Such a hiatus, which would happen to coincide with the midpoint of the N.H.L. season, would only benefit the league.

Should they adopt this policy (and should the International Olympic Committee accept it), not one, but many nations would prosper. About 60 percent of players in the N.H.L. are Canadian. With the likes of Mario Lemieux and Eric Lindros in the tournament, they would likely be the favorites.

The U.S., as well as European nations who claim such stars as Jari Kurri and Peter Bondra, would all have improved squads. It would remain to be seen if the stars of the former Soviet powerhouse would be welcomed back to their national team. Should Russkies like Pavel Bure and Sergei Fedorov participate, what a tournament we would have.

More than just the fantastic hockey, the National Hockey League would benefit from the exposure. The league set itself back marketing-wise by burying itself on SportsChannel America for four years. Now back on the more widely-received ESPN, N.H.L. popularity can only begin to rise, and the national and worldwide exposure associated with the Olympics could be all that this league needs to shed the tag of being the "fourth major sport."

Major League Baseball and the U.S.I.O.C. are considering making up their team of a combined roster of college stars and retired big leaguers. The likely breakdown would be about 60 percent amateurs and 40 percent former pros.

When you consider the players who may be retired by the 1996 games in Atlanta, you can come up with a rather formidable list that could include Ryan, Robin Yount, Andre Dawson, Ozzie Smith, and even Roger Clemens. Unlike the N.H.L., Major League Baseball would obviously not halt its season just as the pennant races are heating up, but having the aged heroes back in the limelight would serve as a break for the fans and really get them ready for September and October.

Besides, all of you who are still mourning over the folding of the Senior League would also be satisfied.

Golf is a different story in that it is the least likely to occur. Not only could it pose logistical problems for the host city, but there just isn't the enthusiasm among the players as there is in the other sports.

Why should there be? Players from all over the world gather in the four major events every year to determine the best golfers in the world. Could winning an Olympic gold medal top winning a green jacket at the Masters? Pro golfers say not a chance. In addition, golf would not get the television exposure because it takes so darn long. If you remember back to the mid-1980's, though, people said the same things about tennis, and that is now a medal sport.

Would the Olympic Games benefit from professionals in these sports taking part? I say yes. It appears that this is the

Lafayette too much for Bison, 49-7

Amidst internal upheaval, Bucknell (3-7) falls to league champion Leopards; B.U. faces Colgate tomorrow

BY JON TERRY
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Lost amidst last week's controversy concerning team dissention among the Bucknell football players and coaches was the realization that the Bison were in the unenviable position of taking on the Patriot League's best team that weekend.

Last Saturday Lafayette came into Lewisburg on the heels of an emotional win over traditional conference power Holy Cross. It was the team's third straight league win, and the Leopards were hungry to make it four in a row against the Bison (3-7) and clinch their first Patriot League title since 1988. After its dominating 49-7 triumph over Bucknell, no one could argue with the fact that Lafayette is, indeed, the class of the league.

The Bison actually came out fired-up themselves, putting to rest doubts regarding their hunger after the confrontation on Friday night during a team meeting. Much to the contrary, and to their credit, they seemed to rally around their coach in an effort to make something out of this season to forget.

Head coach Lou Maranzana seemingly attempted to answer all of his critics that say he is too conservative in his play-calling by ordering an onside kick on the game's opening kickoff. Although Lafayette (7-3) recovered the ball, the decision reflected the aggressive and somewhat ticked-off attitude of the team.

Once Lafayette took over possession, though, those in attendance at Christy Mathewson Stadium found out who the more talented team was. Tailback Erik Marsh immediately rushed for 18 yards, then twice more for 12. He eventually capped off the nine-play drive with a four-yard run to give the Leopards a 7-0 advantage.

Rob Glus '95 started at quarterback, and he engineered a solid, controlled opening drive which utilized the running of Matt Walsh '93 and two key passes for first downs. The drive was spoiled, however, when Walsh lost a fumble on the tenth play of the drive at the Lafayette 21-yard line.

Leopard quarterback Tom Kirchhoff made sure that his team capitalized on the turnover by leading a ten-play drive of his own. A 31-yard touchdown pass to Jamal Jordan gave them the early two-touchdown lead.

The second quarter turned into a turnoverfest as each team lost a fumble, and Bucknell's Rob Fraass '93 picked off a Kirchhoff pass. On the ensuing drive, Walsh took advantage of a great block by wideout Whitey Berardinelli '93 and rambled 51 yards down to the Lafayette nine-yard line. The big play marked the longest run from scrimmage of Walsh's career.

Three plays later, Glus found tight end Corey Zayatz '93 in the end zone. It was Zayatz's first career touchdown, and an Erik Klingner '94 extra point made it a 14-7 ball game.

Solaida Mamsaang—The Bucknellian

Tailback Matt Walsh '93 breaks through a hole and eludes Lafayette defenders. Walsh rumbled for 153 yards on 21 carries in the home loss last weekend.

The rest of the contest was then dominated by Lafayette. The visitors answered the Zayatz score with touchdowns on their next two drives, and only an interception by Jeff Wall '93 prevented a possible third. With the score 28-7 at the half, much of the Bison's early emotions were taken out of them.

The Leopards scored on their first possession of the second half after taking over on a Walsh fumble. Then, just 11 seconds later, Pete Ohnegian intercepted a Glus pass and returned it 12 yards for another score, giving Lafayette a commanding 42-7 lead.

Peter Harteveld '96 was then given a chance to run the show for the Orange and Blue, but his first drive resulted in an interception deep in Bucknell territory. Again the enemies from Easton put the ball in the end zone, and they led the shell-shocked Bison 49-7 with five minutes still remaining in the third quarter.

Both teams simply wanted the game to end at that point, and Lafayette cleared its bench. After trading fruitless drives for the last 20 minutes of the contest, the day was finally over.

When the smoke had cleared, Lafayette had gained 512 total yards of offense, 373 of them on the ground. Marsh racked up 120 rushing yards and Phil Robinson accumulated 111. Kirchhoff had a good day as well, completing 11 of 19 passes for 119 yards and three touchdowns.

As for the Bison, Walsh had one of the better games of his career, gaining 153 yards on 21 carries. The senior was also a key receiver out of the backfield, catching five balls for 53 yards.

For Walsh, it was his fifth 100-yard effort of the year, and the tailback has accounted for 96 percent of Bucknell's rushing yards in the last two games, and 68 percent for the year. He now ranks 12th in Patriot League history in total yards after eclipsing the 3,000-yard plateau on Saturday.

With a career total of 3,060 all-purpose yards, Walsh needs a mere 1,344 yards in his last game tomorrow to break the school record held by Dan Scocca '91.

In all, Bucknell was hurt by sloppy play, as evidenced by six turnovers (three fumbles and three interceptions) and seven penalties. The team will have to clean these areas up significantly to hang with Colgate (4-6) tomorrow afternoon in Lewisburg.

The Red Raiders have lost three straight contests, including an 18-17 heartbreaker to Holy Cross last week in which they missed a 20-yard field goal in the final seconds. Quarterback Jim Russell completed 20 of 29 passes in that game, and he also ran for a 62-yard touchdown. Russell, a threat to run if forced out of the pocket, has rushed for 433 yards this year.

Backup tailback Dana Farland, filling in for 820-yard rusher Bill Sparacio, compiled 101 yards on 18 carries against Holy Cross.

Colgate, which leads the all-time series with Bucknell 30-10, defeated the Bison 38-6 last season, rolling up 345 yards on the ground and 503 overall.

Lady Bison surge up to 2-1; men's team loses to Drexel but times well, is still winless in 1992 campaign

WOMEN'S

Ten weeks of vigorous training, double workouts, and a good deal of dedication paid off for the Bucknell women's swim team as it posted a 143-96 victory over Drexel last Saturday in Philadelphia.

The competition took place only three days after the squad's dual meet against UMBC.

The meet with the Dragons began with a superb effort from all 12 ladies who competed in the 4x100 medley relay. Bucknell took first, second, and third, with a winning time of 4:29.19 by Kathleen Hartnett '94, Jean Cadigan '95, Margaret Grunow '93, and Jeanne Klawon '95.

The next event, the 1,000-yard freestyle, proved to be just as powerful, with the Bison sweeping it away by taking first, second and third places.

Linda Fink '95 proved her dominance in the water with a winning time of 10:55.47. Second was snagged by Erica Cantwell '96, and junior Anne Marie Neilson placed third.

As the meet proceeded and with the help of head coach Lynn Kachmarik and co-captains Grunow and Wendy Sheldon '93, the Bucknell swimmers wanted nothing more than to continue this winning streak until the end.

So they did.

The 200-yard free turned out to be another success with Carolyn Haggerty '93 placing third, Rose Maguire '96 taking second, and Hartnett earning an additional first place. She touched the wall with a finishing time of 1:58.77.

The Lady Bison team spirit dominated the Dragons both in the water and on the pool deck. Grunow dove into the following event, the 50-yard freestyle, and 24.3 seconds later she handed another win to Bucknell. Klawon took third in the event.

In the 200 Individual Medley Sheldon swam to a powerful third-place finish and, one event later, Haggerty and sophomore Lynda Walford placed second and third, respectively, in the 200 butterfly. Grunow had her third win of the day in the 100-yard free.

Hartnett's third win of the day came in the 200 backstroke, with sophomore Colleen Brooks taking second.

Then, for the fourth time that day, Bucknell stole first, second, and third places away from Drexel in the 500-yard free.

Kristin Evans '94 finished third, Cantwell took another second, and Fink again won with a time of 5:22.58. In the 200 breaststroke, Cadigan placed second, followed by Alyson Gillespie '96, who took third.

In the final swimming event of the meet, the 4x100 free relay, DiLenge, Maguire, Sheldon, and Klawon pulled together to take first.

In addition to having some truly memorable performances in the water, the women divers added some extra points to the winning score. Deb Zapotocky '94 had a third-place finish on the one-meter board, and sophomore Julie Kotarba placed fourth. On the three-meter, Zapatocky took second while Heather Steinfeld '96 took fourth.

Women's co-captain Margaret Grunow '93 knifes through the water en route to one of her many victories last season.

As if dominating that meet was not enough for the Lady Bison, four days later they took a short van ride to neighboring Bloomsburg and once again showed who was boss.

Once more, Grunow (four first place finishes), Hartnett (three), and Fink (one) had some pleasing results. Even though the women were worn down and tired, Brooks and Gillespie also pulled through to win a few events, in backstroke and breastroke, respectively.

Instead of complaints from the mouths of the swimmers about having their third meet in one week, all that could be heard from the pool deck was cheering as the meet started out on the right foot. Hartnett, Cadigan, Grunow, and Klawon finished first in the 200 medley relay with a time of 1:55.42.

In the 1,000 free, Fink finished with a winning time of 10:56.14, and Cantwell came in with a strong third. Grunow's second win of the day came in the 200 free at 1:54.67, and Maguire took third in the event.

Brooks' wins came in the 100- and 200-yard backstroke events, and closely behind her was Lorette Schroth '96, who finished third and second, respectively.

Gillespie stole first place away from the Bloomsburg women in the 100-yard breast, and she placed second in the 200 breast. Not far behind her in the 100 event was Cadigan, who placed third, only .68 seconds away from Gillespie's winning time of a 1:12.11.

The 200 fly followed with Haggerty taking third. Soon after came Hartnett, and Klawon dove into the water to place first and third, respectively, in the 50 free.

Even though it was quite obvious to the Bison who was stronger in the water, the second half of the meet turned out to be just as successful as the first. Grunow grabbed her third win of the evening in the 100 free with a time of 52.96. Her fourth win was in the 100 fly, as she touched the wall at 58.91.

In the 500 free, Bucknell again showed its strength with a second and third place, achieved by Maguire and Walford. Hartnett ended the meet for herself on a good note as she easily won her race in the 200 IM, coming in at 2:14.93.

For the last event of the evening, DiLenge, Maguire, Neilson, and Klawon each swam a 100-yard free and finished second in the 4x100-yard free relay, closely behind Bloomsburg.

On the one-meter board, Zapotocky gracefully dove to a second place finish. Kotarba took fourth and Steinfeld followed in fifth.

Although the Bucknell women are pleased with their most recent performances, things are going to get even tougher in the coming days.

Tomorrow at 1 p.m. in Freas Rooke Pool they will host Patriot League competitor Navy, who the Lady Bison took second to at the championships last year. Now back in the water, the squad is looking forward to showing the Midshipmen who will dominate the league this winter.

Following their meet on Saturday, the Bison will get right back into the pool on Tuesday, as they host LaSalle.

MEN'S

In its second meet of the season last Saturday, the Bucknell men's swim team suffered another loss, this time to the Drexel Dragons. Despite the 136-103 defeat on the road, the Bison men (0-2) walked away pleased, grabbing first in six of the 13 events and recording several excellent times.

"I think the team in general did really well," said Jay Gross '93. "We may not have won, but we had a lot of good swims and a lot of guys lowered their times from the last meet."

Gross, a co-captain for the team, seized two of the first places with wins in the 50 and 100 freestyles. His times of 21.39 and 47.49 respectively were excellent in-season marks.

Rick Steenson '95 garnered a win in the 200 Individual Medley while placing second in the 200 butterfly with an impressive time of 1:58.35.

Under the guidance of new diving coach Mark Arcuri, Eric Carr '93 dove to a

FLAG&B releases list of campus resources

BY MICHELLE MANZO
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Bucknell's Friends of Lesbians, Gays, and Bisexuals (FLAG &B) support group has developed a list of campus resources which will be circulated next semester.

According to Amanda Swarr '93, student liaison for FLAG &B, the intent of the list is to "make a more visible presence of lesbian, gay, and bisexual issues."

Currently one of the largest problems homosexual and bisexual students face is that, according to Swarr "a lot of people don't know who or where to ask".

In an environment where homosexuality and bisexuality are often feared and ignored, it is difficult for people to freely practice other sexual orientations, said Swarr.

On Bucknell's campus in particular, there are several different groups and organizations formed of both the student body and the administration.

The Bucknell Lesbian/ Gay/ Bisexual Resource list is an attempt to let "people see what the opportunities are."

When talking about the intentions of the list, Swarr also mentions "consciousness raising" as a main objective. The list provides means for students to contact members and advisors of each group.

Just this year Bucknell has created a new employed position on campus in order to increase awareness and support for lesbian, gay, and bisexual organization.

The position is held by Matthew Frericks who acts as an advisor to Lesbian, Gay, and Bisexual students.

As an advisor Mr. Frericks objectives are to "offer support for the Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual community at Bucknell", and to "provide educational opportunities in conjunction with the office of Residential life and other groups on campus".

Frericks also observes that "societal messages are negative" towards various sexual orientations which in turn "creates an atmosphere where it is difficult for individuals to accept oneself as they are."

According to Frericks, one of the most important ob-

Alcohol Abstinence Week to be held in the Spring

BY MARIA GLOD
Bucknellian Staff Writer

In order to increase awareness of the problem of alcohol abuse on campus and in society at large, an alcohol abstinence week will be held during the spring semester, according to Dr. Don Stechschulte, director of health services.

Several members of the campus community have come together in support of this event which will give students the opportunity to reflect on the role alcohol plays in their lives and to explore other possibilities of social interaction.

"Many of us think we can stay away from alcohol for a specified amount of time and if we are wrong about that this is a good way to find out."
—Trudy Cunningham, associate dean of engineering

"What is different about this program is that it stresses not drinking as opposed to responsible drinking," said John Dunlop, dean of students. "It is a significant effort to suggest that all members of the campus community think about not drinking for health reasons rather than legal reasons."

"The more I see, the more alcohol seems to be the root of many evils on this campus. Taking time to reflect on that may be helpful," said Stechschulte.

Both Interfraternity Council, and the Panhellenic council have been asked to support alcohol abstinence week.

"Because the Greek population represents a significant segment of the campus population, their support is important. They would provide a great deal of leadership and influence in making it a campus wide phenomenon."

According to Scott Alfieri, IFC president-elect, "It will be examined at the next meeting and I think it is a good idea that Greeks will support."

According to Stechschulte, the average college student spends $448.00 a year on the purchase of alcoholic beverages. At Bucknell, approximately 76% of the student body consumes alcohol representing a weekly tab of $22,929.20.

Several major breweries including Anheuser Busch, Coors, Miller and Genesee have been contacted and asked to use this week as a time to promote their non-alcoholic products.

"I hope that just as anytime when people do without something it will give them a chance to reflect on the role it plays in their life," said Eugenia Gerdes, dean of arts and science.

According to Stechschulte, this period will allow students to gain an understanding about the image that the media presents of alcohol as being necessary to have a good time.

"Alcohol on a college campus sometimes assumes too great a role for students and serves as a buffer that takes away from deeper social relationships," said Larry Shinn, vice president for academic affairs. During this week activities will be planned to give students other social options that do not involve alcohol consumption.

University Chaplain, Alison Boden said, "Alcohol abstinence week can help students to better understand the role alcohol plays in friendships, dating relationships and total life at Bucknell."

"Many of us think we can stay away from alcohol for a specified amount of time and if we are wrong about that this is a good way to find out," said Trudy Cunningham, associate dean of engineering.

"If anyone cannot abstain from alcohol for seven days, I think they need to look long and hard at their drinking habits," said Stechschulte.

Condoms available free of charge

BY MARIA GLOD AND DEB MANASSE
Bucknellian Staff Writers

In an effort to prevent sexually transmitted disease and unwanted pregnancy among Bucknell students, condoms will be available free of charge at the Ziegler Health Center, according to Dr. Don Stechschulte, director of medical services.

"Our position is that abstinence is best but because we are aware that students may not choose abstinence, we believe that we must try to help students protect themselves," said Barbara Shailor, vice president for student services.

Stechshulte said that hopefully the stigma that many students identify with purchasing contraceptives in a store will not effect their decision to use condoms because they will be easily accessible.

"People don't like to buy condoms because they think it's too embarrassing," said Stechshulte.

According Stechschulte the heterosexual population ages 19 to 28 represent the fastest-growing population of new AIDS cases in the United States. In addition, cases of other sexually transmitted diseases such as Hepatitis B and C and the human papilloma virus are increasing.

"Because we are aware that students may not choose abstinence, we believe that we must try to help students protect themselves"
— Barbara Shailor, vice-president for student services

"A latex condom used effectively provides the best protection against sexually transmitted diseases," said Stechschulte.

"We are in the process of creating other distribution centers around campus where condoms will be sold at cost," said Stechschulte.

"The university has a responsibility to point out that abstinence is still a sensible option and may be the best one," said John Dunlop, dean of students. "The reality, however, is that many people may be sexually active. For an institution to deny that that is the case is irresponsible."

According to Stechtschulte condoms are 80% effective in preventing pregnancy and their ineffectiveness is often due to improper use.

If the condoms are used properly, they could be 97 to 98% effective.

"We are making condoms available and stressing that given all we know medically, abstinence is still the best thing," said Shailor.

Deer found mutilated in Swartz

BY LAURA HINSMAN AND JESSICA SKLUTE
Bucknellian Staff Writers

Residence Director of Swartz Hall, Steve Galloway, reported to Public Safety on November 15, that a dead deer had been discovered in Swartz TV lounge. The two responding officers found the dead animal lying on a sofa in the lounge. According to the Public Safety incident report, the deer appeared to have died due to injuries sustained after having been struck by an automobile. The officers ascertained that the deer had been killed off-campus, and then transported to Swartz lounge by a Bucknell student.

At the time the deer was discovered in Swartz lounge, its open stomach cavity had been stuffed with frozen hamburger patties, and the carcass has been covered with mustard. A plastic spoon had been placed in its mouth, and a pen had been forced into its right eye. After further investigation, Bucknell authorities determined that these acts had been committed by a second student. These facts have been verified by the Security Log.

Following contact with the Pennsylvania Game Commission, security officers were advised to dispose of the carcass as they deemed appropriate. The deer was given to Physical Plant which was instructed by security to remove the carcass. Extra custodians were required to clean and sanitize the lounge.

The exact disciplinary measures to be taken against both students are presently unknown.

Bucknell community celebrates Kwanzaa

BY MARIA GLOD
Bucknellian Staff Writer

"Kwanzaa allows the Afrikan-American community to reaffirm our culture, show pride in it, and show the campus that it is not only a racial difference but that Afrikan-American denotes a different culture and different rituals," said Terence Riley '94.

Kappa Alpha Psi Fraternity sponsored the celebration of Kwanzaa on campus along with several other organizations serving as co-sponsors.

Each year during the period of December 26 to January 1, the Afrikan-American community celebrates their history and culture to gain a heightened awareness of their cultural background. Kwanzaa was created by Dr. Maulana Ron Karenga in 1966 as an Afrikan-American community celebration.

During this seven day celebration, each day represents a different principle denoted by a word from the Ki Swahili language. Umoja (Unity), Kujichagulia (self-determination) and Nia (purpose) are some of the principles that were examined throughout the week during a principle reading held each evening at 7th street house.

According to Riley, "Ki Swahili is used because many slaves came from West Africa and many Afrikan-Americans find their roots in this area.

This evening the principle reading will focus on Kuumba (creativity). The celebration will culminate on Saturday at with a Karamu dinner which will consist of West Indian cuisine and a principle reading on Imani (faith).

" The word Kwanzaa is also Ki Swahili and means first harvest. "This shows that Kwanzaa is a celebration of life," said Riley.

Each year from Dec. 26 to Jan. 1., the Afrikan-American community celebrates their cultural background. During each day of this period a different principle is examined.

jectives is to increase the awareness of lesbian, gay, and bisexual issues. According to a research study conducted in the 1950's, 10% of any given population is homosexual.

In effect, this is an increasingly large number and thus more attention and awareness should be devoted to issues that effect a significant number of individuals, said Frericks.

"People deny or can't believe that there could be potentially 350 or more homosexuals on campus at Bucknell," said Frericks.

Frericks also stresses the importance of creating a non-threatening environment where people of diverse sexual orientations can feel comfortable and know that there are supportive groups and organizations on campus.

He adds that there is "no doubt that a significant number of students are struggling with their sexuality and may be feeling that they have no one to talk to."

In respect to the resource list, it provides individuals with information on how and who to contact if that is their choice, without having to search for the information and take the risk of having "suspicions thrown upon them" by other students.

False fire alarms threaten safety

BY NANCY NORBECK
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Since the beginning of October, Public Safety has responded to a total of 136 fire alarms. Of these alarms, only one was caused by a real fire.

"People who pull fire alarms falsely are usually drunk and behaving abnormally. They usually act late at night. It's an act of anger or defiance against the University, but the only people the alarms really hurt are the students in the residence halls. Security officers are on duty anyway at that time," said Vince DeCerchio, director of Public Safety.

As the semester draws to a close, false fire alarms become more frequent. According to DeCerchio, the increase in false alarms is due to the stress caused by the end of the semester.

"We see an increase in party activity around this time, and some people choose to work off their stress by pulling a fire alarm," he said.

If a student is caught pulling a fire alarm, or interferes with other fire equipment such as smoke detectors and fire extinguishers, for no apparent reason, he or she is criminally prosecuted.

The charge of tampering with fire equipment is a misdemeanor and is considered a serious offense. Offenders may also be charged with criminal mischief or disorderly conduct. Charges are handled by the police department.

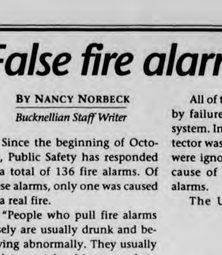
This procedure is the same at most other schools.

"People who pull fire alarms are playing with death," DeCerchio said.

"In the past thirteen years, I've served at two schools, in addition to Bucknell, and I've seen four deaths related to fire in that time."

All of those deaths were caused by failures in the early warning system. In these cases, a smoke detector was damaged, or the alarms were ignored by the students because of the frequency of false alarms.

The United States has the highest incidence of fire related deaths in the world, and twice as many as Great Britain, which is the second highest. Fires occur more frequently on campuses because of the higher concentration of people and activity.



Susan Naughton— The Bucknellian

In the last three months Public Safety officers have responded to over 100 false fire alarms.

In the past two years, Bucknell has experienced three major fires and a dozen smaller ones.

In the recent fire at Tau Kappa Epsilon, the only thing that saved lives were the smoke alarms.

"Our officers arrived at TKE within ninety seconds. Within two minutes, the halls were overcome with smoke so dense that one of the officers was treated for smoke inhalation," DeCerchio said.

Most fire related deaths are the result of smoke inhalation. Smoke can overtake an area long before flames do, causing anyone remaining to asphyxiate from oxygen deprivation.

One trashcan fire can produce enough smoke to overtake an entire residence hall wing.

Many students become frustrated after numerous false alarms and disregard them. This decision creates a serious problem, because in the event of a real fire, people are trapped in the building.

Fire spreads much more quickly than many people realize. A trashcan fire can engulf an entire room within five to seven minutes via curtains or other objects. In such cases, the margin of safety for evacuation is very small.

"When that alarm sounds, you only have a certain amount of time to get out," he said.

According to DeCerchio, modern smoke detectors pick up the slightest hints of smoke in the air. By the time smoke is visible, it is probably too late to safely evacuate the building.

"If a room is engulfed and you open the door, that fire will explode out," said DeCerchio.

Public Safety and Resident Assistants try to check every room, but in the event of a real fire, there may only be enough time to check one hall. Anyone else in the building is then at risk.

Students rarely turn offenders in to the authorities, according to DeCerchio. "I'm amazed at the tolerance students have for this sort of thing. They often won't say anything if they know who did it."

However, DeCerchio insisted that peer pressure is one of the best ways of handling an offender.

"If you don't want to turn in your fellow students, at least confront them about their behavior. If you threaten to turn them in, you may be able to get them to stop," DeCerchio said.

The 1992/93 LaFayette Butler Student Book Collection Competition

Undergraduate students with personal unified book collections of any nature are invited to enter the 1992-93 competition. Winning collections will be exhibited in the Bertrand Library. + Co-sponsored by the Bertrand Library and the Bucknell University Bookstore, the competition is named for the late LaFayette Butler, bibliophile, supporter of the library and initiator of the first competition in 1965. A portion of Mr. Butler's own superb personal collection was bequeathed to the Bertrand Library and is the basis of the library's current Special Collections. + First place prize: $200 cash or a $250 Bookstore certificate. Second place prize: $100 cash or a $125 Bookstore certificate. + The judges for the 1992-93 competition are John Kendrick, Professor of Sociology; Martha Verbrugge, Professor of History; and Nancy Weyant, Reference Librarian/Coordinator of Desk Services and Reference Collections. For further information, contact Nancy Weyant at the Bertrand Library.

Detailed rules for entering the book collection competition are available through the library, the bookstore, and on flyers distributed across campus. Closing date for all entries is Friday, March 5, 1993.

PUBLIC SAFETY LOG

Friday, November 20

Officers responded to Vedder Hall for a report of an intoxicated first year student. The student admitted to consuming alcoholic beverages at a fraternity house earlier. He refused any medical treatment, and the resident director was contacted to respond. The student was left in the care of the resident assistants.

Saturday, November 21

A report was received of a fight in progress at Theta Chi fraternity. A student who attempted to break up an altercation had his eye glasses damaged beyond repair during the scuffle. The parties involved will settle the matter among themselves.

Officers responded to the Langone Center on the report of a theft. An unidentified female was noticed carrying two gallon containers through the loading dock door. A description was obtained and search conducted.

The Department of Public Safety received a report of a stolen bicycle. The victim stated that her bike was left unlocked on the Gateway bike rack.

An act of vandalism was reported to have occurred at the Phi Psi fraternity house. Sometime between 1 a.m. and 12 p.m., unknown person(s) did break a door window at the house. There were no witnesses.

Sunday, November 22

Officers responded to the Phi Gamma Delta fraternity house on the report of an act of vandalism that had just occurred. The individual responsible for the act was being detained by members of the fraternity. Lewisburg police responded and cited the accused for underage drinking. The fraternity asked for restitution damages and did not wish to press vandalism charges.

At 4:30 p.m., a student reported that an unknown person(s) did scratch and dent his 1981 Mercedes. The incident occurred sometimes between 9 p.m. and midnight on November 20.

Officers received a report of a window pane that was struck and cracked by a BB. A search of the area for responsible person(s) met with negative results.

A student who had parked his car in the Bucknell West parking lot reported the theft of a hubcap from his Volkswagon automobile. The value of the hubcap is unknown.

Tuesday, November 24

A Swartz Hall resident assistant reported a broken window in a room in the D Wing of the building. The cause for the broken window is undetermined at this time.

Wednesday, November 25

At 7:10 a.m., a custodian at Bertrand Library reported that an overhead window in Lower Level Two had been damaged. A search of the outside vicinity uncovered a gold ball nearby. This incident occurred sometime after closing on November 24. The replacement cost of the window is approximately $800.

Officers were dispatched at 2:21 a.m. to the third floor, B Wing of Swartz Hall for a fire alarm activation. They discovered that unknown person(s) did ignite a bulletin board on a resident's door, causing the alarm to activate. No damage was done to the door.

Monday, November 30

A resident of Bucknell West reported the theft of his bicycle from the hallway of his Mod. It was taken sometime between 1 a.m. and 10 a.m. on November 22. The missing bike is valued at $200.

Tuesday, December 1

Officers responded to Harris Hall for a student reportedly experiencing chest pain. Medics and an ambulance were dispatched and transported the ill student to the Evangelical emergency room for treatment.

Wednesday, December 2

Public Safety received a report of a series of thefts that were discovered in the Olin Science, Biology and Chemistry buildings. Nineteen signs were removed from various doors throughout the complex. They were removed between 2:30 p.m. on December 1 and 6 a.m. December 2, as reported by Physical Plant personnel.

Officers were dispatched to Vedder Hall on a complaint of illegal solicitation. Officers located three individuals who were attempting to sell perfume and cologne to students. Individuals were removed from the building and escorted off campus after being advised of the University's policy on solicitation.

Thursday, December 3

Officers were dispatched to Smith Hall to a report of an injured student. They found that the student had sustained laceration to his thumb and middle finger while opening a tin food can. Sterile bandages were applied and the student was transported by the Student Health Service to the Evangelical emergency room for further treatment.

This year's services will be held on Dec. 5, 6, 7, and 9.

University trims Christmas trees

BY DEB MANASSE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

In an effort to move toward the goal of the "greening of Bucknell," the university has cut the number of Christmas trees that will deck the campus halls this holiday season.

University president Gary Sojka announced at a recent meeting of the newly formed Green Task Force that the university will have only four trees this year in comparison to the 100 that have been purchased and displayed in previous years.

The four trees will be placed in Rooke Chapel, the Langone Center, the admissions office and in the academic quad.

Said Sojka, "I am willing to be known as the Christmas Scrooge to make the point that we are very serious about the university's commitment to helping preserve the environment."

Sojka stressed that the move toward fewer trees serves a dual purpose as both an environmental and a cost-cutting measure.

"Disposing of the trees impacts on the environment, and they are also expensive," said Sojka.

Mary Evelyn Tucker, associate professor of religion and co-convener of the Green Task Force, echoed Sojka's sentiments.

"The task force is aiming at things that will save Bucknell money and will also be environmentally sensitive," said Tucker.

In past years, about three or four people spent a full day delivering the 100 trees to various Bucknell offices, according to Eric Schmidt, purchasing agent.

"Sustainable growth in quality is what the task force seeks and we can achieve that goal only if as an institution we conduct our business in an environmentally responsible and a fiscally sound fashion," said Sojka.

The Green Task force is an outgrowth of the recent President's Forum on the Environmental Imperative.

The admissions office is one of the four locations of university purchased Christmas trees this season. The universtiy decided to limit the number of trees as a part of the "greening of Bucknell."

State police enforce liquor control

BY CATHY DARRUP
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The Pennsylvania State Police Liquor Control Enforcement agency has recently incorporated much stronger monitoring tactics than in previous years on college and university campuses.

The L.C.E. has employed undercover officers to attend fraternity parties disguised as college students in an effort to detect underage drinkers.

Franklin and Marshall College in Lancaster recently fell victim to the L.C.E.'s latest tactics, when students were arrested and prosecuted by undercover officers for underage drinking.

Bucknell, even though it is a private institution, is also vulnerable to the monitoring tactics.

Contrary to popular student belief, the L.C.E. does not need to seek or be given the permission of a school's administration before it can invade, however secretly, a fraternity party, said Bucknell President Gary Sojka.

He said they must, however, have "some probable cause, particularly a noise complaint from the community" to suspect a problem and act on it.

The scene of a typical fraternity party on campus, including a heavy flow of underage students in the vicinity of alcoholic beverages, would qualify as suspicious activity.

Sojka received an announcement in September that the Liquor Control Enforcement agency would be employing new methods for monitoring alcohol violations, but specifics concerning which schools would be investigated or when were not released.

In light of the Franklin and Marshall secret raid, Sojka commented that the student body "needs to be aware of what methods the L.C.E. uses," as it is another sobering reason for students to be cautious of the dangers of underage drinking.

"Students need to be aware that the laws have got more teeth than they may have thought," he said.

Director of Public Safety Vince DeCerchio said that Bucknell is protecting itself by the active participation of the Panhellenic Council, the InterFraternity Council, and other student organizations who monitor social events that serve alcohol according to the correct alcohol procedure.

DeCerchio said that the Greek monitoring team and the wristband policy are two elements that contribute to a successful procedure.

"I know this isn't a perfect procedure and it has its critics," DeCerchio said, "but it gets progressively better each year" with the cooperation of all student organizations involved.

"The L.C.B. has embarked on a much stronger policy of monitoring alcohol consumption on colleges and universities," DeCerchio said.

He said that Pennsylvania's Act 31 has prompted state agencies to enforce harsher techniques.

He also cites an increase of problems associated with alcohol, such as accidents, injuries, sexual assaults and vandalism as contributing to harsher techniques.

Two rapes occur at Bloomsburg

BY JAMIE DIAFERIA
Bucknellian Staff Writer

A female student at Bloomsburg University was raped last week in an off-campus apartment, marking the second time in less than a month that an attack has occurred at the school, according to the Daily Item.

The 22-year-old student got up to go to the bathroom at 3 a.m., and was attacked as she walked back to her room. The assailant threw a blanket over the head of the student and raped her repeatedly, according to Bloomsburg police.

Another student was raped October 31 in the locker room of the University gymnasium, and police believe there are enough similarities to link the two incidents.

The second victim lives with six roommates, all of whom had left for Thanksgiving Break when the assault occurred.

Police believe the assailant had been in the student's house for several hours before he attacked the female.

"She swore she heard someone come in 30 minutes after midnight," Patrolman Joseph Wondolowski told the Daily Item.

The student thought the rapist might have had a knife, although she was not certain. She suffered a minor abrasion on her hand, according to police, but it is unclear what caused the wound.

In both incidents, it was also reported by students that they were unable to see their attacker, and due to the proximity of the assaults—the second attack occurred a few blocks from the gymnasium—police feel the same male may have been involved.

Police are currently meeting with campus security to exchange information, although Wondoloski admitted they have possible leads.

New BSG officers elected

BY JEFF BOULTER

Brian Mannix, Heather Eisenman, Aubrey Schneggenburger, and Jacinta Bares were elected BSG President, First Vice President, Second Vice President, and Treasurer respectively in the campus wide election held November 23.

The newly elected President, Mannix hopes to address those issues students are the most concerned about such as the controversial Jan Plan elimination. He said he is looking into reinstating the Jan Plan as a required part of the curriculum.

He also would like to tap the resources of the student body. "There's only 40 of us on BSG, but there are a lot of other people out there who want to do something," Mannix said.

As for streamlining BSG itself, Mannix said he is considering the possibility of hiring an outside firm to analyze BSG and suggest where it could be improved.

As first Vice-president, Eisenman's first priority is communication with the students.

"That one's not going to die," she said. "BSG does not stand alone...it will be the student voice."

Aubrey Schneggenburger said she will tackle the fairness of the proposed drinking policy next semester. When asked about the policy, she commented, "If you're in a fraternity, you can drink whenever you want." She said that the resolutions to present drinking punishment are too stringent and unfair to students in traditional residence halls.

Heather Jobson —The Bucknellian

Brian Mannix '94, has been elected as new BSG president

Treasurer Jacinta Bares believes strongly in the present Appropriation Guidelines and said that the only changes necessarily are those related to inflation. Consistent with her campaign stance, Bares plans to implement a "equal helping" policy, giving no special consideration to minority or special interest groups.

Present BSG President Mike Thomas said he is enthusiastic about the new officers. Thomas said, "Brian will do an exceptional job because he is coming into the office with a level of information unparalleled by any BSG President."

Hot issues in the next term, according to Mike Thomas, will be "the government structure as a whole," raising BSG's status to that of the faculty, and changing the University's relations to student organizations such as BSG, IOC, the Greeks and RHA.

Soon to be out of elected office, Thomas took this opportunity to criticize the student body for their apathy. "Bucknell students as a whole do not care about anything until it becomes policy," and uses the tuition increase as an example.

Thomas held a student forum about the issue several months before the increase was made by the trustees and only 6 students were present.

"I think Bucknell students get so wrapped up in themselves and their classes...that they don't look at what's going on around them until that environment has changed."

Thomas expressed his hope that the new president and the rest of the officers will be able to motivate the students during their four years here.

Int'l Ed office sponsors holiday party

Students and Bucknell families are invited to help celebrate the holiday season together with games for kids, music and student entertainment. Beverages with homemade traditional sweets from around the world will be provided.

The event will take place on Saturday, December 5th at 12:30 pm in the Terrace Room of the Langone Center. This is a good chance to meet members of Bucknell's international community.

Study finds men to resist help

A study conducted by senior Tom Lehman and assistant psychology professor Kimberly Daubman has concluded that men respond negativey to help whereas women tend to take advantage of it. The conclusion of the study cited that men's self-esteem is hurt by helping them, and they responded to this by not working as hard.

The fourty-three students that participated in the study were asked to solve anagrams.

Bookstore buy-back to be held

The bookstore will be buying back used textbooks from Monday, December 14 through Saturday, December 19 from 9:00 am to 4:30 pm.

Books requested by professors for next semester will be bought at 50% of the present retail price of a new book. Most books that have not been requested for next semester will be bought at 1/3 of the market value or 10 of prepriced paperbacks. A Bucknell ID must be presented at the time of the buy-back.

The giving tree still needs gifts

Snowflakes from the giving tree can still be picked up on the second floor of the Langone Center, next to the information desk. On each snowflake is a gift for a needy person in the Lewisburg area. Gifts can be brought to the Langone Center Office and should be in by Monday, December 7th although gifts will be accepted up to the end of finals. The BISON Volunteers are very appreciative of all the donations so far and hope to see many more come in by Monday.

Fremont Scholarship established

President Gary Sojka announced the establishment of the Michael M. and Lilliam Amber Fremont International Scolarship on November 19. The scholarship will be given to non-US citizens. It is hopeful that the scholarship will promote international relationships on the Bucknell campus.

Library to be open later hours

The Bertrand Library will extend their hours until 2 am during reading period and finals. These experimental extended hours are a result of an agreement between the University Library Committee and BSG. Library staff will be present in the library during these extended hours to assist students. If these hours are successful, a decision in February may make these hours permanent.

Student president gets $14,000

At Florida A&M University, student body president Roderick Stovall is doing rather well. So well in fact, that he gets $14,000 a year in compensation for his work. Because of the heavy demands of his job, he claims to earn every cent.

Stovall's salary is typical of student executives in Florida State where salaries are sometimes 5 times the national average.

Drinking water banned

A water test at the University of Rhode Island which turned up traces of coliform bacteria has forced students and faculty alike to stay away from the drinking water. Although the bacteria itself is harmless, they may signal the presence of disease in the water.

In one week of the ban, 16,000 gallons of bottled water was consumed on the URI campus.

Professors subject to hate crimes

Professors and a staff member at UC Davis have received hate mail with dead fish. John Poulos recieved a dead catfish with a wire and batteries attached to the fish. An attached note read, "Fish and murders should fry." Several other professors at the University of California Davis have recieved similar mail.

The mail incidents have been classified as hate crimes by the campus police and an investigation is pursuant.

Job expo to be held in Cincinnati

All seniors and recent grads are invited to the Greater Cincinnati Job Expo on Dec. 18. The expo and workshops will be held at the Albert B. Sabin Cincinnati Convention Center, Fifth Street, downtown. Attending will be 50 major employers and the program will run from 10 am to 4 pm.

Attendees are requested to bring at least 10 copies of their resume and dress for interviews. For more information, contact Allison Smith at (513) 579-3160.

BEFORE YOU GRADUATE

The Navy offers you, as a qualified college student, the chance to earn up to $35,000 during your junior and senior years. And you never have to put on a Navy uniform until after graduation. No drills, no summer obligations. In the Nuclear Propulsion Officer Candidate Program you'll get your start in nuclear power where nuclear power started. In the Navy.

After you graduate, you'll get six months of graduate level engineering education in Orlando, Florida, plus six months of hands-on engineering training at a nuclear reactor trainer...and more. Just meet these requirements:

- Have completed sophomore year, majoring in engineering, math, science or chemistry.
- Have a minimum 3.0 GPA.
- Have completed a mathematics sequence through integral calculus.
- Have completed one year of calculus-based physics.
- Be a United States citizen, no more than 26½ years old at time of commissioning.
- Meet Navy's physical standards.

Eight ways to dance boredom away

Charles Curtiss '93 and Melanie Fenwick '94 rehearse for Danna Frangione's "Wishing Bone," one of eight pieces in the Bucknell Dance Company concert. Set to the poetry of Swampy Cree Indians, the performance combines dance and theater techniques.

BY NICOLE COBBAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

With pieces ranging from a romantic Spanish ballet to a country western ballet, the Bucknell Dance Company's latest concert promises to please even the most varied dance critic. Fueled by the dedication of the advisors and the energy of the students, almost half of whom are new to the company this year, the show offers eight distinctly different dances.

"It's a good concert for people who don't like dance or don't know about dance," said Danna Frangione, associate professor of dance.

The Bucknell Dance Company can be seen tonight and tomorrow night at 8 p.m. in the University Theatre, Coleman Hall. Admission is $4 and tickets are available at the door.

The Company continues its tradition of hosting at least two guest artists to choreograph pieces for each show. This semester Paul Abrahamson, director of his own company, The Moose Project, designed a country western ballet set to a collage of music by Bonnie Raitt, Randy Travis, and Michelle Shocked. The piece, a nostalgic and witty commentary on growing up in the southwest, ranges in tone from poignant and sweet to downright cowboy.

Formerly with the Pittsburgh Ballet Theatre, Abrahamson left to form his own company. He is the recipient of many choreography awards including the Pennsylvania State Council on the Arts Choreographic Fellowship and the Carlisle Project Award.

Abrahamson graced the Bucknell stage several years ago when he performed in a duet he choreographed. It was this performance that prompted the Company to invite him back to work this semester.

"Bringing in professional choreographers, particularly someone like Paul who's gone out on his own, adds tremendously to the experience of the dancers because he works in a different way," said Frangione. "The more choreographers you add to a show the more ways of working there are."

Todd Rosenlieb '89 choreographed a jazz work entitled "Groovin'"to "Dream Come True," by the Brand New Heavies. Complete with an irresistable rhythm, bell bottoms, and energy so electric you can feel it, Rosenlieb's piece explodes onto stage.

A recent graduate of New York University's Tisch School of the Performing Arts, Rosenlieb has been performing with the Contemporary Ballet Theatre of Washington and the Second Avenue Dance Company. Rosenlieb also sits on the Bucknell Association of the Arts.

No stranger to the campus, Rosenlieb was instrumental in the growth of the Bucknell Dance Company. Also, he has returned every semester since his graduation to work with the Company.

In addition to choreographing "Groovin," Rosenlieb will be performing in several of the concert's pieces, including a solo in Abrahamson's ballet.

A heavily student oriented program, the Dance Company offers several student choreographed pieces in each of its performances. "They do it for fun," said Shellie Cash-Muller, associate professor of dance. She adds that despite the fact that the Company is a club activity, the participants are very serious about dance. Membership is contingent on a preliminary audition and students are guaranteed to be cast in every concert after their acceptance. Rehearsal processes are several weeks in length, and dancers are expected to attend any and all rehearsals.

Gretchen Wagner '94 and Laurie Turenne '94 co-choreographed a ballet piece, "After the Rain," for tonight's concert. Janelle Oltorik '93 also constructed two pieces, "Yoke of Judgement," a relgious piece, and a modern one set to Michael Jackson's "Dangerous," titled "Insidious."

"Insidious" was choreographed by Oltorik with fellow Company member Charles Curtiss '93. A spicy duet performed by the two choreographers, Oltorik and Curtiss fog the stage with tangible passion.

Frangione points to Oltorik as "the first recruit that came here just for dance." Oltorik has choreographed at least one piece each semester since she landed at Bucknell.

The program is rounded out by works from advisors Frangione and Cash-Muller. Frangione choreographed two pieces, "Song For the Asking," and "Wishing Bone Cycle." An abstract piece combing both the world of theater and dance, "Wishing Bone" is composed of a series of dances with narrative poems from the Swampy Cree Indians. The piece is framed by scenic landscape by Steven Draheim, lighting designer and technical director.

"Luna Negra," a Spanish ballet choreographed by Cash-Muller, throws the audience into the story of a young Spanish Casanova who is haunted by five predatorial females. The Romantic feeling of "Luna Negra" is enhanced by the traditional and elaborate costumes of Mark Minsave '94.

But whether it's the remarkable weaving of costume, lights, and movement, the intensity of the students, or the talent on stage, the Bucknell Dance Company continues its tradition of providing the campus with one of the most highly produced groups at any university level. This weekend's concert provides an eclectic view of the diverse types of dance for the ardent or ignorant audience member.

One of the funkier pieces in Abrahamson's collage of country music, the piece moves with a jazzy rhythm that combines the feeling of a rural attitude with the heaviness of the Deep South.

Holiday service Bucknell style

BY ARA METJIAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Along with the upcoming yuletide season come the much anticipated Christmas events. Bucknell offers its share to the Christmas season with the annual Candlelight Service of Carols at Rooke Chapel. This spiritually fulfilling event is an eagerly awaited highlight on Bucknell's calendar.

The four nights of programming will follow the same general format of previous years. The renowned Rooke Chapel Choir, hailed as one of the top college choirs, will sing a collection of classical, as well as contemporary Christmas songs. Before song will be selected readings from the Old and New Testaments. The readers will vary from President Sojka to faculty members and students. The Candlelight Service will also feature the collective musical talents of the Rooke Chapel Ringers.

This year's Candlelight Service ceremony will have an added extra meaning in itself. The man responsible for the Candlelight Service, William McRae, former professor of music, passed on earlier this year. McRae's legacy will contiue, however, in the minds of all participants as they perform.

Bucknell's Candlelight Service is an event which is eagerly anticipated by the community. Said Rev. Alison Boden, university chaplain, "People were inquiring about tickets as early as August."

In conjunction with the publicity generated by the members of the Bucknell community is the airing of the Candlelight Service on public television. Although this year's performance will not be televised, the performance of 1991 will be shown. PBS shows "A Bucknell Christmas" for four years before recording another one. Last year's performance can be seen during the Christmas week, depending upon local listings.

For Rev. Boden, this year's Candlelight Service will be her first. When she received the position, the service ranked high on the list of benefits Bucknell had to offer. "The Candlelight Service was one of the things I was excited about," said Rev. Boden.

In fact, Rev. Boden witnessed the ceremony last year while here as a candidate for her position. But she soon experienced the overwhelming work behind the scenes of the event. "I didn't realize all of the details involved," said Boden. With the Chapel sold out every night, making sure that the ticket holders are satisfied is a tremendous responsibility.

There are so many positive aspects about the Candlelight Service that it is not confined to a purely religious ceremony. The Service is ecumenical, and people of all faiths are welcome. It is a service that exists to remind people of the transcendental meaning of Christmas. Said Rev. Boden, the Service is "one of promise, hope and peace."

The Candlelight Service also serves to strengthen the community through the focus of the ceremony, the lighting of the candles. "The sharing of the flame is the highlight of the service because of the feeling of unity," said Rev. Boden.

If tickets have not already been obtained, they can be picked up at the ticket office in the University Center. The Candlelight Service will be held December 5, 6, 7, and 9. The ceremony will commence at 7:30 p.m., however, all those that are attending are requested to be seated by 7:15. There is no reserved seating. In addition, people are asked to bring a non-perishable food item to be donated to the Food Bank at the First Baptist Church in Lewisburg.

Rooke Chapel continues its time-honored tradition of holding an annual Candlelight Service of Carols. Repeated for four nights, the Service is interdenominational, holding to the spirit of the holiday season, rather than any one religion.

R.E.M. delivers high-powered message

BY MICHAEL LETTS
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Automatic for the People. It's an appropriate title for R.E.M.'s latest effort. The band who presented us with alternatives to following an inept society during the eighties has seemed to turn to its audience and asked them to find their own inspiration. R.E.M has put together an album that lingers in the shadows and simply lets you pull yourself into the light. The opening lines to the album put it simply—"Smack, crack, bushwhacked, add another one to your act. . . . Hey, kids, rock n' roll, nobody tells you where to go." Not even R.E.M.

Copyrighted by Warner Bros. Inc., 1992

The songs on Automatic for the People reflect the band's outlook on life put to music. While the topics of the songs are quite dark, addressing suicide, political apathy, and death, songs like "Everybody Hurts" help to give the listener a positive attitude towards these problems. Michael Stipe seems to be saying, "hey, things are bad but don't let them drag you down." Lyrics like, "Don't let yourself go because everybody hurts. . . sometimes," and "Its these little things that can pull you under, but sweetness follows," dare you to remain ignorant of the problems of today's world while at the same time reiterate that they can be conquered.

Automatic for the People is a mix of upbeat and mellow tunes that uses quite a bit of orchestration (done by Led Zeppelin utility man John Paul Jones) and lead guitar—a new frontier for guitarist Peter Buck. On songs like, "Drive," "Man on the Moon," "Night Swimming," and "Find the River," the band reaches new musical heights. Stipe's voice resonates beautifully with Buck's melodic feedback, as well as with keyboard work that reminds the listener of The Doors' Ray Manzerek.

However several songs would not have been missed had they been left off the album. "New Orleans Instrumental No. 1" is a perfect example. Its annoying keyboard work and lack of lyrics make it a weak spot on an otherwise beautiful album. "Everybody Hurts," and "Sweetness Follows," are rather uneventful (although this is done on purpose I would expect) and make for slow periods on the album.

Automatic for the People is a new turn for R.E.M. It calls to the listener to take action in life rather than to be a passive watcher. Stipe quietly mentions at the closing of the album that "the ocean is the river's goal and I have got to find the river. . . . all of this is coming your way." Automatic for the People is an accomplishment for R.E.M. musically as well as an accomplishment as a social commentary on an apathetic world.

Condom availability: It's about time

In the area of college administration, the University prides itself as being a leader. Our TIP, alcohol, and sexual assault policies are the models that several other universities use when developing similar policies. We provide progressive sexual health services with a gynecological nurse practitioner and doctors who are in tune with student needs. Until this week, however, the university did not provide condoms to students.

It is a mystery why the university, so advanced in these areas, including sexual health, took so much time to make condoms available to the student body, free of charge. Without the burden of "in loco parentis" the university lagged behind high schools even, where the battle over condoms has been waged for years. Did they fear the backlash from fundamentalists, or parents who thought the administration would be encouraging sex? Probably. In fact, the carefully worded statement that announced the new policy stressed sexual abstinence as an alternative.

However, as we students know, the fact that students have sex is by no means front page news. That lots of students are having lots of sex is no divine revelation. While there are students who are not sexually active now, the condom issue is no less important to them, as many of them will be sexually active by the time they graduate.

At the same time, there is an important point in the university's message. Condoms are not 100% effective against sexually transmitted diseases and pregnancy. This is a medical fact unfortunately backed up by some students' experience.

Condoms are, however, one essential defense against pregnancy and STD's. Monogamy helps. Abstinence eliminates the issue.

The majority of us men and women who choose to be sexually active, should take advantage of this new service. It was not designed to make the university look good. It, more than any other university policy, was designed to meet the needs of the student body.

Using this service and using the condoms are different issues. Many of us, who have condoms in hand, will not use them for fear of spoiling the moment. Instead, we risk spoiling a lifetime. This means that women must insist upon using a condom when their partners seem unwilling. If your boyfriend says he doesn't have one, pull one out that you picked up from the Student Health Services.

The university can only do so much. In the heat of passion we will not have Barbara Shailor or Don Stechschulte to say stop, and remind us to use a condom. Protecting ourselves is ultimately a matter of individual responsibility. In that respect, little has changed.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

P.O.W.E.R. addresses responses...

TO THE EDITOR:

P.O.W.E.R. would like to address responses to the chalk talk and the effigy of a rape victim that appeared on the academic quad and uphill L.C. on Wednesday [November 18].

Unsurprisingly, our messages elicited a strong reaction from the Bucknell community. We observed both positive and negative responses from people as they read quotes on the sidewalk. The following phrases were written beside P.O.W.E.R.'s chalkings:

"Colored Chalk Sucks"

"If she cries rape, sewer" (with an arrow pointing to the sewer)

"The average man is raped every six minutes"

"What's for dinner?"

The response our chalk talk elicited reaffirmed our belief that P.O.W.E.R. should exist on this campus.

We found the above quotes to be both disturbing and indicative of the unsupportive climate that Bucknell fosters for the almost 2,000 female students who attend this university. These women, who are your friends, your roommates, your girlfriends, and your sisters, are never safe from the threat of rape, sexual assault, and other forms of violence that our society not only condones but encourages. The response, "What's for dinner?", for example, which is written amidst quotes and statistics explicating the alarmingly frequent occurrences of rape, is an attempt to diminish the seriousness of violence against women. The destruction of the rape victim effigy and reactive chalkings, undoubtedly written to mock P.O.W.E.R.'s message, are ways in which people deny and dodge issues that make them uncomfortable. Dismissive jokes, however, perpetuate the silencing and misogynist environment which fosters assault against women.

As in the past, P.O.W.E.R.'s goals include establishing dialogue among students and faculty in order to lead people to discuss issues of women's oppression. The response our chalk talk elicited reaffirmed our belief that P.O.W.E.R. should exist on this campus.

PARTNERSHIP OF WOMEN ENGAGED IN REVOLUTION (P.O.W.E.R.)
NOVEMBER 19, 1992

...and receives two more, from both sexes

TO THE EDITOR:

Imagine: You are a sophomore girl here at Bucknell, trying to function as any other girl would on this campus; but you are different. You were almost raped last year. Your trust for mankind has slowly been regenerating from that horrible experience. It is not simple at all to regain that trust; in fact, it is probably one of the single most challenging things you have ever attempted. You thought that you had successfully placed last year's horrible event behind you and WHAM!!! You are reminded of it each and every step you take throughout the academic quad!!!

I understand that P.O.W.E.R. acted with good intentions, but enough is enough! I do not feel that such a flood of repetitive information is necessary. A few of those facts placed strategically around campus would have been sufficient and highly effective. The message would have been presented to the reader allowing them to further contemplate the information. Instead, it was a complete slaughter of the chance to think independently.

I do not comprehend why the members of P.O.W.E.R. would seek to consciously set about to polarize the male members of this campus.

Speaking of slaughter, I do not comprehend why the members of P.O.W.E.R. would seek to consciously set about to polarize the male members of this campus. Instead of bringing together the two different genders, the flood of politically charged propaganda seemed to further the separation. Contrary to the purpose of mutual cohesion, those slogans on the academic quad served to anger and separate men from women, and women from men. Instead of focusing on the trauma that rape victims suffer, it was turned into a men vs. women slugfest.

I have obviously been through that trauma, at least to a certain degree. I was nothing less than appalled at the seeming ulterior motives of P.O.W.E.R. I happen to love both genders—we are all people, and I feel that the male gender suffered an injustice that day. We were all asked to distrust athletes and friends, more than strangers, based soley upon their gender. If P.O.W.E.R. really wants to help women combat rape, they should publicize preventative actions, not make us hate and mistrust all men who could possibly help us in such a situation.

A CONCERNED STUDENT

Editor's Note: Another anonymous letter was submitted this week, but could not be confirmed. Anonymous authors must make prior arrangements through the advisor to The Bucknellian*, Katherine Wheatcroft.*

TO THE EDITOR:

I am writing in protest to the blatantly sexist messages plastered all over campus by proponents of revolutionary change. During the past week sayings and bits of propaganda were written on walkways to bring the issue of women's oppression to the forefront of the campus consciousness. This attempt at increasing social awareness and sensitivity towards issues of women's equality fell pathetically short and, instead, instilled a sense of animosity between the two sexes. As a man, I should be no more responsible for the actions of some psychologically disturbed rapist any more than all women should be blamed for the actions of a random female serial killer. If these people truly want revolution then they better start looking for cooperation instead of competition. Evident messages of hatred towards all men will not solve any problems but create new ones. If these "revolutionaries" want to liberate themselves from bondage would they do it at the cost of enslaving the "oppressor"? The use of a mangled manhequin to shock women into action did nothing more than stir up sentiments of disgust. If this group wants change for a more cooperative world in which all people, men and women, black and white, can live in harmony they must attack the true oppressor: closed-minded labels of all who preach blame and hate. The statement of figures such as "1 in 4 men rape" and "67% of men say woman deserve to be raped" do no more good than those of bigots who attempt to demonstrate the inequality of races by presenting the lopsided figures in crimes in which blacks are in-

Rape is not a crime against women but against humanity.

Vice President stresses academic honesty

TO THE EDITOR:

What might have appeared to the community as a minor event two weeks ago is, instead, one of serious consequence for an academic community like ours. The event was the publication of a forged Letter to the Editor in The Bucknellian. Many of you will have noticed this letter because your copy of the paper had the name cut out. Others of you will not know of the deception because the letter will have made sense...if you didn't know the person whose name was attached to it. This young woman was put in the impossible position of having strong views attributed to her that she did not state; she understandably felt violated by an anonymous forger who put forth the letter in her name. The Bucknellian editorial staff likewise was fooled by the forger and felt betrayed by the unknown writer who abused their editorial trust. It was a serious matter that needed to be addressed quickly and I am impressed by the response of both the editorial staff and the young woman herself. The Bucknellian responded in the most humane of ways and with much effort (have you ever tried to cut out a small section of over 2000 papers?).

My concern here is the violation of truth and trust that occurred. It speaks directly to the heart of the academic community called Bucknell. There is no principle more basic to an academic community than fundamental honesty. Because we are an intellectual community that encourages free and open expression of information, interpretation, and opinion, our whole life together requires an assumption of honesty, a principle so important to our community that students and faculty can be dismissed for acts of

Shikellamy band controversy stalemates

The Daily Item: The jocks were jerks

Editor's Note: The following is an editorial which appeared in Sunbury Daily Item. It has been reprinted with their permission.

Bucknell University should apologize to the Shikellamy High School Marching Braves for its football team's misconduct at the Oct. 31 game against Fordham. The university should also reprimand the football players who insulted and roughed up band members and adults helping them.

They swore at parents of band members who were helping with the performance and told them to get off the playing field, insulted the virtue of girls in the band and trampled on special flags the band needed for the performance.

Bucknell had invited the Braves, one of Pennsylvania's top bands, to play before the game, but the Bucknell football team spoiled the band's performance. It was close to game time, and the Shikellamy students were playing when Bucknell football players suddenly swarmed across the field. They swore at parents of band members who were helping with the performance and told them to get off the playing field, insulted the virtue of girls in the band and trampled on special flags the band needed for the performance. Band members came away incensed that some BU athletes didn't remove their football helmets during the band's rendition of the national anthem until after the band director told them to. Parents later told the Shikellamy school board they saw football players knock flags out of performers' hands. As a mother picked a flag off the ground, a football player stepped on her hand.

This was inexcusable behavior, and the Shikellamy school board has correctly decided to formally complain to the university. It's troubling that the Bucknell football coach is playing the incident down. Top-level university officials need to make it crystal clear to the school's athletic department and students that poor sportsmanship like this will not be tolerated.

SUNBURY DAILY ITEM

Hartzell: Incident was not ignored

The incident which occurred during the pre-game of the Parent's Day football game was unfortunate. I have written and spoken about this matter ad nauseum. The Shikellamy band was late in beginning its performance; they were told of the schedule several times in advance. Our football team waited until the last possible moment to come on to the field to make the 1:00 p.m. kickoff without being penalized for delay of the game. Perhaps some of the actions of our team members were inappropriate; however, if they were, none of the Bucknell coaches or administrators present on the sideline heard or saw the incidents of which we have been accused. This editorial was written without anyone contacting me or Lou Maranzana in regard to the facts in the matter. No one, and I repeat, no one in our department or on our football coaching staff has played this incident down, as suggested. We have explained our side of the matter when asked; we have written, spoken and responded. We have not and will not tolerate behavior that is less than the standard set by Bucknell University. In this case, "poor sportsmanship" simply did not take place on our part. In conclusion, for this matter to get the incredible amount of attention that it has is living testimony to the fact that it has been a slow news period in the Susquehanna Valley. I would think it would be more appropriate for the Daily Item to consider writing a feature article on some of the really good and important news about the accomplishments of the students on this campus that take place every day.

Perhaps some of the actions of our team members were inappropriate; however, if they were, none of the Bucknell coaches or administrators present on the sideline heard or saw the incidents of which we have been accused.

Social life needs changes

BY BRIAN ENG

As I draw near to the end of my first semester of college, I can honestly say that I have a full grasp of what Bucknell is all about. I seem to have survived my first months here academically, and I have learned to adapt considerably to the daily changes in my usual schedule I am forced to make in order to survive. However, the main gripe I have with Bucknell is the nature of the social scene.

As a "new kid on the block," if you will, I didn't know what to expect out of my first couple of weeks drifting around on the Bucknell social scene. What I found out, just by being on campus for the first few weeks, is that there is a definite problem with social life here. Upon further observation, I see that Bucknellians have become too used to a weekend life revolving around the fraternities and alcohol.

I'm not saying that Bucknellians don't know how to have a good time—it's abundantly obvious that they do when one sees the crowds of deliriously happy people leaving the fraternities on any given weekend night. And I'm certainly not saying that there is a problem with the fraternities, having been guilty myself of spending one too many nights on Fraternity Row.

What I'm basically concerned with is the limitations of Bucknell social life. Most people flutter with delight at the thought of the weekend, and a good percentage of those same people relish in the thought of heading to the fraternities in hopes of returning home heavily intoxicated. While that is a problem, drinking is a socially acceptable means of having fun on the weekends; in fact, most Bucknellians are guilty of doing so a few times in their lives. But this is exactly the problem we have at hand. Bucknellians shouldn't have to drink if they choose not to, but if they choose not to, then what is left of their social lives?

The campus social scene often creates problems for the individuals who aren't inclined to drink as much.

The campus social scene often creates problems for the individuals who aren't inclined to drink as much. I cannot begin to count the number of people who admit they did not drink much before coming to Bucknell. These same people drink much more frequently now because there is nothing else to do. The University and Bucknell Activities Council sponsor many interesting activities, yes, such as singers and comedians, but the fact remains that a large percentage of students do not attend these performances. Granted, there are exceptions, but the university needs to create more activities which are going to be attended in greater numbers, and the only way this can happen is if B. A. C. tries to find out what the students will enjoy.

Unfortunately, the problem is much more deep-rooted than most people can see. At larger universities, there are many more social opportunities such as extensive game rooms, regularly scheduled social mixers, movie theaters, and more popular performers. However, these universities have a larger campus and a more socially diverse student body as well as a greater budget that can be geared toward recreational activities.

This problem of social difficulty is very hard to solve for many reasons. First, the University may not have the funds for campus expansion in order to accommodate various social facilities and events. Even if the funds were available, the Bison was recently renovated; the University doesn't want to do so again. Second, the town of Lewisburg and surrounding towns don't hold many social opportunities, either. Third, being a first-year student, I'm not equipped with a vehicle—my only options would be to stay in and be creative or to go out and drink. It's no wonder why Bucknell was rated first in "lots of hard liquor" in the Princeton Review's book. Fourth, the geography of Bucknell and local areas are tiny, which might not even allow for campus expansion even if the administration chooses to. Fifth, and possibly most importantly, most students here have become accustomed to the facts of Bucknell social life.

I know that the ramifications of the social scene on Bucknell University are not apparent now, but if social life continues to be the way it is now, then many things can be affected. Among the most important may be admissions—the quality of social life at BU will affect admissions first because the appeal of the university to non-drinkers or occasional drinkers will deteriorate, and this will eliminate Bucknell's chances of attracting a socially diverse group of potential students.

This apparent no-win situation has but one solution that I can see. The University must gradually change and expand the campus into one which is more suitable for a socially diverse student body. The problem lies not in the students or the administration; it is simply in the way this entire university is structured. Structural changes take time, and the University, not you or I, has to identify these problems. If the University sees the social life as a problem and takes steps to alleviate the problem, a great change would probably not take place for several years. But if these changes in the structure of the social scene happen, then the future of social life at Bucknell will begin to look brighter.

Environmental and women's issues linked

BY JACINTA BUNNELL

Our humanness has given us the privilege(?) of rationality. These minds with which we are endowed seem to reason out that we are not a part of nature, that we are somehow above and beyond it, and that nature needs a caretaker because it surely would not survive if not for our helping hands. But the fact is that our attitude of caretaking has been warped so viciously that our actions no longer resemble the life-giving ones of the caretaker who protects and loves. Our consumerist society, which is based on production, consumption, and GNP, has reduced non-human nature to mere "natural resources" to be used and abused without second thought.

There is a striking parallel between the situations of women and non-human nature. Within the patriarchal world-view, women have been used and abused for thousands of years because women, like the land, are seen as mere instruments of labor and property that can be easily bought and sold. We have been strip-mined for our sex, raped and pillaged of all our vital energies. The pollution of the planet and the oppression of women are both caused by the same set of attitudes, that being the domination and exploitation of that which is deemed as "lesser" and unworthy of making independent decisions.

But it is time to give credit where credit is due. Nature is no weakling and it truly is our life force. We could not conceivably live without non-human nature. But it could surely survive, even thrive, without us. The Earth does not sit back passively and take this all in with no complaints, and neither do the women of this world. The Earth continually rejuvenates itself as we speak. The problem comes in because with each passing day, we are continually stepping up our technologies so that we are using up all of the Earth's vital energies at too rapid a pace. It continues to spit out the poisons that we feed it, but how much longer

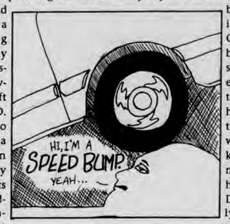
Durkin's deep thoughts

Why the speed bumps have to go

BY X. RYAN DURKIN

So there I was, cruising past Phi Psi in my jet black Volvo (with tinted windows of course), winding out my new twin cam, 12 cylinder, supercharged 350 engine my parents had put in the car as a Thanksgiving present. (Obviously this is false—Thanksgiving isn't a gift giving holiday.) I shift up as I burn past D. U., kick in the turbo when I see Lambda Chi, and then WHACK!! . . . My head suddenly meets the roof of my Swedish hot rod. The impact is so intense it cracks my brand new Oakley razor blade sunglasses. I also spill my boiling hot coffee on my best grey stretch slacks. Now I'm really pissed. When I finally ease the car to a stop in the back of a new Celica parked in front of K. D. R, I step out to survey the damage.



What was once a stunning example of the brilliance of Swedish engineering is now little more than a rambling wreck of scrap metal. The roof extends six inches in a bubble above the driver's side where my head hit. All four brand new tires are flat (including the oversized Goodyear racing tires on the back). My brand new gold electro-plated mags are bent and I lost my pink fluorescent windshield wiper covers. And to make matters worse, the dashboard and my new white bearskin seat covers are stained brown from coffee.

By now your probably wondering (if you're bored enough to have read this far) what the point of this article is. Well, for any of you who haven't hit the ridiculous blacktop mountain in front of Lambda Chi, it's about speed bumps. Not just any speed bumps, but the enormous yellow tire-eaters Bucknell has decided to cover the campus with. I would just like to know why we need so many and why they have to be so big. Does Swartz hall really need three of its own speed bumps? As if I didn't get the point the first time. Or is it for those people who really want to go out of their way to hit pedestrians? If I'm in a bad mood and I feel like hitting someone, three speed bumps sure as hell aren't going to stop me.

Or is it for all those bad Bucknell students who may be flying around campus loaded. I'm sure lots of students drive around pasted, or have "one for the road." I do it all the time. God how I love cruising campus with an open container. (Yes, that's meant sarcastically for any people who are touchy or feel that it's politically incorrect to joke about drunk driving.) Or maybe it's to wake up those of us who might fall asleep at the wheel on the way across campus. I often find myself dozing off at the wheel when I make that long journey to Wash Tubs or the U. C. Or is it to prevent people from hot-rodding on fraternity row? I've often wanted to drag race from TKE to D. U., but those damn speed bumps are always in the way.

Do I sound a bit cynical? Maybe it seems that I'm overreacting. Well why don't you try to explain to your parents why your car needs new shocks every semester? I think the problem could be taken care of much more efficiently than with these ugly yellow mounds in the road. We should hire crossing guards and allow security to arrest jaywalkers. It would give the school revenue and provide jobs for students. I'd love to throw on a fluorescent suit and direct people across the street. And I'm sure there are many other individuals out there who would love to have the power to stop traffic. We could train these crossing guards by having a crossing guard Jan Plan. Think of how impressive that would look on your resume.

The impact is so intense it cracks my brand new Oakley razor blade sunglasses.... My brand new gold electro-plated mags are bent and I lost my pink fluorescent windshield wiper covers.

U. S. should not be a bilingual nation

BY CHRISTINA TISA

The issue has been raised about whether or not the United States should become a bilingual nation. The very prospect of this, quite frankly, makes me sick. Let me immediately say that I speak Italian at home with my grandmother, and that I am a firm supporter of ethnic diversity (see "Students Need to Find Diversity From Within," Nov. 6). However, I find that reading food can labels both in English and in Spanish really offends me. I studied Spanish in high school, but I have no intentions of speaking it in public with people who should have learned to speak English!

My biggest gripe with this whole language thing is that some schools in Florida with large Hispanic populations are conducting classes in the native Spanish. This practice is official policy, and it is being adapted across the country to accommodate whatever language group is common. There is a definite problem with this, and it affects all of us adversely.

Consider nations and regions all across the globe that have more than one language spoken as a matter of custom: India, Belgium, Switzerland, the former Soviet Union, Quebec, China, and numerous countries of Africa (Somalia). We all know what happened in Quebec. Their reason for attempting secession was to protect a common language and culture. India has so many languages that the leaders could not agree on an official language, so they compromised by adopting English, the language of their colonial rulers. The Soviet Union is no more, and the lack of a common language could be cited as a cause.

Is this what we want for America? Don't laugh, because it can happen here as well.

I have no problem with efforts to preserve one's own cultural heritage. Because many citizens have maintained their ethnic identity, our nation has retained its strength. However, our strength as Americans is rooted in our unity and cohesiveness, which is fostered by the commonalities of language, popular culture, and democratic ideals. Without a common language we are a nation divided by ethnic barriers.

Without a common language we are a nation divided by ethnic barriers.

My ancestors, as well as many others, had to learn to speak English when they first arrived in order to survive and pursue their dreams. Millions of immigrants came to America without a formal education, money, or belongings. They brought with them a tremendous will to succeed for the sake of their children, and their children were enrolled in school that instructed in the language of their new home. No instruction in the native tongue was offered. Our ancestors succeeded regardless of this initial language barrier.

When a person is at the point of attaining fluency they begin to dream in that language. The American Dream cannot be dreamed in any language other than English. Without English the American Dream is stifled.

Board requests respect for freedom of press

On November 13, members of a group on our campus who were angered by a recent article in The Bucknellian retaliated against the paper by stealing and attempting to destroy the copies that had been placed in the Langone Center for distribution to the student body. The Bucknellian Advisory Board, which consists of University faculty and staff, deplores this action.

A free press is a powerful press. It can embarass or infuriate those who find themselves in the spotlight of journalistic attention, so it is not surprising that some would seek to curtail its freedom through acts of vandalism. But little is gained through such acts and much is lost.

All Bucknell students pay for The Bucknellian through their activity fees. To deny them access to the paper constitutes theft.

The Bucknellian is the major source of information on the campus. To destroy a week's issue is to deprive the University community of an important resource.

The volunteer staff of The Bucknellian devotes long hours to serving the campus community needs for information and perspectives. Throwing the product of their labor into a dumpster shows contempt for the staff and for the community it serves. Most important, when a segment of the community seeks to curtail the freedom of its press, the entire community loses a vital safeguard against ignorance and against abuses of power. We hope that in the future, when members of the Bucknell Community are angered by the paper's contents, they will use the free press to tell their side of the story. The opinion pages of The Bucknellian are open to each member of the community so that we all may enjoy our First Amendment rights.

academic dishonesty. What makes this forgery even more regrettable is the writer's misunderstanding of this basic assumption upon which our whole community relies–especially in areas of controversy or strong opinion. The tragedy of this event is that the writer of the forged letter will likely go through life believing that the ends justify the means and that dishonesty can be defended in such instances. The lessons of history point to the opposite conclusion, namely, that the means are the ends in the making and that a person who uses dishonesty even in good causes is likely to look in the mirror one day and see a dishonest person.

volved. Both sides should take a position of attacking the socio-economic factors which cause certain crimes rather than looking at the superficialities of the issue and laying blame. The real issue which must be addressed is the divisive tactics of all sides and hatred, in any form. By attacking men, the members of POWER are doing nothing more than demonstrating their incredible ignorance over the causes of the social ills they are tackling and have, unwittingly, continued to perpetuate the system they seek to overthrow. Rape is not a crime against women but against humanity; it is a violent crime and should be treated as thus, with action towards the individual not the sex which he (or she) belongs. The messages of POWER aimed at blaming a certain sex is sexual discrimination and it is this mindset which is the root of homophobia, bigotry, and religious persecution. Of course, they believe their cause to be justified by the continued oppression of their sex and enlist people in their struggle against the enemy. Their efforts, however, should attempt to present unbiased and rational arguments which can help their peers realize the justice of the cause of eliminating sexual persecution of all kinds. Unless the feminist groups start understanding that, they will cause the problem to continually become worse instead of better.

It is understood in politically-incorrect language that mankind is equally composed of men and women. It is also understood that all humans have certain characteristics that are deemed either feminine or masculine. The patriarchy of feminist theology consists of women as well as men but emphasizes "masculine" tendencies which oppresses minority concerns. It seems this partnership for revolution has confused men and the human masculine tendency and has alienated half of humanity in a cause for which they will absolutely need their help. For members of POWER to act in the masculine manner reinforces the stereotype of neo-nazi, militant, men-hating feminists and does nothing to improve the social condition. With messages which openly declare me responsible for the social ill of rape, they are using the same hateful tactics as the patriarchy. This is especially disappointing when the ultimate aim of feminism to bring about a more peaceful, environmentally-conscious, and cooperative world. This commendable vision is marred by these horrible attacks. The power-base of feminist movement lies in compassion and spirituality and a closeness with Nature which will bring a new world order. I'm not saying this is the quality of women but the feminine aspect of human nature which should be emphasized and nurtured. To stop sexual discrimination, one must stop stating men are evil and start doing something productive like targeting those individual characteristics in human beings which lead them to commit certain crimes.

Like John Lennon said in the Beatles' classic "Revolution," "If you want people with minds that hate, then buddy you're gonna have to wait...." I advise members of POWER to examine what the final goal is that they want to accomplish and the destructive direction in which they are heading. For now, they are simply being enslaved, not by the patriarchy, but by their own hatred and ignorance.

With honesty and integrity,

EARTH

can it keep this up?

The Earth continues, for now, to show us its power through earthquakes, volcanoes, and tidal waves. And likewise, the women of this world are banding together to drown the anger, resentment, and oppressive behavior of a system, so dominated by violence, with our own tidal waves. But what is different between our waves and their war is that we are taking no lives, and we are taking no hostages. We know that killing off our oppressors is not the answer. But grappling with their world views and making conscious efforts to change their very oppressiveness is on the road to a working solution. And this sense of social justice holds some vital answers to the massive problems of subjugation and oppression in our society, whether against the Earth, women, people of color, or homosexuals.

The greatest movements for justice and environmental preservation have come and will continue to come from the grassroots organizations that fight oppression of all sorts.

Life is an intricate web, not a hierarchy. We are all in this together, so why are we so competitive? While the nations, churches, and corporations of this world are grounded in hierarchical structures which lead to unequal distribution of power and wealth, living in peace and justice means working within a framework of consensus, equality, and celebration of diversity. The many voices of those who have been historically overlooked and devalued must be integrated into the decision-making process. Care, love, and trust need to be stressed over utility, rules, and regulations. And this can only start with the individual. We have to make ourselves aware of the alternatives, instead of fervently believing what our Masters tell us is just and righteous. Know that you no longer have to be a slave of the so-called system.

The great reforms of the past, the anti-slavery movement, the women's suffrage movement, and the civil rights movement (to name but a few) all began as small groups of people banded together with a common purpose which eventually grew to be so powerful that reform became inevitable. But their power was not one of omnipotent control and subjugation, but rather the power of social justice. The greatest movements for justice and environmental preservation have come and will continue to come from the grassroots organizations that fight oppression of all sorts. We need to take more responsibility into our own hands and start acting locally. All of this abuse against the Earth, women, and other oppressed groups was created by a few individuals. It can be ended by a few individuals.

What the health is going on?

BY JOYCE DOLLINGER
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Wintertime has come and, as December progresses, students look forward to snow fights, skiing and ice skating. But although wintertime excites many of us, we must be careful when Jack Frost starts nipping at our noses; winter weather can produce frostbite.

Frostbite results from the exposure of the extremities to very low temperatures (below 32 F, 0 C), which can cause freezing of the tissues and generate vascular injury. Frostbite can affect any part of the body that is not properly covered. However, the cheeks, ears, fingers, toes, testicles and the nose are the most susceptible. Additionally, frostbite poses more of a threat if coupled with dehydration, drunkenness, unconsciousness, anemia, hunger, wet clothes, exhaustion and poor circulation. The lower the temperature and the higher the wind chill factor, the shorter time it takes for frostbite to appear.

Extensive damage occurs when blood vessels are affected, resulting in a disease called gangrene. During this time, amputation may be necessary. If only the skin and underlying tissues are damaged, however, recovery may be complete.

Also, frostbite is often accompanied by hypothermia, which must be treated first. This occurs when the body cannot sustain the normal body temperature.

SYMPTOMS

1. In the early stages, the skin appears red; pain in the form of a pins and needles sensation is present.
2. As the frostbite develops, the skin becomes white or palish yellow and appears waxy.
3. Extremities and ears feel very cold and numb.
4. Pain disappears.
5. Possible blisters.
6. Often the victim does not know she or he has frostbite until someone notices the symptoms.

Any or all of the above may be present.

SOLUTIONS

1. When outside, cover the risk areas with extra clothing or a warm cloth.
2. Do not rub the affected areas with snow or anything else.
3. Bring the victim inside promptly.
4. Frostbitten areas must be rewarmed rapidly.
5. Gently wrap affected areas in warm materials.
6. Do not use heat lamps, hot water bottles or heating pads.
7. Do not allow victim to place frostbitten areas near a hot stove or radiator.
8. Do not break blisters.
9. Stop rewarming process when the skin becomes pink.
10. Do not allow the victim to walk on a frostbitten foot.
11. Seek medical attention promptly.

CONTINUED CARE

1. Give the victim warm drinks.
2. Do not give the victim alcoholic beverages.
3. Take extreme care that frostbitten ears are not refrozen after they thawed.

Prevention is important in order to protect yourself from frostbite. In the past fifteen years, frostbite has increased tremendously in male runners. Prevention for these runners would be to wear a Gortex running suit because it offers the best wind protection. They also should have some supportive wear (jock strap) that brings the external genitalia closer to the body. Other protective wear for winter weather are: hats, gloves, earmuffs, earbands, insulated linings (silver or silk) for hands and feet, and warm jackets.

Get a hold of end of semester stress

BY KRISTINA SCHURR
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The end of the semester always causes a flurry of activity—elections, formals, last-minute papers and, of course, final exams. In fact, many Bucknellians aren't in the bookstore taking advantage of its holiday shoppers' bonanza; they're rushing around campaigning for student government positions, scrambling to get an overdue paper typed, or pulling an all-nighter to ensure an A on tomorrow's chemistry exam. Be warned though, while many of us regularly spread ourselves very thin, too much going on at one time may indeed be hazardous to our mental, as well as physical health.

"Stressing" about an assignment or filling your Filofax with appointments until graduation seems to accompany many students' academic careers. But the combination of having too much work and too little time often becomes overpowering. Many students procrastinate in an effort to put off dealing with a situation, only to find that it resurfaces later, accompanied by a host of problems that could have been averted had the student addressed an issue on time.

Psychologist Dr. John Ortiz of Bucknell's Psychological Services maintains that much of the stress and anxiety that we experience in our daily lives is self-imposed. "Many Bucknellians come from high schools where they had been the number one student without much effort, and when they arrive at Bucknell, they realize that it takes two or three times as much work just to be average," noted Ortiz. Because many Bucknellians simply aren't happy with average, the drive to surpass one's classmates becomes a common theme across the campus.

"I see a lot of goal-oriented students who harbor many irrational expectations about how their life has to turn out," Ortiz remarked. "There are so many 'shoulds' and 'musts' and 'ought to be's'—these people are pushing themselves so hard that they often neglect to balance their internal and external selves." According to Ortiz, one's internal needs include a proper diet, decent amount of sleep, relaxation time or time spent with friends, and exercise. In short, everything our mother has been nagging us about for years. External needs are our grades in school, goals for the future, and immediate concerns, such as 'I need to find a formals date by tomorrow night!'

So what happens when we don't sleep for days and move onto the third floor of the library because there is just too much to do, or eat rice and water for a week so we can lose the "freshman 15"? Our bodies react to what we've been neglecting, and "burnout" may be a direct result of pushing too hard. Some warning signs of burnout include depression, anxiety, jitteriness, crying, insomnia or hypersomnia, edginess and irritability. "It's a definite phenomena which we see, that very often manifests itself as depression," said Student Health Services Director, Dr. Donald Stetschulte. "Feeling anxious in a conflict situation is normal, it goes back to our fight or flight instinct, but if a conflict is not resolved, we experience a constant state of anxiety which draws upon our immune system and makes it more vulnerable to viruses and bacteria." Hence the increased volume of the cold and flu viruses during finals week.

The key to avoiding this "burnout" is to catch it before it happens. This simply means that feelings of extreme anxiousness, exhaustion, depression, and even some illnesses can be averted if you realize that they are a probable consequence of spreading yourself too thin. Prevention does not mean, however, that you need to give up some of your extra-curricular activities or study in the library every Friday and Saturday night. "Structure your time and be disciplined about your work load," said Ortiz. "Putting your needs into perspective and being objective and reasonable about your goals would be the first step. Accept your limitations and find a daily regimen that works for you."

If you find yourself in a situation that seems insurmountable, here are some tips to help you get through:

- Dont' worry hopelessly or helplessly. If you have an assign ment due, just do it. Further procrastination will not improve the situation.
- With finals approaching, extra study time is necessary. But studying for hours on end without so much as a trip to the wa ter fountain will get you nowhere but tired fast. Consolidation study time into 50 minute intervals with short,ten minutes break aids comprehension as well as eases tension. Also, study ing for three hours and then partying the night away is equally ineffective. Studies show that memory retention is best when serious studying is followed by a good nights' sleep.
- Schedule some relaxation time for yourself. Whatever the activity, whether reading a magazine, exercising, or just meditating for a short time, decide upon an escape from your studies every so often. Your mind and body need a time-out from stenuous learning; taking time for yourself relieves some of the physical and mental tension.

If a person is to succeed at college without getting a stomach ulcer, he or she may need to stop procrastinating and actually get to work. Going to the library every night means nothing if you use that time for socializing with everyone on the main floor. Instead, use those few hours to your advantage—and then talk it up with the people from last year's hall—it's likely that with your work done, you'll be that much more able to enjoy time spent with others instead of whining about your work load this semester.

Another effective tool against procrastination is order. Do make lists of the things which need to be accomplished that day, do make an effort to find that list amidst the two-month-old clump of Milky Way wrappers in your backpack. Also, instead of taking a mid-morning nap during the odd time between classes, make use of that half-hour or hour. It might surprise you to realize that you could actually catch up on some reading or even accomplish the odious chore of check book balancing.

But even if you find yourself mired in a pile of papers, tests, and deadlines, awake at three a.m. with a pot of coffee and a gallon of cough medicine, remember that this type of an experience is supposed to help you learn more about yourself. "Overdoing it ultimately leads to a burnout, which leads to physical pain, which results in an effort to work harder which brings us back to overdoing it," said Ortiz. "This is ultimately a self-destructive cycle which can be overcome through a restructuring of our lives." Don't wait until next semester to start over, finals haven't even begun.

Avoid the holiday feeding frenzy

BY ALISA BLAND
Bucknellian Staff Writer

"Come, now. I know you don't eat enough at school, sweetie. Eat a third helping and make your grandmother happy. Have some more cake, too. I baked it just for you. It's your favorite! Devilishly decadent double dutch chocolate!" The scene is all too familiar. You wake up in a cold sweat the night before you go home for the holidays and realize that the nightmare you just had will soon be reality.

It's the same old story. You go home promising yourself that you will only eat lettuce because you refuse to come back to school with another roll of fat and wind up succumbing to the pressure to gorge over the holiday. It turns into a do or die situation. Eat or starve.

So what is the solution to the fear of fat syndrome that so many suffer from? Here are some tips for controlling the calories and preventing the problem of winter weight gain without over-indulging or starving yourself.

—Limit alcohol consumption. Alcohol is high in calories and has no nutritional value.

—Avoid dark meat turkey. It is substantially higher in fat and calories than light meat. Pre-meal snacks of nuts, cheeses, chips and dips are also high in fat and calories; snack on fresh fruits and vegetables like carrots, celery and sliced green peppers.

—Avoid seconds of everything, especially alcohol.

—Use less gravy—another holiday staple that is loaded with fat and calories.

—Have either an appetizer or dessert, not both. Both are usually high in fat and calories. A good low-cal appetizer, like a small salad with dressing and a light dessert of mixed fruits is a good alternative.

—Don't linger at the table when you are finished eating. Clear the table and finish your conversation in another room. A table full of food is too tempting; you'll end up eating more than you need or want to.

—The first three bites of anything is always the most pleasurable. After six bites you won't be able to stop. Put your fork down after that three bites of cheesecake.

—Take a thirty-minute walk after a large meal. You will start burning calories and remain more awake than if you crash in front of the television.

The most important thing to remember is that if you do eat more than you plan to, don't crash diet. Starving yourself to squeeze into that new outfit is unhealthy. Depriving yourself of food will only make you miserable and want to eat more when you have another big meal in front of you. If you think before you eat this holiday season, you won't be forced to make and break that New Year's resolution to lose the weight you gained.

Groovy gift ideas for early shoppers

Deck the halls with boughs of holly...and start unpacking the tree ornaments, because Santa's coming to town. You guessed it Bucknellians, Christmas is upon us once again. The Thanksgiving turkey has been eaten and, as usual, the opening of the Christmas shopping season is off to a running start.

For some, this is an absolute horror that should be delayed for as long as possible—usually until Christmas Eve. For others, however, shopping is a prerequisite to holiday spirit; seeing all of the stores dressed in Christmas finery, elbowing your way through the discount tables—Joy To The World!

And, of course, many stores are already advertising their own festivities by printing 40-page ads every day, layering their windows with lights and paint, and still finding time to inflate the biggest blow-up Santas around. Christmas now exists as an art form unto itself.

But along with these objets d'art, however, there exists a down side to all the merriment—"What to buy?" What can you get for your best friend, your significant other, your parents...Aunt Matilda? Herein lies the secret of Christmas.

For the little one in the family, this years' toy market is booming with pliable plastic playthings. The old but gold Barbie doll and Barnie, the dinosaur from the PBS kids' show, are on the top of many wish lists. Close behind is the Teenage Mutant Ninja Turtle Mutations line. Trollkins, those hideously cute dolls with the flourescent hair and outfitted in every garb from sports enthusiasts to Russian cossack are also hot.

Toys for the grown but young at heart stock the shelves. Game Boys, by Ninendo, are functional in that they increase hand-eye coordination. Blinky clothes accessories, such as battery operated socks or ties, are sure to make your loved ones the center of attention. Many desk games that the executive can fiddle with while on the phone or waiting for a fax are available, most of which can be hidden in the confines of a desk droor. Consider offering to your more tense acquaintences the infamous silvery metal Chinese stress reliever balls to be revolved in the hand.

So while the lights are going up in the shopping mall nearest you and trees are being strung with enough lights to require wearing UV sunglasses, millions of shoppers are heading to the stores, armed with their credit cards and not much in the way of ideas. Try these gifts and avoid the headache. After all, you can't spread holiday cheer very well when all you've bought are some chocolate-covered cherries.

Pedaler of Perestroika cycles all 50 states

BY COLLEEN RUSH
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The Berlin Wall is nothing more than a faded memory decorated with graffiti and gaping holes that remind us all of what it "used to be like." Several communist countries have joined forces to end the Cold War and start the wheels turning toward democracy. Vladimir Kovalenko, a cyclist from Novosibirsk, Siberia, is doing his part for world peace from the seat of his 21-speed Raleigh Olympian bicycle.

In an effort to educate himself, as well as his students back home in Novosibirsk about the United States, the 34-year old gym teacher and doctor of psychology decided to hit the backroads of America by bike on a 50-state tour. Kovalenko sends postcards, packages of information and addresses of prospective pen pals from each city he visits to his students in order "to teach them more about the country that most of my people only dream about seeing."

Before his solo tour of the states, Kovalenko began a 13,000-mile expedition through France, Italy, Yugoslavia, Romania and the former Soviet Union. From April 1, 1990 to November 26, 1990, Kovalenko, a Russian partner and two American cyclists pedaled their way through the countries, and became the first cyclists to cross Russia by bicycle.

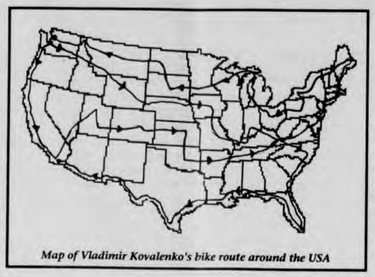
On February 21, 1991, just three months after he finished his world tour, the Siberian cyclist started his solo tour of all 50 states. Kovalenko completed his tour September 16, 1992, adding an additional 22,000-mile knotch to his belt of experience, bringing his total biking mileage to approximately 35,000. Though he had no check points or time schedule, Kovalenko managed to stick to a general pattern of travel by criss-crossing the country east to west four times and north to south twice on his tour (see map).

During his travels, Kovalenko realized that though the route he chose to take was not the most sensible because of the seasons, it was "definitely more of a challenge." Rather than travelling through areas of the States during their best seasons, Kovalenko apparently chose the worst time for every state. "I went through Wyoming in November when there was 40 miles per hour wind and freezing cold snow every day. I travelled through Arizona, Oregon and California in February and March with heavy wind and rain. I was cold and wet like a chicken the whole time," Kovalenko said, "I went through Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana and Texas in June, July and August during the hottest, humidest, mosquito-y weather I've ever experienced." Despite the hardships, Kovalenko survived his tour, suffering only minor losses and a few flat tires.

Preparing himself physically for the trek was the least of his worries, said Kovalenko. "Long distance riding is 10% muscles and 90% psychology," he said. "It is more important to learn how to survive, how to be by yourself for long periods of time and how to make decisions."

Noting that his goal of biking of 100 miles a day from the beginning was a bit unrealistic, Kovalenko said, "Long distance riding is something to build up day-by-day. I started with 50 or 60 miles a day and built up to my goal. My best day so far is 132 miles in one day. Ironically, I made that goal the day after I received a Russian meal from a family I was staying with."

As for the monotony and loneliness of travelling day in and day out on deserted back roads by himself, Kovalenko said he had no problems. "I do not know the name of the American psychologist who did it, but he performed an experiment about what sort of people can do monotonous jobs, like factory work and long-distance riding, the best. He found that two types can perform these jobs better: the first is the idiot and the second is very creative people. So, right now, I am trying to figure out which group I belong to."



Map of Vladimir Kovalenko's bike route around the USA

Kovalenko's dream of travelling around the world on his bike started at the ripe age of 5. "My mom told me that when I was about 5, I went out to play and was lost. My parents found me later that day on the side of the road outside of my town on my tricycle," he said. "When they asked me what I was doing, I said 'I'm going around the world on my bike.' Ever since then, I've had the dream, and now I have done it!"

Russian cyclist Vladimir Kovalenko, from Novosibirsk, Siberia made a pit-stop in Lewisburg after his 50-state tour of the U.S. The globe-trotter shared his experiences with Bucknellians last week.

After seeing all of the country through a perspective that very few ever will, Kovalenko said that his list of favorite cities and sites cannot be narrowed to one or two. One of the places on his list was the Grand Canyon, which he describes not through words but "only big hand movements. There is not enough language for anyone, Russian or American, to explain how huge and amazing it all was."

Disneyland at Anaheim, California was another more than memorable place for Kovalenko. "Adults, because they are supposed to be so serious, forget the emotions and feelings of what it is like to be a kid again. I loved it because I could be a strange big kid all day and not worry about looking silly!" said Kovalenko.

His recent tour, however, was not his first contact with the United States. In 1989, Kovalenko journeyed to America through the Kids Exchange program. Noting the vast differences between his home land and the United States, Kovalenko said, "The first emotion was that it was very bright. America organized differently, not only politically or economically, but also philosophically and architecturally. Most of the space seemed to be taken up by advertisements. The jump from Siberia to America is like the flash from a camera: very sudden. It is WOW! from the very beginning—too bright, at first."

Though life in Russia is not as bleak as many might think it to be, Kovalenko noticed that life for Americans has been made extremely easy. He noted that while making life easy is not necessarily a bad idea, "very many things in America are almost too good. Like, if you have a pencil, you can shave it with a knife, sharpen it manually, or in America, you push a button and brrrrp it is done for you. It is not too much to shave it, so why the button in America?"

Kovalenko's philosophy of politics and life for now is simply "just give everyone freedom and democracy," he said. "The whole world cannot accept the make-everything-easier concept because we don't have the resources. First, start with freedom, and work from there."

Kovalenko described his experiences in Siberia and travelling across the U.S. during a short visit to Lewisburg last week. Mike Kryzytski, owner of the Bicycle Peddler, met Kovalenko during his cross-country tour. Part of Kovalenko's visit was spent at schools in the area, including Bucknell, showing slides of his trip and talking about his life in Siberia.

A major aim of Kovalenko's mission, he said, is to help young Americans learn more about his native land because "it is better to learn about Siberia firsthand than through a book." By breaking down the stereotypes about Siberian people, Kovalenko hopes to open the "ears and eyes of anyone who is willing to hear and see what I have to offer about my country and my experiences."

Without saying a word, however, Kovalenko breaks down all the stereotypes of a Siberian. Tanned, muscular, blond and dressed in typical athletes clothing, Kovalenko emanates an air of everything a Siberian is not 'supposed' to be. "Siberia is not always cold, and not all Siberians are short, fat prisoners with long, black beards," he said.

The future holds more than just returning home for Kovalenko. During his cross-country tour, he kept scrupulous notes of his day-to-day experiences. When he returns to Siberia, Kovalenko hopes to write a book about his travels that will include more than just geographical facts and tourist information. "I want to include anecdotes and feelings I had during my visit so that it is more than just a tour book."

Market Street gets a holiday facelift

Locals and students team up to decorate Lewisburg's main street for the holidays

BY KRISTINA SCHURR
Bucknellian Staff Writer

As the holiday season approaches, we see wreaths, trees and lights going up across our campus. It's a cheerful sign, reminding us that a long-awaited and much needed winter break will soon be upon us. In town, holiday decorations give Lewisburg a new and colorful holiday face. Electric candles illuminate windows, wreaths and ribbons grace doors and porches, and strings of colorful blinking lights draw attention to the more commercial aspect of the holidays. But perhaps the most striking decorations are the lights and wreaths which crown the treetops and streetlights along Market Street.

Residents of Lewisburg have made a tradition out of decorating Market Street. "I've lived here all my life and each year the townspeople of Lewisburg decorate Market Street," said Lewisburg attorney Graham Showalter. This year, the Holiday Decor Committee, consisting of townspeople and business owners, was formed in order to plan the decorating.

"For the past ten years I have been involved with the lighting of the Christmas tree in the park, but this is the second year that I've organized the project," contined Showalter. "I felt that this year we should do an even better job than previous years, so we've extended the length of the decorations." The decorations now stretch the entire length of Market Street, from Water Street to Route 15.

The actual hanging of the lights and wreaths was done on Monday, November 23, with help from the Lewisburg cable company, Buffalo Valley Telephone Service, Citizen's Electric Company, as well as by some Bucknell students. Members of Alpha Phi Omega, the Bucknell service fraternity, and Kappa Delta Rho were ready at seven a.m. to help the workers remove last year's lights and string up new ones. "KDR volunteered about 60 brothers and pledges to take one-hour work shifts," said Kevin Price '93.

More streetlights on Market Street were crowned with ribbons and wreaths this year .

Holiday decorations attract customers and brighten windows of store fronts up and down Market Street.

Alpha Phi Omega member Laird McCausland '93 added that the students helped on the ground, holding lights and untangling strings of old lights. "The students simply provided the manpower to reduce the amount of decorating time," said KDR brother, Peter Doherty '94. "We helped to execute what had already been well-planned and well thought out."

According to some of the organizers, the decorations do seem to attract much attention. An organizer of the project, and manager of Donehower's sporting goods store, David Velz said,"It makes me feel really good to see people looking at the lights and commenting about how nice they look. I believe that if you're going to have a downtown business district then you need to do something special for the townspeople."

And students seem to be especially appreciative of the decorations. "The decorations in town are beautiful. They remind me of downtown Pittsburgh, which is close to home. That reminder makes it easier to be at school this close to the holidays," said Caroline Boag '95.

The decorations hold a special meaning for those who worked to make the project a success. "It's nice to see all those lights. Driving down Market Street now makes you feel really good," said McCausland. "I think that it creates a nice atmosphere and gets people all set up for the holidays. Added Showalter, "The lights are a very tasteful way to remind us of the Christmas season as well as how much we all have to be thankful for. The decorations are just an outward manifestation of our inward appreciation of the holiday season."

Price also noted the importance of participating in the decorating, "In the four years that I've been at Bucknell I haven't had an opportunity to really give something back to the residents of Lewisburg and I'm glad that I got the chance to do it."

This was the first year that KDR helped with these decorations; the brothers of FIGI volunteered for the job last year.

Spend less, give more

BY COLLEEN RUSH
Bucknellian Staff Writer

You can smell it in the air and you can feel it in your wallet: the season of giving is upon us. With the over-commercializing of holiday sentiment, one might begin to wonder if the true meaning of the season has been lost in the shuffle of glitter and late-night business hours to satisfy anyone with money to spend.

And for those unfortunate college students who find a negative balance on their checking account, the prospect of gift receiving rather than gift giving becomes the topic of interest. If the guilt that accompanies the getting and not giving is too much for the penniless student, presents that suit a typical college budget are always a relieving alternative.

Look no further than Bucknell's craft shop for perhaps the easiest and most creative college budget gifts. For the crunchy friends back home, make a slew of tye-dyed T-shirts in festive colors to add a touch of style to the season. Candles, woven baskets and hand-made jewelry make excellent stocking stuffers for parents and siblings. Expanding the dollar and one's creative repertoire makes a happy holiday for any gift giver.

The sappy gifts are ideal for those pals who actually believe that sentimentality is priceless. Digging up old photos and capturing them in an inexpensive frame is an easy way to relive times gone but not forgotten. If you are willing to put in the time, making a complete scrap book or memory book for friends or family is an irreplaceable gift that can be added to as time passes.

For the talented writer, Christmas poems or memorable family stories make an ideal gift. It is a chance to show off your skill and wit while pleasing even the most demanding recipient.

To give a gift that keeps on giving, try offering labor. No one would refuse a day of work-free luxury at your expense. Give out 'coupons' for free labor. Three loads of wash, a 15-minute back rub and breakfast in bed all add up to free time that no amount of money could buy. If the idea of cleaning is not too repulsive to you, give a coupon promising to clean up after the Christmas festivities. Tearing down the dying tree and untangling a mass of decorations is not the ideal way to spend a day, but an IOU to do the job is worth the money it will save you.

If you are a dedicated friend, sibling, son or daughter, give a gift to last throughout the year. Baking cookies, cakes or other treats and sending them once a month to a loved one for the entire year is a temporary way to get around dealing with gifts. For the long lost kid who never writes, promise to write a letter a month. After the shock of getting the letter wears off, the receiver might actually reply. The gift is two-fold: imagine getting something other than campus mail in your box.

As a last resort, for those lucky students who have their bookstore bills sent to mom and dad, charge it! When they get the bill, tell them the economic situation has driven the price of books up. If they buy it, count your blessings. If they don't, start a pay-back plan with low interest rates.

When all methods of escaping the woes of gift-giving on a meager budget are gone, remember the true meaning of the season. Surely your loved ones are thankful enough just to see your shining face at home.

Bison warm up vs. Mt. St. Mary's, 97-73

BY SCOTT GRISIN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The Breakin' Bison began their season with a 97-73 mauling of the Mountaineers of Mt. St. Mary's on Tuesday in Davis Gym.

Solaida-Mamsaang—The Bucknellian

Guard Chris Simpson '94 exploded for 25 points in the victory over the Mountaineers. The junior is averaging 23 points over the first two games, including the team's exhibition contest.

After Mike Bright '93 dropped in the first two points to start the game, Bucknell never let the visitors from Maryland get any closer as the team went on to win by 24.

Before the game, Paul Olkowski '93 was presented with the ball he used to sink an 87-foot shot—the longest in league history—in last year's Patriot League Championship game against Fordham.

"They told me before the game that they were going to present me with something, but I didn't know what," said Olkowski. "Yeah, it's nice."

The Bison (1-0) then took the floor and displayed stifling defense, especially in the first period. The Mount rarely got the ball underneath, and they were forced to shoot from the outside as a result, obtaining nearly half of their points (33) from beyond the three-point line.

In addition, the Bison pulled down 22 defensive rebounds while Russell Peyton '93 had five steals.

Bucknell then turned these defensive plays into points on the other end of the court, as five players ended the night in double figures.

Chris Simpson '94 was the game's high scorer with 25 points and five assists, while Peyton and Ray Brown '94 added 17 points each. Rounding out the balanced attack were Bright with 16, Matt Clark '93 with ten, and Olkowski with eight.

Peyton dished out ten assists in addition to being perfect from the floor (8-8) and from the line (1-1).

"I'm proud of myself as well as the team," said Brown. "We came out and played like a team, and the key to basketball is to play together."

Already up 47-34 at the half, the Bison continued to pull away in the second twenty minutes. They put together a 19-5 run in the early minutes of the second period, kicking it off with nine unanswered points.

After a Simpson score and a tip by Bright, the home team was sitting on a 24-point lead, with the score 76-52.

With eight minutes remaining, though, the Mountaineers (6-22 last season) moved within 12 after three three-pointers and a breakaway layup that forced a Bucknell timeout, but that was as close as they got in the second half.

Bright answered with a three of his own, followed by a breakaway layup by Peyton.

Simpson added a pair of free throws and three nice drives through the frustrated Mt. St. Mary's defense, and sandwiched in the middle of this was a dunk by Bright, bringing the crowd of 1,415 to its feet.

In his first-ever appearance with the Orange and Blue, Sekou Hamer '96 wasted no time showing what he could do when he took an outlet pass off of a steal. With a behind-the-back move at mid-court and a layup, Hamer brought the score to 97-72, the largest margin of the game, with under 30 seconds remaining. The partisan crowd once more rose to its feet in appreciation of the freshman guard's effort.

Mt. St. Mary's added a free throw in the closing seconds, bringing about the game's final score.

Olkowski voiced some concern with the squad's play, however, saying, "If people stop our [fast] break, I don't know what we will do."

Coach Charlie Woollum was pleased overall, saying that "it's very early and we've got to keep working."

The team hit the road Wednesday afternoon for the KYLT Coca-Cola Classic in Montana where it will face Montana tonight in the first round of the tournament.

The Bison return home next Tuesday night at 7:30 p.m. when they host Delaware.

Bucknell handed the Blue Hens one of their three regular-season losses last year, when Delaware went on to finish 27-3. At the conclusion of the 1991 season, the Blue Hens earned a trip to the NCAA Tournament.

The Breakin' Bison looked strong in the first game, and coach Woollum said, "If we play that hard, we'll get better."

At the conclusion of the fall sports season, Bucknell currently is in fourth place in the race for the Patriot League President's Cup, an award which it has captured both of the last two years. The President's Cup is awarded annually to the institution which accumulates the highest point total over the course of the academic-athletic year.

With 28.5 points, the Bison are currently trailing Colgate (36.5), Lehigh (33.5), and Lafayette (32.5) with one-third of the 1992-93 athletic year already gone.

Colgate's usage of championship men's and women's soccer teams along with second place finishes in volleyball and women's tennis has given them the early advantage. Bucknell's standing comes on the strength of championships in men's cross country and women's tennis, and a tie for second place in field hockey.

Rounding out the rest in the league are Army (24.5), Holy Cross (18), Fordham (16.5), and Navy (9).

Several members of the Bison football team took All-Patriot League honors following the completion of the 1992 season.

Two-time selection John Lusk '93 made the first team defense for his lineman play.

Meanwhile, running back Matt Walsh '93, wide receiver David Berardinelli '93, offensive linemen Jeff Hart '93, and two-time selection Eric Rutter '93 garnered second team offense honors.

Holy Cross led all squads with 15 players on the All-Patriot League roster.

James "Smokey" Ostendarp '52 recently received the 1992 George C. Carens Award by the New England Football Writers' Association.

The honor went to Ostendarp for his tenure as the coach at Amherst College from 1959-1991, when he led the Jeffs to an overall record of 168-91-5.

Ostendarp played football for Bucknell from 1948-49 and was inducted into the University's Athletic Hall of Fame in 1981. He went on after his collegiate career to play for the New York Giants for two years.

Wrestlers compete at Mat Town, ESU Open

BY NEIL BARDACH
Bucknellian Staff Writer

While most people view Thanksgiving break as a chance to go home and gain weight, collegiate wrestlers have to be careful during this time of the year.

Thanksgiving weekend just happens to be in the middle of the wrestling season, and that means that grapplers have to watch their weight or else fall prey to a wrathful coach.

There is no exception to this rule in Lewisburg. While most of the student body was home enjoying a hearty holiday meal, the Bison were in training, preparing for another grueling season. And while wrestlers have to suffer through Thanksgiving with little or no turkey, the benefits that they get from a hard-fought match far outweigh the down side of their efforts.

Last year, Bucknell's wrestling team finished second in the conference, and this year coach Bob Ferraro feels that the team is capable of improving on that accomplishment.

"We have a great opportunity to win the conference this year," said Ferraro, "and especially since we're hosting the conference this year, it would be nice to win in front of the home crowd."

The squad's captains this winter are George Swann '93, Phil Elliott '93, Mike Van Doren '91, and Bobby Ferraro '94.

"We returned three NCAA qualifiers from last year's squad," said coach Ferraro, who expects leadership from these wrestlers. "Everyone is working very hard, and there is great team unity."

Brian Sipes—The Bucknellian

Grapplers practice new moves for upcoming matches this weekend.

On Nov. 28, the squad participated in its first team tournament at the Mat Town U.S.A. Invitational, where the wrestlers fought for team as well as individual honors. Overall, Bucknell placed ninth, and several wrestlers won individual honors.

Placing highest for the Bison was Van Doren, who placed second at 150 lbs. He handily defeated three opponents before losing in the finals to the number-one seed.

The next highest place winner for the Bison was Elliott at 134 lbs. Elliott managed a fifth-place finish in a tough weight class, gathering four wins.

Placing sixth in their respective weight classes were Ferraro and Matt DiGiacomo '95. At 190 lbs., Ferraro advanced to the semi- finals before falling in the consolation rounds. In the heavyweight division, DiGiacomo won three matches to earn sixth.

Placing eighth were wrestlers Ron Wellman '95 (142 lbs.) and Jason Prokopchak '95 (158 lbs.). Wellman won three matches, and reached the quarterfinals before dropping in the consolation rounds. Prokopchak also won three matches to earn his position.

Two wrestlers did not place, but won matches to earn points for the team standings. At 118 lbs., Russ Parker '93 won two matches in the consolation rounds. At 126 lbs., Swann won twice in a row, but lost by a close 3-1 score to the number-one seed in the tournament.

In a team tournament, only one wrestler per weight class may wrestle for team points. However, Bucknell entered some "B" wrestlers in this tourney—wrestlers who could not earn team points but who could get time on the mat and gain experience.

Solutions from your Apple Campus Reseller:
The holiday gift you can really use.

Tell your folks that more college students choose Macintosh than any other computer. They'd want you to be in good company.

Ask for an Apple®Macintosh®computer this holiday season and join all of the students who've discovered that no matter what they do, Macintosh helps them do it better and faster. That's because Macintosh is so easy to use. And the thousands of available software applications work in a single, consistent way. So once you've learned one, you're well on your way to learning them all. The advantages of Macintosh don't end when school does. In fact, the majority of Fortune 1000 companies use Macintosh computers.* So ask your Apple Campus Reseller to help you choose which Macintosh to put at the top of your holiday gift list.

Macintosh. It's more than a present, it's a future.

Club men's spikers win NY invitational

Bucknell volleyball team avenges losses to Albany and Cornell earlier this season

BUCKNELLIAN TEAM CORRESPONDENT

Bucknell's men's club volleyball team gained revenge two weekends ago in New York against Cornell and Albany, the only teams to have beaten the Bison in their last three tournaments.

In those tournaments, which involved 49 other schools, the Spikin' Bison have garnered two championships (including one national title), one runner-up, two All-Americans, and one National MVP.

The sixth-annual Cortland Championship, in Cortland, NY, consisted of 20 teams, most of which hailed from the Northeast. Two squads stood out, though, as Bucknell's toughest adversaries: Albany and Cornell. The Orange and Blue had lost to both teams a mere two weeks earlier, and was winless versus Cornell in two attempts.

Following an extremely close win against SUNY-Binghamton in the quarters (15-4, 16-17, 15-11), and armed with an 8-0 record in pool play, Bucknell advanced to the semis of a tournament in which they only reached the quarters in 1991.

Pitted against Cornell, the pre-tournament second seed, Bucknell found itself humiliated 15-4 in the first game. Seemingly overmatched by Cornell once again, the Spikin' Bison were getting spiked themselves.

Nevertheless, Chris Dycka '93, Ben Jarosz '94, Glenn Gesek '94, Brian Sell '94, and Mike Kraus '94 still kept in mind the possibility of an improbable comeback.

"We showed our true grit against Cornell," said Matt Kraus '96. "Ben and Brian passed really well. They are at the heart of our side-out game because they run the serve receive by themselves. They are the key to our consistency, and that's the key to winning in any sport. We rose to the occasion, as we do so often, and ended up sending Cornell home on I-81, 15-13, 15-12. It was the most outstanding team effort we have mustered up as a team that I can remember."

Ironically enough, Bucknell's opponent in the finals would be none other than Albany, the team that defeated the Bison earlier this year in Lewisburg. Once again, the Orange and Blue had to come back to win the match, 11-15, 15-6, and 15-11.

"We lost the first game 15-11 and simply did not play very well," said Sell after the match, "but we did not give up. That's our trademark—our team will never give up. The key is our training. I can personally guarantee that we trained harder than any other team for this tournament, and it showed. It was obvious that we were in great shape after outlasting Albany 15-6, 15-11, in our 16th and 17th games of the day. Now that we know the intense training pays off, we are going to train even harder."

The squad's three-set victory could be attributed to the play of several players who took the initiative in the games.

"Chris [Dycka]'s offense was key," said Sell. "He carried us in a few rotations. He is playing like a superstar this year, which is the last of his illustrious career. We will miss him. Also, Jim Kochman ['95] played tenacious defense; however, the win was without a doubt a team effort."

"I cannot say enough about our team's ability to come back against bigger and more skilled opponents," said middle blocker Greg Freer '94. "It's amazing to watch sometimes. This team just reaches down so deep you begin to wonder if something is going to break...to be the man, you've got to beat the man, and lately we've been beating every man."

> "This team just reaches down so deep you begin to wonder if something is going to break...To be the man, you've got to beat the man, and lately we've been beating every man."
> —Middle blocker Greg Freer '94

"Our next tournament is at Villanova," said captain setter Mike Lutz '94, "and we are determined to win that tournament."

With the exception of St. Francis—who the Bison have already defeated in 1992—none of the schools that Bucknell has competed against lay claim to varsity programs. Therefore, all of the schools are sending the best athletes they have to offer this season against the Orange and Blue.

One of these wrestlers, Chris Jodikinos '95, earned a win for himself.

The team began the 1992 season a week earlier on Nov. 21 at the East Stroudsburg Open, and had a solid showing with a sixth-place finish. Unlike the Mat Town tournament, the ESU Open was a tournament in which wrestlers competed for personal achievement, with no regard for team points. Bucknell was therefore able to enter more wrestlers into the tournament.

"It was a strong start," said coach Ferraro. "We got four wrestlers into the semi-finals. [The ESU Open] is one of the better tournaments in the East."

To give an idea of the caliber of the opposition at this tournament, Ferraro said that "both [Mike] Van Doren and [Tom] Boyd ['94] lost to Penn State opponents who were ranked first in their respective weight classes."

The team fared very well, with six wrestlers earning a place in their respective weight classes.

Ferraro placed the highest of all Bucknell wrestlers, earning second-place honors in the 190-lb. weight class. Van Doren and Boyd placed third in their weight classes, 150 lbs. and 167 lbs., respectively. DiGiacomo placed fourth in the heavyweight division, with Parker finishing fifth at 118 lbs., and Mike Rush '95 placing sixth at 177 lbs.

The majority of the place winners on the team were in the higher weight classes, but coach Ferraro explained that the squad didn't "have any weak weight classes this year, and depending on how well we match up against our opponents this year, we should do very well."

In addition to the Bucknell wrestlers who placed in the tournament, several Orange and Blue wrestlers won matches in the tourney but did not place.

Clayton Burkle '94 won three matches at 126 lbs., and the team had three members win at 134 lbs. Josh Lipton '95 won one match, and Jodikinos and Steve Caruso '95 each notched three wins.

At 142 lbs., Elliott also garnered three wins, while Wellman also earned a victory.

At 158 lbs., Prokopchak and Charles Kresho '95 each won twice in the tournament, while at 167 lbs., Pat Riley '95 triumphed.

Tomorrow the Bison grapplers will travel to Lehigh for the Sheridan Invitational. Following Saturday's competition, Bucknell will not see action until Jan. 6, when it will face North Carolina at home.

The 1992 Fall Season...

We, the editors of the sports section, being that this is the last issue of the semester, deemed it necessary to provide our readers with a look back at the 1992 fall sports season. We have compiled a list of events, quotes and other such nonsense that we feel have made this fall an interesting time for us as editors, for you as readers, and for the athletes as participants. So sit back and enjoy as we present the 1992 Bucky Awards...

They said it

"Bucknell's dynasty is over! Lehigh's starts this year!"
Lehigh's men's cross country coach Fred LaPlante, said before the 1992 campaign; in the Patriot League Championships, Lehigh finished 21 points behind the running Bison—just good enough for second place.

"We're very win-hungry right now. To get close is in some ways more difficult than getting whacked."
—Football head coach Lou Maranzana, after his team lost a 21-10 lead in the 4th quarter and was beaten by Towson State, 24-21.

"Who can score a goal? Can you score a goal?"
—Frustrated field hockey head coach Heather Lewis, turning to the home crowd during a scoreless first half against Ursinus. The Bison went on to win, 2-1.

"You could do better than her [the referee]—you've got the right colors on!"
—Heather Lewis again, this time talking to a fan dressed in black and white.

"It seems the only games we win are the ones against each other during practice."

"It's like someone is trying to break into your home and steal something that's been yours forever."
—Cross country coach Art Gulden on the prospect of losing the men's championship title, which Bucknell has held for seventeen straight years.

"There were five of them and one of me—I had to bite one of them!"
—Women's club rugby player Dawn Soisson '96, after a particularly physical win over Swarthmore.

Closest shave of the semester

Men's cross country vs. Pitt, when Eitan Tabak '94 and Steve Clarke '95 passed the Panthers' fifth runner in the race (only the top five finishers for each team in a dual meet qualify for points) to edge out Pitt, 27-28, and stretch out the team unbeaten streak to 15 victories.

Men's water polo victory over Queens during the Eastern Championships at Navy. The team was trailing, 7-6, when the squad called timeout with possession of the ball and only 60 seconds left on the clock. The Bison regrouped, and went on to score two goals within a minute to steal the game away, 8-7.

Jean Auro—The Bucknellian

Game of the semester

Men's soccer team's 2-2 tie with Navy in overtime. With only one game left to play in a season where playoff participation was out of reach, the Bison (7-9-1) erased a 2-0 deficit with a pair of second-half goals against the Midshipmen, who came into Lewisburg at 10-5-1 and in pursuit of the final seed in the league tourney.

Stretcher match of the season

Football's 34-0 drubbing at the hands of Division I-AA powerhouse Villanov a, in which the following players were bitten by the injury bug: kickoff returner/wide receiver Troy White '95 (ligament damage in the knee, out for the year), starting linebacker Todd Hardy '94 (knee injury, out for six weeks), linebacker Kevin Kane '93 (knee injury, out for six weeks), and tight end Joe Zabielsky '95 (shoulder injury, out for the year).

Heartbreaker of the semester

Men's soccer loss to Fordham (then 4-9), who scored the game's only goal with 36 seconds left in overtime after a penalty kick to win, 1-0. The Rams finished at 5-13-1.

One-game performance of the semester

Golfer Doug Dollenberg '94 at the Susquehanna Invitational's Edgewood-on-the-Pines course, where he shot a two-under-par 70 and placed first in a field of 105 shooters. His score was the best by a Bucknell golfer since April 1976, when Chick Wagner fired a two-under par 68 at the Bucknell Country Club.

Hard-luck award

To men's soccer goalie Mark Wrigley '94, who recorded four shutouts this season and posted a 1.20 goals-against average (third best in the Patriot League), and still saw his team go a disappointing 7-9-1 this year. Wrigley also endured four 1-0 losses and kept his team in numerous other contests with spectacular play in the net even as coach Craig Reynolds broke in a relatively young squad in 1992.

Biggest upset of the semester

Football's 21-0 blowout at the hands of the Fordham Rams (then 0-7) in front of a home crowd on Parents Weekend. The Bison only could scrape up 98 yards of total offense on the afternoon, with 40 of those yards coming on one pass play.

The "extra mile" award

To the field hockey team, who went into overtime in eight of its nineteen games in 1992 and went 4-3-1 for these extended contests. In Bucknell's final game of the season against Lock Haven, which ended in a 1-1 deadlock, coach Heather Lewis made a pre-game agreement with the opposing coach to not enter overtime should the match end in a tie in regulation. One does not need to wonder why.

If this is homecoming, I'll stay home next year

Prior to this year's 33-14 triumph over Brown in Christy Mathewson Memorial Stadium, Bucknell's football team owned a four-year homecoming losing streak. Someone should have words with the schedule maker, and soon.

Worst case of jet-lag

The women's volleyball team, who traveled to Alaska for a rough five-day tournament against Fairbanks and Anchorage in September. The team compiled an 0-4 record during the tourney, and won only one out of the thirteen sets that it played up North.

The "Who let you in?" award

Undoubtedly goes to the women's soccer team, who slipped into the Patriot League playoffs by the narrowest—and most unlikely—of margins. By the end of the 1992 season, the squad held a subpar 6-11-1 record, but was tied with Holy Cross and Lehigh for the final playoff spot by reason of a 1-4 league record, which is the first tie-breaking measure used to determine playoff seeds. Head-to-head play was the next tie-breaking measure in line, but each of the teams had beaten one another in such a configuration that there was no clear winner in this category. Thus, the next method of deciding the fourth post-season spot was goals allowed in league competition. Bucknell finally won this category with eight goals against over the Crusaders (10) and the Engineers (17). Thus, the saying, "the best defense is a strong offense" was disproved by the Bison.

Proof that Bucknellians are gluttons for punishment

The Bison football team saw its biggest home crowd of the season in Christy Mathewson Stadium when it suffered its most horrendous loss of 1992 to Fordham, 21-0—a game that 6,392 fans turned out for. By contrast, three games later in the last home contest of the season, only 1,096 braved the rain to see Bucknell play its best game of the year and upset Colgate, 28-21—thus qualifying for the lowest attendance count for the entire fall.

What can you depend on these days?

One of the four teams that the Lady Spikers volleyball squad defeated this year was Fordham (15-1, 15-12, and 15-5) early in November. Ironically enough, it was the Rams who knocked the Bison out of the Patriot League Championship Tournament later that month, 3-1 (15-10, 9-15, 15-5, 15-11), thus ending Bucknell's season in the tourney's consolation quarterfinals.

Make up your mind, already!

In an article in The Phoenix Gazette this past September, sports staff writer Chris Cobbs described Bucknell as being "generally regarded as a wimp on the NCAA playing fields. Even the name suggests a bunch of geeks in horn-rim glasses burrowing into a library." Then, a mere five paragraphs later, Cobbs explained that "where you will find Bucknell players is lining up for diplomas. In fact, Bucknell leads the NCAA with its 94 percent graduation rate. And Bucknell players take only 4.1 years to graduate. No basket-weaving classes, either." The point of the Gazette commentary was to say how other universities should emulate the Bison athletic program, but with the image it paints of the student body in Lewisburg, was the pat on the back worth it?

Maybe we misunderstood the article, and should read it again. Now, where are those darned glasses of mine?

Commentary
Turnabout is rare play

Two weekends ago in Christy Mathewson Memorial Stadium, I witnessed something that local football fans in Lewisburg rarely have this fall: the home team sitting on a lead and running out the clock with long, sustained drives.

Indeed, in its last game of the 1992 season, Bucknell came up with a 28-21 upset of Colgate to end its turbulent year on a winning note. This victory is likely to be quickly lost in the shuffle of the Christmas season, upcoming exams, and the start of the University's winter sports schedule, but let's not do that quite yet. In light of the recent upheaval in Bucknell's football program, some things have to be looked at here in order to make some sense out of what has happened to the team since controversy overcame it.

First and foremost, the squad played against the Red Raiders as if it was in a televised bowl game. The execution was sharp, pursuit of the ball was relentless, and Bucknell created opportunities for itself on both offense and defense which led to a stunningly quick 21-0 count by the end of the first quarter. How could this one game be so different from all the others? The answer is simple.

Motivation.

For whatever reason, Bucknell overwhelmed the opposition with sheer desire alone for the first time this year. The win over a Colgate team that may have been superior on paper surely proved how far the proper motivation can propel a ball club. Forget talent or coaching for a moment—the Bison beat out their opponent two Saturdays ago because they wanted the win more fiercely.

Granted, desire won't always lead to victory. Playcalling and preparation always will figure into any win, and these are still areas that must be looked into in Bucknell's football program in the coming months.

Yet, fans and players alike would do well to remember what a little fire did for the Bison, even if it was fanned because of an event that caused a fair amount of disruption in the campus community. If nothing else, the events of the past month in the program may have led to insight into what could be for the future of Bison football if its players are properly directed and motivated to leave it all on the field every weekend.

Even with a final record of 4-7, the season in itself is something to build on from the standpoint of what lessons the players have learned from their adversity.

The team has been broken down into minute parts and put under a high-powered microscope in the last few weeks; now it is time to begin putting those pieces back together—the right way—so that we can forge a new and positive identity for the squad.

The rebuilding will not have to be done from a personnel standpoint nearly so much as a ideological one, for here is where the program's problems have been so especially notorious in recent seasons. If the players and coaches alike can work toward fostering communication, mutual respect, and innovative game plans, then maybe the stands at Christy Mathewson Stadium will not be as bereft of students when next fall rolls around.

We shall see.

Peter A. Lalos

Good luck to everyone on finals!!!

Lady Bison clipped in season opener, 84-82

Bucknell's second-half comeback falls short against St. Bonaventure; reserves key strong first performance

BY SCOTT GRISIN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The saying "too little, too late" can often be heard after a game, but in the case of Bucknell's women's basketball team, "more than enough, but too late" would be more appropriate.

As they did in the final few games of last season, the Bison orchestrated a strong run in the closing minutes of Tuesday's season-opening contest at St. Bonaventure.

Despite this effort, however, they dropped the game 84-82 as they simply ran out of time. The players felt that they lost the game in the first period as the Bison (0-1) began slowly, trailing the Lady Bonnies 41-34 at the half. Bucknell went into the locker room down by only seven points, however, thanks to some great play off of the bench.

Monica Nawarskas '94 dishes off to a teammate during a game in Davis Gym last season. The junior racked up 16 points against St. Bonaventure this past Tuesday, but her contribution was not good enough to avert the Bison from going 0-1.

"We stayed in it through the first half," said Anne McGovern '93, "because the second string was really helping us a lot."

The senior forward contributed 16 points and one block.

The reserves accounted for 52% of Bucknell's total scoring, though, with Monica Nawarskas '94 scoring 16 points, and Lauren Wagner '96 adding 17 more as the high-scorer for the Bison.

In her first game with the team, Wagner "really stepped up and did the things the team needed her to do," said tri-captain Juliet McGee '93. Bucknell came on strong in the second half, outscoring St. Bonaventure 48-43.

"We really hustled and worked hard—the enthusiasm was just incredible," said McGee, who pulled down 11 rebounds. "We battled and got back in the game."

Not only did the Bison get back in the game, but they nearly won it. Down by 15 points with only 3:30 remaining, they brought themselves within two, and if it wasn't for five turnovers during this run, they just might have stolen the lead away from their hosts.

"We could have won the game," said Lisa Fink '93, "but it was just good to have come back from a big deficit."

The squad's slow start against St. Bonaventure may have been due to the fact that the contest was the first of the season for the Bison.

"It was a pretty good first game," said Fink, "and we know what we have to work on. We got the first-game jitters out of the way, and now we can get down to playing."

McGovern added, "It's a big help [to have the first game behind us], but it would have been one hundred times better if we had won."

The Orange and the Blue will try again tonight when they play Iona in the first round of the Iona Tournament in New Rochelle, NY. The squad will return to Lewisburg next week for two home games, hosting Cornell on Monday, Dec. 7 at 7:30 p.m., and Hofstra on Dec. 9.

In a battle versus Mt. St. Mary's in 1991, guard Anne McGovern looks to pass the ball off.

"We will not be the same team we were in this game," assures McGee—at least not the one seen in the first half.

Senior tri-captain Juliet McGee is ninth on Bucknell's all-time list for free throws made in a career with 148.

Coming off wins against Drexel and Bloomsburg, the Lady Bison swimmers split their meets last week with Navy and LaSalle.

Navy, the Patriot League powerhouse last year who beat Bucknell for the number-one spot in the conference, again showed its dominance in the pool by taking 10 of the 16 events and finishing with a 176-124 win two Saturdays ago.

Although they weren't able to capture the meet, the Bucknell women (3-2) showed that they too had outstanding swimmers by shattering four pool records in Lewisburg.

The Lady Bison medley relay of Kathleen Hartnett '94, Stephanie Boles '95, Margaret Grunow '93, and Jeanne Klawon '95 started off the meet by taking the event in a pool record time of 1:51.64. Second year co-captain Grunow was also responsible for two of the other records by winning the 200-yard freestyle and the 100-yard butterfly with times of 1:54.1 and 58.51, respectively.

Hartnett, another power swimmer for Bucknell, brought in the other pool record by finishing with a 59.97 in the 100-yard backstroke. The junior also pulled out a win in the 200-yard backstroke.

Other notable swims for Bucknell included many second-place finishes by Allison Gillespie '96 in the 100- and 200-yard breaststrokes, Klawon in the 50- and 100-yard freestyles, Linda Fink '95 in the 1,000- and 500-yard freestyles, Colleen Brooks '95 in the 200-yard, Hartnett in the 200-yard IM, and the freestyle relay team of Suzanne Dilenge '94, Rose Maguire '96, Anne-Marie Nielson '94, and Klawon.

The Lady Bison also grabbed third places with the medley relay team of Brooks, Gillespie, Wendy Sheldon '93, and Dilenge; Jean Cadigan '95 in the 100- and 200-yard breaststrokes; and Brooks in the 100-yard backstroke. The Bucknell diving team of Deb Zapotucky '94, Julie Kotarba '95, and Heather Steinfeld '96 placed fourth, fifth, and sixth, respectively, on both boards.

As a team, the Bucknell women fared better against LaSalle at home a mere three nights later. Taking the meet by the score of 128-114, they captured six of the events and posted two new school records by Grunow.

In breaking her own record in the 200-yard freestyle in 1:53.63 and shattering the previous 200-yard butterfly record with a time of 2:08.45, Grunow has now taken part in setting ten school records.

Grunow also combined with Hartnett, Gillespie, and Klawon for the medley relay, taking the first event in 4:03.93. Hartnett was the only other individual winner for the Lady Bison, touching the wall first in the 50- and 100-yard freestyles with times of 25.09 and 54.2, respectively. The remaining first place finish belonged to the freestyle relay team of Dilenge, Maguire, Nielson, and Klawon with a 3:42.98 time.

The depth of the Bucknell team showed through with numerous second- and third-place finishes.

Diver Zapotucky took second on the three-meter board, with teammates Steinfeld and Kotarba third and fourth, and third on the one-meter board.

Distance swimmer Fink touched third in the 500-yard freestyle and second in the 1,000-

When is a 1-1 split for a sports team a blessing in disguise?

Answer: When that squad happens to be the men's swimming team, who had not yet won a meet this season until it toppled the Bloomsburg Huskies two weekends ago in dual competition.

Solaida Mamsaang—The Bucknellian

Anne-Marie Nielsen '94 cleaves through the water in dual competition this past week. The women's swim team split its two meets vs. LaSalle and Navy.

In its other meeting before Thanksgiving break on Nov. 24, the Bison (1-3) fell to LaSalle, 136-99.

Bucknell traveled to Bloomsburg after having dropped its first two meets of the year to UMBC and Drexel and quickly took control of matters with the Huskies. In the day's first event, the 400 medley, the Orange and Blue took first with a time of 3:44.51, and followed up on that with a one-two finish in the 200 free.

Rick Steenson '95 (1:48.36) took first, with Sloan Broderick '96 right behind.

In the 50 free, Jay Gross '93 touched the wall first with a time of 21.97, while Kevin Kendall '96 came in behind a Husky with a third-place finish.

John Dillon '95 placed second in the 200 fly in the fifth event of the meet.

A fine performance was turned in by diver Eric Carr '93, who grabbed first in both the one- and three-meter diving events.

First-place honors were also taken by Dietrich Conze '94 in the 100 free, Heath Smith '94 in the 200 backstroke, and Steenson in the 400 IM.

Broderick took second in the 500 free, while Grant McKnight '94 did the same feat in the 200 breast.

The thirteenth and final event of the meet saw the team of Conze, Steenson, Steve Droste '93, and Gross race to a blue ribbon with a time of 3:17.08 in the 400 free relay. The first Bloomsburg team to finish came in a full 11 seconds later.

When the swimming Bison took to the water against the LaSalle Explorers three days later, however, Bucknell was the squad that was caught in the undertow.

First place finishers included Steenson in the 200 medley (1:58.46) and 200 fly (1:57.8), and Gross in the 50 (21.34) and 100 free (47:76). Other than Carr's pair of firsts in the one- and three-meter diving events, though, Bucknell was rarely seen as the superior team last Tuesday in Freas-Rooke pool.

Second-place honors were more the order of the day for the Orange and Blue, as things turned out. In the 400 medley relay, Droste, Steenson, Gross, and Conze took second, while Stewart Harris '95 and Droste did likewise in the 1,000 free and 200 backstroke, respectively.

Rounding out the competition were a fourth-place finish for Doug Reid '95 in the 200 breaststroke and a second in the 400 free relay by the team of Broderick, Smith, David McGeorge '94, and Mike Watkinson '96.

Until 1993, the Bison will be idle in terms of dual competition. After the new year has been rung in, Bucknell will face off against the Blue Hens of Delaware on Jan. 6 in in the friendly confines of Freas-Rooke pool.

Students, faculty arrested in incinerator protest

Five members of the Bucknell community are awaiting a Feb. 19 hearing after being among thirteen members of the Organization for United Ecology (OUE) arrested for civil disobedience on Jan. 28, while protesting the proposed plan by Susquehanna River U.S. Pollution Control Inc. (USPCI) to construct a hazardous waste incinerator in Union County.

Charles Sackrey, associate professor of economics; Karl Patten, professor of English; Ernest Keen, professor of psychology; Amanda Swarr '95; and Joel Wainwright '95 were charged with defiant trespass, a misdemeanor of the second degree, during the demonstration held in Harrisburg.

The protestors were arraigned by Horace Lowrey, Harrisburg District Justice, and Steven Semic, Steelton District Justice. They were released after posting 10 percent of the bail set at $2,500 each.

Over 125 members of OUE participated in the demonstration making it the organization's largest rally at the state capital. "We needed to find some way to make our point of view public," said Sackery. "We have to convince people that this place is the wrong place, this company is the wrong company, and this technology is the wrong technology."

In order to begin work on the project, USPCI must gain state approval through the Department of Environmental Resources (DER). The DER reviews applications determining whether the proposed project meets all state environmental requirements. Although the agency has accepted a phase one ap-

Joel Wainwright '95, one of two Bucknell students arrested at OUE's demonstration against the proposed plan to build an incinerator in Allenwood, asserted his conviction to continue participation in the protest. He said,"We will go to whatever non-violent lengths which are necessary to stop the burner."

Cafeteria undergoes revamp by new catering company

One of the new features of the cafeteria, is a wok stir-fry station where students can prepare their own vegetables and meat. At other stations, students can make waffles or sandwiches, if they are willing to fight the crowds.

Wood Company introduces new variety into menu

BY TARA GILLIGAN AND DEB MANASSE
Bucknellian Staff Writers

Students returning to the caf this semester may have had to do a double take to make sure they were in the right place. The Wood Company, hired to revamp dining services, has given the cafeteria a bit of a face-lift in the two weeks since its arrival.

In place of what last semester was a conventional serving line is now an array of dining options including a deli cart, a wok stir-fry station, a pasta bar, a row of belgian waffle irons, and a hand-dipped ice cream freezer in addition to more traditional cafeteria offerings.

"As soon as people hit the serving line they'll know there has been a change," said Tim Tenon, interim manager of dining services. "Not only in layout and color scheme but in menu offerings as well."

Perhaps the largest remaining problem in the cafeteria is how to deal with long waits for particular food items. Athough students now have a choice of entrees (rest assured—curly fries and overcooked pasta are still available), they will have to put up with a long wait to cook their own stir fry or waffles. And while the novelty will undoubtedly wear off, the arrangement of the cafeteria will likely be such that the masses will still swarm around the ice cream freezer and other popular food counters.

On the up side, diners who turn their noses on the main course can always make a sandwich, throw together some veggies, or pour themselves a heaping bowl of Cap'n Crunch.

Ross, Moyer resign as new company moves in

BY DEB MANASSE
Bucknellian StaffWriter

The Wood Company, a regional food service mangement firm headquartered in Allentown, PA has taken charge of Bucknell's dining services as of Jan. 18. This comes after the apparently sudden resignations of director of dining services Hank Ross and his assistant Todd Moyer.

According to Barry Maxwell, vice president for administration, the University was working with the Wood Company in a consulting capacity when Ross and Moyer resigned their positions and left the University.

Calling Ross's resignations "a decision researched after a lot of talk about the changing situation of dining services," Maxwell added, "we've known for a while that we've needed to make a change."

President Gary Sojka cited concerns over the quality of service provided by the former dining services management as the primary factor leading to the decision to make substantial changes to the program.

According to Sojka, the main issue facing dining services was clear. "It was distressing that not too many years ago our dining service was one of the most popular, but that in recent years it has been in serious decline," said Sojka.

The University's first step toward this end was to employ the services of the Wood Company to lend their expertise in the area of food services to Ross and his staff.

"The original intent of the University was to utillize the Wood Company as a support for the existing dining services staff," said Maxwell.

"The idea was that Hank [Ross] would work with the Wood Company. However, once the service was here for a while it became apparent to everyone that that was not going to work," said Sojka.

Alleged sex offenders receive HBSA sanctions

Hearing board delivers two suspensions

BY TARA GILLIGAN AND MARIA GLOD
Bucknellian Staff Writers

Two incidents which occurred at the end of the fall semester have forced the Bucknell community to continue to deal with the harsh realities of sexual assault and harassment. The cases were adjudicated recently by the Hearing Board of Sexual Assault (HBSA), an internal judiciary panel established last year which has the authority to levy strict penalties against perpetrators.

While the University has refused any comment on the names of those found guilty or on the nature of each incident, the cases serve to illustrate the serious implications of sexual assault in a small college community.

The HBSA found both individuals guilty of sexual offenses. In the first of the two cases, two women presented testimony to the HBSA about separate incidents that occured on the same night. The incidents occurred during and after a fraternity and sorority mixer at the end of last semester; both assailant and at least one survivor were intoxicated. The perpetrator was found guilty by the HBSA of the following charges: sexual harassment, physical aggression or contact of a lewd type, deliberate or reckless threats, and violation of local ordinances or state or federal laws.

Although no charges were formally filed with the police, the HBSA imposed university sanctions. The perpetrator, a junior, is currently serving a suspension of up to one year and will be eligible to return to campus upon the completion of an awareness program. If he returns to campus, he will be under strict probation. The registrar's office confirmed that the individual has not enrolled for the spring term.

The second case, adjudicated this week, involved a first year student who allegedly forced a woman into his car, threatening to kill them both if she would not return to his room with him. The HBSA has found the perpetrator guilty of both sexual harassment and physical abuse.

The HBSA sentenced this alleged assailant to a suspension, but decided to allow him to remain on campus under probation. If, at the end of this probation period, the assailant has not committed any further offenses, his sentence will be deemed served.

The hearing board was established last year in response to the needs of the Bucknell community to deal more effectively with sexual offenses and to encourage victims to come forward with their accounts. The board is a standing subcommittee of the Committee on Student Conduct and is "empowered to adjudicate all charges of sexual assault under this policy," according to the 1992-93 Student Handbook.

Sally Nyquist, head of the board and associate professor of biology, said, "I think Bucknell has a very good system. From the time of the incident to the time of the hearing, it's only a couple of weeks."

According to Nyquist, the HBSA is much better able to handle sensitive cases than were former boards. The current system is "expeditious" and avoids the "major problems of previously long, drawn out boards that had no privacy whatsoever," she said.

Three accounting majors inflate GPAs

Three senior accounting majors inflated their GPAs on applications that they sent to a major accounting firm, according to a memo sent to senior and junior accounting students by Accounting Area Coordinator Stephen Willits, associate professor of management. According to the Dec. 17, memorandum, those unethical actions were committed against one of the "large public accounting firms" that regularly recruits at Bucknell. Upon contact, Willits declined to comment. The firm involved and the staff of the Career Development Center also declined to comment.

The following is a transcript of the letter that Willits sent to accounting students:

I deeply regret having to inform you of the nature of a telephone conversation I had this morning with a partner of one of the large public accounting firms that regularly recruits on campus. It seems that three members of your class inflated their GPAs, a fact that became quite obvious when the firm checked what was claimed against the students' transcripts. Needless to say, none of the three will be receiving offers from the firm in question.

I would like to emphatically remind all of you that such actions are highly unethical, not to mention downright stupid. Further, I would like to inform the responsible individuals that you have embarrassed not only yourselves, but also the University. I suggest that you spend some time reflecting on the consequences of your actions and on whether you have the strength of character necessary to be joining a profession that highly values integrity.

Do Bucknell professors assume that all their students are upper middle class?

Only several weeks after the arrival of the Wood Company, Ross and Moyer announced their resignations.

"The school just thought it was time to make a change," said Ross. "I have always worked for an independent school and wanted to continue to do that and decided that it was time for me to make a change as well."

According to Maxwell, Ross and Moyer's imminent departures led the University to retain the Wood Company on a full-time basis to work with the dining staff to develop a comprehensive plan for dining services.

"It became apparent that it was going to be to our benefit to go with the Wood Company full time," said Sojka.

Sojka stressed that the University's food service plays an important role in creating a positive campus environment and voiced his concern that students that had become dissatisfied with the quality of food options at dining services were distracted by the task of making their own eating arrangements.

"The idea is to reestablish the food service to become a more viable option for students, to make it more in tune with what students want," said Sojka. "When things like finding food begin to take time for students, that takes away from students' primary objectives."

According to Maxwell, Bucknell's current hourly dining services staff will remain employed by Bucknell and will maintain their former salaries and benefits.

The staff will be under the direction of a six person Wood mangement team which currently includes Tim Tenon, interim manager of Dining Services, and Paco Rosado, assistant manager of Dining Services.

Tenon will serve as manager until a joint Bucknell/Wood Company search for a permanent manager is complete some time this spring.

Rosado, who formerly served as the Wood Company assistant manager of Dining Servies at Franklin and Marshall College, will stay on as assistant manger.

In addition to the Wood Company additions, the management team will include four continuing dining services supervisory staff members, Suzi Brannon, Mary Byerly, Joan Crist, and Rick Slear.

"It is going to be a tough transition, but I'm convinced that we are working with good people," said Maxwell.

Ross and Moyer had served Bucknell for 22 and 9 years, respectively.

"What we are trying to do in the serving area is to make it more spacious and to give increased variety," said Tenon.

According to Barry Maxwell, vice president for administration, it is the administration's hope that the changes to dining services will entice some disillusioned meal-planners back to the cafeteria.

"We hope we create such an attractive dining service environment that people will be more likely to take a meal plan than they were in the past," said Maxwell.

Maxwell's hopes may have been realized, at least temporarily, as a number of upperclassmen, who had long since abandoned the meal plan, returned to the cafeteria to sample the enticing selections.

According to Maxwell, the administration is going to work to make sure that those who give the new caf a try keep coming back.

"We are going to form a dining service advisory committee to work with Tim [Tenon] and the management team to provide opinions and to act as a sounding board," said Maxwell.

Tenon echoed Maxwell's sentiments that the Wood Company places a strong emphasis on listening to students.

"We would like to have the opportunity to meet with students. We want to know what they'd like to see," said Tenon.

Although the Wood Company plans to examine the menu and format of the Terrace Room and the Bison, no final decisions have been made on what alterations will be made.

"One of the things we are concerned about [in the Bison] is having a good mix of healthy and traditional fast food.

The latest talk on this matter indicates that the Wood Company is considering incorporating the same "food station" system in the Bison as they have instituted in the cafeteria.

"We feel that we may be able to eliminate the ordering system," said Tenon. "Meanwhile we are looking to solicit input from students."

Financial problems force the closing of Lewisburg Hotel

BY NEIL BARDACH

The Lewisburg Hotel, 136 Market Street, unexpectedly closed Monday, due to "a combination of things," according to owner Roger Fetter. "It is closed. They [the operators] did have some financial problems, which was obviously the major reason [for the closing]."

However, according to an article in The Daily Item, a Sunbury newspaper, the primary reason for the Hotel's closing was that the company- which was run by Fetter's stepdaughter- failed to pay substantial amounts of both state and federal taxes. Court documents, filed from September 1991 to January 1993, show that the business failed to pay about $132,360 in taxes. These taxes covered business income, sales, and employee paycheck withholdings. According to the article in The Daily Item, the Pennsylvania State Department of Revenue and the Federal Internal Revenue Service filed liens in court after reportedly trying to obtain tax payments.

According to David Martin, director of licensing with the state's liquor control board, the Hotel's liquor license expired on Monday, leading to the closing. However, the license could not be renewed because of a reported $19,960 in taxes owed for 1992. According to a state law, a liquor license cannot be renewed if a tax debt exists.

The expiration of the liquor license would not have meant in itself that the Hotel would have had to close completely, but rather that they would have no longer been able to serve any alcoholic beverages. However, the unpaid state tax could also prevent the Hotel from renewing its sales tax license, a requirement for all Pennsylvania businesses to run.

Since closing, the business has been listed for sale at $390,000, according to The Daily Item. However, according to the Lewisburg Area Chamber of Commerce, Fetter states that this price is incorrect. He has owned the property since 1986, when he bought it for $125,000. Fetter would like to sell the property, but he is also considering the possibility of a new tenant.

The loss of the Hotel is a great blow to both the community of Lewisburg and the University. The dining room in the restaurant was usually full, often by University students. "The food was good, and it was always nice for Parents' Weekend," said Brooke Bitner '94. The Hotel was always booked solidly for University events such as graduation and first-year student orientation and was a popular spot for receptions and weddings.

As a sort of social center for a town without one, the Hotel was "a central feature of downtown [Lewisburg]," said Robin Meredith-Golden, Administrator of the Lewisburg Area Chamber of Commerce. "We hope that a new [tenant or arrangement] can be found soon."

Scaffidi assumes role as new gay/lesbian/bisexual advisor

This January, the University hired Cate Scaffidi as the new advisor to lesbian/gay/bisexual students. Matthew Frericks, who held this newly formed position prior to Scaffidi, resigned at the end of last semester.

Scaffidi is the second advisor to fill this position which recently added to provide support and guidance to Bucknell students. The purpose of the new advisor is to act as a representative of gay/lesbian/bisexual concerns, as well as to collaborate with students on campus to implement relevant programming.

As the position only warrants five hours per week, the former advisor was unable to devote enough time to Bucknell students and simultaneously maintain a more demanding position.

Amanda Swarr, who acts as the student liaison for lesbian/gay/bisexual concerns, feels that Scaffidi "was the perfect choice" for a new advisor. Although the present semester has just begun, Scaffidi seems to be enthusiastic and motivated. Swarr believes that as a Bucknell graduate, Scaffidi is familiarized with the campus which is an asset to her position.

With Scaffidi's previous therapeutic experience, Swarr foresees positive contact between the advisor and the students. She also mentions that Scaffidi is "very comfortable with her own sexual orientation" and is "very approachable."

Barbara Shailor, vice president for student service, would agree with Swarr in saying that Scaffidi's contributions to Bucknell's campus will be "a continuation of what we've started; not a new beginning."

Race/Gender survey is basis of socio-economic workshop

BY DAVE YOUNG

Lured by free milk chocolate or the opportunity to express their point of view on an important campus issue, 25% of the Bucknell community participated in a survey on issues of socio-economic class conducted by the Race/Gender Resource Center during finals week.

Posing a variety of questions dealing with discrimination based on socio-economic class, class differences between Bucknell faculty and students, and problems with socio-economic class, the survey became a part of the annual pedagogy workshop for faculty development sponsored by the Race/Gender Resource Center during the month of January.

Although the first of two workshops was intended to address how teaching can be affected by attitude towards socio-economic class, progress was inhibited because workshop participants came into the course with their own biases, according to Carol Lee, assistant professor of history and co-director of the Race/Gender Resource Center. "You can't assign someone a class based only on income," said Lee, pointing out a chart on the wall of the resource center office, which assigns classifications of people according to income, gender, and occupation. Lee made it clear that a person can be classified as middle class according to occupation, but not according to income.

Focusing on sterotypical behavior that goes along with certain income brackets, the workshop also dealt with the influence of social factors such as upbringing and education which effect thinking within a class. This perspective on socio-economic class was emphasized by the speakers at the workshop, Laurie Nisonoff, Susan J. Tracy, and Stanley Warner who wrote a story on socio-economic class at Hampshire College in Massachusetts. Published in issue forty-one of Radical Teacher, the story entitled "Stories Out of School: Poor and Working-Class Students at a Small Liberal Arts College," gave the directors at the resource center the idea for their workshop.

Defining income inequality as a consequence of class distinction, the story highlights the contradictory public and private social cultures at Hampshire as well as discrepancies between middle and working class student opinion of accommodations, food choices, and the Gulf War.

Time constraints are also a concern that poor and working class students face. While their peers have plenty of time to complete

Have We Deferred the Dream ?

Over 130 members of the Bucknell community attended the second annual Martin Luther King, Jr. celebration held January 15 in the Terrace Room.
Following the singing of the African-American National Anthem by Sharon Hawkins '94 and Michele Simms '93 (bottom right) and the reading of Langston Hughes poem "What Happened to the Dream Deferred?" by Terence Riley '94 (right), Professor of Religion and Political Science Douglas Sturm (bottom left) delivered the keynote address entitled "Have We Deferred the Dream."
Sturm began his talk discussing W. E. B. Dubois' still-present notion of the African-American's double-consciousness as a vehicle to examining what King referred to as "the triple evils of our time: racism, militarism, and poverty."
Speaking in the context of the political, social, and economic history of the movement spearheaded by King, Sturm spoke to the "paradoxical" situation in which one finds society, in that America, "from it's very beginning, has been schizophrenic," proclaiming freedom and liberty for all while at the same time systematically repressing the African- and Native-American.
"The virulence of racism runs deep in America and penetrates all of our institutions, even yet," asserted Sturm, closing with the assertion that "we are still afflicted, are we not, with the triple evils to which Martin spoke."

Students benefit from changing federal financial aid policy

BY KRISTEN KUSEK
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Within the next few weeks, students on financial aid will be receiving and filing forms according to a new system which will go into full effect July 1, 1993. Last summer, President Gary Sojka signed the Higher Education Amendment of 1992. Because 60% of Bucknell undergraduates receive financial assistance, this amendment warrants attention. Ron Laszewski, director of financial aid, said that "the mechanism [of financial aid] has changed, but the basic operation is the same."

What changes will be in effect? First of all, the way in which families apply for financial aid will change in that a minimum of two forms will have to be filled out instead of just one. The information requested on the two forms will be similar, but worded differently. The process is intended to allow for more government control.

Second, one's borrowing power under the Stafford Loan will increase. Freshman and sophomores will be able to borrow up to $3500 instead of $2600 and the borrowing power for juniors and seniors will increase from $4000 to $5500. However, these figures have been offered, but to date, no extra money has been provided to substantiate them.

Third, the Parent Loan for Undergraduate Students program (PLUS) will enable parents to borrow up to $4000 per student. Next year, parents will be able to borrow the difference between the cost of Bucknell and the amount of financial aid their children receive. Credit ratings, among other factors, may affect parent eligibility. The stipulations are included in a 150-page booklet which explains this program.

According to the amendment, home equity would not be considered when dealing with financial aid. But in accordance with University policy, Bucknell will still continue to consider home equity when determining financial aid status. For example, one could come from a "poor" family as far as income is concerned, but with a home equity of more than $300,000, Bucknell would label the family as a "no-need" family.

As a result of these mechanistic changes, there is bound to be some initial confusion. Sojka's concern dealt primarily with the inevitable "heterogeneity of interpretation" by the various amendment-signers. He also expressed concern about the increased expectation by families as far as the delegation of financial aid and the lack of additional money to substantiate the changes.

Aside from these future changes, as Laszewski said, the basic operation will remain the same. Put simply, financial aid is still based on need. The factors determining financial aid still include parent and student income, number of assets, family size, and how many children in the family attend school. Fifty-five to 60 percent of Bucknell students have a sibling in college.

Another constant in the financial aid system is the concept of preferential awards. According to the Undergraduate Financial Assistance booklet, "need-based financial aid is usually awarded in a combination of three forms: grants/scholarships, student loans, and college work-study." Preferential awards consist of more scholarship money as opposed to loans or jobs. This scholarship money does not have to be repaid. These awards are given to qualified athletes, scholars, and music, dance, or theater participants, as well as minority students in an effort to diversify the campus.

Finally, Bucknell's financial aid program will be "critical" to the University's future, according to Sojka. Although no goals are written in ink thus far, the administration plans to concentrate on "people and programs, not bricks and mortar." Bucknell needs to provide a greater number of endowment programs for which the students do not have to pay. As of this year, Bucknell is the most poorly endowed when compared to our sister institutions.

The hearing board is comprised of five members: two faculty, one male student, one female student, and one administrator. Members are selected from the Committee on Student Conduct, and each receives special training.

At each hearing, all five members must be present; a "finding of accountability" can be reached only when at least three members are in agreement, according to the Handbook.

The board has "full authority in matters involving students brought before it, and is empowered to institute any of the University's disciplinary sanctions."

"It's a very intensive process. For a number of people, there's an awful lot of work involved," said Nyquist.

SURVEY

their studies, poor and working class students as well as single mothers who go to school at Bucknell must give time to both jobs or children in addition to studies.

"People who came to the seminar made no bones that they were working class, and they highlighted ways that University policy ignores them," says Lee.

Students, faculty, and staff who participated in the socio-economic class workshop agreed that impressions of Bucknell were those of a privileged school where students come from comfortable backgrounds. This view was further supported by results on the survey questionnaire which reports "common themes of insufficient diversity, lack of awareness, snobbishness, and thoughtlessness" as the biggest problem concerning socio-economic class at Bucknell.

Lee concurs that "we are self absorbed," noting that students fail to recognize that people in the surrounding community are making lifestyle choices. She attributes lack of respect for people outside the Bucknell community to "checkerboard vision." "We can see something on one level, but we can't transfer it to a broader framework. We will look at Bucknell in one way, but we don't look outside Bucknell in the same way."

With 41 persons in attendance at the first workshop, the directors of the Race/Gender Resource Center are optimistic that discussions on race, gender, and class will continue throughout the semester.

Sojka elected to NCAA

University president Gary Sojka is one of four newly elected members of the Presidents' Commission of the National College Athletic Association (NCAA). The new members were chosen in a mail election procedure by their peers in their membership divisions, the NCAA said. Forty-four college and university presidents serve on the commission.

According to a 1992 survey, Bucknell's 94% graduation rate for student athletes leads the way among American colleges. Sojka said that in his four year term he would emphasize that "student athletes are students first and foremost."

SBDC holds seminar

The Small Business Development Center (SBDC) will hold a seminar on Tuesday, Feb. 23 examining the business dilemma of being 'profit rich and cash poor.' Discussion will be led by George Kester, associate professor of finance at Bucknell.

The $10 fee must be made payable to Bucknell University and sent to Charles Coder, SBDC Director before Feb. 21. Enrollment is limited.

For more information call Charles Coder at x1249.

New exhibit to be hosted

Bucknell is hosting an exploration of the African Experience during the spring semester.

Events open on Monday, Feb. 8 with the Center Gallery exhibit, "Paramount Chiefs of Sierra Leone", a series of photographic portraits by Bloomsburg University photography professor Vera Viditz-Ward.

The Center Gallery is open to the public free of charge weekdays from 11 a.m. to 4 p.m. and weekends from 1 p.m. to 4 p.m.

Controversy surrounds incinerator issue

BY SAMANTHA SHIVERS
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The latest attempt to draw attention to the proposed incinerator for Gregg Township by the Organization United for Ecology (OUE) has again put the spotlight on the USPCI and their battle to gain approval.

The $100 million incinerator has for over two years been in a constant state of metamorphosis, changing and shifting to meet the various requirements for the government and the public. This has left a sleepy audience in a quagmire of shuffling terms and changing regulations.

"The demonstration in Harrisburg was more a publicity stunt by OUE to put pressure on the DER." -John Tracy, Sunbury Daily Item

Since September 1990, the U.S. Pollution Control Inc. (USPCI) - owner of the site - has had to grapple with local and state officials to recieve approval for their hazardous waste incinerator. The USPCI is currently performing tests in order to submit a Phase II application to the Department of Environmental Resources (DER).

The need for an incinerator was the first issue to be targeted by such opposition groups as the OUE. The DER claimed that Pennsylvania was one of the leading exporters of hazardous waste; therefore, an incinerator was essential for the state to maintain its self-sufficiency. But the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) claims that Pennsylvania is one of the main importers of waste, not exporters.

Contradictions like this have hampered the USPCI in gaining public support.

"The demonstration in Harrisburg was more a publicity stunt by OUE to put pressure on the DER. The people now say that the DER hasn't been listening to their complaints about USPCI's complicity and track record in other states," said John Tracy of the Sunbury Daily Item.

The Phase I application was at first denied due to the presence of Class I soil on the site. In order to obtain approval, the DER had to consider the location of wetlands, agricultural lands and carbonated geology. After shifting the site of the incinerator and by making exceptions to various county laws, the approval was finally given.

Another criticism by opposition groups was the fact that DER approved the Phase I application by stating that it would not be a storage facility. OUE was sceptical as to how the incinerator would process seventy five thousand tons of waste and not have to store any of it.

The Phase II application now being compiled by USPCI will be submitted by the end of the year. Its objective is to monitor the possible environmental impact the incinerator would have on the area.

Members of OUE gather on the capitol steps to protest the plans to build a hazardous waste incinerator.

While the Phase I application dealt more with site restrictions and therefore was thought of as a black and white issue, the Phase II application dealing with air monitoring and wind patterns, is more open to the opinions of the DER. " There is more mitigation, more room for give and take with the Phase II, " said Tracy.

Student involvement in the incinerator movement has been minimal, especially considering the close proximity of the incinerator to campus.

"Nothing every really got off the ground even from the start. In the very beginning in 1990, the Gulf War came along and swept away much of the interest," said Charles Sackrey, associate professor of economics.

ARRESTS

plication from USPCI, a second phase application must be approved before construction of the incinerator can begin.

In their struggle to 'ban the burner,' OUE is opposed to DER's review of the incinerator proposal. "We set out to bring attention to this problem and to make the rest of the state aware of the fact that DER is, in our opinion, simply ignoring their own laws and regulations," said Clyde Peeling, vice-president of OUE and owner of Reptileland. Leading the protestors at the demonstration, Peeling stood outside the building and read a letter that called for the resignation of DER secretary Art Davis. Peeling then attempted to deliver a mock pink slip to Davis and entered the lobby along with the other 12 protestors.

The 13 protestors then engaged in non-violent civil disobedience by sitting down in front of the double door entrance at the state DER and refusing to leave until Davis acknowledged the group. "We wanted to symbolically shut down the DER, and we did," said Swarr. "The sentiment of the group is to do whatever it takes to stop construction of the incinerator."

When the protestors declined the requests of DER officials to move from their posts in the lobby, the agency called in the Harrisburg police department. Police Chief Richard Shaffer asked the group to leave, and when they refused, officers handcuffed and arrested the thirteen.

Bucknellians involved in the demonstration are planning to increase campus involvement in the 'ban the burner' campaign. "We are going to try to get more students committed to OUE," said Wainwright. According to Wainwright, a membership drive will be held this spring allowing students to join the efforts of OUE. "This is something that the Bucknell community should be aware of because it will effect all of us," said Vanessa Jones '95 after participating in the demonstration. Patten, also commenting on the importance of Bucknellian involvement in this issue, said, "The proposed site is just up the river and the people who live here have to be concerned."

Although Peeling indicated that the demonstration was effective in bringing attention to the issue, he stressed that OUE members plan to continue protesting the building of the incinerator. "I don't think that one time is going to be enough. I think we're going to have to commit civil disobedience repeatedly to focus attention on Union County," said Peeling.

Other members of the group echo Peelings sentiments. "We will go to whatever non-violent lengths which are necessary to stop the burner," said Wainwright.

Campus must confront sexual assault

This past week served as a reminder that the Bucknell Bubble is not impervious to the ugly realities of the world. The Bucknellian learned of two cases of alleged sexual assault that took place at the end of last semester. Immediately, we were confronted with several questions: Do the incidents belong in the paper? If so, in how much detail? Should the name of the man found guilty of sexual assault by the Hearing Board on Sexual Assault be included? How should the wishes of the victims influence coverage of the news? What information best serves the campus community?

These questions led to more general questions. The Bucknellian had literally stumbled upon the information. Was the University withholding valuable information, as it chose to do in these cases, that could significantly effect the campus as a whole? Should the University be pressed to release information on every case that is adjudicated by the HBSA? Absolutely.

The biggest stumbling block to confronting sexual assault on campus is denial of the reality of the problem. Failure by the University to release information on adjudicated sexual assault cases directly feeds in to this denial and perpetuates the horror.

Sexual assault must be confronted, by men and women. Making the incidents public brings the issue to the forefront. It tells women that they must be wary, that the specter of sexual assault does lurk within the confines of the campus. The University's refusal to release such information tells women that it doesn't happen here. It does; just ask Janice Butler. Women need to know this.

Security alerts were sent to every student concerning the rape cases at Bloomsburg. Why not make public cases of rape and sexual assault on the campus? The difference was that in both cases the victims knew their alleged attackers; they were acquaintances of some sort. Be the attacker a friend, acquaintance, or stranger, sexual assault is still sexual assault. Information about cases on campus may be even more valuable, and represent a more imminent threat to women on campus.

The nature of the incident must be included in the report. This brings sexual assault out of the abstract and into the real. It allows women to reflect on times when they were in similar situations, and it may help them realize that it can happen to them — especially if they have too little judgment and too much alcohol.

The value of such information for men is just as compelling. Not every man is a sexual offender, but every man can be. Seeing their peers in situations similar to those they may have been a part of forces every man to realize that he has the potential to sexually harass or assault. It is a fact that men do not want to face, but it is the first step in prevention.

The University has little to lose by releasing information about adjudicated sexual assault cases. Such information shows that the system works. Assaulted women will know that there is a place where justice is served. Men will know that there are stern consequences they will face should they sexually assault a woman.

Sexual assault cannot be dealt with as a theoretical construct. The biggest stumbling block to confronting sexual assault on campus is denial of the reality of the problem. Failure by the University to release information on adjudicated sexual assault cases directly feeds in to this denial and perpetuates the horror.

This reasoning led us to conclude that the interests of the campus as a whole were best served by publishing the information pertaining to the alleged sexual assaults. With rare exception, every news story is going to have its critics, and that is the best proof that a newspaper is doing its job. Printing the names of those individuals who were tried by the HBSA, however, was an issue that posed much weightier and less clear cut ethical questions.

Would The Bucknellian be irresponsible in not notifying the women on campus about threats to their physical and emotional well-being? Most answered yes. At the very least, it seemed, women should know the names so that they have the choice of whether to associate with the individuals. The University maintained that there was no need to release the names because those close to the cases had deemed that neither man represented a "continuing threat to the campus." Why then, was at least one of them suspended for a year with conditions on his re-admittance and the strictest possible probationary status until he graduates?

Others argued that printing the names would serve to make the issue real for students. They would see their peers, people they may have thought incapable of alleged sexual assault. They might realize that people, not monsters, can and do commit monstrous acts. Most agreed that not printing the names would perpetuate the stigma that surrounds sexual assault. Printing the names, they said, would help to remove the taboo that survivors often feel, and force discussion on the issue.

Everyone, however, acknowledged that there were serious consequences to printing the names, even when the individual was found guilty by the HBSA. The issue of confidentiality on a small campus was paramount.

Would release of the names compromise the confidentiality of the survivor? If so, might this discourage other assaulted women from coming forward?

This issue was unresolvable. Many argued that rather than discouraging women from coming forward, it would encourage them to do so. If women saw that they were not alone they might be more willing to come forward. This is true especially if, as has happened in the past, a women had been sexually assaulted by one of the individuals named.

It was the survivor's pain, however, that proved to be the most gut-wrenching and soul-searching of the issues. In this case, we knew that printing the name of the individual found guilty would cause the survivor an indescribable amount of pain. Yet, the arguments for disclosing the name seemed to override this on a rational level. Few of us had experienced the kind of trauma that permitted us to understand what the survivor was feeling. Those who had, and could in some small way relate to the survivor, knew one thing: her pain was devastatingly worse than ours had been.

We were divided. How could we weigh the intense pain of an individual against what we take to be our mission, serving the entire community? We struggled with the line that exists in each one of us between journalist and human being. In the end, given the circumstances of this particular case, we did the only thing we could.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

P.O.W.E.R.'s actions "invaded my sight"

TO THE EDITOR:

I am writing this letter to the anonymous members of P.O.W.E.R. who decorated the quad with their enlightening statistics. Kudos to you for having the initiative to seek to remedy the injustices done to women. Though your methods were radical, I believe that you felt society necessitated such actions, and were therefore justified to react in this way. I fully support your right to demonstrate, and I even applaud you for taking a stand.

But your rights are guaranteed only as long as you don't interfere with anyone else's rights. Well you interfered with my right to forget and to go on with my life. Your graphic effigy of a woman who had been raped invaded my sight every time I went to class. I was not only bombarded with your chalk talk (which was difficult enough to deal with), but I had to face the memories of my ordeal, and realize that I had been that effigy; perhaps not as graphic, but real just the same.

I was raped; at least I was the victim of an attempted rape, by a person I had thought to be my friend. It happened not more than three months ago, it happened on this campus, and we were both sober. I had been a virgin, and he knew that. When you decided to plant your effigy in a highly visible and trafficked area, you should have taken people like me into consideration. Don't we count? Are we, perhaps, unimportant in your crusade because it has already happened to us? I can't speak for every victim, but I know that it must have had a horrible effect upon them.

I fear that your movement has had a negative effect. What you have done, in essence, is to alienate the very people you are fighting for. You drew me in with your chalk talk, but you disregarded me with your other stunt. How can I support you if you don't have any consideration for those who were victims of the male dominance you strive to end?

In the future I will give you the benefit of the doubt because I think that you have the potential for becoming a very formidable group. However, for now I cannot condone or support your methods. You are much too militant, and you don't have to be that way. There are other ways to end this. Women will not cease to be raped because of your effigy. You only alienate those people who can still be reached and educated about the wrongness of sexual assault and rape. Those who agree with you and your methods now will in the future. You must find a way to reach those who need to hear your message without harming those who are recovering from the attacks of those who didn't.

I am writing this letter without using my name because I don't feel that my identity is relevant to my case. There are those of you who do know who I am, and I beg you to keep it to yourself. I can understand why the members of P.O.W.E.R. act both at night and namelessly; for the same reason I do also.

Thank you for your time and patience.

Mutilated deer— "Who done it?"

TO THE EDITOR:

Deer Bucknell,

While reading the last issue of The Bucknellian I was struck by a small article on the front page, "Deer Found Mutilated in Swartz." After reading in disgust of the deer found stuffed with hamburger, smeared with mustard, containing a spoon in its mouth and a pen in its right eye, one question immediately forced its way into my mind. "What kind of person would do something like this?"

I'm sure many of my fellow Bucknellians reacted similarly, pondering over the question for a second, then chalked the event up next to Jeffrey Daumer and our 60 degree balmy New Years Eve as yet another example of surreal reality.

However I, perhaps due to a childhood saturated with Nancy Drew novels and with the superfluous leisure hours of January on my hands, could not leave well enough alone. The question continued to haunt me and, armed with only the meager facts supplied in the Bucknellian article, I set out to deduce the nature of the culprit.

Was it Sherlock Holmes (or was it Inspector Gadget?) that once said, "To crack the crime you must think like a criminal." Taking this advice to heart, I settled back in my green vinyl, general issue dorm chair and recreated the scene of the crime in my mind. The first thing I noticed was the mustard.

"Why not ketchup?" I asked. Clearly, the mustard sort of went with the hamburgers...but ketchup would have gone just as well. From an informal study conducted over the past few years I know for a fact that more people prefer ketchup on their burgers than mustard. What could mustard do that ketchup couldn't, culinary aspects aside. Aha! In my mind I saw the lounge, deer with open stomach cavity, hamburger patties... the place must have been a bloody mess. The criminal recognized that mustard would contrast with all the red blood, leading to a greater visual impact when the deer was first discovered. Indeed, ketchup would probably have blended with the blood, being only noticeable upon closer inspection. To have such sensitivities to the importance of color the criminal must have been the artistic type.

This was a good start, but it wasn't enough. I referred back to the scene in my mind, and using a combination of techniques culled from hours of Psych 101 and Quincy reruns, I searched for more clues. One option was evident. The burgers, plastic spoon, and mustard all suggested that a bitter Bison worker was the villain. Frustrated from frying up hundreds of hot, grease-stinging Bison burgers ("No ketchup please") and dispensing innumerable non-fat frozen yogurts ("Spoons are in the basket") without so much as a "Thank-you," the Bison employee may have vented pent-up desires to harm students on the innocent deer.

"But why a deer?" Unless the criminal was drunk and thought it

Coach clarifies

TO THE EDITOR:

Thank you for allowing me to express my views and opinions concerning Bucknell sports and athletics. The opinions and views expressed were solely mine and not those of Lafayette College or any of their staff. I would also like to apologize to Lafayette for any misunderstanding that may have happened when I listed myself as a coach at that fine institution. Thank you again.

OUE's civil disobedience will continue

BY CLYDE PEELING

Those who participated in civil disobedience in Harrisburg on January 28 had given it careful thought. After all, few of us want to intentionally break the law and none of us are eager to spend time in jail, not to mention the fines. Nonetheless, we became convinced that the action was unavoidable.

Thoughts about the approaching date crept into mind early in January as I walked through the Ecuadorian rainforest and sat for hours in our outboard-powered dugout, navigating Amazonian tributaries. Together with Bucknell students Robin Black, Jeff Walsh and Aaron Burgamy, I spent a week in a remote part of the Amazon basin. As our fifty-foot canoe made the return trip up Ecuador's Aguarico River, I noticed Aaron totally absorbed in Still Life With Woodpecker, a book by Tom Robbins. It was such a strange looking title and cover design I asked him if I could look at it. He handed me the book as he extolled its virtues and I randomly opened it to page 98 and began to skim the contents.

"Life is like a stew," wrote Robbins. "You have to stir it frequently or all the scum rises to the top." A little further down the page he continued. "If you're honest, you sooner or later have to confront your values. Then you're forced to separate what is right from what is merely legal."

I handed the book back to Aaron and commented that Robbins could have been talking about citizens in the central Susquehanna Valley! He could have been a member of Organizations United for the Environment (OUE). Certainly, it had become clear to our OUE members over the past thirty months that the scum had risen and it was time to do the right thing and take the consequences. We were witnessing government in collusion with a waste industry right under our noses. If anyone believed they were being protected by DER before September 1990, they didn't now.

The acronym—intended to be funny—"D. E. R., Don't Expect Results," had, for us, become the sober truth. If we were going to get environmental protection, it would be up to us to provide it for ourselves. It was time, indeed, to stir up the stew.

U. S. Pollution Control Inc.'s Host Community Working Committee (HCWC) has uncovered a wealth of information, all supported with primary source documentation. It shows, for example, no reliable data to support DER's claim that the Commonwealth needs a commercial hazardous waste incinerator. On the contrary, HCWC research reveals that the Capacity Assurance Plan (CAP), prepared by DER for the federal EPA in the mid 1980's, shows a 150% overcapacity for incinerable materials through the year 2009. And, incidentally, EPA figures claim that Pennsylvania is the largest importer of hazardous waste in the United States. Why, then, would USPCI want to build an incinerator? If there isn't enough waste, how can they expect to make a profit?

"If you're honest, you sooner or later have to confront your values. Then you're forced to separate what is right from what is merely legal."

The answer may be that DER is unwilling, or unable, to enforce environmental laws and regulations as they relate to the waste industry. We suspect this reluctance to enforce the law may be related to the fact that the waste industry is one of the largest lobby groups in Harrisburg. Whatever the reason, with no environmental cops enforcing laws, a company like USPCI can import waste from virtually any customer willing to pay their price, from anywhere in the world. And DER reluctantly admits that if the Commonwealth were to issue a Certificate of Public Necessity (CPN) which would allow USPCI to build its incinerator, orverriding local zoning that currently prohibits it, nothing in the law requires that USPCI burn any of Pennsylvania's waste.

Committee members also examined the ownership issue. That is, who owns the land? They found that USPCI did not list the true owner of the land on their permit application as required by law. The HCWC looked at USPCI's hazardous waste landfill facilities in other states. The company, it turns out, failed to list over 80% of their violation history on the permit application. The law, of course, requires that they include all past violations.

Not to worry, Secretary Davis reassures us, ownership and violation history will be reviewed throughout the permitting process. They are Phase II issues. Does that mean that he'll stand by silently for the next two years, with the Host Committee evidence in hand, while Union County hemorrhages money, only to deny the permit because the process will be then have reached Phase II? Ridiculous. Wouldn't it make more sense and save millions for everyone and deny the permit now? Only a fool, of course, believes that he really intends to review their violation history two years from now and abort the process. On the contrary, the only way Mr. Davis is going to obey the law is if citizens force him to do it. And that's what the civil disobedience in Harrisburg was all about.

Governor Casey, Secretary Davis, and USPCI want to keep this fight local. They do not want the entire state, or nation, focused on Union County. If they can keep us "down on the farm," we can be managed. But if investigative reporters begin to ask questions, if legislators demand answers, if Union Pacific stockholders begin to divest themselves of UP stock, USPCI and DER may very well find themselves, like WTI of East Liverpool, Ohio, stuck in a nasty mire.

That's exactly why OUE strategy is to attract as much attention as possible to Union County. "An ill-conceived stunt," whined USPCI's Tim Hartman. Ill-conceived? Well-conceived, we think. The story was picked up from Pittsburgh to Philadelphia. We'll build on that. We'll do it in increments. One civil disobedience isn't going to do it, nor two, nor three, but eventually Mr. Davis will feel the heat for his disregard of his agency's regulations and if he's smart he'll look for someplace to hang his hat. The HCWC provided the hook. He has nine volumes of their research filled with valid reasons to deny a permit to this outlaw company.

This won't be easy. There's something very sobering about being cuffed, hauled away in a paddy wagon, finger printed, and escorted to a locked cell. On the other hand, we found the police to be sympathetic and kind. They knew we weren't criminals, and a few quietly acknowledged that they knew we were justified. Even DER's security guard wanted to shake my hand just before we were taken away. Maybe I was reading something that wasn't there, but I think he knew his boss was not giving citizens a fair shake and he was powerless to do anything more than extend his hand. I appreciated it.

Both USPCI and DER like to admonish us for not working within the system. After all, there is plenty of opportunity for meaningful public participation.

Current education limits us

BY SCOTT RUSSO

A very unfortunate truth has been brought to my attention, and in quite an ironic fashion. During a Western Political Theory I class conducted by Douglas Sturm, a question was asked of the professor: why he, at times, seems pessimistic about the results of his life-long efforts as an educator. He stated how he believed that our educational system has become merely an economic tool. That is, young men and women attend the best universities for the sole purpose of getting the best jobs, and ultimately making the most money possible during their lives—the "Great American Dream."

Bucknell is a good example of an educational institution preparing eager, relatively hard-working, fortunate individuals to pursue what they have been brought up to reach for. Unfortunately, this kind of preparation is extremely limiting. While education is necessary to get a job, and a job is necessary to sustain a secure life and to keep the economy going, the point is that education has become solely a financial and economic tool. Our higher education institutions have lost their true purpose of providing an atmosphere where students can seek to expand their mind in every direction and learn how to fulfill their potential as human beings.

While education is necessary to get a job, and a job is necessary to sustain a secure life and to keep the economy going, the point is that education has become solely a financial and economic tool.

Our problem even goes beyond how many of us tend to restrict our academic learning. More importantly and to a greater degree, we limit our overall education to academics (of all things). We think education is academics for grades when really it is much more. We need to concern ourselves, in addition to our academic education, to learning what it means to live a truly good human life. Education is an opportunity for us to expand our minds and prepare ourselves to participate in society as a human being.

There are many ways to define or express what it means to be human. One way that seems to capture our uniqueness relative to other creatures is that we recognize the world as a whole in some sense, and we further recognize our place in it. This is what makes it possible to both desire and achieve a kind of satisfaction from whatever it is we decide to do with our lives. This satisfaction has become far too individually motivated by our capitalist society (just like most other modern societies), and we fail to see the value of our lives in relation to society as a whole. We are all too concerned with our own lives and our own well-being.

There is no blame being placed here on any one or any group. We are all in the same situation. It is our society that trains us to value wealth and individual success. What we all need to realize, however, is that the true meaning of human life is not centered around each one of us individually. More importantly, life is not meant to be completely devoted to "working." We should attempt to live our lives by acting and performing more than simple or complex functions in an organized society. We are not some kind of living machine. Yes, we need to pursue a particular field and learn enough to succeed in it. But transcending this need is our need to learn about life, to recognize how our field can benefit society, and to see how we can each contribute our individual human qualities to society through our careers.

The only way our society can succeed is if we all do this. The domestic problems we currently face can be partially attributed to our failure to pursue a truly human life and to establish a society for all to live in. We need to discover what is right and wrong, and prepare ourselves to actually do what is truly right in all the relationships of our lives. After all, this is the point of human life. If we simply establish an organized society of people who train to fill simple roles or functions, regardless of how complex their knowledge may be, we really are no different than any of the other semi-intelligent animals with whom we share the earth. In fact, we could be considered less successful as a species, because we can't even sustain those human beings who are alive.

Obviously, this argument doesn't necessarily mean that those who study hard and strive for a successful career won't be "human." What is true is that they are setting themselves up to fail, like almost everyone else in our society, to both recognize and live a truly human life. It seems that the "goods" that are achieved by pursuing an education in the manner most of us do are only some portion of the overall picture. They are at one end of a spectrum, and we need to discover those 'goods' that are on the other end. This might just be a first step toward solving some of the problems our society faces.

There is more to life than work . . . there is friendship, for example. We all know this, and see value in our friends. But what we need to do is take our value of friendship to the next level—to a care and concern for all fellow human beings. It seems that if we are to be fulfilled personally as a human beings, we need to contribute to the fulfillment of all others. This does not mean we should give up our individuality and our personal lives. It is more of a state of mind that we should live our daily lives with.

Furthermore, there is more to life than filling some function or role in society that could be just as well filled by another person with the same training. Taking it a step further, the same can be said of education. Work in our society, as well as higher education, seems to be denying our opportunity to fully express all of our personal powers and talents as efforts of a human beings. Our actions have been redirected toward selfish goals, and we don't focus on what it means to be truly human.

A MODEST PROPOSAL SURVEYING SEX, SAFETY, AND PHILOSOPHY

Read this article to yourself... while I read out loud. So, after baiting us into The Cave with talk of doughnuts and soft drinks, they handed us a scantron form and asked us to fill in how we feel. And after forty-five minutes of assiduous number 2'ing, I wiped the stale crumbs and flat cola off my "Senior Survey" and made my way through the rows of tables and up to the proctor. She glanced at me rather suspiciously. Perhaps that was because I had surreptitiously stuffed the test booklet under my tee-shirt, giving the impression of non-symmetrical steroid use. And, after a disapproving gaze (I think she thought I was stealing the refreshments and not the test itself), she permitted me to leave. So now all Bucknell students can enjoy the test's incisive and thought-provoking questions. Questions that helped put four years of higher learning into sharp focus for seniors, for administrators, for everyone. Questions like:

"118. To what extent have you felt pressured to fit into the social environment at Bucknell?

1. I have felt no pressure
2. I have felt little pressure
3. I have felt moderate pressure
4. I have felt a great deal of pressure

5. PRESSURE! What do you mean PRESSURE??? I don't feel any PRESSURE to fit in! MY LIFE IS JUST COOL!!! REALLY COOL!!! Just ask all my FRIENDS!!! I've got LOTS of FRIENDS! I've even got a BASEBALL HAT and a TOLERANCE and I know how to do NAKED BEER SLIDES without getting RASHES OR BLISTERS!!!!!!! In short, my comprehensive collegiate experience has prepared me for the complex social challenges and eclectic leisure situations of the working world... just ask all my friends. SO DO I GET THE JOB???"

Then, of course, there was the memorable 119.

"119. Which of the statements below best describes your use of alcohol? (A' drink would be equivalent to 12 oz. of beer or 1 1/2 oz of liquor or 6 oz. of wine)

1. I do not drink alcohol at all
2. I have 1-2 drinks per week
3. I have 1-2 drinks per day
4. I have 3-5 drinks a few times per week
5. I have 3-5 drinks per day
6. I have 6 or more drinks almost every day.
7. I have got one bitch of a hangover after my 27 Tequila Slammers last night and feel like complete dogshit. In fact, all this math is making me kind of nauseas. In fact, I think I'm gonna... (complex and eclectic vomiting sounds)
8. SO DO I GET THE JOB?!?! LOOK, I'LL PAY THE DRY CLEANING!!! MY PUKE ALWAYS WASHES RIGHT OUT. JUST ASK MY FRIENDS!!! It's one of my positive and outstanding attributes that makes me the proper man for your most prestigious and pellucid company."

The highlight of the test came when they listed four "educational philosophies" for us to choose from. Four complex and eclectic philosophies. How generous of them. And yet, all of them seemed so lofty and intimidating. But it got me thinking. Does everything and everyone have one set philosophy? Philosophies just seem so... safe. In the past, my columns haven't had philosophies. My one aim was just to be funny while remembering to dot my satiric i's so that my name didn't end up scrawled in blood red chalk on the uphill quad. I didn't want anyone thinking my purpose was anything more than mere entertainment. If they wanted to think, they could read Skeena's Prescription. Of course, thinking becomes entirely unnecessary when you've got such attractive round ovals to fill. All of them in nice symmetrical rows. All of them the same size, the same shape. All of them blank.

Sex makes a good philosophy. It's just so malleable. It can be positioned into all sorts of new and interesting theories, concepts, themes, plots, anything. Most people relate to it in some way, shape, or form. And, penetrating insights on sex are great material for budding humorists—for budding anybody. They're even great for surveyed seniors who have already bloomed into philosophical maturity.

Thinking becomes entirely unnecessary when you've got such attractive round ovals to fill.

"117. Sometimes people are coerced into having sex when they don't want it. Pressure may be in the form of manipulation, emotional blackmail, getting a person drunk to the point of defenselessness, threats, or physical force such as holding a person down. These kind of pressures may come from a lover, date, friend, or acquaintance. At Bucknell, have you ever been coerced into sex when you didn't want it?

1. Yes
2. No"

For years now I've included subliminal sexual material in my own various columns. Like the Beatles. It just seemed the best way to get people's attention without actually dealing with an issue. All you have to do is read the second word of every other sentence from the bottom up to discover delightfully narcotic sexual "suggestions." And the titles have spoken for themselves: Bison Tales, Different Drum, Sharpest Image, The Point... all of them icily attractive, deliciously phallic, invigoratingly threatening. It's enough to make innocent talk of filling in circles seem rather crass and chauvinistic. I was going to call this semester's column The Erect Penis, but my editor suggested I stick to the two word motif. Crossing Lines. Crossing lines, dotting i's, filling circles... and here we've got the safety to do it all. So what'll it be? Yes or no?

Court ignoring new evidence of innocence

BY JOHN SHIRE

Webster's Ninth New Collegiate Dictionary defines justice as "the maintenance or administration of acting or being in conformity with what is right or morally good . . ." However, it seems that the meaning of justice has taken a turn for the worse. In the January 26 issue of The Philadelphia Inquirer, a news piece entitled "Death penalty tightened" demonstrated that political ideology consistantly plays a greater role in setting life-threatening precedents than does the act of maintaining what is "morally good."

Political ideology consistantly plays a greater role in setting life-threatening precedents than does the act of maintaining what is "morally good."

The article described the Supreme Court's Jan. 25 ruling, 6-3, in which individuals who present new evidence of innocence to a case, after conviction, are not entitled to a federal court hearing unless they "... meet an 'extraordinary high' level of proof, which the court did not define." This decision demonstrates a non-wavering conservative view from the majority that federal courts should only intervene when "...state courts violate constitutional procedures, such as lack of effective counsel or a biased jury..." This creates very strict conditions by which an individual convicted of a crime may seek an appeal. It seems to me, however, that a judicial system should be independent of political biases and structured in a way that enables everyone to prove their innocence, regardless of the time-table in which they are able to provide the evidence.

The Court's rigid decision will decrease the number of cases allowed to be heard beyond the state court systems. The number of cases appealed to the federal courts every year is astronomical and understandably a drain to federal funds and resources; however, it is immoral for our judicial system to begin chopping heads because it is incapable of hearing every case that casts a shadow of doubt over the culpability of a convicted individual. With the Supreme Court's decision, it seems that the meaning of justice is lost. To me, justice would be better served if actions were taken to restructure the state and federal judicial systems, so that individuals sentenced to death who have found new evidence to prove their innocence may be given one more opportunity to defend their lives.

We should all take time to think rationally about this Court decision because the ramifications are immense. It suggests to us that a lack of money, man power, and time, in conjuction with insular political views, have become more significant matters than human life and liberty to a system that is supposed to be the common man's last resource for upholding rights guaranteed in our Constitution. One might ask what other incidents demonstrate the effects of politics in our judicial system. Well, how about the pro-life decisions pursued throughout the Reagan and Bush administrations, and the reversal of pro-life laws since the inauguration of President Clinton? Justice may thus be defined selectively, according to one's way of thinking clearly, intelligently, and ideologically. One can only hope that a continued pursuit of excellence in education will provide our future law-makers with the wisdom necessary to uphold laws that guarantee our liberty and above all else, life.

An example of their definition on meaningful public participation occurred in January 1992. DER held hearings on the Phase I permit application. 165 citizens, farmers, organizations, businesses, government leaders, and the federal Bureau of Prisons testified against the project for 165 valid reasons. One individual testified in favor of the project. In their collective wisdom, however, Governor Casey and Secretary Davis ignored all this testimony and issued Phase I approval two months later.

Thirteen OUE members were arrested in Harrisburg, including two Bucknell students.This public past-time there will be more. And then more. On our last night in the jungle last month, we encounter hundreds of thousands of army ants blocking our path. Robin Black was attacked by ants biting at her ankles and all of us quickly retreated from their column. Like the ants, there are many more of us. Although Union Pacific has financial resources and political clout we can't match, we have thousands of people. And if we continue to stay the course, we, like the army ants, will succeed in driving out this corporate giant from the region.

was a bison, thus creating a visual pun of the menu item "Bison Burger." No, that's too simple. Everyone always uses that excuse, "(S)he must have been drunk." As temptingly easy as that explanation might be, I could not accept it. There was a deeper motive in this case.

The choice of a deer was quite specific. Why not a chicken, turkey, or rabbit? They would have been easier to come by and stuff, and cheaper too (less hamburger needed). Animals are often used as team mascots, I recalled. Colgate Deer, Lafayette Deer . . . No! Dartmouth Deer! I could see the culprit now, an adrenaline addicted athlete, high on his/her own physical power, attempting to curse the opposing team by mutilating its mascot in a tribal-like ceremony. Sure, didn't prehistoric hunters draw pictures of their prey on cave walls and proceed to "spear" the images before the actual hunt? Here, thousands of years later, the concept of "civilized man" is proved to be a facade by the continuation of such primitive habits.

"Wow!—I'm getting pretty good," I thought. This theory explained pretty much everything . . . but the act of stuffing the deer. I could conceive of no motive for an athlete to choose the act of stuffing as a choice of mutilation. A number of other, more conventional acts of disrespect and mutilation seemed more obvious. Who would stuff a deer... and with meat?

When the answer came to me I was surprised I had previously overlooked it. So many aspects of the crime seemed to point in this direction. Obviously, the criminal was a conservative crackhead reacting to the dual pressures of animal rights activists demanding science dissection lab alternatives and inflamed vegetarian feminists refusing to fill the traditional female role of stuffing the holiday bird.

There it was! What kind of a person would commit a crime like this? A bitter, conservative crackhead Bison worker/athlete with an artistic tinge. I jumped up from my chair in the exaltation of victory. The mystery was solved. From my dorm window I looked out over the bush-sculpted campus, beautifully maintained. Certainly there couldn't be many of "that type" of person out there. Now that we knew what kind of person committed repulsive animal mutilation crimes, we could spread the word. Then people could be on guard and warn the squirrels if any of "that type" happened to be around.

There it was! What kind of a person would commit a crime like this? A bitter, conservative crackhead Bison worker/athlete with an artistic tinge... Certainly there couldn't be many of "that type" of person out there.

"Wait a second!" The thrill of discovery evaporated as I saw the scene of the crime yet again in my mind. The deer, the mustard, the burgers, the spoon . . . and the pen. The pen? That shot my theory down. Who would stab a deer in the eye with a pen? A frustrated nature writer? No, they all use word processors anymore.

"To crack the crime you must think like the criminal." Remembering these words of advice I became the criminal. There I was in Swartz TV lounge, sounds of Ren and Stimpy float mutedly in the background. On the sofa lies the deer, stomach stretched full with as many burgers I could stuff in, yellow mustard swirling with the red blood matting the fur, plastic spoon dangling from where I placed it under the deer's heavy tongue. I'm feeling mean and ugly and I want to hurt, but what more can I possibly do to this animal? The plastic knife in my pocket isn't sturdy enough to saw off a hoof or an antler as a souvenir. I don't have anything with which to hang the animal. Then I notice the damp and vulnerable eye. Moving closer to its dark, filmy surface, huddling over it, I peer in. Down, in the center . . . there's something there. I bend closer, and it moves toward me . . . out of the dark, soft ball. It's round, and growing larger, it seems familiar . . . it's me. My eye—the white ball, brown ring, and black, pulsating pupil—is staring at me through the eye of the dead deer. I blink, and even then I see, in the moment before the darkness, my lashes descending softly towards my cheek.

I am scared. I look down at my hands, skin streaked with innumerable lines, and see the pattern in the deer's matted fur. Wetting my lips, I note the black fleshy lips of the deer, closed quietly over the white plastic of the spoon. The deer's tongue, half hanging out of its mouth, is stiff and thick, and I cannot swallow. Then, though I don't want to, I look in the deer's eye—and I see myself. The sight is repulsive, and reflex-like with the pen in my hand, I stab it out—once, in the eye, so that I cannot see myself any longer.

Instead I find myself standing at my window, staring out over the campus. Below me, two girls jog by, one guy with a red backpack heads off towards the library.

"We have seen the enemy, and he is us," said Pogo. I have discovered the criminal—but have no joy in this discovery. Regardless of whether s/he was an athlete, a feminist, a conservative, an artist, or any other label, s/he was a Bucknellian. Very possibly we passed the mutilator everyday on the way to class, dined together in the Bison, perhaps even knew the person.

As one of our own, living together with us in the same environment, we share the responsibility for this criminal's actions—even if it's in a small part—if it's only in responding to the criminal's actions. When people fail to respond with outrage and repulsion to unacceptable acts, bad things happen (i.e. Nazi Germany, Stalin's Russia, Pennsylvania's numerous SuperFund sites).

Hence, my fellow Bucknellians, I urge you to respond to the "Mutilated Deer Found in Swartz." If you thought "What kind of person would do something like this?" say it, and say it loudly. I, for one, will. Because when the time comes, I want to be able to look Nature, and myself, in the eye with a clear conscience.

London program offers more than meets the eye

Students studying abroad discover western Europe, experience a new culture and partake in a first hand learning process

LAURA GRISIN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Does central PA have you feeling a little suffocated? Have you already been to Reptileland, "the mall," and Good Wil's twice this week, yet still yearn for more? Perhaps you should consider a semester living and studying in London where you can discover students from around the world, a pub on every corner, and some of the best theatre productions on stage today.

Plans are underway for the 1993 Bucknell in London program, directed by Marilyn Mumford, professor of English, and Janet MacGaffey, assistant professor of anthropology.

Throughout this program, courses in literature, anthropology, and drama will be offered. In order to take advantage of the surroundings, field trips and excursions to places of interest in the city and elsewhere in Britain will be featured. For example, all students will take a course focusing on novels for which they will see these authors' homes in Bath, Yorkshire, and other parts of the English countryside. For MacGaffey's course entitled "Art, Power, and Identity," she plans to use London's museums as "her textbook." Also, a British playwright will teach a seminar for which students will critique approximately 20 theatre performances.

The directors have developed a program which hopes to expand the participants' understanding and appreciation of the world. "The best way to encourage this is to move students out of their familiar Bucknell/Lewisburg context and into a dynamic, culturally diverse urban environment to which their coursework is closely connected," said Mumford.

Bucknell in London, like any study abroad program, offers students a chance to branch out in ways which are not possible on campus. "There are so many opportunities in studying abroad," said Holly Lissner '94, a participant in the 1992 London program. "It's very exciting to spend extended time in a big city after being in Lewisburg for a few semesters."

Though one may be hesitant to spend time abroad with other Americans, students seem to find this a positive experience. "It was great to get away with other Bucknellians. It opened my mind and broke down a lot of barriers and stereotypes," said Howie Long '94, also a 1992 program participant.

With the Bucknell in London semester, tuition is the same as a semester here, and students' grades are included on their Bucknell transcript.

Information sessions will be held at 6:30 p.m. on Monday and 4 p.m. on Thursday in room 219 of the Langone Center. Applications are due by Feb. 16. Questions should be directed to either program director or Barbara Rowe, director of the Office of International Education.

How to shake the winter blahs

Befriend the bitter cold and take advantage of the great outdoors

KRISTINA SCHURR
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The clock radio sounds. As you cover your head with a pillow, trying to block out the deejay's voice, you can't help hearing: "Good morning everyone. It's a cold one out there. The sun's shining but it's eleven degrees with a wind-chill factor of -17. Make sure you bundle up on your way to work..."

Frosty February has arrived, and with it comes bone-numbing temperatures and high speed winds. Instead of scurrying back to bed with a steaming cup of hot chocolate, however, consider some outdoor winter activities.

Downhill skiing offers benefits to both the avid skier as well as the novice. Physical exercise in fresh air, time spent with friends and, the rush of adrenaline as you fly down the hill are only a few reasons to take a weekend to visit some of the local mountains. Pennsylvania offers many ski areas from which to choose. Listed below are some of the nearby resorts.

Camelback ski area. Located in Tannersville, take Exit 45 off Interstate 80. Eleven lifts service 27 trails, ranging from beginner slopes to black diamond (advanced). A weekend day's lift ticket costs $36 per person, but rates are $26 for groups of 21 persons or more. Camelback offers weekday rates as well as reduced student prices on Thursdays. Ski rentals cost $15 daily, but snowboards with boots are $24 and require a security deposit of $350 cash or a major credit card. For information call (717) 629-1661.

Another Pocono Mountain ski area, Shawnee offers cheaper weekend group rates—$19 per person for groups or 15 or more. Plus, with every 15 lift tickets purchased, one free lift ticket is provided. Regular weekend rates are $35, weekdays are $30. On Wednesdays, students with a valid student I.D receive one-third off the weekday rate. Ski rentals cost $20; snowboards with boots are $22 plus a cash or credit card deposit. Both Shawnee and Camelback maintain twilight skiing hours; prices of lift tickets vary according to ski times. Shawnee is located at Exit 52 off I-80. (717) 421-7231.

Closer to Bucknell, but offering only 20 trails serviced by six lifts is Montage Mountain. Four trails are black diamonds, two are double black (expert). Weekend rates are $33, weekdays are $26. Tickets for groups of 20 or more are $23. Snowboarding is permitted here also, requiring either a credit card or driver's license as a deposit. Wednesday is college night; students ski from 5 until 10 p.m. for $12. Montage is located in Scranton at Exit 51 off Route 81. (717) 969-7669.

If schussing down the slopes isn't very appealing, ice skating provides a calmer (and less expensive) form of winter entertainment. But while outdoor lakes and ponds like the one at R.B. Winter are peaceful and scenic, February weather can fluctuate enough to weaken a solid skating base. If warmer weather lasts for more than three days, a nearby indoor skating rink is at the Sunbury Youth and Community Center on Memorial Drive in Sunbury. Skating times are from 6:30 p.m. on Wednesday, Thursday and Friday, 1 to 5 and 7 to 9 p.m. on Saturday; 1 to 5 p.m. on Sunday. Adult prices are $2.25, student rates are $1.75. Skate rental costs 50 cents.

For those who enjoy more "sporting" activities, consider ice fishing and fly fishing. While skiing and skating benefit your physical and emotional well-being, fishing adds an extra dimension—catching your own dinner. Also, besides the cost of a fishing pole and some equipment, no high admission fees regulate this sport. Nearby ice fishing areas include Blanchard State Resevoir, R.B. Winter State Park, and Walker Lake, all a close distance from Bucknell. The year-round sport of fly fishing may prove to be fruitful in some of these nearby creeks: Penn's Creek, Buffalo Creek and, near State College, Fisherman's Paradise. Before you set out with your rod and reel, however, pick up a fishing license. If you are caught fishing without one, expect a stiff fine. One may purchase these from Out and About Sporting Goods on Buffalo Road in Lewisburg. Persons applying for a licence must be at least 16 years old. Licences for Pennsylvania residents cost $12.50; out-of-state fishers pay $25.50.

Admittedly, beating winter sluggishness is a difficult thing to do, especially when the wind is whistling through the chinks in the window frame. But staying inside until April gets old very quickly, leaving us bored and restless. Enjoying outdoor activities can help to hold the winter blahs at bay.

Black History Month Profile: Elijah McCoy

The lubricating cup, which made possible the automatic oiling of machinery, was invented by Elijah McCoy, the Canadian-born son of runaway slaves. After being educated in Scotland as a mechanical engineer, McCoy settled in Detroit and started experimenting with a cup that regulated the flow of oil onto moving parts of machines.

In 1872, he was granted a patent for the first automatic lubricator. No longer did machines have to be stopped for oiling; his new oiling device revolutionized the machine industry. McCoy established his own firm and obtained patents for additional inventions such as an "ironing table" and a lawn sprinkler. His major contribution, however, was the lubricating cup which was to become so popular that persons inspecting new equipment generally asked if it contained the "real McCoy," meaning the McCoy oil device. This helped to popularize the American expression, meaning the "real thing."

Celebrate Black history through "African Experience"

With the inception of Black History Month, Bucknell offers its contribution to the celebration of Black history through it's project "African Experience." Since May of 1992, the "African Experience" has been in the stages of planning following a suggestion by Larry Shinn, vice president of academic affairs, that such an exhibit be presented to the campus and community. Consisting of concerts, lectures, dramatic representations of folktales and art exhibits, the "African Experience" will serve to demonstrate the diversity of different cultures. Many of the showcase features, such as the Center Gallery exhibit, will remain long after February has rolled into March, reminding us all that cultural awareness remains a constant event. This semester's events are sponsored in part by the Pennsylvania Humanities Council, the Bucknell Association for the Arts, and the Bucknell University Lectureship Committee.

Photographing "cultural symbols"

BY ARA METJIAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The Center Gallery explores the culture of Sierra Leone in its latest exhibit. Titled "The Paramount Chiefs of Sierra Leone," the project focuses on its subjects through the medium of photographs, depicting them through the ultimate canvas of realism.

Photographed by Vera Vaditz-Ward, professor of photography at Bloomsburg University, "The Paramount Chiefs of Sierra Leone" opened as an exhibit at the Smithsonian Institute's National Museum of African Art for nearly a year. Originally 30 photographic portraits of chiefs in their war, traditional, and ceremonial garb, the showing at Bucknell will be supplemented with textiles and regalia from Sierra Leone.

"Fascinated by the pageantry, I decided to photograph the chiefs during such formal appearances whenever I had the opportunity," said Viditz-Ward.

Says Janet MacGaffey, professor of anthropology and coordinator of the exhibit here at Bucknell, "we were very lucky to take advantage of this."

Vaditz-Ward travelled trough Sierra Leone and documented projects in rural development, public health, and education. Her collection here focuses on one aspect of life in Sierra Leone, the chiefs. Vaditz-Ward has been involved in the photographic documentation of the Sierra Leone chiefs for more than a decade. She first set foot in the country of Sierra Leone as a Peace Corps volunteer, and subsequently became enraptured by the country.

"I have been making photographs in Sierra Leone for almost 15 years," says Viditz-Ward. "During that time I was fortunate to witness appearances by paramount chiefs at public functions."

In 1986 Viditz-Ward was awarded a Fulbright research grant, which enabled her to photograph in different regions of Sierra Leone. These photographs were displayed during the bicentennial of Sierra Leone. Presently those photographs are a permanent part of the Sierra Leone National Museum in Freeton, the capital city.

"The Paramount Chiefs of Sierra Leone" exhibit can be seen free of charge in the Langone Center's Center Gallery. Said Professor MacGaffey, "We have put a lot of effort into organizing this, so naturally we want the people to come." The exhibit will be on display from February 8 - March 19. The Center Gallery's hours are from 11 a.m. - 4 p.m. on weekdays, and 1-4 p.m. on Saturday and Sunday.

Viditz-Ward's exhibit will be accompanied by a gallery talk, "Becoming a Stranger: Working as a Fine Art Photographer in West Africa," at 3 p.m. on Saturday, Feb. 13, to be followed by an opening reception.

The photographs themselves are stunning to look at. But beyond that, they provide a rare glimpse at cultural tradition foreign to most students.

"Clothed in elaborate gowns and frequently accompanied by musicians and dancers," said Viditz-Ward, "the chiefs always command attention as living symbols of Sierra Leone's long, proud history and rich cultural heritage."

Concert to toot your horn over

Among the semester-long activities of lectures, dramatic folk representations, and art exhibits, there is another exciting presentation. South African trumpet player Hugh Masekela will perform a concert in the Weis Center on Tuesday, Feb. 16. The performance starts at 8 p.m. and tickets are $10, available at the Weis Center Box Office.

Masekela was born in Witbanks, South Africa in 1940. He then joined a group named the Jazz Epistles, the first black jazz group to record an album in South Africa. Masekela studied at the Guildhall School of Music in London, before continuing his education at the Manhattan School of Music. While Masekela was in New York, he made his recording debut on the second album by Miriam Makeba. Masekela then toured with musical legend Harry Belafonte before forming a group of his own.

This absence from South Africa marked the beginning of Masekela's self-imposed 31 year exile to protest the system of apartheid in his country. It was not until Masekela returned in 1990 for a highly successful tour that he founded the Botswana International School of Music and became music instructor at the University of Natal.

Masekela is a famous composer whose works are heard on the "Graceland" album and tour with Paul Simon. Masekela has also written songs for the Broadway musical Sarafina, which has subsequently been made into a motion picture starring Whoopi Goldberg.

Roosting in Weis

With Spike Lee's biography of Malcolm X sweeping box-office receipts and drawing mass attention to the life of the black civil rights activist, Bucknell offers its contribution to the regeneration of interest in Malcolm X this Monday in the Weis Center.

Laurence Holder's award-winning play "When the Chickens Come Home to Roost" dramatizes the pivotal confrontation between Malcolm X and Elijah Muhammad. Sponsored by the Bucknell University Activities Council, the play will begin at 8 p.m. and is open to the public without charge.

Playing the role of Elijah Muhammad is Thomas Martell Brimm, with Renauld White portraying Malcolm X. Although both Malcolm X, a black Muslim leader and black nationalist, and Elijah Muhammad, founder of the Black Muslims, were followers of the Muslim faith, they disagreed about the treatment of blacks.

The New York Times hailed the piece, stating, "Laurence Holder has taken a pair of intimidating men and brought them utterly convincingly to life. . . (he) creates a fascinating tug-of-war between men who once had everything in common—who indeed made history together—and who now find themselves antagonistic strangers."

The touring version is directed by Allie Woods, who also directed the original off-Broadway production in 1981. Woods' credits include more than 50 productions in the United States and abroad.

A two-man tour de force, "When the Chickens Come Home to Roost" was originally cast with Denzell Washington playing Malcolm X. The play addresses issues still relevant to today's social climate, and illuminates a part of history gone, but not forgotten.

Musical tastes for any palette

BY KATIE DEBONVILLE

Kicking off a new semester of dynamic faculty recitals, Dr. Catherine Payn, associate professor of music opens the season with a panoramic concert that's sure to entice even the most demanding music critic.

Payn will be performing at Bucknell Hall 8 p.m. on Thursday, February 11 at The recital, which will showcase music for soprano, harp, and piano, will be the first of several recitals to be performed this month by students and faculty of the music department.

Opening the evening's program will be a set of three songs for soprano and harp. Composed by Robert Schumann, the pieces are settings of poetry by Lord Byron, translated into German by the composer Felix Mendelssohn. Elizabeth Etters-Asmus, known to the campus as the harpist for the annual Christmas candlelight services in Rooke Chapel, will accompany Payn.

In contrast to the dramatic, militaristic style of the Schumann pieces is a group of French songs which Payn describes as "flowing and elegant." This portion of the recital, also for soprano and harp, features works by the French composers Poulenc, Caplet, and Tournier.

The first American work on the evening's program is a song cycle titled "To Sleep." Written by New York composer William Holab, this piece marks the final soprano and harp combination.

The international flavor of Payn's recital continues with Manuel de Falla's "Seven Popular Spanish Songs." Joining Payn and Etters-Asmus for this piece will be pianist Dr. William Payn, associate professor of music.

The recital will close with two arias by the American composer Lee Hoiby. A familiar presence on campus, Hoiby conducted a residency at Bucknell in the fall of 1991. "One of the arias is based on Turgenev's A Month in the Country," said Catherine Payn. "The second is taken from the Thronton Wilder play Our Town. Dr. William Payn will again serve as the accompianist for the Hoiby pieces.

Later this semester Payn will be performing Samuel Barber's "Knoxville Summer of 1915" with the Bucknell University Orchestra. Directing this performance, scheduled for Thursday, April 22, will be Christopher Para, assistant professor of music.

In the meantime, Payn looks forward to performing the very diverse program. "I love this repertoire," Payn said. "It shows the scope of colors that are available for this combination of instruments."

Curtain closes on one-acts

Cap and Dagger to perform two Sheppard plays

BY MARY JORDAN

This weekend a long-standing tradition in Bucknell theater will come to a close as the curtain goes down for the last time on the January one-acts. For years the annual Cap and Dagger one-acts have provided students the opportunity to direct one-act plays. Rehearsed during the now-defunct Jan Plan, this year's selections are two Sam Shepard pieces, Action and Killer's Head.

Tickets for Cap and Dagger's final evening of one-acts are $4 and are available at the Langone Center Box office or at the door on performance nights. The plays will be held on Friday and Saturday night in the Tustin Studio Theatre, at 8 p.m.

Killer's Head, directed by David Ames '94, is an eleven-minute monologue delivered by Mazon, played by Paul Heimer '93, a convict who is strapped into an electric chair. During his speech, Mazon leads the audience through a captivating, dreamlike journey.

"You're really drawn into (the monologue)," says Ames. "It's not hard to look at, but I really feel there's something uncomfortable. Something not right about it." Ames has attempted to pull the audience's focus onto the "grotesque, fascinating image" of Mazon on the stark, but striking set.

Gary Grant, chair of the department of theatre and dance, believes Mazon to be the image of a sculpture more than a person. "Killer's Head has its roots in the super realistic period of American painting and sculpture," said Grant. "Shepard's man in the electric chair reminds one of (New Realism sculptor) Duane Hanson, (expressionistic sculptor) George Segal, and (artist) Robert Rauschenberg."

Or, as Ames says, "He (Mazon) tells a story, but the given circumstances are kind of wierd. As Mazon becomes less and less like a human being, it's like an intense dream we get brought into." The audience remains ignorant of Mazon's history—why he's talking or the crime he has committed. However, the electrocution is staged, although Ames would not comment on how.

The second play slotted for the evening, Action, is directed by Michelle Firestone '93. Action takes place in a prison used as a fallout shelter during the aftermath of a crisis. Throughout the course of the play, the characters are trying desperately to find their existential place in a book pass to one another.

Action centers on four main characters, thrown together by a coincidence of fate, attempting to accomodate to their new and unfamiliar surroundings. Heading the cast are Greg Nagel '96, Bernard Zilinskas '95, Jodie Eash '95, and Kristie Robson '95. Although the circumstances of their being brought together are unknown, the lack of communication and failed attempts at conversations reveal the extent of the relationships that have developed.

"Shepard's writing obliges the performers to explore different types of action and their different relationships to action," says Firestone. "It seems that if they are active, they can discover a clear throughline concerned with the accomplishment of material tasks. If their actions are enigmatic and they are just acting it out, they'll never find the place in the book through which they are looking for."

Influenced in her direction by Brecht and Beckett, Firestone believes Action revolves around the "struggle within American society in dealing with a lack of communication." All four of the characters seem to be operating on separate wavelengths; wavelengths that cross periodically to provide an unexpected connection.

Grant agrees, saying, "Author Sam Shepard is known as the first American playwright. His plays are filled with cowboys and rock stars. (However) Action shows another side of Sam Shepard- his European influences. Written while Shepard was in London in exile in the 70's, Action shares affinity with Irish playwright Samuel Beckett and with Austrian playwright Peter Handke. It is a play of grotesque absurdist humor, set in the Beckettian landscape outside of time and space."

If you know nothing about Brecht or Beckett, and even if you've never heard of Sam Shepard, don't be intimidated. The plays are entertainingly provocative, and an appropriate finale to the close of Cap and Dagger's tradition.

M. Hiu-wah lands on campus

The multi-talented Kwok Hiu-wah performing a solo in a self-choreographed piece titled "Bird." Hiu-wah extends her knowledge to the Bucknell community in a three-day workshop series on Folk Dance sponsored by the Department of Theatre and Dance. Classes are held in Tustin Dance Studio and are open to the public free of charge.

BY NICOLE COBBAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

She sits comfortably on her bed in Ward House, barefooted and casually clad in sweats. Her wistful expressions and broken English reveal little about the imaginative power of this award-winning choreographer, however, one glance at her work unfolds the talents hidden within the petite frame of dancer and choreographer Kwok Hiu-wah.

Hiu-wah joins the Bucknell campus this week to conduct a series of dance workshops in Chinese folk dancing. Lessons will focus on Eastern Chinese Dance, which Hiu-wah warns is very different from the Western Chinese style. "It's very rich," says Hiu-wah. "The East has a very specific style."

Classes will be held Sunday, Feb. 7 from 6-7:30 p.m., Monday, Feb. 8 from 3:30-5 p.m. and Tuesday, Feb. 9 from 1-2:30 p.m. All classes will be held in Tustin Dance Studio and are free and open to the public. Currently a professor of Chinese classical dance at Taiwan's National Institute of the Arts, Hiu-wah encourages dancers of all abilities to attend.

Also working with the Bucknell Dance Company, Hiu-wah will set a piece titled "Waiting" for the Company's spring concert in the Weis Center. Kristen Costello '95, Charles Curtiss '93, Danna Frangione associate professor of dance, and guest artist Todd Rosenlieb '86 will represent the Dance Company.

"Waiting" tells the poignant story of two women whose husbands have gone away to find work. Hiu-wah based the roots of the dance in her hometown near Cxian, in China, where the practice of leaving behind one's family in order to support them is quite common.

"My hometown is Cxian," says Hiu-wah. "It's a very old city with countryside more to the North. In this side (of China) the people are very poor. Men always work in other places. They must leave their families and go more West, near Mongolia."

Very often, because of the climate, distance, and grueling work, husbands never return home. "Waiting" narrates the fantasy of two wives who imagine their husbands have returned to them, ending their uncertainty and grief that they will never see them again.

Hiu-wah majored in Chinese classic dance and folk dance at the Xian Art School before entering the Xian Troupe. After playing the lead roles in two full-length dance dramas, Hiu-wah began her career as a choreographer.

In 1981 Hiu-wah joined the Hong Kong Dance company, choreographing extensively for them. She was later invited by the Hong Kong Arts Center and Academy for Performing Arts to choreograph and lecture.

Since then, Hiu-wah has worked at the First Hong Kong International Dance Meeting and with the Singapore Dance Committee.

The recipient of many awards, Hiu-wah's piece "Dream" won a merit award in the celebration of the 30th Anniversary of the People's Republic of China. In addition, she has won the Modern Dance Division at the 1985 Hong Kong Young Choreographers' Competition and took first prize in the European Modern Folk Dance Competition in 1991.

After participating in the American Dance Festival in 1988, Hiu-wah received a fellowship enabling her to study in New York City. She agrees enthusiastic that there's no place in the world like New York for cultural stimulation. "I was in New York for two weeks," said Hiu-wah, "and each night I went out to see a different performance."

Hiu-wah left the Hong Kong Dance Company in 1990, going abroad to work on educational activities in England. Besides her residency at Bucknell this year, Hiu-wah has been invited to teach master classes at Colorado College.

A taste of Hiu-wah's work can be seen next Friday in Dance Forum's concert at the Weis Center. Although not a member of Dance Forum, Hiu-wah supplied the company with a short piece—just enough to whet the appetite and keep the campus in suspense until May.

Lady Bison ascend to fourth place in the Patriot League

Much improved team has visions of hosting a tournament game

BY JON TERRY
Bucknellian Staff Writer

One of the more puzzling aspects of the 1992-93 season for the Bucknell women's basketball team has been their inability to win games away from Davis Gym. Going into Wednesday's game at Colgate the Bison were a dismal 1-11 on the road, although many of those losses were in tough non-conference games early in the year. As it turned out, the Bison (7-13, 5-3) were able to come home with a 69-52 win over a bad Colgate team (0-17, 0-8).

There is a tremendous amount of pressure associated with playing against such weak competition. If you win, well big deal, you were supposed to win. And if you lose, then it can be devastating both in the standings and in the confidence level of the team.

That is precisely why the Bison looked for some senior leadership on Wednesday, and Lisa Fink '93 and Juliet McGee '93 provided them with just that. Fink scored 17 points and grabbed a team-high seven rebounds while McGee led all scorers with 19 points.

The game got a bit tense early as head coach Juliene Simpson was forced to call a timeout after Colgate jumped out to a 10-5 lead. Jumpers by K.C. Vlah '96, McGee, and Fink quickly got the Bison back into it, and a 16-0 run midway through the first half gave them a comfortable 31-17 advantage.

Rookie point guard K.C. Vlah '96 was a perfect six for six from the floor on her way to a 14 point effort in Bucknell's 90-56 derailing of the Lady Engineers earlier this season. The Buckeye currently leads the squad in steals and assists and is in contention for Patriot League Rookie of the Year honors.

Colgate made it close again in early in the second half thanks to a couple of three-pointers by Jen Lachance, the second of which cut the lead to three. Again Simpson looked to her veterans, and up stepped McGee. The senior scored Bucknell's next 12 points and before you knew it the Bison were back up by nine.

A three-pointer from the top of the key by Anne McGovern '93 and Fink's six-for-six shooting from the foul line in the last five minutes keyed a 23-6 run that put the Bison up by 20 and the game in the bag.

Bucknell was not so fortunate last Saturday when they were blown out by a powerful Holy Cross team, 80-50. The Crusaders jumped out to a 14-0 lead, and lead by as many as 27 in the first half. With three minutes remaining in the half the Bison trailed 41-14, but showed some determination by scoring the last ten points of the half to at least make it somewhat respectable.

The second half was rather ugly as both teams emptied their benches, and the first-place Crusaders were able to cruise to the 30-point win. No Bison was able to crack double figures in scoring, with McGee leading the way with nine points. Bucknell shot just 31.5% (17-54) from the floor.

The effort was disappointing, particularly because the Bison up-

Breakin' Bison regain first, face stiff test vs. Fordham

Following a heartbreaking loss at Holy Cross, cagers rebound twice

BY SCOTT GRISIN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

College basketball doesn't get much better than last Saturday afternoon's classic first-place showdown between Bucknell and The College of the Holy Cross in Worcester, MA. Going into their first of two meetings this season, both teams owned 6-0 Patriot League records, and both were coming off of seven-game winning streaks, but only one team would remain unbeaten. Unfortunately, that team was Holy Cross, as they handed Bucknell its first league loss of the season, 88-86 in front of the Sports Channel cameras.

Both teams showed up ready to play, but they each chose a different half in which to show their stuff. The Bison jumped out to an early 7-1 lead, but the Crusaders then took off on a 14-0 run, making the score 21-11. They led by as many as 18 (37-19), in dominating the first half, but Bucknell was able to pull within 12 by halftime, when the score was 44-32 in favor of Holy Cross.

After the intermission, the Bison shot 60 percent from the floor, and Mike Bright '93 scored 21 of his 27 points in the second period as Bucknell began to chip away at the lead. They put together an 11-0 run towards the end of the game during which Matt Clark '93 hit two three-pointers that brought the Bison within one (84-83) with 1:13 remaining. Bucknell then stole the ball back, but Chris Simpson's '94 layup did not fall. Simpson led the Bison for the fourth straight game with a career-high 31 points. Frank Powell pulled down the rebound for Holy Cross and was fouled. The first free-throw was good, making it 85-

Women's track sprints through Relays

Lady Bison place in three relays and two individual events

BY KRISTEN OPDYKE

To most people, it was an evening to watch the Superbowl, eat hot dogs, and relax. Not so for the Bison tracksters. The streaking Bison had more important business to take care of, as they traveled to picturesque central New Jersey for the prestigious Princeton Relays. The Lady Bison continued to prove that they are a force to be reckoned with, placing in three relays and two individual events.

Leading the way was the Distance Medley Relay, with the veteran foursome of Kathy Wurster '94, Bridget Dean '95, Gina Abraham '93, and Kristen Opdyke '93. They blistered up the track with an ECAC qualifying time of 12:08.86 as they placed third, behind Princeton and the University of Pennsylvania. Wurster led off with a stellar 2:17 800m leg, which put the Bison in excellent position. Dean and Abraham held position, while anchor Opdyke dove across the line, just missing second place. The performance was the second best in Bucknell history. Look for the "fab four" to shine at Eastern Championships in March.

The middle distance crew turned in fine performances as well. In the 4 x 800m relay, again it was Wurster pacing the way, as she led the baby brigade of Michelle Fallone '96, Aaryn Kay '96, and Maria Ryan '96 to a fifth place finish in 9:34.69. The 4 x 400m relay proved to be just as exciting, as they raced to a fourth place finish. The team of Norine Nadeau '96, Dean, Beth Muehl '94, and Sharon Shilling '95 ran 4:07.1, as a strong finishing kick by Shilling (61.5) held off rival Shippensburg at the tape.

Bison individuals were also dominant at the meet. Dawn Ellery '94 continued her fine jumping this season as she placed 4th with a jump of 5' 4 1/4". Ellery will be looking for her fifth consecutive high jump title at the Patriot League Championships later this month. Tameka Hinton '95 continued to show why she is already one of the most dominant sprinters in Bucknell history. Hinton placed second in the 60m dash in 7.3. More importantly, she dusted Lafayette rival Tina Beth Pina. The Bison herd will thunder to Blue Hen country this weekend for the Delaware Invitational.

If you are a track and field fan, you'll be in sweet heaven for the month of February. The Bison stay in Lewisburg for the rest of the month, including Patriot League Championships Feb. 27.

Letter to the Editors:

The following policy will be followed for basketball tickets for the five remaining home basketball games in February. Each student may pick up one general admission ticket at the ELC box office, with his or her student ID for each game. These tickets will be available on a game-by-game basis until 4:00 the day of each weekday game of Feb. 1, 17, and 24, and until 4:00 on Friday preceding the games of Feb. 6 and 27. Any remaining student tickets will be available at Davis Gym the day of the game. We expect sellouts for all of these games so it would be advisable to pick up a ticket at the ELC. The same policy is applicable to faculty and staff members. Faculty and staff may pickup tickets for their immediate family only with their ID. All men's games will be telecast on the campus cable system as well and will be broadcast by Bob Behler on radio station WTGC-AM 1010 and WUNS-FM 96.3 beginning one-half hour prior to tipoff. We expect to have both men's and women's Patriot League playoff games at Davis Gym in early March. A full description of the ticket policy for these games will be forthcoming in late February.

❄The chills and spills of January sports❄

Bucknell's Student-Athletes celebrated their final January off from classes with some outstanding individual and team performances

While the weather outside is still truly frightful, perhaps even more frightening is the termination of the days of parking your car around the horseshoe of Davis Gym after just waking up for a noon pick-up game. Though none of the varsity coaches will publicly mourn the deletion of Jan Plans, most of the teams chose to take advantage of the less hectic schedule and posted outstanding results. Here's a brief recap of each team's month:

Wrestling

Throughout January, the Bucknell wrestling squad had to meet questions about how good they really were. Were they good enough to upset a Top 20 team? Could they do it twice? Could they top the defending conference champions? While the season is far from over and many more questions will arise, the Bison have met every challenge presented to them throughout January and enter the new semester undefeated through six dual bouts.

After opening the season by finishing ninth at the Mat Town invitational in Lock Haven and fifth at the Sheridan Invitational in Lehigh, Bucknell was a decided underdog entering its first dual bout of 1992-93. A perennial Atlantic Coast Conference power, North Carolina, was coming into Davis Gymnasium to take on a young Bison squad that included only three seniors.

After losing a major decision in the first bout, Bucknell captain George Swann '93 scored a 13-0 shutout at 126 pounds to even the score. The Tar Heels were able to win four of the next five bouts to take a commanding 18-8 lead into the final three bouts. 177 pound Mike Rush '95 started the Bison rally with a 9-1 major decision and when Bob Ferraro '94 scored a first period pin, the match was tied entering the heavyweight bout. The Bison's Matt DiGiacomo '95, outweighed by his opponent, Scott Greenberg, by over 40 pounds, fell behind early in the deciding bout, but a pair of escapes brought the sophomore to within one point at 3-2. A warning for stalling on his Greenberg and a pair of penalty awards to DiGiacomo secured the 4-3 win, giving Bucknell a 21-18 victory over the 16th-ranked team in the nation, according to the Amateur Wrestling News.

The Bison continued that momentum into the next two matches, a 24-16 triumph at conference foe Hofstra and a 24-18 decision at cross-state rival, East Stroudsburg. Each of the wins were highlighted with falls by captain Mike Van Doren '92, who finished the month with a team-leading overall total of 19 victories, seven by fall or technical fall and six more on major decisions.

Those successful competitions set-up a home showdown with 19th-ranked North Carolina State, a team the Bison have never been able to defeat. Instead of falling behind early as they had against UNC, Bucknell was able to jump out to a quick lead on the Wolfpack. Van Doren and Swann decisions along with Phil Elliott's first half-ending, 11-2 major decision staked the squad to an 11-8 advantage at the intermission.

Bucknell solidified that lead when the second half opened as Jason Prokopchak '95 reversed Doug Tyson onto his back and pinned the Wolfpack 158-pounder in the first period. A N.C. State rally was thwarted by Rush and Ferraro and Bucknell earned its second Top 20 upset in two weeks, 23-16.

The team continued to streak, toppling defending East Coast Wrestling Association champion Blue Devils of Central Connecticut State, by a 20-15 count. Since each squad earned five individual victories, the match was decided on a third period pin by Swann and a 17-2 technical fall by Ferraro. DiGiacomo again sealed the victory, taking an 8-2 decision at heavyweight.

While many questions still remain regarding the conference and national championships, Coach Bob Ferraro's team has met all of January's challenges and emerged, unscathed.

Wrestling captain Phil Elliott '93 and his team enjoyed perhaps their best January in recent history by defeating all six of their opponents.

Women's Hoops

This year Bucknell's women's basketball coach Juliene Simpson decided that she would take her team to sunny Florida for the holidays. Only they were not going down there to have fun. Instead they were going to learn some basketball against some tough competition.

In the Miami Holiday Tournament, the Bison were beaten by Miami 74-54), Michigan, and Oklahoma (84-60). Only the Michigan game was somewhat close, with the Wolverines prevailing 83-77.

The following week at the Florida International Sun Tournament, the Bison were pounded by Iowa (97-39) and Temple (67-53) before beating Patriot League patsy Lehigh Bucknell then returned to wintry Lewisburg on Jan. 9 for its first home game in exactly a month, the Patriot League opener against Colgate. McGee scored a career-high 32 points that night as the Bison jumped all over the hapless Red Raiders 87-66.

After losses to two of the better Patriot League teams, Fordham and Lafayette, the Bison suffered one of the more disappointing losses of the season - an 84-69 setback to Buffalo. A non-conference home loss to a sub-.500 team hurt.

Remarkably, the loss sparked a three-game winning streak. Simpson recorded her 200th coaching win at home against Army. The Bison jumped out to a 16-14 halftime lead before cruising, 51-37. Lisa Fink '93 racked up a season-high 19 points off the bench to lead the way. Just three days later Bucknell recorded their second road win of the season, defeating Navy at beautiful Alumni Hall, 55-47. The streak reached three as the pitiful Lehigh squad came to town. The Bison promptly sent them home with a 90-56 loss.

Despite their 4-9 record during the winter break, there were many positives. Number one, the Bison got a first hand look at some of the best talent in the country. Now they know what big time college basketball teams look like. Second, they did go 4-2 in the Patriot League, their best start in four years, and they are right in the hunt to host a tournament game.

Head basketball coach Charlie Woollum is just one win shy of his 300th career victory. He also hopes the Bison can remain number 1.

Men's Track

To briefly review the 12-0 start that the men's indoor track and field got off to while most Bucknellians were off campus, you need only to focus on the Delaware and Princeton Relays. Both events showed why head coach Art Gulden refers to this year's freshmen as "one of the best recruiting classes in the East" and also that team success is not measured by individual gold medals.

At Delaware on Jan. 22, Bucknell scored 168 points to defeat a throng of opponents (Delaware 109.5, Temple 57, Drexel 53, Lafayette 47.5, Mt. St. Mary's 43, West Chester 30, Georgetown 28, and George Mason 18). Ed Loges '96 set a school record in winning the long jump title with an IC4A qualifying leap of 23'4.75". Fellow frosh, Brian Preputnick '96 captured the high jump title. Mike Bronson '93 garnered top honors in the 5,000-meter run and Brad Bernardini '94 also placed first in the 55-meter dash.

Most recently, Gulden considers last weekend's trip to New Jersey "one of the best Princeton Relays we've had in quite a while." The school record fell in the shuttle hurdles relay, as the Orange foursome of Adam Scarlatelli '94, Rick Van Emburgh '95, Blaine Fawcett '93, and Theodore Janowsky '96 crossed the finish line in :30.3. The mile relay contingent of Bernardini, Van Emburgh, Jean Simon '94, and Daniel Akwei '96 placed a fast and impressive second.

John Lewis '93 was the lone Bison individual winner, taking gold in the 3,000-meter run.

All in all, it was business as usual for the two-time defending Patriot League champions.

Women's Track

If you were away during January and are wondering how the Bison tracksters did, one word sums it up: AWESOME. The Bison were at Colgate early in the month, using depth and a balanced effort to beat league foes Colgate and Lafayette, along with Columbia and Albany. Outstanding performers of the meet were Tameka Hinton '95 in the sprints, and Gina Abraham '93 in the middle distance races. Abraham looked sharp in her first race back, since a stress fracture sidelined her for most of the cross country season.

One week later at Delaware, the women again won a thriller over Delaware and a flock of other schools in a meet that went into the wee hours of the night. The freshman trio of Kelly Peet (long and triple jump), Norine Nadeau (middle distance and high jump), and Kristen Overturf (throws) showed why they are the tracksters of the future as they turned in fine performances in their respective events. But it came down to fantastic performances by the 4 x 400m and 4 x 800m relays to seal the sweet victory over Navy.

Senior co-captain Dana Harbst was reflecting on the meets and said, "It is still early in the season, but I saw good things with a very young team. We pulled together and crushed two Patriot League teams (Lafayette and Colgate), which is a big morale boost. I have a positive feeling that we can only get better." If the Lady Bison continue to work hard and improve, things could look 'blue' for the rest of the Patriot League.

Men's Hoops

The Breakin' Bison win 'em when they count— plus some others, too. As the halfway point of the season approached, the Bison found themselves unbeaten in league play, and playing very well.

Bucknell started the holiday season by hitting the road for a lengthy five-game road trip, playing at George Mason, New Orleans, Cornell, Loyola (MD), and Canisius. The Bison traveled to Fairfax, Virginia on Dec. 21, where they defeated the Patriots of George Mason 73-60. Simpson had another good game, leading the team with 21 points and shooting 15-for-15 from the free-throw line— a Bucknell record.

On Jan. 2, Bucknell suffered its second road loss in as many games, this time at the hands of Cornell. The Big Red hit a three-pointer to tie the game at 62 with :11 remaining, and when a shot by Russell Peyton '93 refused to go down with :04 to go, overtime was in order. Cornell outscored the Bison 21-13 in the extra period as the Big Red went on to win 73-65. Bucknell closed out the road trip up north in Buffalo, New York, with a 69-68 loss at the buzzer to Canisius.

The Bison opened the Patriot League season with a victory at home against the Red Raiders of Colgate by a score of 92-89. The team then traveled to Fordham, where they picked up another win against the defending Patriot League champions. Simpson again led the Bison with 18 points, but Mike Walsh '93 had a great game off the bench with 16 points, two blocked shots, and three rebounds. After 12 lead changes in the second half, Peyton gave the Bison the lead for good on a layup with 3:44 remaining as Bucknell went on to win 69-65.

The Lafayette Leopards arrived in town on Jan. 16 only to have Paul Olkowski '93 and Walsh lead the Bison to a 87-74 victory. Olkowski scored a career-high 23 points, while Walsh remained hot, adding 17 of his own. Three other Bison scored in double figures including Simpson, Bright, and Raymond Brown '94. "One of our plusses is balance," said Walsh. "When someone has an off night, there's always someone else picking up the slack. The defense has to worry about everybody putting the ball in the hole."

Bucknell then proceeded to annihilate Army four days later, winning easily by a final score 83-57. Olkowski was forced to miss the second half of the game after inadvertently putting his right arm through a window of a door leading to Bucknell's locker room.

Olkowski returned to the lineup on Jan. 23 in a game at Navy where Simpson and Peyton combined for 38 points in a 68-61 victory over the Midshipmen. Simpson was a perfect 7-for-7 from the line, and Peyton's 17 points tied his career-high total, while Brown was also in double figures with 10.

The orange and the blue continued to win as they destroyed Lycoming by 32 points in Davis Gym on Jan. 25. The Bison jumped to a 60-26 halftime lead en route to a 94-62 final score with 14 of the 16 players scoring at least two points, including six from Jason Janego '94. Simpson led Bucknell yet again with 20 points while playing just 23 minutes, and Peyton added six more steals to his total. The Bison picked up their seventh straight win of the season, beating Lehigh University 91-75 last Wednesday night at home. Chris Simpson again led the team with over 20 points, which he has done seven times this season.

As many students began returning to campus at the end of January, they found the Breakin' Bison undefeated at 6-0 in the league and 13-3 overall. They shared the seat atop the Patriot League with Holy Cross as they went into a first place showdown with the Crusaders last Saturday afternoon. "We're pleased with where we are," said coach Woollum. "Our destiny is in our own hands. If we get knocked down, we'll have to get back up and fight."

Women's Swimming

The holiday season was most successful for the women's swimming team. Including last Saturday's romp over Colgate (see story on back page), the Bison have won five straight meets to run their overall record to 7-2, good for second place in the Patriot League.

After beating a tough Lasalle team on Christmas Eve, Delaware came to town on Jan. 6 and was treated to a Margaret Grunow show. The senior co-captain won three events that day, including a pool-record performance in the 50-yard freestyle. Grunow also won the 200-yard freestyle and the 200-yard butterfly by an astounding 12 seconds. The team won all eleven events that day on their way to an easy victory.

On Jan. 16 the Bison travelled to Easton and pounded Lafayette by a score of 145-80. Grunow, Jeanne Klawon '95, and Kathleen Hartnett '94 were all double winners as the Bison took 10 of the 11 events.

On Jan. 23 the Bison overpowered Fordham on their way to a convincing 142-87 triumph. Grunow set a new record in the 200-yard butterfly and lead the team to victory with three individual wins. In all it was a most successful January for the women. Not only did they win all five of their meets in convincing fashion, but they are now brimming with confidence heading into the Patriot League Championships in three weeks.

Men's Swimming

Unfortunately for the men's swimming team, they did not quite share the same success with their women counterparts. The men were defeated by Lasalle, Delaware, and Lafayette early in the month, despite some outstanding individual performances. In the Delaware meet, the Bison were actually ahead with three events to go, but they could not hold the lead. Jay Gross '93 and Rick Steenson '95 each won two events, but the Bison were hurt by the absence of diver Eric Carr, who was out with an ear injury. The Bison were outscored 32-2 in his two events, which proved to be the difference in the 126-113 meet.

Carr's injury also cost the Bison in the loss to Lafayette. This time they were outscored 27-3 in the two diving events. Gross and Steenson both continued to impress, winning two more events apiece.

The men were able to turn it around, however, against Fordham. Gross, Carr, and Stu Harris '95 were all double winners in the 158-80 win. Harris set season bests in the 500 and 1000-yard freestyle events, while Gross remained undefeated in the 50-yard freestyle.

After knocking off Colgate on Saturday (see article on back page) the men look to upset Lehigh tomorrow and carry some momentum into the Patriot League Championships.

Chris Simpson '94

Shooting guard Chris Simpson '94 has been selected Athlete of the Week for his career-best and staggering 31 point effort against the Holy Cross Crusaders. The native African and current Virginian almost single-handedly brought the Bison back from an 18-point deficit. The game, broadcast live on Sports Channel, garnered Simpson Patriot League Men's Basketball Player of the Week honors.

"He's playing as well as anyone in the Patriot League right now," said head coach Charlie Woollum following Saturday's dissapointing 88-86 setback.

83. When Powell missed the second shot, the Bison would have had a chance to tie or go ahead, but a failure to box out on the shot resulted in a tip-in for the Crusaders and an 87-83 lead with :17 to go. Holy Cross added another free-throw, and Bright hit a long three as time expired making the final score 88-86.

"We knew it was going to be a tough game up there," said Bright, "but we let them get an early jump on us. When you go away, you can't let a home team get up on you like that. We made a nice run at the end, but we just came up short."

The Bison then hosted Rider on Monday, and Bucknell led early but soon fell behind. They then cut into the Broncs' lead by scoring nine unanswered points as part of a 16-5 run at the end of the first half, pulling within five at 40-35. The Bison went ahead four minutes into the second period, and they held the lead for most of the half with Rider only close enough to tie the score twice at 59 and 63. Rider took the lead again, however, 73-69, and Bucknell clawed back. They got the ball with :50 remaining and the score 76-76, and they got a new 45-second clock after a missed shot and a Bucknell rebound. Coach Woollum called a time-out to set a play, and Olkowski called another time-out when he could not get the ball in play. The Bison tried again, and the ball ended up in the hands of Brown who shot a short jumper with :03 to go for the 78-76 win.

Bucknell then began its second round with Patriot League teams at Colgate Wednesday night. The Bison painted the first half blue and orange as Bucknell dominated. The Red Raiders shot only 24 percent in the first half as the Bison went into the locker room with a comfortable 14 point lead. With 13:00 left and Bucknell still up by 14, Colgate began to chip away at the lead until it was 51-49 with 7:00 to go. At the end of an 18-5 Colgate run, Clark was called for a charge, and the Red Raiders took the lead 55-54 on the two made free-throws. The two teams exchanged leads four times over the next four minutes, until Peyton was fouled with :30 left in the game. He made both shots, putting the Bison up 65-61.

Colgate then beat the Bison pressure for a layup and to pull within two again. At the other end of the court, Walsh was fouled with :10 remaining, and he took his 47 percent free-throw percentage to the line. He missed both shots, and Colgate got the rebound. Colgate's Brown put one up from beyond the arc that rolled in and out with :06 left, and the Red Raiders underneath missed two tip-ins as time expired. Bright led the Bison with 20 points.

"In the second half, we just lost our concentration," commented Woollum after the game. "We made enough bad plays that we were fortunate to win." He later added, "We played a hell of a half against Colgate. Then they turned around and played one against us. We've just got to work on playing a solid 40 minutes of basketball, that's what every team tries to do."

The Bison continue their season tomorrow night when they host Fordham at 7:30p.m. in Davis Gym. The game has been sold out since Wednesday afternoon, and it promises to be a great one. Fordham beat Holy Cross by five points on Wednesday, moving Bucknell back into a tie for first and Fordham onto the doorstep.

"They're going to be flying high — they're going to feel that they are better than us after beating Holy Cross; plus they've won the last two years they've come here, so they have the numbers on their side," said Bright. "We're getting better every day, however, and we should come up with the victory."

Bucknell won the first meeting in January 69-65. If the Bison should win tomorrow, it would be coach Woollum's 300th victory in his 18 seasons here at Bucknell. "The coach looks at it as getting older," commented Bright. "He also has just over 200 losses, so that's over 500 games at Bucknell alone. He just wants to get through the season and then look back on his accomplishments."

set Holy Cross at home last year, so they felt they should have given them a tougher fight.

In all, the team is definitely in a strong position in the league. Tied for fourth with Army (whom the Bison have already beaten this year), the Bison are a few more wins away from hosting a first-round tournament game, which is played on the home floor of the higher seed.

At this time last year the Bison were just 4-16 overall and 2-6 in the conference. The turnaround this year is likely due to a better combination of veteran leadership with young talent. K.C. Vlah has been a spark at the point. Although she will have to cut down on her turnovers, she does lead the team in assists and steals. Lauren Wagner '96 has stuggled with her shot for most of the season, but she proved early on that she can score.

McGee, Fink, and Joy Sandler Gr. have all shown that they can step up in a key moment in a game. With the steady improvement of Monica Nawarskas '94, the Bison now have the veteran influence that they lacked last year.

with Bob Behler on the radio at the Colgate game on Wednesday night. Great job, Chris. Congrats also go out to Behler, who will be working a second round NCAA tournament game in Syracuse for CBS Radio.

— As an old Colts fan, it bothers me that of the three likely finalists for NFL expansion - Baltimore, Charlotte, and St. Louis - Baltimore is the most deserving, but least likely to land a team. Despite a local owner, a guaranteed new stadium, and the fact that the city was robbed of its team by an idiot owner who brought in a fleet of moving vans in the middle of the night, Charm City is hampered by its close proximity to D.C., where the Redskins already play. But the league needs to understand that traditionally people in Baltimore hate the Redskins, so they won't be losing any fans.

— The Sign of the Year has to be the one I saw in Sports Illustated a few weeks ago, where some lonely fans of the 3-38 Dallas Mavericks penned, "We've got next game!"

—Let me give you a litte tip. The best way to get a good seat for the Fordham game tomorrow is to show up in time for the women's game (5:15 tipoff). They would love to have you, and who wants to get stuck behind the rafters anyhow?

— Despite my eternal hate for the Duke basketball team, when it comes time to fill out my tournament brackets this year I'm still putting Coach K's boys in the Final Four. It's got to be some sort of miracle how Bobby Hurley has gone from a little whiner who couldn't shoot and committed too many turnovers to a complete point guard who will be a combination of Mark Price and Kevin Johnson when he gets to the NBA.

Dominant wrestling team burned by polls

Undefeated Bison knock off two Top 20 teams, yet not considered in polls. Bucknell will host Baffalo this evening in Davis Gym

BY MITCH BENTON
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The Bucknell wrestling squad had to overcome a number of challenging distractions as well as an outstanding Cal. Poly wrestling program in order to continue its season-opening winning streak. While the Bison were able to experience some of the highlights of California on their West Coast road trip, they quickly found that California wrestling was not comprised of Mickey Mouse programs, and they struggled to earn their sixth consecutive victory.

San Luis Obispo was Bucknell's first stop on the trip to face a Cal. Poly team that had already been in the Amateur Wrestling News' Top 25 this season and was looking for a victory to put it back on the list. A 17-12 decision at 118 pounds put the home team on the right track, but George Swann '93 quickly derailed it with a 14-8 victory at 126. A Phil Elliott '93 8-3 win at 134 pounds gave Bucknell a 6-3 advantage after three bouts. In the following contest, Bucknell's Ron Wellman '95 scored a three point win over Pat Morrissey, then the sixth-ranked 142 pounder in the nation according to the AWN, increasing the lead to six.

After the teams exchanged decisions in the next two bouts, Mike Rush '95 pushed the Bison back to a six point lead with a 5-4 win in his first competition of the year at a new, lower weight of 167 pounds. Captain Bob Ferraro '94 sealed the victory with his 15-0 technical fall at 177 pounds, also a different, lower weight. While Cal. Poly mounted a nine-point comeback, it was not able to catch the Bison who pushed their record to 6-0 with the 20-18 victory.

"Cal Poly was ranked earlier in the year," explained Head Coach Bob Ferraro, "I thought that it was a great win for us, making such a long trip and doing all of the social things that California has to offer. We had to re-focus on wrestling and the team came through."

After visiting Hollywood and Universal Studios, appropriate spots for this edition of Bucknell grapplers whose season has thus far resembled a movie script, the team had to regroup to take part in the Country Classic Open held at Cal. State-Bakersfield.

"I was happy with our performance at Bakersfield," the elder Ferraro continued, "We had been away longer and it's difficult to remember what you are there for. When you spend time on the road, it can be tough to keep your weight down."

While the Bakersfield tournament was a non-scoring open meet, Bucknell did have more placewinners then any of the eight programs entered, earning ten in nine different weight classes. That string included one individual champion and a pair of runner-up finishers.

The Bison's lone weight class champion came at 150 pounds where captain Mike Van Doren '92 was hardly tested as he swept through the bracket to take the title. Seeded second in the meet, Van Doren opened with a 17-1 technical fall in the second period, setting up a bout with hometown favorite Mickey Ritter of Bakersfield. Van Doren dispatched him with a 12-3 major decision and scored a first period pin in the next bout to reach the championship round. In the finals, the graduate student finished with a 12-2 major decision over top-ranked Wes Winterstein of the Air Force Academy. Van Doren's total of five wins in California give him a season record of 19-3, and a career mark of 73-31, ranking him fifth on the school's all-time victory list, seven behind former All-American Bryan Burns '91.

Still competing at 177 pounds, second-seeded Ferraro was also able to sweep through the preliminary rounds on the strength of a pair of first period pins and a 5-3 decision over the third seed, Laszlo Molnar of Cal State Fullerton. In the finals, Ferraro was upended by the top seed, Mike Vanarsdale of the Sunkist Wrestling Club and former three-time collegiate All-American.

Also placing second for Bucknell was Rush at 167 pounds, who was 2-1 in the competition, including a pin and 5-3 decision over second-seeded Brett Machovina of the Air Force Academy.

Other high placewinners for Bucknell included a pair of fourth place finishes. The first came at 118 pounds where Clay Burkle '94 went 4-2 with a fall and a technical fall, to solidify his starting position as the Bison 118 pounder. Also finishing fourth was Jason Prokopchak '95, who went 5-2 in the 158 pound weight class.

Peter Ho — The Bucknellian

Captain Mike Van Doren GR, pictured here in a match against Drexel last year in Davis Gym, has been one of several Bucknell grapplers on fire. At the Country Classic Open in Bakersfield, CA, Van Doren captured top honors in the 158-lbs weight class.

Despite tomorrow's showdown with the Naval Academy, ranked 16th in the nation by the AWN, Coach Ferraro warns against overconfidence heading into tonight's match-up with conference foe Buffalo, now 1-10 after a recent 33-0 loss to Kent State.

"We cannot overlook Buffalo," cautions the coach, "They have five good wrestlers, but I think that we match up pretty well. We just have to focus on Navy after that match. I'm sure we can beat Navy if we all perform well and don't have any letdowns. It's difficult on the road and they have hostile fans, but we're ready."

Despite the team's impressive early season success that includes victories over current Top 25 teams such as North Carolina and North Carolina State, the Amateur Wrestling News has not ranked Bucknell in its most recent poll, a fact not lost on the squad's coach. "There is a lot of politics involved, but the team was prepared for that. Nothing can take wins away, and if we keep winning, they'll have to rank us.

"We are goal oriented as a team," Ferraro went on to say, "We've accomplished most of our goals to this point. Our next goal is to see if we can win the conference's team championship and send some individual champions to the NCAA tournament."

Commentary

Well, sports fans, it's that time of year again. The NFL season has culminated in yet another overhyped blowout, the NBA and NHL are rambling on to see which half dozen or so teams are eliminated from the playoffs, and the "arbitration scoreboard" is the most exciting event in baseball these days. So about all we can do is keep our faith in college hoops, count down the days until spring training, and consider these tidbits from the world of sports:

— Not that I condone the actions or beliefs of suspended Cincinnati Reds owner Marge Schott, but doesn't it bother you just a little that the group of people who decided her fate were other Major League owners, principly Brewers boss Bud Selig? Hardlv an objective crew.

— Can you believe that last Sunday's Stupor Bowl was the highest rated television show ever? I've been a Cowboys-hater all my life, but that third quarter was the most dominant performance since the Redskins blitzed the Broncos a few years ago. You also have to feel for the Bills, who are a very good football team but will always be remembered as dogs. I think it was Bruce Smith who put it best when he explained, "People always think of the Super Bowl winner as the best team in football, and they remember the loser as the worst team in football."

— There have been many great basketball players to come through Davis Gym in the four years that I've been here - Damon Lopez, Kirk Lee, Mike Iuzzolino - but none have taken over a game like Rider's Derek Suber on Monday night. All the more credit to the Bison who made sure his 36 points went for naught.

— It's distressing to hear the media speculate on superstar Mario Lemieux's return from his bout with Hodgkin's Disease. The guy has cancer, not a sprained ankle. Give him as much time as he needs to get healthy, then we'll welcome him back with open arms.

— From the You Can Bet on Anything Dept. - Oddsmaker Danny Sheridan will give you 2-1 odds that Joe Montana will be a Kansas City Chief next year. The Vikings come in at 4-1 and the Raiders at 7-1, with the rest of the NFL field at 20-1. What about the Winnipeg Blue Bombers?

— Yes, that was The Bucknellian's own Chris Drowne doing color commentary

Yet another school record fell in women's swimming this week, and it wasn't even Margret Grunow '93 who did the honors. Linda Fink '95 swam the 1000-yard freestyle in 10:39.77, breaking her own school record by .59 seconds, and at the same time helping Bucknell to a 142-99 win over Colgate last Saturday. The 7-2 Bison have now won five consecutive meets.

Fink's great day in Hamilton also included a victory in the 500-yard freestyle, as she recorded a personal-best time of 5:12.59. Grunow and Kathleen Hartnett '94 each had two-win afternoons as well. Grunow (see box on page xx) took first in both the 100-yard freestyle and the 200-yard individual medley, while Hartnett won the 50-yard freestyle and the 200-yard backstroke. Allyson Gillespie '96 was Bucknell's other individual winner as she took the 200-yard breaststroke.

The Bison also posted two relay victories. The foursome of Hartnett, Gillespie, Wendy Sheldon '93, and Jeanne Klawon '95 took the 400-yard medley relay in 4:09.68. Later, the quartet of Klawon, Grunow, Rose Maguire'96, and Suzanne DiLenge '94 capped off the day with a win in the 400-yard freestyle relay in a time of 3:41.63, the tenth best time in school history.

Other Bison performers who set individual marks were Maguire in the 200-yard freestyle and Kristin Evans '94 in the 1000-yard freestyle.

Tomorrow the women will take to the water against Lehigh (6-2) at the Freas-Rooke Pool at 2 p.m. The meet against the tough Lehigh team will mark the last competition before the Patriot League Championships. Following the league meet are the Eastern Championships in Buffalo March 4-6, and at least five Bison will be there. So far Grunow has qualified in the 50, 100, and 200-yard freestyle, as well as the 100 and 200-yard butterfly. Fink will compete in the 500 and 1000-yard freestyle. Hartnett will swim against Grunow in the 50 and 100-yard freestyle, and she will also compete in the 100 and 200-yard backstroke. Colleen Brooks'95 has also qualified for the 200-yard backstroke.

According to co-captain Grunow, who holds five individual school records, three pool records, and is a part of four record-setting relay teams, this year's squad is one of the best in some time. "This is the strongest team since I've been here. Our freshmen are great," she said. "Right now I feel as good as I've ever felt. I'm excited and nervous, but still loving it," she said looking forward to the league meet. "I still feel pressure every meet, but somehow everything comes together."

As for the Patriot League competition, Grunow feels that Army is the team to beat. "Navy is probably unreachable because of their strong diving, but Army beat us a couple of years ago, and we want to beat them."

The men's team, which has been upstaged by the women over the last few years, also defeated Colgate on Saturday. The Bison (3-5) won eight of the eleven races on their way to a 129-113 victory.

Jay Gross '93 and Rick Steenson '95 each won two events to lead the way. Gross took the 50 and 100-yard freestyles, while Steenson set season bests in the 200-yard butterfly and the 200-yard individual medley.

Other individual winners were Stu Harris '95 in the 1000-yard freestyle and Steve Droste '93 in the 200-yard backstroke. Droste and Steenson combined with Sloan Broderick '96 and John Dillón '95 to take the 400-yard medley relay, while the quar-

Men's track prepares to defend title with depth, balance, and patience

BY CHRIS DROWNE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Every track and field coaching staff in the Patriot League does its best to prepare their respective teams for the Championships. However, they all do it differently. Bucknell's men's head coach Art Gulden and assistants Bill Hodge, Jo Giannettino, and Bob Schanbacher are getting this winter's squad ready in the same way they prepared their two previous Patriot League champions—with depth, balance, and patience.

While each school sends its teams to various meets for valuable individual experience, Bucknell's coaches strive for the team experience. "Most of the others [Patriot League teams] travel to the fast tracks, such as Harvard, Bloomsburg, and Army to get their individual some impressive results," said Gulden. "Those times are skewed and aren't a true measuring stick. I tend to be like the state of Missouri: I want someone to 'Show Me' and those times don't do that."

That's where the patience part plays a major role. The Bison can't allow themselves to get "psyched-out" and become impatient with their own progress which won't be as skewed as their adversaries.

"You are bound to plateau at one point or another during training," described Gulden. "The important part is to work hard through it by being confident, aggressive, and above all, patient. We've been able to do that in the past as individuals and as a team, which is one of the ways we've been able to win."

Sprinter Brad Bernardini '94 warms up before a home meet outdoors last Spring. The Vineland, NY native won the 55-meter dash at the Delaware Relays on Jan 22. He was also part of the mile relay team that placed second, not a usual event for him, at the Princeton Relays.

Another major reason for the Bison's success has been superior balance. Most teams only score in certain events. Bucknell scores across the board. However, this year, that balance will be challenged. In the past, the middle and long distance events have been dominated by orange jerseys. That could change this winter as the Bison boast nobody among the Patriot League's top five performers in those events. "We need our middle and long distance runners to step it up right now and get those points that in the past have been givens for us," stated Gulden.

The third ingredient from championships past (and hopefully present and future) is depth. Not only has Bucknell scored in almost every event, but it did so with two or more people.

"There's no question that depth won it for us last year, and we have depth again this year," said Gulden. "But, the rest of the league has improved to the point where some individuals from other teams can cut into that depth."

Individuals being the key word. "We send two bus loads to meets and not just our elite athletes to fast tracks," said Gulden. "We get our team ready for the big meet together, not as individuals." That is were Bucknell differs from Lehigh and the other challengers to the throne.

"While its fair to say that we're not favored to win a single track event at this point, I still consider us to be the favorites to win the overall meet again this year," stated the veteran head coach.

It's impossible to challenge the receipe that has made Bucknell's track program nationally known. However, this year's Bison will have their depth, balance, and patience tested at the Delaware Invitational this weekend, and then ultimately by their Patriot League opponents impatient to ascend to the top.

BUCKNELL UNIVERSITY — LEWISBURG, PENNSYLVANIA 17837

Lewisburg named top ten small town

BY SUSAN SMITH
Bucknellian Staff Writer

What helps to distinguish Lewisburg as one of the nation's top ten small towns? Perhaps it's the unique streetlamps? Perhaps it's the high number of historic homes and churches (23)? Maybe it's the presence of Bucknell.

A variety of criteria, including scenery, proximity to a metropolitan center, per capita income, percentage of non-white population, and the town's newspaper, were used by author Norman Crampton when rating small towns (pop: 5000—15,000) for his book, The 100 Best Small Towns in America.

Lewisburg ranked ninth in the nation, scoring high in areas such as the lowest amount of serious crimes (4th), physicians per 100,000 people (26th), and percentage of college-educated residents (39th). It also garnered extra points for being home to a county seat, located near state parks and scenic drives, and host to an institution of higher learning.

Barry Maxwell, vice-president of administration, who was interviewed for Crampton's book, said that the relationship between Bucknell and Lewisburg is reciprocal. "Lewisburg would not be the town that it is without Bucknell and Bucknell would not be the institution it is without Lewisburg."

While Bucknell is a large part of Lewisburg's economic base (900 employees, $31 million payroll), the relationship between the University and town stems much further. Maxwell listed the numerous civic and community programs such as assisting the elderly and cleaning up the town as evidence of the ongoing relationship between the University and town. Nada Gray, the borough manager of Lewisburg said, "Bucknell University is a cultural asset."

Maxwell also noted that while the faculty and staff are attracted to the reputation of Bucknell, the nature and appearance of the town also draws them to work here.

The town also aids in attracting prospective students. Valerie Brady '94 remembers thinking, "It was a cute, quaint town." When she leaves Bucknell she will think of Lewisburg fondly. Nikki Collier '96 said, "I liked the small town because it's quiet and different than the big city which I'm from."

Sharon Poff, director of public relations and publications acknowledged that the University has always promoted the charm of Lewisburg in the student handbooks and other publications sent to prospectives. Now the tag "Top ten small town in America" will also be included.

According to Poff, "Students and alumni have always recognized what a beautiful town Bucknell is located in." She has even heard Bucknell parents comment on "how much they've enjoyed visiting Lewisburg" and that they'll miss the town when their son or daughter graduates.

J.J. Guiliano '93 will miss the safety and friendliness of the Lewisburg when he graduates. He said, "It's safe. You can actually leave the door open. You can deal with the people in a bakery or pharmacy. If you don't have enough money you can tell them you'll be back and they'll believe you."

Amanda Kessler '93, a native of Lewisburg who went away for prep school and who has since returned to Lewisburg for college, said, "Maybe I'll retire here someday after living in a city." This year she is living at home and said "I'm starting to come back into the community in which I grew up and am really enjoying it. There's nothing about the town I don't like."

The "Old West" style town of Elko, Nevada was ranked the number one small town in America.

Library heightens security after thefts

BY TARA GILLIGAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The Ellen Clarke Bertrand Library will be stepping up its security measures in response to what Vince DeCerchio, director of Public Safety, described as "a rash of thefts that has just begun to occur in the library since the beginning of school."

Several students had materials taken from their locked study carrels, located in the front of lower level one. Others reported that their backpacks had been stolen after they left the bags unattended on desks in the library.

As a result of the surge of thefts, Public Safety will assign extra officers to patrol the library.

Additionally, it will hand out 2,000 copies of a memo reminding students and faculty to secure their belongings and alerting them to the recent incidents.

Joanne Young, associate director of library services, said she contacted both Public Safety and Physical Plant to discuss ways of preventing further theft, especially from the locked study carrels assigned to seniors and graduate students working on theses.

Young said that the library and Physical Plant will investigate ways of securing the locked study carrels which now are completely open above the door. "I'm sure that cost is not an issue above security and safety," she said.

In addition to simply telling staff and students to be more careful about where they leave their personal belongings, Young said, "We're asking staff to be more aware of people who may not be here to study." However, Young believes this approach may have little effect. "The buildings [on campus] are all open to everybody," making it difficult to keep unwanted individuals out of the library, she said.

Following one of the incidents, an individual reported to one Public Safety officer that three "juveniles" had been roaming the library and had apparently not come to do work. The officer was not able to locate these individuals in his search of the library, but in the future Public Safety will, in its stepped-up campaign against li-

Rumors of 20/20 visit spur discussions

BY TIMOTHY W. KIRK
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Rampant rumors that ABC news magazine 20/20 was planning a visit to Bucknell in conjunction with a story about drinking trends on campus have spurred rigorous discussion and debate this past week.

Director of Public Relations Sharon Poff confirmed that 20/20 telephoned Bucknell "two-and-a-half to three weeks ago" interested in doing a story covering "what's going on with drinking on campus."

"We sent them information concerning our alchol policy, various educational efforts that are being made by people like Bob Thomas, and we haven't heard from them since," said Poff

According to a source at 20/20, Bucknell was indeed on a list of schools deemed relevant to one of their potential stories. "We are investigating a story on problem drinking at colleges," he said. "Most of the other schools that we've talked to are interested in cooperating. They want this exposed. For the most part, [underage drinking is] illegal. Often they [schools] don't have any recourse. Therefore, they are open to cooperating with us and exposing anything."

20/20 said they wanted to attend a fraternity party as well as talk with groups of students and administrators about drinking on campus, according Poff. Students and administrators have expressed considerable concern over the purpose of this story and the nature of reporting done in news magazine segments such as those broadcast by 20/20.

As a result, both IFC and the Panhellenic Council chose to inform their members of the possibility of such a visit and discuss what policy should be concerning talking to reporters from 20/20.

"I was alerted to the fact that 20/20 might visit campus by Ed Dadez, and felt it important to pass this on to sorority members through their presidents, " said Casey Corbett '94, Panhellenic president. "We are obviously concerned with the possibility of having whatever we say taken out of context, and I felt it would be best to discuss this ahead of time so no one was taken off-guard."

IFC President Scott Alfieri '94 also said Dadez told him of the possibility of a visit, and told him to "be cautious."

"I alerted fraternity presidents and told them, 'if you don't want to let 20/20 into your house to film a party, you don't have to,"' said Alfieri.

Dadez asserted there is "no University position," on talking to 20/20. "My guess is that if 20/20 is going to visit, the fraternities would feel more comfortable if their members did not talk with 20/20, said Dadez. "When public relations talked with us, one of the things that they [20/20] were interested in visiting was a fraternity party. At that point, IFC was the first student group meeting with which members of student services could meet to alert them to the possibility—meaning that in the previous 10 days or so, colleagues have also talked about this at the Panhellenic Council, RHA, Residence Directors, and other student groups."

Alfieri said their was no attempt to "cover-up" anything on the part of IFC or Dadez.

"It's no hidden secret," said Alfieri. "He [Dadez] was just saying

Faculty calendaring decision leaves University community dissatisfied

BY DEB MANASSE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

After suggestions by several members of the faculty at their Monday meeting that the re-calendaring decision made last semester is not satisfactory, the faculty has sent the issue back to the Committee on Instruction for evaluation.

News Analysis

It appears that the proposal passed by the faculty has succeeded only in proving equitable to all parties involved.

Nobody's interests seem to have been served, everyone appears dissatisfied, and the elaborate process of deciding how to deal with the gap left by the removal of the Jan Plan looks to have been fruitless for all.

During the April 1992 faculty meeting in which the January Plan was eliminated, the Committee on Instruction cited several of the program's shortcomings. Although the complaint that student participation in the January program had decreased to approximately 32% a year was in the forefront of the debate, several other issues surfaced in favor of eliminating the program.

According to reports from the Committee on Instruction as well as vice president for academic affairs Larry Shinn, parents had repeatedly voiced concern about the excess free time students were faced with during the six-week period between semesters.

In addition, the Committee on Instruction stressed that the end-of other time during the year.

It was clear that not everyone could be satisfied by the decision, but it seemed that at least a majority would find themselves pleased with the final result. The Jan Plan was eliminated and the faculty turned to the task of restructuring the calendar.

However, nearly nine months later, and after several different calendar proposals, the University has committed to a calendar that fails will still be home for five weeks between semesters with only seven fewer days of excess time on their hands.

It seems unlikely that students who found themselves twiddling their thumbs for six weeks in anticipation of the spring term will suddenly find themselves blissfully occupied during the five-week break that will loom in front of them under this calendar.

The last day of finals for next year's spring semester is Thursday, May 19. This represents a shift of two days from current calendar. Such an insignificant change will give those students hoping to get a jump on the summer job market no greater edge than before.

> The University has committed to a calendar that fails to address the concerns that were the impetus for the removal of a program that served, at minimum, a third of the campus.

Graduating seniors will see even less of a change. They gain one day from the plan, but only because graduation will move to a Saturday.

May finals schedule increased the difficulty of competing in the already highly competitive summer job market.

Despite these legitimate concerns, many members of the faculty voiced continued support for the Jan Plan, saying that it allowed students to take advantage of opportunities not available to them at any to address the concerns that were the impetus for the removal of a program that served, at minimum, a third of the campus.

The calendar that has been passed for next year has the second semester beginning on January 26, one week earlier than it would have started under the current calendar. This starting date means students

'prepare yourself.' There was not much discussion at the IFC meeting. In my president's report I said to just use your own discretion."

Dean of Students John Dunlop met with student groups, informing them of their rights. "They [20/20] had decided we were really a party school. They wanted to investigate this-who knows to what end. What I did had to be done, I thought. I presented it in a balanced way and let students draw their own conclusions."

Jen Matsko GR, residence director for Hunt Hall and the downhill fraternities said, "There was certainly no attempt to institute any kind of gag-rule on the topic. As a matter of fact, the first I heard of their [20/20] visit was through the same rumor most students did."

According to Todd Haldeman '94, president of Theta Chi Fraternity, there was a consensus among fraternity presidents not to let 20/20 into fraternity houses.

"There was a question of them coming here and twisting what we told them. We agreed as fraternity presidents that it probably wasn't in our best interest to let them in," said Haldeman. "We are putting serious effort into implementing BYOB policies and trying to make that work. We didn't need additional risks to deal with."

Poff confirmed that memoranda had been sent out alerting administrators and staff members of the possibility of a visit by 20/20.

"We did send memos, including a list of possible questions that would be asked, for the sole purpose of allowing people to prepare for the visit and not be caught off-guard. I know nothing of an attempt to silence anyone," said Poff.

"I don't think it's a question of not wanting to be open about our alcohol situation," said Dadez. "It's more of the point that when the media, TV, or newspapers are interested in doing a story about alcohol and then throw in the word 'fraternities,' they're not looking for a glossy piece to talk about how wonderful the fraternities are in leadership, scholarship, or community service. They're looking for some of the negatives, or problems. And I don't think that the Greek system needs to cooperate with that."

As of press time, however, 20/20 is not planning to come to Bucknell.

"I've done some preliminary legwork," said the 20/20 source. "We've lost interest in working with them [Bucknell]. There's nothing going on between us and Bucknell. If that changes, I will let you know."

brary theft, be aware of such individuals. "It makes us suspicious if they're going to be using the library facility and not doing any work," said DeCerchio.

DeCerchio said that Public Safety is determined to prevent the increase in library thefts from becoming a "juvenile feeding frenzy."

According to Young, the majority of the incidents reported involve missing backpacks. Often, the backpacks are returned, she said.

However, other reported incidents have been far more serious than the stolen backpacks. Tim Kirk '93 reported having all of the material for his senior thesis—books and notes—stolen from his locked carol.

"I find this incredibly troubling," said Kirk. "Obviously this was a great personal loss, as months of irreplaceable work was stolen, in addition to over $1,000 worth of books, both personal and library-owned. The fact that there have been numerous thefts affecting the scholarly pursuits of students is nothing short of disgusting."

Several of the students who had their backpacks stolen commented that the library is not as safe as they had previously assumed it to be. Dinesh Achria said that he left one the study rooms for only a few minutes and returned to find his backpack and calculator missing. "I just think it's not a safe place any more," he said.

After intense searching, Achria found his backpack in a trash can.

One other student who had her wallet, keys, walkman, and calculator stolen said, "I was very angry and very bitter. I felt no one had a right to take something that wasn't theirs," she said. Although their wallet was found and returned, the money and her copy card were missing.

Kirk notes that the library staff has worked closely with him in this matter." Many of the materials have been located randomly hidden the library, and I'm certainly grateful for the efforts of Bonnie Baer and her staff."

PUBLIC SAFETY LOG

Wednesday, February 3

RA at Kappa Sigma Fraternity reported the theft of a room phone. Entry was gained in the room by breaking an outside window pane. Total property was valued at $85. The theft is believed to have occurred over Christmas break.

Thursday, February 4

At 2:39p.m., a Public Safety Officer on foot patrol in the uphill area observed a vehicle driving in a reckless manner in front of Roberts Hall, in the Quad. Driver of the vehicle is being cited for various motor vehicle violations concerning the incident.

A student reported the theft of approx. 13 books and various personal items from a study carrel in the lower level of the library at 10:55p.m. Value of the missing property is unknown at this time.

A student reported the theft of CD's and a walkman from a study carrel in the Library, between 4p.m. and 9:30p.m., this date. Property value is unknown.

Unknown person(s) did remove a car stereo from a vehicle parked in the Orchard Lot. Victim of the theft reported it occurred sometime between 1/31/93, and 5:30p.m. this date. There were no signs of forced entry to the vehicle. Property value unknown.

Officers responded to a vehicle accident that had just occurred, when a car backed out of a parking stall into another vehicle on Vaughan Lit. Road at 10:37p.m., this date. There were no reported injuries to either parties involved.

Friday, February 5

At 3:50p.m. this date, an ill student contacted Public Safety Dispatcher requesting a ride to the hospital. Student Health Service Driver was paged and transported the victim to the Emergency Room at Evangelical Hospital.

Officers responded to a fire alarm activation at 6:01p.m. to Bertrand Library, lower level one. Cause of alarm was a discharged fire extinguisher activating a smoke detector. Extinguisher was replaced and alarm system returned to normal status.

Saturday, February 6

At 12:20p.m., during a routine ID check at Theta Chi Fraternity, a woman with a can of beer was found to be under the legal age for possession of alcohol. Student was escorted from the fraternity back to her residence hall.

A student reported his vehicle missing from the Swartz Hall parking lot at 4:35p.m., this date. At 7p.m., officers located the missing vehicle on Moore Ave., with no signs of forced entry.

A person attending a basketball game in Davis Gym reported being the victim of harassment to officers at 9:55p.m., this date. Investigation will be continued by East Buffalo P.D.

Student was treated by officers after sustaining lacerations to thie hands. After bleeding was controlled, the injured party was transported to Evangelical Hospital ER by a BHS Driver for further treatment.

Monday, February 8

At 8:53p.m., officers responded to the field house for a reported injured student. On arrival they found the victim had sustained an injury while playing basketball. Victim declined further treatment and will contact the trainer for treatment.

The Department of Public Safety received a report that there was a VCR stolen from Dana. It was determined that the security cable had been cut by means of a bolt cutter or similar tool. This act was committed between 3p.m. and 5:45p.m. an 2/8/93.

Tuesday, February 9

A Bucknell University student reported to the Department of Public Safety that she has been the victim of harassing telephone calls. The calls started in September and have continued. Investigation is continuing.

A Bucknell University student reported the walkman and a wallet from the library. The items taken were unattended at the time. Investigation continuing.

Wednesday, February 10

While at the Bertrand Library responding to an intrusion alarm, two Bucknell University students reported that their backpacks and contents were stolen from lower level one. A search of the area for those backpacks met with negative results. Also this same date, a theft of a calculator was reported from the lower level one of the library.

A Bucknell University student reported being the victim of a series of harassing telephone calls. Investigation continuing.

DeCerchio creates Public Safety Advisory Board

Colin Bridgewater—The Bucknellian
Vincent DeCerchio, director of Public Safety.

Consistent with the trend of increased student participation in discussions of University matters, Vincent DeCerchio, director of Public Safety, has announced the formation of a Public Safety Advisory Board.

"Enforcement merely maintains the status quo. We want to change things, to improve the crime situation on this campus. This board should serve as a means to generate new solutions to old problems," said DeCerchio.

The function of the advisory board, according to a Feb. 2 notice which DeCerchio sent to students, will be to review the current policies and procedures, to discuss new ways of providing campus services, and to assist "in the problem solving and total quality management" of Public Safety.

"I want input from students, staff, administrators, and faculty to help me solve some of the most visible problems—parking, vandalism, alcohol abuse, and violations," said DeCerchio.

DeCerchio's advisory board will be comprised of four to six students, two support staff members, two faculty members, and one administrator. DeCerchio is currently recruiting interested individuals.

DeCerchio is interested in comments from representatives of all facets of the University. "We want to institue a system of peer influence, whereby we are not simply dictating behavior to students," he said.

New alcohol policy sanctions implemented

BY JOHN SHIRE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

On Feb. 2 Bucknell University put into effect a series of new sanctions for individuals who violate the university alcohol policy.

According to John Dunlop, dean of students, "These new sanctions stem from the ineffectiveness of the old sanctions and are intended to be more educational for the students and less punitive than the previous sanctions."

The new sanctions result from a year and a half of collaborative effort by Dunlop, Gerald Commerford, Assistant Dean of Housing, a task force of students and administrators, the Bucknell Student Government and the Committee on Complementary Activities.

Upon review of the old university policy, the task force, headed by Barbara A. Shailor, Vice President of Student Services, concluded that the old sanctions had done little to decrease the illegal consumption of alcohol. Further, the task force concluded that the old sanctions were discriminatory because they favored those students who could easily pay the penalty of illegal consumption, a $50 fine.

Under the provisions of the old policy, the alternative penalty required a student to serve ten hours of campus service at the physical plant; however, there was no way to ensure that the students would attend.

Dunlop said, "It became too time consuming for adminstrators to constantly chase after the students. In order to ensure that a student was fulfilling the obligation, a physical plant employee had to be taken off of another job to oversee the student. Further, by requiring the student to work in the physical plant as a punishment, the sanction was undermining the importance of the positions held by the regular physical plant staff."

During revision of the new policy, student members of the task force explained that while many students would become extremely ill from alcohol consumption, old sanctions deterred many students from seeking medical attention. Dunlop said "many students in need of medical help were reluctant to seek aid because they feared that sanctions would be imposed upon them."

Dunlop deems the new sanctions as "superior to the old sanctions in that they emphasize education more than punitive action and that they differentiate between the degrees of seriousness of each offense."

Commerford said, "one must distinguish between a student who is present in an area of illegal consumption and a student who is publicly drunk during consumption. [The revised policy] is a much clearer policy to deal with." For each particular offense, there is a particular penalty. He said, "More serious offenses will be dealt with more seriously."

The policy also distinguishes penalties according to the number of offenses committed by the student. Dunlop said that this is a superior policy because, "under the old policy, there was one sanction for all offenses."

Alcohol policy undergoes changes

BY SHANNON SKOPAK
Bucknellian Staff Writer

On the weekend of Feb. 5 two procedural changes to the University's alcohol policy were implemented.

The first alteration in the policy is that in addition to underage people who are found consuming alcohol the fraternity supplying alcohol will be charged with violating alcohol policies.

The second change in alcohol policy is the introduction of "party areas." The appointed place for "party areas" is the basement of each fraternity house. During registered parties fraternities must restrict open containers of alcohol to the basement of their houses. Both people of drinking age and those under the age of twenty-one are permitted to be in the "party area."

According to Ed Dadez, Associate Dean of Student Life, the University's goal is to allow for "successful social events that follow alcohol policy." Dadez feels this is possible "with the support of the campus community."

Scott Alfieri, President of the Interfraternity Council, will also be working to enforce these new procedures and believes that if alcohol policies are followed correctly it could lead to the "perfect party."

An additional change in the policy is that the Residential Directors and Area Coordinators will be more involved in assigning the appropriate sanctions. The Dean's offices will only be involved in the more severe offenses, upon which a referral of suspension may be assigned.

The original draft of the new policy was developed by Dunlop and Commerford, reviewed and modified by the task force, and then reviewed and modified by the BSG and the CCA. Thus, students were very much a part of the final sanctions. Dunlop said, "the thinking of the students is reflected in the final revision," in which sanctions range from an administrative letter of warning from the area coordinator to a referral to the committee on student conduct with a recommendation of suspension from the university for the remainder of the semester in which the violation occurs.

An intermediate disciplinary sanction may deny a student the off-campus living privilege, and lottery pick within his or her class for the subsequent year, and require the offender to write a three pages essay on a topic such as the relationship between alcohol and sexism or the impact of alcohol abuse on the University community. Bob Thomas, the University Drug and Alcohol Program Coordinator, along with Commerford suggested the paper topics. All the papers relate to a common theme which emphasizes that the use and abuse of alcohol provokes certain kinds of activities including violence, exclusivity, and discrimination.

The 1992/93 LaFayette Butler Student Book Collection Competition

Undergraduate students with personal unified book collections of any nature are invited to enter the 1992-93 competition. Winning collections will be exhibited in the Bertrand Library. + Co-sponsored by the Bertrand Library and the Bucknell University Bookstore, the competition is named for the late LaFayette Butler, bibliophile, supporter of the library and initiator of the first competition in 1965. A portion of Mr. Butler's own superb personal collection was bequeathed to the Bertrand Library and is the basis of the library's current Special Collections. + First place prize: $200 cash or a $250 Bookstore certificate. Second place prize: $100 cash or a $125 Bookstore certificate. + The judges for the 1992-93 competition are John Kendrick, Professor of Sociology; Martha Verbrugge, Professor of History; and Nancy Weyant, Reference Librarian/Coordinator of Desk Services and Reference Collections. For further information, contact Nancy Weyant at the Bertrand Library.

Detailed rules for entering the book collection competition are available through the library, the bookstore, and on flyers distributed across campus. Closing date for all entries is Friday, March 5, 1993.

The one thing that has been accomplished by the faculty's calendar juggling act is that the 32% of the student population who would have utilized the Jan Plan are left without the opportunity to do so.

The new calendar also leaves many "unofficial Jan Planners" who used January as a time to make money or to secure non-paying internship they couldn't afford to take during the summer without enough available time to interest potential employers.

It is clear that the faculty must make a final decision on the calendar issue and stick by that decision. However, members of the faculty must carefully weigh the issues and aggressively consider the possibility that the best calendar for Bucknell is the one it just abandoned, one that included the January program.

Safe Rides program to offer work-study position

BY TARA GILLIGAN AND MARIA GLOD
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Delta Delta Delta and the Department of Public Safety are currently discussing changes to the Safe Rides program in an effort to eliminate misuse of the service and to enhance the program's effectiveness.

Although the ultimate goal of the revisions has not yet been clearly identified, the two groups involved hope to improve the organization of the Safe Rides escort service.

"We really have to iron out some kinks in the program and straighten out some of the abuses," said Vincent DeCerchio, director of Public Safety.

The most immediate proposal being discussed is the possibility of hiring a student on work study to participate in the coordination of the program.

According to DeCerchio, this newly created position will help to fill a gap in the Safe Rides operation. The paid position will call for a student to either serve as a driver or a supervisor, he said.

DeCerchio said he would like to "hire an escort supervisor who would provide hands-on supervision and act as a facilitator."

The money to pay the student would come out of the Public Safety's budget and would probably total between $2000 and $2500, he said.

In addition to their discussion of hiring a student employee, Public Safety and Delta Delta Delta have been grappling with ways to provide safer and more efficient service for students, while eliminating abuses by individuals who use it merely for convenience.

"The primary purpose of the Safe Rides program is to provide escorts to people who are wary of their safety at night," said DeCerchio.

"The problem we are facing now is that it has become a taxi service, and this takes away from the people who really need it," said Jenn Stevens '93 Delta Delta Delta philanthropy chair and coordinator of the program.

DeCerchio said that while a student requesting a Safe Ride to go from one fraternity house to another is an abuse of the system, he does promote use of the service by students who have consumed too much alcohol to safely walk home.

"I like the idea of using Safe Rides to transport people who are intoxicated so that they don't drink and drive," said DeCerchio. "That could save a life."

To discourage students from requesting Safe Rides out of laziness, DeCerchio said they are considering adding a "walking service." Under this part of the program, two students—carrying radio and flashlight—would walk with the person requesting an escort.

"If you are concerned about your safety, then you'll accept a walking escort. It will discourage people who are just looking for a taxi services," said DeCerchio.

"I think the program provides an excellent service to the University community and I feel it is an invaluable service which I would not want to discontinue," said DeCerchio.

On Campus

Taipei dancers to perform

Dance Forum Taipei, which includes dancers from Taiwan, Hong Kong, the People's Republic of China, and the United States, will be in residency at Bucknell Feb. 3-13. In addition to the performance tonight at 8 p.m. in the Weis Center, the group will be conducting classes in Peking Opera movement and offering workshops in Chinese folk dance.

Masekela blows in South African trumpet player Hugh Masekela will perform on Tuesday, Feb. 16 at 8 p.m. in the Weis Center as part of Bucknell's semester-long exploration of the African Experience. Masekela co-authored the Broadway musical, "Sarafina," now a motion picture starring Whoopi Goldberg, and was a featured performer on Paul Simon's "Graceland" tour.

Explorer finds Bucknell

International explorer and filmmaker Quentin Keynes will be in residency at Bucknell Feb. 16-19. During that time he will be visiting classes and narrating several of his award-winning films including "The Zambesi, I Presume," which retraces the journey of David Livingston.

Keynes is the great-grandson of Charles Darwin and the nephew of English economist John Maynard Keynes.

Poet Plath to be honored

The English department will host a tribute to Sylvia Plath on Sunday, Feb. 21 at 2:45 and 7 p.m. in the C. Willard Smith Library, Vaughn Literature Building.

The tribute, which is being held in conjunction with the Andrew W. Mellon Foundation and the 92nd Street Y Center for Poetry in New York City, will include reminiscences of the poet and her work by Al Alvarez, Peter Davison, Ruth Fainlight, Maxine Kumin, and Grace Schulman.

Events celebrate African-Americans

Photographer Vera Viditz-Ward will host the gallery talk, "Becoming a Stranger: Working as a Fine Art Photographer in West Africa," on Saturday, Feb. 13 at 3 p.m. in the Center Gallery.

Vinie Burrows, actress and non-governmental permanent representative to the United Nations, will discuss her work as chair of the Subcommittee of Southern Africa on Feb. 15 at noon in Walls Lounge.

"Mapantsula," the first anti-apartheid feature focusing on black South Africans and endorsed by the African National Congress will be shown on Feb. 18 at 4 and 7 p.m. in Coleman Hall room 101B.

Drugs found at Clarion

One current Clarion University student and one former student were arrested by University Police in a residence hall on Jan. 23 for possession of marijuana and possession with intent to deliver marijuana. Both charges are unclassified misdemeanors.

Officers allege the smell of marijuana was coming from the room that was occupied by the subjects. During their search the officers found 48 grams of the drug, cigarette rolling papers, two unidentified pills, and $437 in cash.

F&M starts "clean" hall

Franklin and Marshall College plans to make a substance-free hall available during the 1993-94 academic year. The purpose of the hall is to provide a living environment that is alcohol, drug, and tobacco free for its inhabitants.

The students are expected to make a commitment to the above guidelines by signing a community contract which states that they will never use the substances on the hall, or return to the hall under the influence of these substances.

At the end of the semester, the students will be asked to evaluate the Substance Free Community program and its strengths and weaknesses and to make recommendations about areas needing improvement.

Tufts doctor faces charges

Internationally known researcher Dr. Richard I. Shader, the department chair of pharmacology at the Tufts University School of Medicine, has been faced with several sexual harassment charges that have caused the state to limit his psychiatric practice and stay a suspension on his medical license. Shader denies that he has ever "engaged in sexual harassment," according to his attorney.

Shader admitted having sexual relations with a female patient who had gone to him in the 1970s after she filed a complaint with the Boston Psychoanalytic Society in May 1990. In addition, another faculty member stated that she had been sexually harassed by Shader in the late 1980s; similar accusations were brought up by a woman who worked with Shader on a medical journal that he edits.

No actions have been taken against Shader by Tufts, nor by the New England Medical Center, which is affiliated with the medical school.

Skidmore gets five million

Skidmore has received a pledge for a gift of five million dollars from Wilma Stein Tisch, class of 1948, and her husband, Laurence Tisch.

The gift, the largest in the college's history, will be used to boost Skidmore's endowment, currently estimated at $49 million, and create within the endowment a permanent professorship and a student scholarship named in honor of the couple.

"This generous gift is a tremendous vote of confidence in Skidmore and its future," said Skidmore president David Porter. He added that increasing the endowment is one of the top priorities of the college during their current fund raising campaign.

U. S. takes advantage of Guatemalan workers

BY NANCY MORRISON AND JIM ROUSSEAU

For two weeks in January, we participated in a delegation to the strife-ridden country of Guatemala. One of our most disturbing experiences was learning about the horrible conditions and exploitative wages of the textile factories in Guatemala City.

The Guatemalans refer to the textile factories as "maquilas," which are predominantly owned by foreign companies. A large proportion is owned by United States firms. The objective of the foreign firms is to take advantage of the cheap labor that is abundant in this country.

The process is as follows: the fabric is cut in a First World country, sent to a Third World country, such as Guatemala, to be sewn, and then sent back to the First World country for distribution. This practice keeps the cost of production low and profits high. The work is completely unskilled, with the majority of workers being women and children. In the traditional world of economics such business practices make perfect sense.

But, the traditional world of economics often overlooks the human factor. After spending an afternoon with women labor organizers from the maquilas in Guatemala City, we could not ignore the plight of the workers. Most of the women work six or seven days a week, for 12 to 18 hours a day. Labor laws in the Guatemalan constitution call for an eight-hour work day, with overtime hours being compensated accordingly. In reality the constitution is not enforced, creating a situation where the women and children are expected to work overtime without compensation.

Furthermore, workers who refuse to work overtime hours are often fired. On top of this blatant exploitation, the average income is one to two dollars a day. This income cannot provide subsistence for a family, even in the Third World.

Other poor conditions include bad lighting, back problems due to bending over sewing machines, and random pregnancy tests that could result in the dismissal of women workers. All of these conditions lead to a life of poverty for the maquila workers.

The question we raise from this experience is how the United States firms and government fit into this scheme of exploitation. The United States government (i.e. George Bush) claims that the U. S. must take on the role of a "world leader." If this claim is to be justified, the U. S. government and other First World governments must take responsibility for the exploitative policies of their transnational companies in the Third World.

This should be the case even if the domestic government (i.e. Guatemala) does not enforce its own labor laws. This policy should be implemented internationally, so that exploitative policies by transnational companies can be eradicated in all of the Third World. If the U.S. claims to be a "world leader," it must be the initiator of justice in every region of the globe, not just within its own borders. This is the only way that real change can be assured.

Jan Plan end brings relief yet sadness

BY ROGER TARPY
PROFESSOR OF PSYCHOLOGY AND FORMER JAN PLAN DIRECTOR

"This is the way the [January Program] ends
Not with a bang but a whimper."

With apologies to T. S. Eliot, these words pretty much characterize the final chapter of the January Program, which, for the past few generations of undergraduates, has been one of Bucknell's most interesting and controversial educational ventures. Many of us bid farewell to this program with a mixture of relief and sadness—relief because we can now get on with better ideas but sadness because we have lost a unique tradition. It is with this ambivalence that I offer my thoughts on the program and my personal hopes for the future.

Let me first argue a conciliatory point—educational programs are supposed to fail, at least eventually. The greatest impact of any educational program occurs early on, when the enthusiasm and energy are high, and when the ideas that created the program are fresh and resonant. But times change. Responsibilities gradually shift. Programs that once seemed exciting become routine and stale. This natural attrition is not the fault of any single group of people, nor does it reflect a lack of caring or integrity. It simply happens.

Moreover, we probably should celebrate this fact, because when a program has run its course, we have an opportunity to engage in a self-reflective process that can be both invigorating and productive. This is precisely how an institution grows and accommodates to a changing world.

But is the end of the January Program a cause for such celebration? Has a new and better program, about which the faculty and student body are excited, showed the tired and flawed Jan Plan to the side?

There certainly is some good news in this regard; the widespread neglect of the January Program, by students and especially faculty, has come to an end. To its supporters, let me quickly agree that many students over the years have taken the January Program seriously and have benefited enormously from the experience. And yes, many faculty have consistently provided innovative and challenging educational opportunities for their students. But the larger message, at least recently, has been quite the opposite; the majority of faculty and students did not participate, and many of those who did, participated in what might euphemistically be called a "limited manner." In the final analysis then, the overall benefits of the Jan Plan simply have not justified the continuing high costs—a shortened summer vacation during which many students must earn money, a lost opportunity for an educational program that would better serve the ideals on which the January Program was originally based, and so forth.

The loss of the January Program brings some decidedly bad news, however. The educational ideals that were embodied by the Jan Plan, ideals in which Bucknell could rightly take pride, are no longer well served even by the new General Education program. Why? Because the January Program included activities that, almost by definition, cannot be done in the context of the regular curriculum. Here's what the Jan Plan was all about: "Voluntary participation; explore unfamiliar topics; serve

Troops don't fit in Somalia

BY BRIAN P. ELLIOTT

My feeling as a U. S. Army R. O. T. C. Cadet is that humanitarian missions like the one in Somalia should be left up to some other organization better suited for the job. If such an organization does not exist, then one should be formed to save the military from handling jobs for which it is not suited.

Humanitarian missions...should be left up to some other organization better suited for the job.

United States troops have been in Somalia for some time now, conducting a humanitarian mission for the first time in the history of the armed forces. I think that this is a precedent setter and will not be the last such operation that the U. S. undertakes.

I have no quarrel with the relief effort itself and the humanitarianism for which it stands. I do, however, feel that it is not the place of the armed forces to be food deliverers who risk being shot at. I do not think that it is appropriate to ask men to die, or to ask a mother to give up her son in an operation for which he was not trained.

The military was originally established to defend our shores against hostile invaders. Later, we felt that it was appropriate to help foreign governments defend against hostile invaders which they themselves could not defend against. Now we are asking the military to deliver food, and help people, but these people are without a government or infrastructure of any kind. In order to truly help the people of Somalia, we would have to take it completely upon ourselves to rebuild the entire country.

Again, I want to make it clear that I am not against the relief effort in Somalia. I am against the armed forces being sucked into an operation for which it was not originally intended.

The units that were sent to Somalia also pose an interesting question as to how well

CHAIRDANCING, COCKY DOODY, AND THE STRUCTURE OF THE UNIVERSE

The bald-headed bouncer was big and thick and remarkably sincere. As we shivered in the Georgetown alley, debating the absurdity of the bar's inflated cover charge, he shared with us his deepest, most profound secrets. "Damn! I used to DO dat shit!" he exclaimed, leering at something behind us. "And I am telling you right here, right now dat it was some GOOD shit too." Less confused by his excremental metaphor than, perhaps, we should have been, we swiveled to see a peroxide gob of purple eyeshadow clinging adoringly to a bulging "Atlas Gym" tank top. Fully absorbed in the task of polishing Atlas Gym man's ear with her tongue, Ms. Eyeshadow completely ignored our friendly bouncer as she passed.

"God DAMN," he philosophized, bringing a beefy hand up to scratch his own dry ear, "Why'd she connect with dat mo'?" And since neither I nor my friends could think of an appropriately ignated duty as a pack of males was not to smile or laugh or even attempt to communicate. All we were supposed to do was sit. And drink.

Our designated duty as a pack of males was not to smile or laugh or even attempt to communicate. All we were supposed to do was sit. And drink.

Actually, that's not completely true. There are certain communicative subtleties for drinking men sitting in a bar: a grunt and a wave of the hand means that someone should bring you more beer. A grunt and a rolling of the eyes means that the person bringing you more beer is wearing a low cut top. Two grunts and a lifting of both hands in an "I surrender" gesture means that the person bringing you more beer and wearing a low cut top has just smacked your hands away and called you a "total jerk."

Yet, despite the slurping, leering, grunting, and groping nature of our initiation into manhood, there were still times when the musical beauty of our delicate inner souls rang forth, surpassing the boundaries of mundane expression. This artistic breakthrough would usually occur during a particularly inspiring "booma boom boom" or "zoom zoom zoom" or a sharply syncopated drum fill. At this point, at least one of us would bob his head in a vaguely rhythmic fashion while lifting and releasing his shoulders. If the drum beat was particularly catchy, he might even bite his lower lip and swivel his torso in semi-synchronization with the bobbing head. It was chairdancing at its masculine best.

And for a few comical seconds, I think I actually thought I looked cool. Then I glanced around and noticed the other packs of males. They were echoing my movements with almost ritualistic precision. Five, six, seven, eight...bite lip, swivel hips, twist, bob, drink, nod, grunt, grunt, drink, wave, leer, rinse, repeat, and chug...and five, six, seven eight...

Some of the chairdancers were more adept than others. Added to the normal repertoire of bobbing and biting, these prima chairdancerias would clench their jaw, shift their elbows, and lip synch or even shout out a couple of the "boom boom booms." These bellowing outbursts were usually proceeded by enthusiastic high-fives and general excitement—as if the particular bellower had just performed some very difficult surgery, or balanced the budget, or said something extremely

Spirit of Black History Month must not fade

Black history month is well under way—the programs have been successful and attended by several Bucknellians. Only two more weeks left in the month and then we can all forget about black history until next year.

Yes, the programs will continue, but at a much more staggered rate. But the programming, albeit effective, is only one aspect of the issue of race relations on campus. Every Bucknell student confronts his own natural prejudices and insecurity, as well as those of peers, on a daily basis. Some of us might not think that this is the case, but acknowledging that the issue exists for each one of us is the first step in improving the racial climate on campus. This more subtle aspect of Black History Month, must never die.

The campus community should take this month of positive programming to reflect on the larger issue of tolerance and acceptance on campus. Open campus-wide programs have only a limited effect upon this end. The university should coordinate a sustained effort to bring people together to honestly and sincerely discuss prejudice—be it in the form of residence hall groups, Greek organizations, etc...

On its face this sounds like just another programming idea. And it will be unless we can all learn to do one thing: confront the issue of race honestly.

Bucknell does not have the most diverse campus in the world by any means. Nor, does it necessarily draw from the most open-minded and accepting students. There is nothing inherently wrong with this lack of diversity if the university is honest about it, and makes a sincere effort to facilitate understanding.

Of course, this takes more than just a willing administration, it demands a willing, courageous, and honest student body. The way that we talk about racial issues now is guarded, "correct," and in a word, untruthful.

Students are generally expected to be understanding about racial issues. We know this, and most of us talk the talk when we have to. Those who do not are ostracized as bigots.

The fact of the matter is that most students who come here have racial prejudices, be they black or white. To condemn individuals who admit to their prejudices does not solve anythging.

Imagine what would happen if a student spoke honestly and sincerely about his own prejudice against blacks. He might say that he feels uncomfortable around blacks, or even that he engages in racial slurs behind closed doors. At this point in the conversation, the high and mighty among us would no doubt inform the person of how evil he is and tell all of their friends about the bigot on the hall.

A few of us, however, might acknowledge that we have, from time to time, felt the same. It would be far more effective to forego our moral condemnation and instead commend the student for his courage in confronting his fears and prejudices. It is at this level that understanding and attitudinal change begins.

The dialogue on racial issues has not reached this level on campus, or anywhere in the country for that matter. It takes courage not only on the part of an individual, but also on the part of a university to admit that all is not perfect in terms of racial relations. This campus does have underlying problems with race relations, just like the rest of the world. It is not a bad place because of that. However, such openness prevents the problem from festering and is the only effective way to deal with racial issues on campus.

The best way that we, as a campus community, can commemorate Black History Month is to commit to bring the issue to every individual while at the same time placing honesty and sincerity above sounding right.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Professor thanks volunteers

TO THE EDITOR:

On Sunday, Oct. 18th, approximately 100 people participated in Lewisburg's 1992 Crop Walk. As a member of the Crop Walk Planning Committee, I would personally like to thank the Sisters and Brothers of the following Greek organizations for their active involvement and substantial contributions:

Kappa Delta Rho — Delta Gamma — FIJI
Delta Delta Delta — Pi Beta Phi — Kappa Kappa Gamma

I would also like to thank Lisa Duggan, Kylie Eisensmith, and Karen Rockwell for their generous gifts. In addition to creating goodwill between the community and the University, the exceptional efforts of these caring Bucknellians helped us raise nearly $7,000. Ninety percent of this amount was shared by partner relief agencies in more than 70 countries. The remaining ten percent was donated to the Lewisburg food bank.

Once again, I thank you for all you have done, and I look forward to seeing all of you in Crop Walk 1993!

Sincerely,

MARK S. BETTNER

Stop burning styrofoam!

TO THE EDITOR:

As a member of Bucknell's cycling team, I log over 2,000 miles per year on the roads surrounding Bucknell. I find the citizens of this area hypocrites for objecting to the USPCI burner in Allenwood. Almost every day, I ride by some smoldering pile of garbage that some citizen has in his or her backyard. Often, his or her children are playing next to it. Riding by on the street, the smoke burns my lungs; I can hardly imagine what damage the children are sustaining, not to mention the environment. Modern hazardous waste burners are made to emit a minimal pollution. The engineers that design them have an ethical and financial responsibility to minimize the damage to the environment. It would be unprofitable for USPCI to build a burner that would earn them billions in lawsuits 20 years down the road. I think the citizens of this area should stop burning their piles of styrofoam before they start complaining about a minimal worsening of general air quality.

Gays should follow the current policies

Walsh argues for the status quo on military issue

BY DAVID WALSH

Over recent weeks, the liberal left in America has become increasingly vocal in their quest to lift the ban that currently exists on gays and lesbians in the United States military. Their new messiah, Bill Clinton, in an effort to salvage his campaign promise to lift the ban, recently helped pass legislation that no longer requires applicants to indicate their sexual preference on any application forms.

But while these events may have caused our President to claim a minor victory, and indeed made for some wonderfully inflammatory headlines in the newspapers, one can only wonder, in light of all this, if anyone has a grasp on what the issue at hand really is. For if this ban is actually lifted, the United States military may be thrown into a state of chaos from which it may never recover.

Before addressing this matter directly, it is necessary to examine certain undeniable realities. First and foremost, the military does not, nor has it ever, followed the same rules as society. It is a completely separate entity, and exists at its most simplistic and basic level, to kill people and destroy everything the enemy has. It is not a societal laboratory to be tampered with by civil rights activists with an agenda.

In order to operate as it should, the military must enforce discipline, and in essence, create single-minded, professional killers. Sexuality of any kind has absolutely no place in this equation, for it is simply a distraction to the job at hand.

To understand this fully, one has only to look up military regulations concerning the subject of sexuality (as Time magazine did in its Feb. 8 issue). Officers are not permitted to fraternize with enlisted soldiers. Sexual intercourse is expressly prohibited under any circumstances, save for married couples in separate living quarters. Any other form of sexual contact (anal and oral sex, which are the only types of sex homosexuals and lesbians can have, basically) is prohibited anytime, anywhere, by anybody.

This may sound harsh and inhuman, but so is war, and that is what the military was designed to do: fight wars. That is why someone like Bill Clinton is simply not qualified to make a judgment on this issue. Because he, like the majority of Americans, has never been in the military.

One must realize that this situation is unique in society today. Since most people cannot relate it to everyday life, they can never fully understand every aspect of it.

The issue then, is not about gays in the military; it is about sexuality in the military.

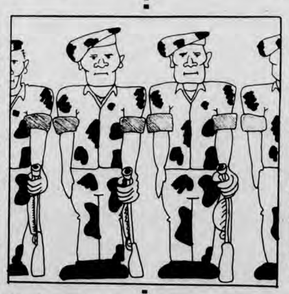
Those big guns are too heavy anyway

Stern speaks for average Americans

BY JEFF STERN



In 1863, the first black army regiment fought its first battle in the Civil War. It was a proud day for not only black America, but all America. It represented a major stride toward racial equality in the United States.

Now, in 1993, we are on the threshold of making one of the largest mistakes in military history, a mistake that is as wrong as the decision to let blacks fight was right. Gays do not belong in the military.

For upwards of 200 years, our military has carried on a fine tradition of maintaining only the highest quality, best fit, and most qualified people to live up to the title "American" soldiers in the country. This is an exclusive club we're talking about here. And why shouldn't it be?

I am not in any way suggesting that homosexuals are less patriotic than are heterosexuals. But, when you're out there on the front line, fearing for your life, the last thing you want is some guy admiring what a nice ass you have.

The real problems with allowing gays into the military are all the unnecessary adjustments that are going to have to be made, adjustments that will prove detrimental to combat procedure. The list is endless.

It starts at the bottom with little things like the normal guys having to watch their backs when they say words like "faggot" or "pussy." It is very important for soldiers to have some outlet for the tremendous stress they endure. Depriving them of the right to tell faggot jokes and watch their mouths at all times turns a time-honored stress reliever into one more thing they have to stay on their toes about. Try it yourself. It's not as easy as you might think to resist exercising your natural dominance over those who are different, especially in times of high stress.

Then there's the problem of homo relationships coming into or actually being formed in the service. A soldier is a fighting machine. He or she is made of steel and must be completely devoid of emotions like love and mercy when engaged in combat. How can lovers on the battlefield be trusted to keep their country's safety in higher priority than their lover's life? There is no way. Human emotions are fine and necessary in movies and greeting cards, but they have never had a place in the military.

The most damaging aspect of allowing queers into the military is the pure physical abuse that they will be subject to. Faggots and dykes are in danger much of the time in the outside world. We cannot possibly expect them to be treated any differently in the armed

Native Americans must not be forgotten

BY JONATHAN MALEY

I want to remind the students of Bucknell that there are Native Americans out there (in the real world). If Chief Lyons or Joy Harjo were not eye-opening, let me do what I can.

This January a few Bucknell students and I volunteered as teachers' aides at a government school on the Navajo Nation Indian reservation in Arizona. To speak for myself, it was one hell of an experience.

The school is a boarding school, where we stayed in the dorms with the children. I would date the school, and more specifically the dorms, at about the mid 1950's. The dorms were very hot. Most of the thermostats were set at 75-80 degrees. We had problems figuring this out, but I was able to befriend a janitor, and we lowered the heat. The dorms were well equipped with towels, blankets, and pillows, but other than that, they were pretty bare.

Approximately 30% of all Native Americans live at or below the poverty level, and approximately 30% are alcoholics.

The most wanting fact that I noticed in the dorms was the complete lack of stimulation. When we first arrived and foolishly sat in the TV room (the kids are allowed to watch an hour of TV a day), we were attacked by children. They took about three minutes of cautious sniffing around, moving closer all of the time, before pouncing on us. From that day on, we were fair game for anything that we did not do behind closed doors. I have never seen such a consistently large and intent audience for a game of spades in my life.

The dorms situation was bad, but there is worse. Concerning the teachers, we encountered both good and bad. It saddens me to say that I counted more negative ones than ones who really cared for their students, but the those teachers that attempted to positively impact their students made up for it.

This situation is not unique, and because it is such a basic problem at all schools, it would be in vain to relate it to you in any hope of solving it.

There are a lot of Native Americans in North America. I have heard a figure of 1.9 million currently, while there were 9.8 million in 1492. Native Americans all either belong to or came from tribes. The largest tribe, according to U. S. News and World Report, is the Cherokee. Approximately 30% of all Native Americans live at or below the poverty level, and approximately 30% are alcoholics. The area in the U. S. with the lowest standard of living (as of research taken some time in the mid 1980's) is the Oglala Sioux reservation in Pine Ridge, South Dakota.

These are some very basic facts. They say very little about Native Americans. I can say very little about Native Americans. The reason that I am saying this at all is because I think that most of the people at Bucknell know (or maybe even care) very little about Native Americans. This is not wrong, and I do not mean to blame anyone.

What I want to do is offer an idea to those of you who are reading this. The idea is education. As we have seen more and more attention brought to issues like racial strife, the injustices of the rich and poor, and the dawning realization of homosexuality as something that is not deviant and immoral, there have been worlds of change. Most of this change has been positive, and positive change is what I am attempting to establish (even if nothing more than in the minds of a cherished few at Bucknell).

OK, let's say I've won you over, what next? Read a book. Lame Deer, Seeker of Visions by John Fire Lame Deer and Black Elk Speaks by Black Elk and Richard Neihardt are two that I recommend. Our library has a lot of interesting books to look through. See a movie. Dances With Wolves is a start, as is Thunderheart, but Powwow Highway and An Incident at Oglala offer more redeeming and less sugar-coated entertainment. Talk to John Grim (a Crow Indian) or Sid Jamieson (from the Mohawk Nation). Take some of Professor Grim's courses. Open your mind. Thanks for your time.

And this has been repressed in military institutions since the dawn of time (look up the word Spartan in the dictionary, for example). There is no doubt the military would have banned heterosexual behavior long ago if 90% of the population didn't engage in it.

The military is not Bucknell, it is not Lewisburg, and it is not the town or city where anyone reading this article came from. Those who support the crusade of Bill Clinton and others like him are simply missing this fundamental truth about the military, and are failing to see that the ban on homosexuality is not an isolated case of discrimination, but part of a larger ban on sexuality in general. It is a ban deemed necessary by the military to serve its ultimate purpose: to fight wars more effectively and defend this nation.

Who is Bill Clinton, or a writer for The Bucknellian, or anyone else to tell people who have made it their life to study the military how to do their job? That is why the ban must be kept and the status quo maintained.

The bottom line is that yes, anyone who wishes to serve in the military should be able to do so, but only if they are prepared to adhere to the military's policies on sexuality (which include the avoidance of homosexuality). Every person who enlists knows that the military restricts sexuality in all its forms, or else they have been severely misled by their recruiter.

Joining the military should be, first and foremost, an act of patriotism and service to your country, not a political statement. Anyone who sees the military as an arena for revolutionizing the sexual ideology of society is simply missing the point.

SOMALIA

the troops could possibly be trained to conduct such an operation. Being an Army Cadet, I do not know very much about the Marines that were sent, but I do know that the troops who were sent from Fort Drum, seem to be way out of their normal realm of operations. The unit which is stationed at Ft. Drum is a light infantry division which is trained for, and would normally be deployed to, some sort of northern climate.

It just does not seem right to me that troops should be used for an operation which is completely different from the missions for which they have been training. Some might argue that the military must look for a new purpose because the number of serious threats to our national security seems to be rapidly decreasing. I know that some critics of defense spending had similar sentiments after the collapse of the Soviet Union. It would seem that Saddam Hussein should have quickly silenced those that felt the military no longer had a place in our society.

The armed forces should be used to conduct further such humanitarian type efforts until some other sort of organization can take responsibility. The military should be allowed to continue its proud tradition of defending our country.

Our soldiers are being trained to fight against the enemy, should it ever be necessary again. I think that we should let them concentrate on the job for which they were originally intended.

CHAIRDANCING

witty. Something that Winston Churchill might have said. Something like, "I maybe a (burp) total jerk, but youra ugly (longer burp) bitch, and at least in the morning I'll be (extremely long burp)."

Then they'd go back to chairdancing in a manner that suggested either an extremely rewarding or highly frustrating bowel movement.

And as I watched them bob and burp, grove and grope, flex and clench, the archetypal truth came flooding forth. It was right there, right then, that the ubiquitous GOODNESS of this grand parallel between masculine dance and number two, between male self-expression and cocky doody, between art and excrement plunged into my consciousness. "God DAMN," I philosophized, "we are ALL connected."

It was a tribal, magical thought that seemed to snowball into cosmic understanding. We young men, together in that Jung bar, had surpassed the inherent limitations of everyday language: the zooms, the booms, the God damns, the shits...none of them were really necessary. Our shared consciousness, a consciousness constructed from a universal need to drink, dance, and release our waste, was of a higher ilk. So what if we did not smile or laugh together? Our bond was a most serious one. Our world was a stage, displaying the timeless paradigms of love, art, and bran cereal. Together we were all one man!!! Together we drank, together we danced, together we flushed. We were all brothers in this fraternity of life.

Then, after a few more quaffs of Bud Dry, the full philosophical impact hit me: man and the universe exist together as one unified work of art. We are connected in the same manner as Macbeth and Duncan, as Iago and Othello, as Claudius and Hamlet. We, the men of the galaxy, are all part of one brilliantly composed play watched by God.

Or perhaps we are not a play, but actually a novel—the kind of novel that God could buy at a cosmic grocery store. The kind of novel which God might be embarrassed to admit that he reads. Perhaps he smuggles us into the john with him after a large meal. And there he sits, marveling at the crass, violent dialogue and wondering how much longer we can remain a bestseller.

But now it seemed my philosophical intoxication was taking a turn for the worse. Perhaps it was better not to think about these things too much. I was here in this dark place to enjoy myself: to swing my body, to drink my liquids, to release words from my mouth. I forced myself to relax and enjoy the music. "Boom, boom, boom!" I shouted, as the song came to an end.

GUNS

forces. People are people. Whether they're on the inside barracks or working at a grocery store, normal, average, everyday American people are going to repress, abuse, and, in extreme cases, cause serious physical damage to fruits of every variety. Prejudice sees no color. Society's injustices are something that we learn to accept.

I do not mean to propagate these thoughts, I am simply speaking for the average American.

In America today, we have racism, sexism—every type of "ism" you can imagine. Of course it is wrong to hate people because of their sex or their color. These boundaries have been thankfully shattered in the military, and acceptance continues to grow. To hate for basic moral differences on the other hand, is quite a separate topic. Normal people and gays are fundamentally opposite. How can they get along?

The sad truth is that majority rules no matter what. The majority of our society is straight: men are attracted to women and vice versa. Maybe on some screwed-up planet somewhere, the majority of people are queer. This is not true on Earth. We are a normal planet. Majority will always rule over the minority.

To take this a step further, it is accurate to say that people never really change. Styles and leaders and ideas come and go, but people's basic attitudes remain. We have survived for this long without having to change our attitudes. I see no reason why we should start now just because our president is a faggot sympathizer. My god, what would happen if people could change to accept others?

Our military is, for all intensive purposes, a reflection of our society. In our society, homos are often outcasts and misfits, different from the rest. Until this changes, we cannot expect our military to change, and we have already established that change is utterly impossible.

My advice to homos of all kinds is to suck it up and be happy that you don't have to be out there on the front lines. You're lucky. You should be grateful that you were born all messed up inside. At least you won't have to get messed up even more by having a bullet inside you. Those big guns are too heavy for you guys anyway. Just be actors or something.

The bottom line here is that allowing gays into the military is not fair. It's not fair for the soldiers, men and women, in our armed forces, and it's not fair for the citizens of the country that they protect.

as an intern; work off campus; investigate possible careers; take a cultural trip; broaden one's perspectives; whet one's intellectual appetite; do something creative or experimental. All done for neither course credit nor grades." I would argue that, despite the rhetoric, the General Education program is unlikely to fill the void left by the demise of the Jan Plan. The General Education program will, of course, achieve worthwhile goals, but compared to the Jan Plan, capstone and critical thinking seminars are "business as usual." This is not a criticism of the General Education program. That program simply was never designed to feature the kinds of activities that the January Program did well, or at least aspired to do well.

If faculty and students have the creative energy to offer highly distinctive and unconventional programs, as they obviously do, then why shouldn't we simply continue doing Jan Plans even with the General Education program in place? The answer is that without reform, the January Program, as practiced recently, cannot work. Programs need incentives to be successful, certainly over the long run. It would be wonderful if merely doing a Jan Plan had been sufficient reward but, unfortunately, for most people this was not the case. To insure success, then, future "January" programs must retain the innovative character of the old Jan Plan, but also must be seen as an important part of the educational program for all students and all faculty. And to accomplish that, both must be given credit for taking it

Students spend Jan Plan fighting injustice

Seventeen Bucknellians traveled to Guatemala during January to learn about the ongoing human rights crisis in the country

BY COLLEEN RUSH
Bucknellian Staff Writer

As the semester progresses, those last flashes of January begin to dwindle, and the reality of yet another period of grueling work hits home. While some students may be reflecting on their last "January Experience" as a time spent appreciating, yet mourning the loss of the Jan Plan, 17 Bucknellians changed the world as a result of their two weeklong trek to Guatemala over January.

The Bucknellians, in conjunction with Witness for Peace, a Washington-based organization, traveled to Guatemala with Chaplain Alison Boden to study the human rights situation and U.S. foreign policy in the country. The students met with various organizations, ranging from wealthy landowners to peasant groups, during their expedition.

The students, after their return home, were encouraged to write to legislators, newspapers, and other media sources to inform them of their discoveries in Guatemala. The desired results of the trip will be changes in U.S. foreign policy and an overall increased awareness of the situation in Guatemala.

To listen, to learn, and to educate others were the main objectives of the trip, according to Boden. "The trip was also about understanding what it means to be a world citizen," she said.

"The idea," said Mike O'Heaney '95, "is that when we come back, we'll have a better feel for what the real situation is like down there (in Guatemala). Things that you read in newspapers and from the State Department or government are usually skewed information. We're drawing our own conclusions, instead of having them drawn for us by the media."

The trip, as it turned out, was a sensitive and eye-opening experience for many of the students. Though a training session was held to prepare the students for what they would see and hear, no one was fully prepared for the shocking experience.

"We met with a lot of sensitive organizations in the country. We had to be careful about everything we said because when you get a group of 20 'gringos,' as we were affectionately called, people are always listening," said O'Heaney.

The human rights "situation" in Guatemala was worse than expected. Most of the students came back with their own stories of disbelief at the poverty and lack of rights in the country. The conditions in marginal communities, or shanty towns, was one of the most shocking sights.

For Brooke Stutzman '95, it was seeing a filthy child playing in her soiled, make-shift diaper. "It was so shocking to see that much uncleanness," said Stutzman, "and the parents did not seem to care enough to make her stop doing it."

Beth Morilla '95 agreed, noting that one of the hardest parts about the trip was facing the destitute youngsters of the marginal areas. "Seeing the bloated bellies from malnutrition and the absolute poverty was the worst. I couldn't become hardened to the fact," said Morilla.

O'Heaney, relating his experience with the poverty-stricken children, said, "There were kids coming up to us at restaurants and asking for our chicken bones. You can read about it in books, but when you actually see the poverty and have little kids hugging your legs, it becomes an emotionally draining experience."

The students agreed that perhaps the most difficult factor to overcome was the seemingly unemotional and detached manner that many of the persecuted citizens of Guatemala seemed to possess. The Guatemalans related with little or no emotion stories of loved ones being gunned down in broad daylight.

"These people [the Guatemalans] tell you these horrible stories of death, but they are so hardened because it is their reality," said O'Heaney. "They show no real emotion and they are very matter-of-fact about the whole thing. It's a very sad situation."

Despite the poverty, lack of rights, and continued persecution from the government, Guatemalans are optimistic about the future. The social and political changes, however slow, and the increasing awareness and concern about human rights are reasons enough for hope.

According to the students, much of the optimism is due to one Guatemalan woman who singlehandedly increased awareness about the poor state of human rights in the country. Rigoberta Menchu, a member of the indigenous Quiche tribe, wrote a personal account about her experiences in Guatemala, including the deaths of her mother and father. In November, Menchu was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize for her book, I, Rigoberta Menchu.

Mike O'Heaney visits with a group of Guatemalan children in Santiago Atitlan, Guatemala. The village is one of the many marginal communities, or shanty towns, scattered around the country.

The students also noted that the mere presence of concerned U.S. citizens was cause for optimism in the country. "Having an international presence like ours with some of the groups that we met with gives them a little more protection. If the government knows that we're meeting with these people and interested in their welfare, then it is less likely that the government will continue violating human rights," said O'Heaney.

Though optimism among Guatemalans was high, many of the students had reason to lose a little faith after a meeting with the U.S. Embassy in Guatemala City. Before the meeting, students were told that anything said by an ambassador during the session was not to be quoted or published because of an incident several years before. The incident occurred when a member of a Witness for Peace delegation returned to the U.S. and repeated verbatim a disturbing conversation held with a U.S. ambassador in the Embassy.

After the meeting, students said they were not surprised that the conversations were strictly off the record. Several students commented that the experience was embarrassing and disheartening because of the statements and attitudes of an ambassador. O'Heaney described the general attitude of the conversation, saying, "His (the ambassador's) tone was really a slap on the back and a wink, saying, 'Hey, we're Americans. We understand that we're well off because we have people like Guatemalans working for us.'"

Despite the tense feelings toward the U.S. government, Guatemalans were receptive of the students. According to Morilla, one man in the embassy summed up the feelings of Guatemalans, by saying, "The U.S. government is our #1 enemy, but the people are our #1 friends."

O'Heaney explained the Guatemalan sentiment toward Americans, saying, "Guatemalans have every reason to hate people in the U.S., but because they have no role in their government, they don't associate Americans with the U.S. government. Everyone we met with knew we were trying to influence U.S. foreign policy, so we were well received. They were really pleased to know that there were students interested in their situation, and that they got to tell their side of the story."

For most of the students, defending the U.S. was not an issue after witnessing first-hand the deplorable conditions in the country. Morilla summed up her sentiment, saying, "I found myself ashamed a lot, mainly because of the indirect exploitation due to our lack of awareness and understanding of the situation."

Immediate solutions to the human rights crisis in Guatemala are few. Throwing money at the problem seems to be the most called upon, but least effective remedy thus far. Morilla believed that, to some extent, monetary relief was a "cop-out, because people are emptying their pockets to empty themselves of guilt instead of dealing with the real problems."

John Stith '95 took the initiative to contact the local TV station in his hometown, WPSX TV 3, and inform it of his discoveries in Guatemala. As a result, Stith will be a guest on "Taking Note," a 15 minute interview show by the TV station. The airing date has not been set, and Lewisburg does not receive the channel on which the interview will be aired.

The wheels of change are already turning at Bucknell. On Sunday, Feb. 7, a mass was held in Rooke Chapel to commemorate the Guatemalans who are struggling for their rights. The first collection of the mass went to Upadim, a small group of Guatemalan women who promote health and sanitation in a marginal community of 5,000.

Stith also spoke at the mass, hoping that his experiences in Guatemala would make more people aware of the situation. "I spoke about every person's struggle for peace. In Guatemala, the people struggle with poverty, hunger, decreasing educational opportunities, and the military. In the U.S., we struggle with a lack of peace in our inner lives and don't follow our consciences because we are too unable to focus on people other than ourselves. If we band together, one's problems become another's solutions," said Stith.

Enjoy the subtle ambiance of Morrone's

BY MITCH GOLDMAN AND ANDREW COHEN
Buckenllian Staff Writers

Our trip to Morrone's Lounge and Steakhouse did not start on the best of notes. After reserving a table with a difficult hostess, we drove 25 minutes up Route 15 to South Williamsport, arriving a half-hour early hoping to be seated. The bad news was that we waited almost the entire time; the good news—at least what we hoped was the good news—was that we had to wait because the restaurant was packed, meaning the food must be good.

While waiting, we enjoyed pretzels at the bar which were not too salty and only slightly over-buttered. We soaked up the warm atmosphere as well. Many conversations were taking place as the fireplace warmed the crowded yet friendly and upbeat restaurant.

After perusing the menu, we again found good and bad news. The good news was that the pleasure of each other's company was so pleasing that neither of us felt the need to order from the wine list where half-liters sold for $9.50 and bottles were priced between $17 and $48. The bad news, for Andrew at least, was that he could count the number of vegetarian entrees on one hand.

After perusing the list of entrees which ran from $8 to $20, Andrew settled on the Fettuccini Alfredo ($9.95) while Mitch set to devour the New York Strip ($13.95).

Although we were still a little miffed at the hostess from the phone, our attitude changed after one taste of our respective appetizers. Mitch's Clam's Casino ($4.95) was plentiful and plenty tasty. Andrew's French Onion Soup ($1.50) was heavenly. The plethora of croutons absorbed much of the flavor of the soup, and still packed a delicious crunch. Andrew's comment on the soup turned out to be the rule with all of our food: temperature is key— the soup was hot, but not too hot. It was the perfect temperature.

Our salads, which were included with our entrees, got the job done. The greens were fresh and the dressing ample, but it did not drown the salad.

As our entrees arrived we began to feel the pretzels and our appetizers setting in our stomachs, but we trudged on, as all troopers must. Mitch tore at his steak in the fashion that lions tear at the flesh of a newly-killed gazelle. In between his carnivorous bites, one could barely make out the word, "Dillicious."

Andrew thought the same about his fettuccini, but found himself in the unheard-of position of being unable to finish it, since its richness grew on him with every bite. "Too many goddamned pretzels," he thought.

The unsung hero of the meal, however, was Andrew's order of fries ($1). The portion was a bit small, but that seemed appropriate in the grand scheme of things. Such a jewel should not be served in abundance.

After explaining that he could not finish his entree, Andrew decided that dessert was nonetheless appropriate. The peanut butter pie ($2.50) was, we think, delicious. However, neither of us had enough stomach room to enjoy it fully.

We ended the meal, as we would suggest some dapper Bucknellians might do on a first or second date, with two delightful cups of espresso ($1.50).

A perspective on learning self-defense

BY COLLEEN RUSH
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Ahh . . . self-defense. The very thought provokes images of old Bruce Lee movies and the Karate Kid Part (fill in the blank). I, like any other law-abiding citizen, have longed to participate in one of those life and death situations with "the bad guy" that calls for 100% pure adrenaline-induced strength and an idiotic amount of luck to succeed. Given the chance, who wouldn't want to pummel a would-be aggressor with the grace and suave of Jean-Claude Van Damme?

However, lacking the coordination, nerve, and knowledge that it would actually take to fulfill my desire, I resigned myself to a bottle of mace, a whistle that would wake the dead with the slightest puff of air, and the number of Public Safety carved into the palm of my hand for those inevitable late-night wanderings.

Alas, my wishes were granted when the Women's Resource Center announced that "martial arts experts" were coming to Bucknell to educate women in the area of self-defense. Two hours of training and preparation in self-defense, and I knew I would be a serious threat to Mr. Lee and his karate-chopping counterparts.

"Sign me up," I boldly demanded, knowing that if nothing else, my height (6'1"), a previous childhood wrought with beatings from four older siblings, and a natural southern toughness backed up my otherwise non-existent repertoire of self-defense techniques. I practiced my ear-splitting "hiiii-ya"'s and rough, psychotic looks in the mirror in anticipation of, and preparation for, my two hours of blood, sweat, and tears.

On Saturday, when I found myself wearily trudging towards Davis Gym in a new snowfall and wind that gives you an "ice-cream headache" when you inhale, I reassured myself with oh-so naive thoughts of body-slamming enormous attackers and cliché, meathead sayings like, "No guts, no glory!"

Confidence hanging in mid-air, I approached the gym. Little by little, the boldness of which I once bragged diminished when I realized that the first and last time I had ever entered the confines of the gym was freshman year at (Say, didn't we meet at . . .) Playfair. I could actually hear the atrophied muscles in my body screaming in fear, warning me not to enter the forbidden zone of (gasp) sweat, work, and exercise.

Disregarding my body's adamant demands to bolt, I entered the wrestling room and soon found myself among throngs of other females with the same facade of spunk and fierceness in their eyes that I knew I had in mine. I took my seat on the padded floor and allowed the electric aura of the crowd to catalyze my hesitantly awakening body.

When the professor of bodily damage entered the room, garbed in all black attire, an intimidated hush fell over the anxious crowd. She proceeded to pass around a waiver that absolved her and anyone affiliated with the class of responsibility for any accidents that might occur.

As the waiver made its way around the room, my body reminded me that this was my last chance to run. No signature, no self-defense class.

I was plotting a quick escape when a quote plastered on the wall caught my eye. "Cowards die many deaths . . . but the Brave only die once." I reassured myself that I'm no coward, but either way, like the quote says, I'm going to die.

As the thought passed, out of nowhere the brave chug-chug-chugging sound of the Little Engine That Could hit me. I think I can, I think I can, I think I can . . . I hope I can, I hope I can.

Formalities and warm-up exercises finished, the class began on a somewhat familiar note. We were going to learn how to fall, our mentor of mutilation told us. I've spent the better part of 19 years perfecting the art of falling down. Piece of cake.

Never before had I thought that there was a "right" way to fall. I soon learned that flailing arms and spastic efforts to catch oneself was not the correct way to fall. Rather, I was taught to flow with the fall, making sure that my forearms and not my headcaught the brunt of the impact. Sensible enough.

What followed the first lesson was a series of pointers on how to kick without breaking toes, how to punch without breaking fingers, and how to let the attacker know that he is not dealing with, in the immortal words of my overly-competitive sister, a "fraidy-cat." She also reiterated the inevitable lesson, the one our brothers, fathers, and other male acquaintances have impressed into our minds: "Hit where it hurts! Hit where it hurts!"

Much to my ego's disappointment, the lessons were more along the lines of wound and escape than brutalize and maim. Should an attacker attempt to grab, shove, strangle, or bear hug me, my efforts to defend would consist of a sharp blow to the chin, shin, or groin area, a primeval scream, and a wind sprint that would impress Jackie Joyner-Kersee.

Unfortunately, if someone were to attack me a day or so after the class, the aching, stiff, sore muscles that warned me in the first place would merely laugh. Unable to move a limb without a flash of pain in some part of my body days after the class, I've come to the realization that self-defense is all guts and no glory. Pain and a whiff of reality have cured this pseudo-lethal weapon of all beliefs that self-defense is a quick and easy power-trip for the brute at heart.

A sweetheartless Valentine's Day

BY KATE FINK
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Remember in grade school when you got valentines from everyone in the class? You stuffed the cellophane-thin Snoopy- and Garfield- shaped cards into those tiny envelopes that didn't seal very well, always sure to sign them "From:" so that the boys would not think that you actually LOVED them. Later, you would secretly wonder how many of the boys said "From:" even though they were burning to write "Love" but didn't because the trendy thing was to believe that all girls had cooties. Everyone would wear red, bake valentine cupcakes and cookies, and in the middle of the day everyone had a Valentine party and played spin the bottle for chocolate kisses.

Yes, Valentine's Day used to be fun for everyone. Time and maturity change everything and now many people spend the day sulking, wearing drab green and stomping on the heart-adorned cupcakes. True, it can be nauseating on this day of all days to watch happy-go-lucky couples walking down the road, hand in hand gazing at a giant bouquet of roses. You may even feel the need to perform some mild act of violence on the love-birds staring into one another's eyes at lunch in The Bison, which only on this day seems to be the most romantic lunch ever.

No need to get bitter, though. More people than you would think are spending this Valentine's Day without a significant other. In an unofficial poll, it was determined that out of 24 people, only 12 will be embarking on romantic endeavors come Sunday. That is less than half if you consider that one "valentine" is threatening to road trip this weekend as the ultimate Valentine denial.

So now that you know that you are not in the minority, those without a friend-of-the-opposite-sex-that-is-more-than-a-friend can shed the self-pity with dignity and learn to recognize the potential of this fine day:

◊◊ Get a group of your friends together and go out to a romantic restaurant for dinner. Stare at the mushy couples and make up a script of what they could be saying to each other.

◊◊ Pick a bouquet of weeds from your neighbor's yard and spray paint them red. Affix a piece of campus junk mail to the make-shift bouquet and you have a pseudo love letter.

◊◊ Call up WVBU and have a song dedicated to yourself.

◊◊ Ask your roommate and significant other if you could accompany them. Volunteer to bring the romantic music and candles.

◊◊ Make a strawberry daiquiri for two and drink it all.

◊◊ Sit at home and cry. Maybe someone will think that it's cute and fall in love with you.

◊◊ Call up a parent and be comforted that at least one person tells you that you'll always be loved.

If these suggestions don't suit your desperate needs on Valentine's Day, there is still the tried-and-true alternative; call up a pal of the same or opposite sex with whom to enjoy the evening. The company of a good friend is sure to send those "I'm alone on Valentine's Day" blues away.

Test the true color of your passion

COLLEEN RUSH AND KRISTINA SCHURR
Bucknellian Staff Writers

How strong are your feelings for the significant other person in your life?

This quiz is designed to help you determine your true level of affection for your significant other (S.O.), as well as identify possible problem areas within the relationship. The answer key denotes the "color" of your passion and indicates your level of interest in the relationship.

1. When you're in your S.O.'s arms, you think about:
   a. Just how wonderful this person is.
   b. Your comfort level with this person.
   c. What you're going to eat for lunch tomorrow.
   d. Someone else.
2. Approximately how many times per day do you think about your S.O.?
   a. 10-20
   b. 6-0
   c. 1-5
   d. Not at all.
   What's the point?
3. If given a free vacation for two in the Bahamas, who would you rather take?
   a. Your significant other
   b. Your best friend
   c. Your mother
   d. Your dog
4. Valentine's Day is approaching. Will your S.O.:
   a. Surprise you with flowers and dinner.
   b. Send a card and/or candy.
   c. Do nothing.
   d. Ask you to wash and wax the car.
5. If your significant other were a car, he or she would be a:
   a. Mustang
   b. Chevrolet Celebrity
   c. VW Bug
   d. Yugo
6. In a past life, your S.O was probably:
   a. Don Juan/Cleopatra
   b. Romeo/Juliet
   c. Ozzie/Harriett
   d. Lassie
7. In heat terms, how would you describe your love-life?
   a. Sizzling
   b. Simmering
   c. Room temperature
   d. The burner's off
8. Do you see your relationship with this person as:
   a. A lifetime commitment
   b. College-only romance
   c. A regular hook-up
   d. A one-night stand
9. Most of the time spent with your S.O. is:
   a. Always alone together
   b. Mostly alone, sometimes with friends
   c. Sometimes alone, mostly with friends
   d. Intoxicated
10. What subject do you argue about the most?
    a. Who loves the other more.
    b. Finding enough time for each other.
    c. Family or friends
    d. Who hates the other more
11. At what point in the relationship did you or will you say, "I love you."
    a. The moment you met
    b. After several dates
    c. After the first real "hook"
    d. Never
12. You feel that you can trust your S.O. with:
    a. Your life
    b. Your credit card
    c. Movie choices
    d. The TV remote control

Answer key: Check your responses. Count the number of questions to which you answered A. Do the same for B, C, and D. When you have finished, find the passion color which corresponds to the letter that occurs most often for you.

Mostly A responses: Fire engine Red—Your love life seems pretty secure. Quality time spent together is another important factor—make sure to carve some time out of your busy day just for cuddling. Don't let little squabbles interfere in such a promising relationship.

Mostly B responses: Hot Pink—While your romance has all the charm of a fairy tale, some problems may hinder you in the search for ultimate bliss. Are you giving the relationship the time it deserves? In an effort to avoid being hurt, you may be holding yourself back, always expecting the worst—relax and loosen up a little. Try focusing on your S.O.'s needs rather than on your own.

Mostly C responses: Rose—Are you sure that this is the relationship for you? Responses to questions four and eight may indicate that this may not be the person. And if so, why waste your time with someone who isn't satisfying your needs? Perhaps you need to make a decision about what you want from your S.O., or if you want a relationship at all.

Mostly D responses: White—On a scale of one to ten, your relationship is negative one. Perhaps there are positive aspects about this relationship, but it's doubtful that anything short of a miracle can change the way you feel about your S.O. Are you staying with this person out of convenience? If so, reconsider your possibilities.

Black History Month
Profile: Granville Woods

Granville Woods was awarded more than 35 patents for electrical systems and devices which created new energy techniques for the transportation and communication industries.

Born in Columbus, Ohio, Woods migrated to Missouri and worked in a variety of jobs to formulate his inventions. In 1884 he secured his first patent for a furnace and boiler to produce steam heat. In the years that followed, the prolific inventor improved the telephone transmitter and developed an electric car powered by overhead wires, a grooved wheel for the trolley car, the "third rail" system for an electric locomotive, and improved airbrake system, and a telegraph system for communicating between moving trains, all of which improved railroad safety. Woods sold most of his inventions to the General Electric, Westinghouse and Bell Telephone companies.

One woman, one show, one night of pure entertainment not to miss "Queen of Black Theatre" Vinie Burrows will present her one-woman show Sister! Sister! in the Vaughan Lit Auditorium Monday at 7:30 p.m. Composed of 19 different characters, all played by Burrows, the show probes issues dealing with women.

BY NICOLE PANICO
Bucknellian Staff Writer

In a portrayal of 19 women of different ages, races, nationalities, and backgrounds, highly-acclaimed actress Vinie Burrows will present Sister! Sister! at 7:30 p.m. on Feb. 15 in the Vaughan Literature Auditorium.

Born in Harlem, Burrows attended public school before furthering her education at New York University with a degree in pre-law. Hailed as the "Queen of Black Theatre," Burrows currently resides in the Lower East Side where she is actively involved in issues dealing with housing, education, and conflict resolution.

As stated by Sandra West, editor of Testimony: A Journal of African-American Poetry, Burrows' "legendary 30-year-old theatrical career continues to spread wing and soar majestically like the dramatic, ever seeking, never failing, mythical flying African."

Sister! Sister!, subtitled "A Celebration of the Triumphs and Trials of Women the World Over," deals with stories of those who are oppressed, neglected, and abused. Burrows uses the raw materials of women's experiences to create a compelling and moving theater piece. Humor and rage, irony and sorrow, love and frustration, combine to document women's struggles and celebrate women's joys. Burrows incorporates many selections from authors ranging from the Irish playwright Sean O'Casey, to the Ugandan author Okot p'Bitek, and the most famous persona, Winnie Mandela.

The speech "Detention," a United Nations address, describes political detention in South Africa and asks for black liberation from a white majority. In addition, the show contains testimonies of women from Italy, Harlem, Uganda, Honduras, and Appalachia. Other selections include "Liberation" by Susan Griffin, "Glory" by Charlotte Watson Sherman, and a piece in which Burrows transfigures into a 13-year-old cotton picker who is brutally raped by a drunken neighbor and intimidated into keeping silent.

Burrows blossomed as a child actress, performing on stage with the celebrated Helen Hayes, Ossie Davis, James Earl Jones, Mary Martin, Ben Gazzara, and Cicely Tyson. In 1968, discouraged by the scarcity of quality roles available for African-American artists, Burrows began her collection of different solo shows. Walk Together Children became her first of seven. The compilation of prose, poetry, and songs by black writers detailed the African-American experience, allowing Burrows to portray 24 different characters on stage. The other six solo shows include Africa Fire!, A Child is Born, From Swords to Plowshares, Homemade Love, and Sister! Sister!

The self-made actress—Vinie Burrows.

Burrows won world-wide acclaim for more than 4,000 performances in schools, universities, and theaters on four separate continents. In addition, Burrows made several appearances on television shows such as "The Merv Griffin Show," "The Tonight Show," and "Camera Three."

Not only is Burrows a dazzling actress who inspires many, but she is also the entrepreneur who produces, directs, and publicizes her solo performance shows.

Due to the level of success Burrows has attained, it is not surprising to learn of the many awards and achievements she has earned in radio, television, and film. In 1986, the Actors Equity Association presented her the prestigious Paul Robeson Award for her dedication to human rights, and willingness to create understanding and respect for diversity. Then in 1990, she accepted the Alliance Against Racist and Political Repression's Human Rights Award along with Congressman George Crockett of Michigan. Experimenting in politics, Burrows was accredited to the United Nations as the Permanent Representative for the Women's International Democratic Federation. Active in issues of apartheid, women, and development, she often participates in UN conferences and programs. Finally, her most recent achievement came in 1992, when the New York City Chapter of the National Organization of Women (NOW) bestowed upon her the Susan B. Anthony Award.

Stephen Holden of The New York Times said, "It (Sister! Sister!) reveals Ms. Burrows, a veteran of many Broadway and Off-Broadway shows, to be an actress of range and commanding passion." But according to Burrows, "the art of living is the most exquisite art of all!" She hopes that women and men who view her program will join together in the active struggle to enrich and safeguard all life of this endangered planet.

Dance Company holds auditions for new members

BY JESSICA HERBSTER

Did you ever get that urge to just dance? You know the feeling: your feet start tapping, your ears catch rhythms real or imagined, and suddenly you're moving and shaking across your room. Well, it's time for all you closet dancers to throw open your doors and hit the stage.

Bucknell's Dance Company is holding auditions on Sunday, Feb. 14 in the Tustin Dance Studio. Auditions will begin at 6 p.m. and will last approximately an hour and a half. Students will be split into small groups and taught three separate routines covering ballet, jazz, and modern techniques. They will then be asked to perform the routines for Company members.

The Company holds auditions every semester to recruit new and creative talent. Once a student is invited to join the Company, he or she is considered a member for as long as he or she wishes to remain active. Each member is guaranteed a performance in every dance concert until his or her graduation, regardless of his or her class year when accepted.

Currently there are 25 members in the Company, although there is no limit to how many new dancers will be chosen. Both male and female dancers are encouraged to audition, however the Company makes a special plea to the male population.

Although the ensemble is student run, there are two faculty advisors that are an integral part of the Company's success. Danna Frangione, associate professor of dance, and Shellie Cash-Muller, assistant professor of dance, complement the students' work with their own choreography and participation in performances. In addition to the professional techniques of the advisors, the Company invites guest artists to perform and run workshops throughout the year.

While the dancers work incredibly hard to produce and perfect their work, they are an extremely close-knit group and supportive group. Anyone who wishes to contribute to this talented company should not hesitate to audition. The Company holds very informal auditions—you need not be Grace Kelly or Ginger Rogers, just a Grace Kelly or Ginger Rogers hopeful.

Meredith Monk, performer in residence, conducts a series of workshops next week before performing in Atlas, a show written, composed, and choreographed by Monk herself. Tickets are available in the Weis Center or in the Langone Center lobby from noon-1 p.m. next Monday through Friday.

BY NICOLE COBBAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Among the instruments that performers use to entertain and delight audiences, the most complex is the performer himself. And if the body is the tool of creativity, Meredith Monk is the master craftsman.

Renowned for her versatility as a composer, singer, filmmaker, director, and choreographer, Monk will be in residency Feb. 15-19 with the department of theatre and dance, as well as with the department of music. Her stay on campus will conclude on Friday night in the Weis Center with the concert version of Atlas: an Opera in Three Parts, a piece written and composed by Monk.

Monk's workshop, titled "The Voice: The Original Human Instrument," will focus on creating vocal music. To Monk, the voice is an unique and diverse means of expression. Her vocal compositions draw on sources such as animal and insect sounds, imagined primeval rites, ancient forms of cantillation, children's songs, and vocal traditions.

Exercises in the workshop will include breathing techniques, detailed vocal and movement warm ups, and an analysis of the voice as an instrument for exploring texture, gesture, image, character, landscape, rhythm, timbre, range, and resonance. Participants will work on solo as well as group composition. All workshop events will take place from 7-9 p.m. in the University Theatre in Coleman Hall.

A prolific artist, and graduate of Sarah Lawrence College, Monk has created more than 60 music/theatre/dance and film works since 1964. Her latest, Book of Days, will be shown Feb. 14 at 4 and 7 p.m. in Coleman 101B. It is a film about time, drawing parallels between the Middle Ages, an era of war, plague, and fear of the Apocalypse, with our modern era of racial and religious conflict, AIDS, and the fear of nuclear annihilation, Book of Days was recently chosen for the 1991 Whitney Biennial by the Whitney Museum in New York City.

In 1968 Monk founded The House, a company dedicated to an inter-disciplinary approach to performance. Ten years later she created the Meredith Monk Vocal Ensemble to perform her unique vocal compositions.

Monk has received numerous awards, including two Guggenheim Fellowships, three Obies, and 16 ASCAP Awards for Musical Composition. She has also been awarded the honorary degree of Doctor of Arts from Bard College and the University of the Arts.

Tickets for Atlas will be available from the Weis Center Box Office. Tickets may also be purchased in the Langone Center lobby from noon-1 p.m. Monday through Friday of next week. Accompanying the ticket display in the Langone Center will be a video showing of Monk's film Ellis Island. The film won the CINE Golden Eagle Award as well as prizes at the Atlanta and San Francisco Film Festivals, and was shown nationally on PBS.

Also accompanying Monk during her week at Bucknell will be associate director Pablo Vela, a member of Meredith Monk Vocal Ensemble/The House since 1975. Vela has appeared in all major productions with the two ensembles.

Vela is a Yale graduate, and taught acting at Goddard College before joining Monk. Presently, he organizes and teaches workshops in the United States and Europe.

Monk's residency is made possible in part by a grant from the Mid-Atlantic Foundation in partnership with the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania Council on the Arts and the National Endowment for the Arts, as well as by a grant from the Bucknell Association for the Arts.

East meets West in Weis

BY ARA METJIAN

Portraying avant-garde choreography that is representative of the dramatic political and social upheavals, as well as the grace of the Asian theater, the Taiwan Dance Forum is an innovative group that's sure to entertain. The dance choreography will include pieces from Asia's highly acclaimed Man-fei Lo, Fu-lann Tao, and Sunny Pang, artistic director for Dance Forum.

With members from Taiwan, Hong Kong, mainland China, and the United States, Dance Forum Taipei can be seen at the Weis Center for the Performing Arts tonight, Feb. 12, at 8 p.m. Tickets are $15 ($5 with BUID) and on sale at the Weis Center Box Office.

With Gold Medals in choreography, this show is the group's fourth stop on its first tour outside of Asia. Prior to reaching this campus the company performed in Los Angeles, Colorado Springs, and Philadelphia.

"It's fun to visit different campuses," said Ping Heng, general director for Dance Forum. "Each environment and (every group of) students are all very different. Some focus on dancing. Some do not. Different schools have different relationships to dance."

Heng complimented Bucknell for its well-maintained facilities and general support of the arts by the students. Presently rehearsing in Coleman Hall, the group will move into the Weis Center Friday morning for a final pick-up rehearsal before the show.

The tour represents the first time that we will be able to witness the disciplined technique and unique political perspective of Dance Forum. The group strives to express its traditional cultural values which are contrasted by the fast-paced international market economy.

Peng warns, however, that while much of the concert consists of contemporary movements set to traditional, ethnic music, modern dance in Taiwan is surprisingly similar to its American counterpart.

Combining traditional and modern dance movements, a member of Dance Forum Taipei performs in "Pipa-ing," a piece choreographed by the group's artistic director, Sunny Pang.

"Taiwan has a lot of influence from America," said Heng. "English is a required course. A lot of graduate studies (are done) in the States. People are conscious to all the American input."

Aside from the performance this Friday, Dance Forum also offered workshops to the campus community. Ending today, the group conducted classes in Chinese Folk Dance, Peking Opera Movement, and Taiwan Aboriginal Dance. In addition Dance Forum also presented a lecture/demonstration which focused on the blending of Eastern and Western dance.

Hong-Kong choreographer Kwok Hui-wah, who choreographed a piece for Friday's performance, also staged a quartet "Waiting" for the Bucknell Dance Company's spring Concert. "Waiting" will feature the collective talents of Dance Company members Kristen Costello '95, Charles Curtiss '93, Associate professor of dance Danna Frangione, and guest artist Todd Rosenlieb '89.

All members of the community are invited to attend the concert this Friday. The performance contains several pleasant surprises, and may reshape the conception of Asian dancing that has developed in the United States. The Dance Forum Taipei residency is supported by the Bucknell Association for the Arts.

Faculty recital provides relaxing alternative

BY KATIE DEBONVILLE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Tired of listening to that same old song on the radio? You want live music. You want premieres. You want the classics. Well, in the department of music, what you want is what you get in the latest faculty recital to emerge on campus.

Tuesday, Feb. 16 promises to be a musical night for Bucknell. At 8 p.m. in Bucknell Hall, assistant professor of music Genevieve Lee will present the second in a series of recitals featuring various faculty members and students.

No stranger to performing at Bucknell, this concert will mark Lee's third as a soloist since she joined the faculty in the fall of 1991. Lee has also performed at the Weis Center and as a member of the Aurelian Trio, which completed a residency here last fall.

Tuesday night's recital will begin with the premiere of "Summer Angels" by Augusta Read Thomas, a junior fellow at Harvard. Her composition was commissioned by the Fromm Foundation and is also being premiered this month in Boston and Princeton.

"It's exciting to be doing a premiere," said Lee, adding that Thomas is doing well as a young composer.

The first half of the program will conclude with Beethoven's Piano Sonata, Opus 109 in E Major. Lee explained that this piece is a unique one because Beethoven explored new structures of music with it.

The final portion of the concert will consist of Chopin's Preludes. Containing 24 preludes, the set was composed between 1836-1839 during Chopin's well-publicized relationship with novelist George Sand. "One of the challenges of playing this piece is keeping it cohesive—keeping it as one piece instead of 24," Lee remarked.

Lee enjoys learning and performing a variety of types of music. Although she does not concentrate in a particular genre, Lee stated, "I like to incorporate 'new,' 20th-century music into my programs."

Lee has spent summers studying at various music festivals. She met violinist Teresa Ling and cellist Kelley Mikkelson, the other members of the Aurelian Trio, while teaching at a summer chamber music camp in Vermont. According to Lee, Ling and Mikkelsen will return to Bucknell in March, when the Aurelian Trio will perform its second Bucknell concert.

Assistant Professor of Music Genevieve Lee leans against the familiar piano. Presenting her third faculty recital in Bucknell Hall this Tuesday night, Lee will perform a variety of titles, including the premiere of a piece composed by a junior fellow at Harvard. The recital is free and open to the public and will begin promptly at 8 p.m.

Wrestling drops first of year

BY MITCH BENTON
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The Bucknell wrestling squad's dreams of an undefeated season sank at the hands of the Naval Academy last Saturday, ending the team's season opening seven match winning streak. The weekend started successfully as the Bison routed visiting East Coast Wrestling Association rival Buffalo Friday night, 41-8, Bucknell's largest margin of victory this season. The win pushed the team's conference mark to 3-0 and set up next weekend's showdown with Rider, also undefeated in the league, in a contest that should determine the ECWA's regular season champion.

Despite losing their first match of the year, Head Coach Bob Ferraro downplayed the disappointment. "We set goals at the beginning of the season and our goal was never to go undefeated. Our goals have always been to win the conference championship, place two All-Americas at the national championships and earn a spot in the Top 20, instead of trying to get a ranking," Ferraro commented, taking a shot at the Amateur Wrestling News, who has yet to put the successful Bison in the national poll, while the team is 2-1 against teams that are currently ranked.

Bucknell scored early and often against Buffalo, with the team opening the match by capturing victories in the first four bouts, highlighted by the second-period pin by Ron Wellman '95 over Rob Bashaw at 142 pounds. After dropping the Main Event to end the first half, the Bison returned to score 24 more points in the second to drop the overmatched Bulls to 1-11 and 0-2 in the conference. Jason Prokopchak '95 at 158 pounds began the onslaught as he received a forfeit. Also earning a forfeit was heavyweight Matt DiGiacomo '95, while Mike Rush '95 at 167 pounds and Bob Ferraro '94 at 177 each earned six team points on injury defaults.

The victory was Bucknell's seventh in a row, marking the school's best start to a season since the 1961-62 squad that finished the year at 9-0, finishing third in the Mid-Atlantic Conference.

The following day, despite making the early road flip to Annapolis, Md., Bucknell was able to jump out to an early lead on Navy, ranked 16th in the nation by the AWN. Clay Burkle '94 opened the match with a 3-1 decision at 118 pounds and when George Swann '93 surprised Jeff Stepanic—rated the 11th best 126 pounder in the nation—with a second period pin, Bucknell had taken a 9-0 lead.

"We couldn't have asked for a better start with Clay and George winning," said Ferraro, "but there was maybe one other wrestler who I was satisfied with. Each of the other seven were disappointing. Each of

Men's indoor track and field team earns a "B" from coach

BY CHRIS DROWNE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

With only two weeks to go before the Patriot League Championships, the men's outdoor track and field team made a second training pilgrimage to Delaware. However, head coach Art Gulden did not leave this meet as pleased as he was after the previous trip south. His staff will also be hosting the Winter Track Classic this weekend in the fieldhouse.

"I think we've earned A's in all of our meets up to this point, but some people came out flat this week. So as a team—and I like to evaluate everything on a team scale—we slipped to a B," said Gulden. "However, that's to be expected and shouldn't take anything away from those individuals who had outstanding performances."

"You can't be totally up for every meet week in and week out, but this should've gotten our attention and told us that everything's not just going to happen. We have to make it happen."
– Art Gulden, head coach

Two more Bison earned a trip to the IC4A's with standout performances in Delaware. Rick Van Emburgh '95 won the 500-meter race with a personal-best time of 1:05.02. That mark also moves him into fourth place on Bucknell's all-time list in that event.

The second qualifier is a member of the highly-touted freshman class. Karim Abdul-Martin '96 leaped 47' 4.5" in the triple jump, good enough for second on Bucknell's all-time list. The other outstanding field performance came from long-jumper Brian Drechler '95, who leaped a personal-best 22' 4.5".

On the track, Mike Bronson '93 earned top honors in the 3,000-meter run with a time of 8:33.82. Brad Bernardini '94 and Derek Hamilton '94 each crossed the finish line of the 55-meter dash in under 23.18. Jaime Silva '94 "made real good progress in the 5,000-meter run and then came back strong in the mile relay," according to Gulden.

Gulden, commenting on both his team and some individuals, said, "We've made some good progress, but we have a lot further to go. Some of those individuals he was talking about included Dave Slupe '93 and Jim Farrer '93, who have indeed made progress, but not enough to shake runners from other schools yet.

"You can't be totally up for every meet week in and week out," said Gulden. "But this meet should have gotten our attention and told us that everthing is not just going to happen. We have to make it happen."

Lehigh, who was also at the Delaware Invitational, has been coming on strong of late and would like nothing better than a shot at Bucknell come championship time. "They don't have the depth to cover all the events, but they could beat us if they have a real good meet and we don't," conceded Gulden.

This weekend, Bucknell will host several different local schools, including Bloomsburg, Shippensburg, and some runners from Penn State. "This is an excellent field and just another step in the preparation process," concluded Gulden. "I do know that we have to improve more before the conference meet."

Lady Bison look to secure home tourney game

Women hope to repeat sweep of two Service Academies

BY JON TERRY
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Solaida Mamsaang — The Bucknellian

Lisa Fink '93 brings the ball up court against Fordham last Saturday night in Davis Gym. The guard has elevated her game for the stretch run in hope of helping the Lady Bison finish among the top four, thus earning a home game for the first round of league playoffs.

In women's basketball action this week, Bucknell will look to make it a perfect four-game sweep over the military academies. Earlier this year, Head Coach Juliene Simpson notched her 200th career victory, as the Lady Bison knocked off Army 51-37 in Lewisburg. One week later, they beat Navy in Annapolis 55-47.

After falling out of a share for third place with Lafayette on Wednesday, the Lady Bison are still very much in the hunt to host their first-ever Patriot League Tournament game. To do so, tomorrow afternoon (3:15 p.m. tipoff) the Lady Bison will have to repeat the defensive performance they put on in their previous meeting with the Cadets (8-11, 5-5). In that game, Bucknell held Army to just 25.9 percent shooting from the floor, despite shooting just 11.5 percent themselves, in taking a 16-14 halftime lead. The Lady Bison pulled away in the second half, partly thanks to a 25-5 free-throw advantage. Lisa Fink '93 had one of her better efforts of the year as she scored a season-high 19 points—15 from the foul line.

Army is led by sophomore forward Lisa Russell, who once held a share of the Patriot League scoring lead. Senior guard Gina Scarcella (5' 10") and sophomore guard Carrie Garinger (5' 9") gives Army a tall backcourt when they are in together.

Navy (10-11, 4-6) presents a different challenge. When they come to Lewisburg next Wednesday (5:15 p.m. tipoff), they will be looking to avenge a home loss to the Lady Bison that they considered disappointing. Led by senior guards Heather Brand and Kim Drayton, Navy has the all-important mix of a veteran backcourt and a strong front line. Forward Yolanda Ray was named to the Second Team All-Patriot League following last season. Kim Cowling and Jenna Hausvik are 6' 0" and 5' 11", respectively, although Hausvik will be looking to better the 0-point scratch she recorded against the Lady Bison earlier this year.

Navy holds a 5-1 lifetime advantage over Bucknell; however, in addition to Bucknell's January triumph, last year's games were decided by a total of only five points. In a rivalry that is beginning to heat up, Bucknell looks to improve not only in the series record, but also in the first division of the Patriot League.

Women upset Fordham, fall to Lafayette

BY MIKE MELESKY AND SCOTT GRISIN
Bucknellian Staff Writers

The Bucknell Lady Bison (8-14, 6-4) broke into last week flying high, in a tie for third place in the Patriot League. This was due in part to the leadership of some outstanding upperclassmen, as well as to the surprising maturity of the younger members of the team. Although their overall record may not show it, they have in fact jelled together effectively as a team.

In Davis Gymnasium last Saturday, the home team battled the Fordham Rams, winning 64-58. The game was entirely controlled by the ladies from Lewisburg, as three Bison scored in double figures, and only four of the Rams were able to put any points on the board. "We love to play at home," said Juliet McGee '93. "We came out fired up."

Every time Fordham made an attempt at a run, the Bison stopped the charge and rebuilt their lead. McGee led Bucknell with 19 points and 11 rebounds, and Joy Sandler GR threw in 13 points of her own. Lisa Fink '93 came off of the bench and tallied 16 points and pulled down eight boards, while Kelly Kempton '93, making her first start of the year, grabbed 11 rebounds. More importantly, however, Kempton shut down Fordham's 6'5" center, Kelly Roche, holding her scoreless for the entire game. K.C. Vlah '96 and Anne McGovern '93 also contributed with their key passing and defense.

On Wednesday, the Leopards of Lafayette (14-7, 6-3) handed the Lady Bison a 16-point loss on the new hardwood of Kirby Field House. It was a hard-fought contest, but even 32 points and 12 rebounds from McGee could not match the 63 combined points scored by Lafayette's Heidi Caruso (20), Sue Williams (21), and Angela Spell (22). Caruso and Williams are arguably one of the best backcourt tandems in the Patriot League.

The Leopards benefitted from the physical style of play throughout the game, bumping the Bucknell ball-handler nearly every time down the court. Three players on both sides fouled out, with one Lafayette player committing her fifth only 3:11 into the second half. Vlah, Fink, and Kempton fouled out of the game for Bucknell.

Despite this loss, McGee has been the main cog throughout the season for this young squad. Her defense, scoring ability, and rebounding skills are keys to the team's success, and like most of the players, she has improved as the season has progressed. Since she is a southpaw, most teams try to nullify her scoring by forcing her to her right. However, against Lafayette, her left hand "came around." "Normally when they force me to my right," said McGee, "I dish it off. Against Lafayette, I just started shooting it instead, and they kept on falling."

McGee, who was named Patriot League Player of the Week last week, deflects individual honor by saying, "I'd much rather score five [points] and win than score 32 and lose," but her achievements should be recognized. Her contributions in the scoring column as well as in the leadership she provides are essential to the Bison, who are still largely a young, improving team.

a leg on the 4 x 400m relay, a distance she is not accustomed to running very often. Her 61.7 second leg led the relay to a sixth place finish (4:11.97).

The jumpers, who have been strong for Bucknell all season, again came through with great performances. They were led by second place finishes in the triple jump (11.00m), and long jump (5.17m) by Kelly Peet '96. Tanya Barnes '95, a steadily improving jumper, had a great day as she placed third in the long jump (4.96m). For those who aren't up-to-date on metric conversions, that's 16' 3 1/4". Rounding out the jumps was the ever consistent Dawn Ellery '94, who placed second in high jump (5'3 1/2").

In the distance events, Bridgette Mayer '96 had a great debut race in the 5000m. Mayer placed third in 18:13. Look for Mayer and teammate Amie Souter '96 (fifth, 19:00) to join Kristen Opdyke '93 in the longer races at Patriot Leagues. Also having great races were Jessica Wilhelm '95 in the 1500m (fifth, 5:01), and Kathy Wurster '94 in the 800m (second, 2:20). To round things off, the 4 x 800m relay of Wurster, Michelle Fallone '96, Gina Abraham '93 and Maria Ryan '96 placed second in 9:33.7, their fastest time of the season.

Next up for the Bison is the Bucknell Track and Field Classic this Saturday at 11:00. Come watch as the Lady Bison get tuned up for Patriot League Championships, which will be Feb. 27 at the Bucknell Field House. Who knows, it could be another day of personal records and ECAC qualifiers.

them either should have gotten bonus points or not given them up."

The Midshipmen began their rally at 134 pounds and soon cut the lead to 9-7, before Bison captain Mike Van Doren'92 pushed the advantage to five points with his 13-6 decision at 150 pounds. The weekend's two victories for Van Doren raised his team-high total to 21 and his career mark to 75-31, ranking fifth on the school's all-time list, just six wins out of fourth, a spot now held by former Bison All-America and current assistant coach Bryan Burns '91. Navy took the lead by scoring decisions in the next two bouts, but Bucknell's Ferraro was able to reclaim it with a 10-4 victory at 177 pounds, leaving the match tally at 15-14 and giving the junior a season mark of 19-2. The Middies were able to secure the win by scoring the final eight points of the match leaving the final score at 22-15.

Taking the optimistic view, coach Ferraro said "If you look at the plus side of this, we wrestled the 16th best team in the nation with seven weights not performing their best and we still had a chance to win." Bucknell will be looking to begin a new winning streak this weekend as state rival Millersville invades Davis Gymnasium tonight at 7 p.m. The team follows that tomorrow by competing in a dual match tournament held at nearby Bloomsburg. The Bison, last year's runner-up in the same tournament, will enter the competition seeded second and will need to get by California, Pa. and either Liberty or possibly a rematch with Millersville if they want to set up a possible match-up with the host, who is currently ranked in the Top 25. Ferraro warns about looking toward the tournament too early. "I think the weekend is going to be very competitive. Millersville is a good team and their strengths match our strengths so it's going to be interesting."

Juliet McGee '93

Women's basketball tri-captain Juliet McGee '93 has been selected as The Bucknellian's Athlete of the Week for her outstanding games against Fordham and Lafayette.

The forward averaged 25.5 points and 11.5 rebounds on her way to be named Patriot League Player of the Week for the second time this season. The Lady Bison split the two games, upsetting Fordham in Davis Gym 64-58 and bowing to the Leopards 84-68 in Easton.

McGee is majoring in economics.

Trivia Question Answer: The Bison had never beaten Fordham in Davis Gym before last weekend.

'Behler Gets CBS 'Radio Nod

Bob Behler, "The Voice of the Bison" for the past seven years, has been named to the Host Communications/CBS Radio broadcasting team for the NCAA Men's Basketball Tournament this coming March. Behler will broadcast an NCAA Tournament East Regional second-round game, from either Syracuse or Nashville, on Mar. 21.

Behler will handle the play-by-play of the CBS Radio backup game. Should the primary game become one-sided, Behler's call of the backup game will be heard nationwide over the CBS Radio Network.

A 1985 graduate of the University of Georgia and native of Stockton, Ca., Behler has been Bucknell's Athletics Radio/TV Coordinator since 1986. In addition to his radio broadcasts of all Bucknell football and men's basketball games, Behler hosts and produces football and men's basketball television shows that reach over five million homes on cable systems throughout the East.

In addition, Behler has covered several NCAA Championships for Sportscast Productions, and this year will cover the NCAA men's and women's golf championships. He has also been named to the faculty of Sportscast Productions broadcast camp for the second straight year.

'Record Number of Student-Athletes Named to 'Dean's List

A record number of Bucknell student-athletes (121) earned Dean's List grades for the first semester of the 1992-93 academic year. The previous record of 106, set last spring, exceeded last Fall's 104.

Included among the long list are 13 team captains and 12 athletes who earned perfect 4.0 averages. The captains include David "Whitey" Berardinelli '93 (football) and Dana Harbst '93 (women's track), who each earned 4.0 averages for the semester. Other captains named to the Dean's list include Suzanne Chairsell '93 (field hockey), Julie Diercks '93 (women's track), Phil Elliott '93 (wrestling), Kim Fekel '93 (women's soccer), Lisa Fink '93 (women's basketball), Jay Gross '93 (men's swimming), John Lewis '93 (men's cross country), Sarah Mesaros '93 (volleyball), Kristen Opdyke '93 (women's cross country), Chris Retzler '93 (water polo), and Todd Streelman '93 (men's lacrosse).

22 Outstanding Female Student-Athletes Honored

During halftime of last Saturday night's men's basketball game against Fordham in Davis Gym, Bucknell honored many of its top female student-athletes as a part of National Girls and Women in Sports Day festivities.

The honorees included two Academic All-America selections and two All-Patriot League Scholar-Athlete Award winners, as well as numerous All-Patriot League selections and Patriot League champions.

The Academic All-America honorees include Sarah Maseros '93 and Lisa Fink '93. Other honorees include Trisha Way '94, Margaret Grunow '93, Wendy Sheldon '93, Kathleen Hartnett '95, Katrina Mueller '93, Almira Baldwin '94, Lisa Gibbons '95, Jen Giordano '95, Katie Steele '96, Heather Hoehn '94, Juliet McGee '93, Joy Sandler GR, Sara Allen '96, Erika Anhood '96, Lauren Weihl '96, Kristen Opdyke '93, Kymm Carlson '94, Dawn Ellery '94, Tameka Hinton '95, and Tricia Plasko GR.

Army fires its coach for "Publicly humiliating players"

BY CHRIS DROWNE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Former USMA men's head coach Tom Miller was fired last Thurs.

Last Thursday afternoon, the United States Military Academy, a member of the Patriot League since its inception as a multi-sport association, announced that it had fired its head men's basketball coach Tom Miller "because of his poor relationship with his players," said academy spokesperson Bruce Bell.

Miller, a disciple of Bobby Knight and a 1970 West Point graduate, has been troubled by his fiery temper wherever he has gone. His overall record at West Point, including a 3-15 start this year, was 13-61 in two and a half seasons as leader of the Knights. Before returning to the Hudson, Miller had coached ten seasons at Cornell and then Colorado, with a combined record of 106-164.

However, he was not fired for his poor won-loss record. He was fired because he embarrassed both himself and the program on several occassions.

Bell clearly stated that the reason Miller was fired was because he "publicly degraded his players, and had been told twice this season by administrators that his outbursts were inappropriate."

Bell went on to add, "The whole purpose of West Point is to develop leaders. Things such as yelling in the face of a Cadet are totally inappropriate."

Assistant coach Mike Connors, a long term assistant under Miller, will assume the head coaching duties for the remainder of this season.

Breakin' Bison keep share of first place

Cagers pound Rams and Leopards, move to 16-5

BY SCOTT GRISIN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

2,500 screaming fans. Some with orange and blue faces, others with basketballs on their heads. Yes, ladies and gentlemen, it's Davis Gym. On Saturday, the Breakin' Bison hosted Fordham in their second meeting of the season, and the Rams had much in their favor. They beat the Bison 70-65 in last year's Patriot League final. They have a 6-2 overall record against Bucknell, and they are 2-0 in Davis Gym. They were coming off of a five-point victory over Holy Cross just three days earlier, and they came charging into Lewisburg.

But that was where Fordham's luck ran out. The Orange and Blue stopped the charging Rams in their tracks, winning by a score of 77-63 and giving Coach Charlie Woollum his 300th win.

Led by 19 points from Mike Bright '93, the Bison (16-5, 9-1) never trailed by more than two points. After a basket by Raymond Brown '94 to put Bucknell up 12-10 with 14:58 remaining in the first half, the Bison went on a 9-2 run and never looked back. Up 41-30 at the half, Bucknell came out strong again in the second period, increasing its lead to 45-30 before Fordham began to play. The Rams struggled back to within seven at 54-47, but never got any closer than that as the Bison pulled away to win by 14. The game was capped off by a one handed slam by Mike Walsh '93 that caused the sellout crowd to erupt and a "Walshie" chant began echoing around the gym.

"I thought we played exceptionally well, both offensively and defensively," said Woollum. Bright, Brown, Russell Peyton '93, and Chris Simpson '94 all scored in double figures, as the Bison continued to distribute their scoring. "We really pulled together," added Woollum. "No one cares who gets the credit—they just want to win."

Forward Mike Bright '93 completes the high-percentage shoot against an earlier opponent. The tri-captain needs only 15 more points to move into third place on Bucknell's All-Time scoring list. He is currently first on the Patriot League's list.

Coach Woollum was "very happy" about his 300th victory since replacing Jim Valvano in 1975. He added, however, that he is "more into what's going on now. Once the season is over, I'll have a lot of good memories, I'm sure." In his 17 years here, Woollum owns a 301-203 (.597) record, with thirteen winning seasons, five 20-win seasons, and two NCAA Tournament berths. With the victory over Fordham, the Bison have clinched their 11th straight winning season—Bucknell is one of only six Division I schools with that streak. "It's a group, a family, success," said Woollum. "There have been a lot of people involved—the fans, the staff, the players...I just happen to be the coach."

On Wednesday, Bucknell traveled to Allan P. Kirby Field House where, as Woollum said, they "took care of business," mauling the Leopards of Lafayette 84-65. It was a tough night for both teams. Lafayette was without their outstanding freshman point guard Craig Kowadla, while Bucknell's Peyton and Simpson left their uniforms in Lewisburg. The two were forced to borrow uniforms from the bench, with Peyton taking number 33 and Simpson selecting 52, the number he wore his freshman year. Thus Bucknell's problems were solved, but Lafayette's would only grow more numerous.

The Leopards led 15-13 early in the first period before Bucknell put together a run which basically lasted the entire first half. The Bison outscored Lafayette 35-8 during this run, and they led by 25 (48-23) at the half.

The second period went much the same way as the Breakin' Bison lived up to their name. The Bison increased their lead to as much as 27 at 57-30 with 14:06 to go, but the Leopards put a little run of their own together, outscoring Bucknell 19-8 during the next five minutes. The Bison took control again, boosting their lead back up to 25 and went on to win by 19. Simpson led the team with 23 points, and the balanced scoring continued as Peyton, Brown, Bright, and Paul Olkowski '93 also scored in double figures. They went home happy for the 11th time out of the last 12 games remaining tied for first with Holy Cross.

The Bison (16-5, 9-1) head to West Point, New York, tomorrow to do battle with Army before hosting Navy on Feb. 17.

Jean Auro — The Bucknellian

Head Coach Charlie Woollum notched his 300th career victory at Bucknell last Saturday night against Fordham. Woollum hopes to stay in a first place tie and not slip to number two in the league.

Bucknell goes to war against Army, Navy

BY JON TERRY
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Consider it "Military Week" for the Breakin' Bison. Tomorrow you can catch the Bison in West Point, N.Y. when they take on Army at 1:00 p.m. Then the first place squad will return home to Davis Gym Wednesday night at 7:30 p.m. when Navy comes to town.

After Wednesday's thrashing of Lafayette, the Bison have won four straight games and 11 of their last twelve. Even more optimistically, the Bison are in their easiest stretch of the season. Including the Lafayette affair, Bucknell is in a five-game stretch against the four bottom teams in the Patriot League, as well as Loyola (Md.), whom the Bison defeated rather easily in Baltimore in early January. Although head coach Charlie Woollum will never say any game is easier than another, the Bison's schedule is favorable heading into the season-ending matchup with league co-leader Holy Cross.

Army (3-17, 2-8, pending last night's game with Holy Cross) comes into tomorrow's game in sixth place in the Patriot League, and turmoil floats over their collective heads after the firing of their head coach, Tom Miller.

In late January, in Lewisburg, the Bison smashed the Cadets 83-57, handing them their ninth straight loss at that time. Raymond Brown '94 led a balanced scoring attack with 14 points. Army, playing without senior forward Derrik Allen, out with an injured knee, turned the ball over 17 times, many of which came in the midst of a 17-2 Bucknell run in the second half.

Army's defense will have to step up their game tomorrow in order to be successful. Last year in West Point, Army was able to hold Mike Bright '93 to just two shots and three points, and Bucknell's bench was held scoreless as the Bison struggled to a 57-51 win. In this year's earlier meeting, however, the Army defense was nonexistent. The Bison nailed 15 of their first 19 shots from the floor on their way to a 59.4% shooting night. All this despite not having center Paul Olkowski '93 in the second half after he inadvertantly put his hand through a door window during halftime.

Army, whose roster includes 11 freshmen, is led by junior widebody David Ardayfio. First-year Cadets to watch are guards Mark Lueking and Alex Morris, and forward Tacuma Williams.

Navy (7-13, 5-5) has been a pleasant surprise in the Patriot League this year. Currently in fifth place in the conference, first year coach Don DeVoe (formerly the boss at Tennessee) has his team in the running to host a tournament game at their beautiful Alumni Hall, a place in which visiting teams are growing increasingly anxious about playing.

Earlier this year, Bucknell's backcourt bailed them out in a hard-fought 68-61 win. Russell Peyton '93 and Chris Simpson '94 combined to score 38 points to foil Navy's comeback bid. Simpson led all scorers with 21 points, including 11 of 13 from the charity stripe.

The Bison led by 11 at the half, but Navy pulled to within four with 6:29 to play. Strong foul shooting by Simpson, Peyton, and Matt Clark '93 then helped the good guys pull away.

Bucknell has won the last five meetings with Navy and is the strong favorite to make it six in a row next week. Midshipmen to watch include captain John Haase, forward Chuck Robinson ("little" brother of a fairly good NBA center named David), and sharpshooting guard Michael Burd.

Commentary

Ashe was a hero off the court, too

Last Saturday night, not only the sports world, but the entire world lost one of its most respected citizens, Arthur Ashe.

On the court, Ashe was a pioneer for all black tennis players and athletes by winning both Wimbledon and the U.S. Open. He was the world's top ranked player at the conclusion of the 1968 and 1975 seasons and captained the United States Davis Cup team to a world championship. But more important ,, Ashe was a pioneer off the court.

He transcended the sport of tennis and educated millions on such noble subjects as apartheid, inner-city youth development, and most recently the disease that took his life, AIDS. In an age when athletes are using their celebrity status to land lucrative endorsement contracts, Ashe used his celebrity to teach us all. Everyone who heard Ashe speak on an issue that he truly cared about would agree that nobody combined intelligence, sincerity, and truth quite like he did.

Last spring, a writer from USA Today learned that Ashe contracted AIDS during an open heart operation blood transfusion. Knowing that the secret only his family and closest friends had kept since 1988 was about to be broadcast worldwide, Ashe once again performed well above and beyond all human expectations. He called a press conference to explain everything and also state that he would devote the remainder of his life to once again educate the world on a subject that few wish to address.

Ashe immediately formed The Arthur Ashe Foundation for the Defeat of AIDS. Through the efforts of several tennis players and other volunteers, this foundation raised millions of dollars and educated at least as many people. In fact, just prior to his death, Ashe was to meet with a special national commission on AIDS, but declined citing poor health. Instead, he video-taped a message for that commission saying, "We [AIDS victims] don't want sympathy, but we do want compassion. People need to know that all of us can shake hands, hug, use the same fork, and even kiss without exchanging the illness. We have a long way to go in educating the public."

Unfortunately, very few people in their lifetimes have the ability to transcend and educate multiple generations on a multitude of serious subjects. It is even more rare when this person comes from the world of sports. Arthur Ashe was such a person.

Women sprinters have banner day

BUCKNELLIAN TEAM CORRESPONDENT

The key to a successful season is continued improvement; each meet running a little faster, throwing a little farther, jumping a little higher. Coaches Art Gulden, Bill Hodge, and Jo Gianettino know the secret formula to keeping the upward climb of good performances: They are masters at the art of fine-tuning athletes. This past weekend at Delaware, the Lady Bison had a day filled with ECAC qualifiers, personal bests, and BU all-time performances. A great day, considering the meet started at practically the crack of dawn.

Ironically, one of the best performers was not at Delaware, but at Cornell. Versatile freshman Norine Nadeau traveled to Ithaca, NY Friday night to compete in the pentathlon, a grueling competition which includes the long jump, high jump, 55 hurdles, shot put, and the 800m. Points are awarded on the basis of times and distances in each event. Nadeau finished an outstanding third, with a total of 3,199 points: one point shy of the ECAC qualifying standard. Nonetheless, it was a magnificent competition, as she achieved personal records in the long jump (17'5"), hurdles (8.7), shot put (33'1/2") and was 1/2" shy of a personal record in the high jump (4'11"). In the 800m, Nadeau needed to run 2:34.29 to qualify. She ran 2:34.35.

"I was just exhausted and couldn't run any faster in the 800m!" Nadeau said afterwards. Nadeau still has a chance to provisionally qualify for ECAC's if enough (12) people don't meet the qualifying standard. Nadeau will certainly be an asset to the Bison at Patriot League Championships to be held at Bucknell later this month.

Nadeau's teammates a few hours away were also turning in fine performances. Tameka Hinton '95, had a great day, taking second in both the 55m (7.28) and the 200m (25.50). Her 200m time is a career best and an ECAC qualifier. Co-Captain Julie Diercks '93 ran the sixth fastest time in BU history and a career best in the 200m (26.96).

In the longer sprints, Beth Muehl '94, finished third in the 500m in a personal record (1:21.04), as did Sharon Shilling '95 in the 400m (1:01.72). Sprinter and Co-Captain Dana Harbst '93 found herself running

New admissions video released

BY COLLEEN RUSH
Bucknellian Staff Writer

"The paths students take at Bucknell are like its setting; interconnecting and diverging on a common ground," says a soothing voice, as a camera pans slowly across the academic quad showing students walking in various directions across the walkways. The scene may be familiar to current students, but the ideas expressed are not.

The first video, "A Personal Experience," is a 13-minute long general information presentation. The video covers several aspects of campus life, ranging from theater and engineering programs to residential colleges and football, alternating "story-line" clips. This video was sent out in early December to approximately 2,000 high schools with "high Bucknell student traffic," said Richard Skelton, Dean of Enrollment Planning.

The second video, "Seekers and Scholars," is a nine-minute presentation that focuses on five personalities on campus. Interviewed in the video were Nicola Wong '93, Joey Krakoff '92, Jon Laguna '94, Meagan Llewelyn '93, and Jennifer Hunt '93. The video is expected to be sent out within five weeks to "a select group of students who have been accepted, but live outside of Bucknell's geographical draw and don't have a good sense of the school yet," said Skelton.

Morgan Woods '93, saw "A Personal Experience" and felt that the school was Incinerator protesters face reduced charges

Criminal trial of five called off in eleventh hour

BY DEB MANASSE AND MARIA GLOD
Bucknellian Staff Writers

Three professors and two students, scheduled to appear in court this morning, received a last minute reprieve from the trial as the charges of disorderly conduct levied against them from a Jan. 28 protest may be reduced from misdemeanors to summary offenses.

The five members of the Bucknell community were originally scheduled to face trial after their arrest for civil disobedience in a protest against the proposed construction of a hazardous waste incinerator in Union County.

Charles Sackrey, associate professor of economics; Karl Patten, professor of English; Ernest Keen, professor of psychology; Amanda Swarr '95, and Joel Wainwright '95 were among the thirteen Organization for United Ecology (OUE) members arrested during the Harrisburg demonstration and charged with defiant trespass, a misdemeanor of the second degree.

The U.S. Pollution Control Inc. (USPCI) which proposed the builiding of the $100 million facility two years ago has been faced with continual opposition from members of the local community who have formed the OUE in an attempt to stop the construction of the incinerator. The protesters, demonstrating last month on the steps of the Department of Environmental Resources (DER), were continuing their attempts to block the its approval necessary to begin work on the project.

According to Sackrey, this significant reduction in charge is appropriate. "We would have pleaded

Computer services director resigns

BY DENISE MAUTONE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Following the sudden resignation of Jon Eschinger, Director of Computer Services, as of March 1, 1993, the department of Computer Services will be under the directorship of two new directors.

Both Ralph Droms, associate professor of computer science, and Gene Spencer, senior analyst of computer services will fill the position until the University conducts an adequate nationwide search for a new director.

Although Eschinger presented a formal announcement of resignation, the former director declined to elaborate on the circumstances regarding his leaving the university. He said, "It's time for me to move on and find something more exciting to do."

This co-directorship comes at a time when the University can expect to see some radical changes in Computer Services.

Vice-President of Academic Affairs Larry Shinn, asked both a faculty member and an administrator to share the position, because as Droms said, "It will be easier to focus our attention where it is needed if there are two people to share the position." Shinn was not available for comment.

According to Droms and Spencer, it would have been logistically too difficult to bring in a new director. "There are many upcoming events that will need immediate attention from someone who is at least familiar with the present situations in the Computer Services Department," said Spencer.

These upcoming events include the eventual conversion to a new computer system to replace the present CP-6, and the possible implementation of a campus-wide network.

Droms will be in charge of computing support for academic use, while Spencer will be primarily concerned with computing requirements for administrators.

"Droms is brilliant. He has thought all of the problems through already," said David Murray '92, graduate of computer science.

"There were a lot of problems, and they weren't just esoteric computer science problems. They were problems for users," said Murray. Eschinger tended

Monk performs Atlas

BY NICOLE COBBAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The Coleman stage resonates with the sounds of singing. The group stands in a circle, swaying, holding hands, weaving their voices in a four part round. The melody is simple, but sung in this way, in a round, the effect is almost religious. Each member is barely aware of his or her own voice, entranced by the harmony of the group. The singing fades to humming, the humming to an effortless silence. The group leaves with smiles on their faces, still humming snatches of the music to themselves.

The source of their contentment is a workshop that has just been conducted by Meredith Monk, performance artist in residence. A well-known and well-respected artist, Monk remains remarkably personable, despite the fame. Lying on the floor, Monk is counseling a performer who is complaining of back troubles, while answering questions for straggling workshop members.

To complete her week long residency, Monk will perform in the concert version of her work Atlas at 8 p.m. in the Weis Center tomorrow night. Tickets are $15 ($5 with BUID) and available at the Weis Center Box Office.

Nicole Cobban—The Bucknellian

Meredith Monk conducted several seminars for classees and various groups this week. Saturday night she will perform at the Weis Center.

Originally commissioned by the Houston Grand Opera, the Walker Art Center, and the American Music Theater Festival, Atlas has since toured throughout the United States and Europe. Also to be performed with Atlas is Facing North, a duet with Monk and long-time associate Robert Een.

Inspired by the life and daring Asiatic travels of French-born explorer Alexandra David-Neel, Atlas narrates the adventures of the character Alexandra Daniels and her traveling companions. Throughout the three-part piece the character of Alexandra is played by three different performers, including Monk.

In the first section, "Personal Climate," Alexandra is an anxious youth, dreaming of far away places while being fussed over by doting parents. The scene transforms into a film sequence, young Alexandra's daydream, before jumping to a comic airport scene. It is in the airport that Alexandra selects the two companions who will accompany her on her quest.

"Night Travel," the second section, depicts Alexandra (played by Monk at this point) during her prime. The group gains an additional two members, and their journey takes us to the far corners of the earth. Along the way each member is tempted by supernatural forces, and by the end of the section only four have survived the test.

Wristband policy amended by IFC

Problems ironed out

BY ANDREW COHEN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

After a semester-long trial, the Interfraternity Council (IFC) wristband policy has been amended to designate a specific drinking area and hold houses accountable for individual violations of the alcohol policy. "We met with representatives of the IFC who agreed with us that the policy was a good one, but that it was taken advantage of. We needed to tighten up where there were some abuses," said Vince DeCerchio, director of the Office of Public Safety.

The former wristband policy "started in September with the idea that people with indentification would get a wristband and could drink anywhere in the house," said DeCerchio. Fraternities were responsible for checking identifications to ensure that students were of age. When underage individuals were found drinking in the house, they were charged with individual violations of the alcohol policy; the fraternity was not charged.

Under the new policy, individuals may not "drink with the wristband throughout the house. Each house would have a designated area where those with wristbands can drink, one large area in the house

Condom week promotes safer sexual practices

BY MICHELLE MANZO
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Releasing their tense anxieties over sexual issues has been, in the past, a difficult issue for many people, particularly when it comes to dealing with questions of whether to make available condoms and previously taboo information on sexually transmitted diseases. The members of Bucknell's AIDS Awareness Committee, however, see saving lives as too important to let controversy stand in their way.

As part of a nation-wide Condom Week, members of the committee and other student volunteers have been distributing free condoms in the University Center Mall as a way to promote safe sex and the prevention of AIDS. They also provided free information on AIDS and the importance of condom use in forms of brochures and films shown in the Bison.

Janelle Oltorik '93, one of three student chairpersons of the committee, stresses the importance of raising awareness on campus. "This semester we are working to get students aware that AIDS is a problem for them...They think they are immortal," she said. By distributing free condoms to Bucknell students, the committee hopes to increase condom use as an effective form of protection against AIDS and other STDs.

that is larger than the old segregated area [the enclosed rooms restricted to students of age]," said DeCerchio.

In addition, the administration will "now hold the houses responsible for anybody drinking in the house without a wristband," said DeCerchio. This was the main area of abuse under the former policy. According to DeCerchio, "The old game was don't give underage people wristbands, and when we came in to conduct routine party checks, the underage people would simply drop their beers." This practice, said DeCerchio, "violated the spirit of our agreement."

Not every fraternity engaged in this practice. According to DeCerchio, "Maybe half of the houses were making a strong effort to meet the spirit of the new agreement. But the other half weren't really making an effort to work with this policy."

However, DeCerchio noted that when abuses occurred, they were extreme. While "the house would say, 'We are not responsible for those drinking without wristbands, they may have brought it in themselves,' when you have 30 or 40 or 50 people drinking without a wristband there has to be some collusion with the house." The new policy is still flexible when it comes to individual infractions, according to DeCerchio. "If it's a few people, we'll evaluate it."

Both the old wristband policy, and its amendments were the result of close work between DeCerchio, John Dunlop, dean of students, Ed Dadez, Greek advisor and associate dean of student life, Gerry Commerford, associate dean for housing, and members of the IFC executive board.

At the urging of the IFC, "We agreed to give the old policy a one year trial. The first semester, we got a lot of good input and cooperation from the IFC. But as the semester progressed, were found that there were some problems; some houses were taking advantage," said DeCerchio.

Informal fraternity gatherings involving only members of the house, such as this game of "Beirut" are not covered by the new policy.

The wristband policy currently applies only to registered parties. According to DeCerchio, "Members of the fraternity who want to drink in their fraternity house aren't really bound by that policy.

However, when the numbers exceed the members of the house, we consider it a party. But within the members themselves, we allow them to keep the responsibility in the house."

DeCerchio was quick to point out that the current policies are by no means final; there is a working dynamic. With increased pressure by outside authorities such as the police and Liquor Control Board "the Greek community is at a turning point in its existence. In the long run, the intent is to have Greeks govern their own affairs with restraint and integrity."

DeCerchio said he sees his role as advisory, but he will "like Bill Clinton, pull everyone kicking and screaming into the future." At the same time, he does not see his position as strictly administrative.

"The alcohol issue is a tough nut to crack. But we don't want to be the Grinch that Stole Christmas."

not to listen to suggestions by students or qualified experts, he said.

Keith Overton '93 said, "I think it's a good idea having a Computer Science faculty with such a strong say in computing at Bucknell."

Droms and Spencer present complementary qualifications, that according to Droms, "will allow us to support one another."

The co-directors expect to work rather well together. "Of course, there will be disagreement over some things, but that's only healthy. We intend to both be very much involved in the complete running of this center," said Droms.

Droms will be uprooting himself from the classroom and taking a two-year leave of abscence from teaching, the expected length of the temporary position.

This will be Drom's sixth year at Bucknell; he was previously employed by IBM. When asked if this would be a change of pace for him, Droms said, "It's going to be very different."

However, the transition for Spencer may be a little less severe. A graduate of Bucknell in 1976, Spencer has spent the past 15 years as senior analyst in Computer Services.

When similarly asked if this was a big step for him, Spencer said, "As a matter of fact, there are new responsibilities, but most of my previous work dealt with the upcoming issues of conversion."

The University will hire a one-person replacement by June 1995. Spencer said,"We face significant challenges in the next year. Ralph [Droms] and I possess both the people and technological skills to approach this posotion in a very methodical fashion that will prove to be successful."

Eschinger is leaving the University after 20 years of service. Not

Thursday, February 11

A Bucknell University employee reported a theft from a room in the library. After an inventory conducted, it was determined that several pieces of computer related items were missing. Investigation continuing.

At 5:30 p.m. this date, the Department of Public Safety received a report of an attempted theft from the library. It was discovered that the would be victim did see an unknown person attempt to remove her wallet from her coat. A search of the building and campus was conducted and investigation continuing.

At 7:35 p.m., a Department of Public Safety Officer assisted the local police in locating a Bucknell University student wanted for questioning. Student allegedly attempted to purchase alcohol with a fake ID.

Friday, February 12

At 6:51 p.m., a Bucknell University student in Kress Hall reported that an unknown person did throw a snowball through his window.

At 6:52 p.m., The Department of Public Safety received a report of a wallet being found in the library. The wallet was found in the ceiling tile of the elevator by an employee. The victim reported that only a vendor card was missing and that the wallet was stolen from lower level one of the library where he had left it unattended on a desk.

At 10:55 p.m., Public Safety Officers responded to the LCA fraternity on the report of a disturbance in progress. Upon arrival, it was discovered that a NON-Bucknell University person had attempted to enter the "21 area" without showing his ID. The East Buffalo Township Police were summoned and individual was taken into custody and subsequently charged with underage consumption.

At 10:45 p.m., Public Safety Officers responded to Larison Hall on the report of an alcohol overdose. Victim was taken by ambulance to the Evangelical Community Hospital where she was treated and released.

Saturday, February 13

At 12:53 a.m., a Public Safety Officer responded to the LCA fraternity on the report of a fire alarm activation. While present at the scene, an unknown person did activate a pull station for no reason.

At 2:15 a.m., a Bucknell University student was present at this office and reported an act of harassment. She stated that while walking in the area of Coleman Road and Fraternity Road when she was verbally harassed and threatened by an unidentified male. Investigation continuing.

At 12:42 a.m. during routine Public Safety party checks, and individual was discovered consuming alcohol without the proper wristband. Identification was made and it was discovered that the individual was under 21 years of age and had received the wristband from a neighboring fraternity where he was not identified prior to the issuance of the wristband. Investigation continuing.

At 12:50 a.m., while a Public Safety Officer was conducting an interview on Fraternity Road, two students were warned about throwing snowballs at each other and in the direction of the Public Safety Vehicle. One of these students, continued and did strike the vehicle as well as the individual with the Public Safety Officer. The Bucknell University student was apprehended and found to be intoxicated and under 21 years of age. Charges pending.

One of the main problems, according to Oltorik, is that often students under the influence of alcohol "hook up" and neglect to protect themselves properly as a result of their intoxication. She argues that if students have condoms available to them, they will be more likely to use them. "Obviously, we're not promoting sex", says Oltorik, "but for those students who choose to be sexually active, there should be condoms available."

Doug Poskitt '93, another co-chairperson of the committee, submits that they "are not trying to offend anyone" by distributing condoms in the University Center. He hopes that handing out condoms will increase the chances that they will be used and "help stop the spread" of disease.

In total, the Ziegler Health Center supplied the students with 600 latex condoms discretely wrapped with useful instructions. The aim of the free distribution is to instigate the habitual use of condoms as a form of protection. "Obviously people are not going to abstain from sex," Poskitt said. "We just want them to be careful."

Free condoms are also available upon request in the health center, and a Safer Sex Kit can be purchased for five dollars. The kit, encased in a brown paper bag, contains twelve spermicidal condoms, contraceptive foam, and information on AIDS and safe sex. Dr. Donald Stechschulte, medical director of the health center, notes that, ironically, the sales of the Safer Sex Kits have increased since the availability of free condoms.

Stechshulte said, "There's no stigma attached to asking for condoms here, it just means that you think highly of yourself and want to protect yourself."

According to Stechshulte, Bucknell students are experiencing "a false sense of security" and also an "overdose on denial". Engaging in risky sexual behavior is a problem for all people, including college students. "Awareness is the perception that it happens," he said. Stechshulte said the key factor is that awareness is useless if the proper precautions aren't taken.

> "We are working to get students aware that AIDS is a problem ... they think they are immortal" —Janelle Oltorik '93

Stechshulte confirms that "there are HIV positive students on this campus." However, he continually emphasizes that the spread of AIDS and STDs can be prevented by practicing safe sex. "You should be scared to death", he says. "AIDS immediately alters your life and prematurely ends it."

Both Stechshulte and members of the AIDS awareness committee insist that Bucknell students need to practice safe sex. But their warnings have not yet taken full effect on campus. According to Stechshulte, "The ramifications are not fully appreciated." He reinforced the serious, however morbid, reminder that "you'll notice when you come back for your tenth reunion because some of your classmates won't be there."

Interim disciplinary system approved

BY NEIL BARDACH
Bucknellian Staff Writer

With early semester incidents just now being adjudicated, students are getting their first taste of a new disciplinary system.

John Dunlop, dean of students, issued a memorandum on Jan. 12 that outlined in detail an Interim Disciplinary System which has been approved effective as of the beginning of this semester.

The Interim Committee of Student Conduct (ICSC), headed by Jack Pyper, associate dean of arts and sciences, issued recommendations to student life, which were accepted.

The document is an outline detailing first the procedures for bringing a case to a disciplinary committee, and then describing the format of the committee that will oversee the implementation of the system. The committee will adjudicate some of the disciplinary cases until a permanent disciplinary policy is in place.

The document provides a students' bill of rights, of sorts, in regards to disciplinary hearings and actions. It outlines exactly the voting totals within the committee that must be reached in order to take disciplinary action.

Under the guidelines outlined in the document, "There must be at least four out of five votes in the affirmative to reach a finding of responsibility." This means that four of the five committee members must find a person responsible for the violation in order for the process to continue to another stage.

Further, it says that "a vote of four out of five is required for a student found responsible for the charged misconduct to be suspended from the University."

If the misconduct is serious enough to warrant expulsion from the University, a unanimous vote must be reached. The document states that "disciplinary sanctions other than Suspension or Permanent Expulsion may be imposed by a three out of five vote."

One paragraph in the document describes the procedure to be taken if the dean of students chooses to adjudicate over a misconduct case. Importantly, while the dean may find a student guilty of misconduct, he may not dismiss a student without the consent of the vice president for student services.

The next section of the document outlines the actions that are to be considered misconduct. The first group is described as "violations against the academic community." Here, the document expressly protects a student's freedom of speech, his freedom of movement, as well as the right not to be harassed sexually. The document defines sexual harassment as "unwanted comments, gestures, or physical activity of a sexual nature." Also, the document protects a student's right against harassment of a racial, ethnic, or religious nature. The policy would also protect a student from interference with an academic or research project.

In the final stretch of his lengthy Bucknell career, John Dunlop, dean of students, is still recommending improvements to the disciplinary system.

The second group of misconducts is termed "trespass or damage to property." As the title suggests, the section outlines the definitions of damage to property, both personal student property and University property.

The third group labels misconduct in regards to falsifying information to the University.

The fourth group mentioned in the document is by far the broadest of the groups. It describes misconducts in regards to the "use of fireworks, firearms, offensive weapons, alcoholic beverages, or unlawful drugs." The document describes all use of such firearms, fireworks and offensive weapons as unlawful, although the ROTC program is exempt from this policy, provided that it meets certain guidelines. Also, this section describes the distribution, possession, or use of unlawful drugs, including improper use of alcohol, as illegal.

The last group in the document provides for punishment of civil and criminal laws that are not described in other parts of the document.

Finally, the document outlines the procedures for the conduct of the ICSC hearings.

'not guilty' to a misdemeanor charge," said Sackrey "We don't believe we are guilty of such a serious crime."

Whereas the misdemeanor charges carry the potential of a $2,500 fine or up to one year in jail, a summary offense involves a fine of up to $365 and typically does not involve a trial.

Carrying the case through the entire criminal proceedings may have done more to publicize their arguments.

"If we had had a trial it would have been bad for DER and USPCI," said Keen. "The publicity would have thrown into question their honesty and integrity and the entire project of having approved the site."

On the other hand, Sackrey and the others are "not disappointed that it is not going to go to a trial." Being found guilty of a misdemeanor could have prevented them from participating in future demonstrations.

"A misdemeanor is a very serious charge," said Sackrey. "If you are convicted of a misdemeanor it can get in the way" of effective political protest.

Being convicted of a misdemeanor "might have put us on probation and kept us from doing any of these types of political activities for a year," he said.

The members of OUE plan to continue their fight against the building of the incinerator.

"It gave us renewed energy to keep fighting," said Amanda Swarr '95.

Maria Glod—The Bucknellian

OUE members gather at the steps of the state capitol to protest the building of the proposed incinerator in Allenwood.

Swarr and Wainwright were pleased to hear that the trial had been called off. Both worried about the high costs of a lengthy trial process.

"We leapt in the air with a yell of relief," said Wainwright.

The protestors were originally arraigned by Horace Lowrey, Harrisburg District Justices, and Steven Semic, Steelton District Justice. They were released after posting 10 percent of the bail set at $2,500 each.

trying to "push the multicultural aspect" too much. Woods also noted that the video "lacked facts, such as size and location" of the school.

According to Skelton, the reason the video excluded general details about the school was because "every other school video has the facts and figures. We wanted something more creative that highlights student interaction with one another and faculty." Skelton also noted that students who receive the videos will "already have the facts about the school in print form, before they see the video."

Caroline Boag '95, said that there was a "conspicuous absence of Greek life" in the videos. "The video doesn't really explore the social extracurricular activities around Bucknell," said Boag.

Skelton explained the absence of Bucknell's social activities in the videos, saying, "The focus of the videos was on academic experiences. There was no agenda or direction to the video otherwise. Greeks were not excluded or included."

Though the purpose of the video, to give prospective Bucknellians a glimpse of a day in the life at Bucknell, was achieved, Kathy Ziegler '96 felt the video was "positive, but not catching."

"I remember what I looked for when I was choosing schools. I looked for size, interaction with professors, Greek life, what students looked like and other factors. It [the video] should have shown more people and not just focused on four or five," said Ziegler.

A changing and diverse student body, however, make capturing the "typical" Bucknell student difficult. "We're targeting any 17 year old student who is looking at Bucknell. The video portrays a lively student body engaged in a variety of academic areas," said Skelton.

Prior to the release of the new videos, the Admissions office, in coordination with Learning Resource Network and College U.S.A. Program, two commercial production distributors, created a laser disk presentation about Bucknell. Copies of the disks were sent to high schools across the country affiliated with the two distributors. However, after five years of using the laser disk, the admissions office found that the disks were outdated and not being used by many of the high schools participating in the program.

Payne gets accolades

Michael Payne, professor of English, has received the annual Professional Achievement Award from the board of directors of the College English Association (CEA). The national award, which recognizes an association memberwho has contributed signifigantly to teaching and scholarship at the college level, will be presented at the annual CEA convention in April.

In addition to more than fifty articles, several high school and college textbooks, twenty edited and twelve co-edited volumes, Payne is the author of two books, "Irony in Shakespeare's Roman Plays" and "Reading Theory: an Introduction to Lacan, Derrida and Kristeva."

The recipient of the Lindback Award for Distinguished Teaching and the Class of 1956 Lectureship, Payne has served as chair of the History and English departments, secretary of the faculty, Presidential Professor, and the John P. Crozer Professor of English Literature, and has lectured internationally.

Baird locks up directorship

Jeff Baird, Public Safety sergeant has been named director of security at Lycoming College in Williamsport. "Jeff has served Bucknell well, and we're going to miss him. I'm sure he'll be a fine director in his new position," said Vincent DeCerchio, director of Public Safety.

Philosophy fills vacancy

The department of Philosophy has hired Gary Steiner full time, as its specialist in continental philosophy.

Steiner is no stranger to the philosophy department, he has taught at Bucknell for six years as a visiting professor. Last year he was awarded his PhD from Yale University.

Steiner's scholarship focuses on Cartesian philosophy, but most students probably remember him more for his "False Consciousness" class, a perennial favorite among philosophy majors.

The department is currently interviewing for another position which would specialize in non-traditional philosophy including feminist and non-Western philosophies. This is a new position created largely in response to student demand.

Skies set for astronomy

The Bucknell Astronomy Club and the Department of Physics will hold an open house at the observatory from 7 p.m. until 10 p.m. on Saturday, Feb. 20. If the skies are clear, the telescopes will be used to observe Mars, Venus, Jupiter, and other astronomical objects. There will also be a slide show and short video presentation on the size of the universe.

Tours of the observatory and the presentations will be available regardless of the weather conditions.

Virus strikes 175 students

Although conclusive lab tests were not yet available, officials at Villanova University suspected a virus to be the cause of the mystery illness that plagued nearly 175 students.

Stephen Bell, a University spokesman, said the symptoms include nausea, stomach pains, and cramps that last twelve to twenty-four hours. Eighty of the affected students were taken to the hospital, but only one was admitted.

State health investigators said that initial tests results seemed to rule out food poisoning, and the local water company said that the University's supply was clean.

Two other unnamed universities have faced outbreaks of a similar illness.

Earth mugs distributed

Skidmore College's Environmental Action Club will soon be offering reusable 22 ounce thermal mugs as part of the CUPPS program. Alex Lackner, president of the Club, was introduced to the program at UVM and Middlebury College. "CUPPS stands for Can't Use Paper, Plastic, Styrofoam," he explained. Similar projects are done at colleges across the nation.

Lackner plans to integrate the mug into the lifestyle of the Skidmore student by "continually programming events where students would bring the mug." The profits from the mug sales will sponsor speakers and other environmental awareness programs.

Engineers hit oil tankers

Engineers at Lehigh University are researching an innovative double-hull ship design that will make oil carrying tankers less dangerous.

By building the ship with the two-layer hull, the ships will be stronger and have less potential for cracks and leaks to develop either through accidents or normal wear and tear.

The Lehigh research has focused on ways that ships have failed in the past in an effort to correct those mistakes in the future.

Laws in different nations will require the implementation of double-hull ships within the next ten to fifteen years.

House costs Clarion $890K

Student and employee opposition to the proposed $890,000 residence for the president of Clarion University is increasing.

In a time of cutbacks, many people see this venture as an unnecessary expense that would place an undue financial burden on the University. "We can't afford another raise in tuition, and that's what will pay for the house." said one student. Many others echoed that sentiment.

Trustee Raleigh Robertson said, "We realize that this is not the best time to build a president's house. But there never has been a good time."

The measure must still be passed by the State System of Higher Education Board of Governors.

If you haven't had a mammogram, you need more than your breasts examined.

A mammogram is a safe, low-dose X-ray that can detect breast cancer before there's a lump. In other words, it could save your life and your breast.

If you're a woman over 35, be sure to schedule a mammogram. Unless you're still not convinced of its importance.

In which case, you may need more than your breasts examined.

Let it snow, let it snow, let it snow!

Snow. Some people like it; some people hate it, but regardless, it is here, so we are going to have to live with it. If you have ever been hit by a snowball, or run into by a sled, then you know that all people have different ways of enjoying the wintry weather. Walking around campus this week, you probably lost one of your shorter friends in a fresh snow drift or found yourself unable to move your car off a sheet of solid ice. Although skiers rejoiced at the sight of the snow, those who were responsible for keeping campus streets and paths clear found their daily workload increased, as they spent hours shoveling and plowing all over campus.

Whether you skipped class to spend a day in the Poconos, or swiped a tray from the caf to careen down the nearest hill, or even found yourself with a group of friends on the soccer field playing football, then you have experienced the true essence of winter fun. Or maybe you became furious as you were pelted in the side of the head by your best friend's snowball. Most students escaped the wintry episode without a scratch, but unfortunately, a few were not quite so lucky. A number of students collided with immovable objects while sledding down Robert's hill. One first-year student was even unlucky enough to suffer a broken leg which resulted from just such a collision.

For many, snow means a chance to run and play, but for employees of the physical plant, it is a time to move fast and to keep the campus streets and pathways safe for all. They spent long hours plowing the streets so that faculty and students would not have to miss a valuable day of lectures and labs.

If this taste of winter unleashed the little snowman inside of you, then relax and enjoy the few days of snow that this week will provide. However, if you dread looking out the window to see the horrid white blanket covering everything, then be relieved in the knowledge that Spring Break is a mere four weeks away.

Clockwise from left: Josh Klatt '96 catches air while snowboarding behind Roberts Hall; Chris Ebbeson '94 sees stars after colliding with a tree; an unfamiliar scene in central Pennsylvania becomes the norm this week; physical plant employees work diligently to clear the snow; a hall of first-year students enjoy a game of football on the varsity soccer field; students line up behind Roberts Hall to take their turn sledding; Patty Keebler '94 and Heather Lennox '94 frolic in the academic quad between classes.

Admissions, lies, and videotape...

Prospective Bucknell students now have the opportunity to experience the essence of the University in twenty-two minutes by viewing two new admissions videos. They will find Bucknell to be a diverse, and even multicultural school, where students have boundless opportunities to enjoy their inner sensitivities, nay even comb the depths of their souls.

An aspiring rabbi and a Christian woman will share the story of their friendship. Prospectives will see blacks, Jews, women, and maybe a white male, if they squint. What prospectives will not see is any semblance of Greek life or other social activity. What kind of flim-flam artist does the University fancy itself as? What will these poor trusting seventeen year-olds do when they get here and see that life at Bucknell is not bursting with opportunities to express their multiculturalism?

When those who have seen the video arrive here, they will, as many of us have done, discover the truth about Bucknell and swallow the fact that they must align themselves within the traditional social structure. They will feel cheated by the administration for selling the University as diverse and multiculturally thriving, while at the same time they see students forced to define themselves within the restricted parameters set by the social milieu.

Who forces us students to be like this? We do. No administration has the power to dictate how fulfilling our college experience will be. They can make it harder or easier, but ultimately it is up to each student to define him or herself.

The administration found a handful of students who are making something of their collegiate experiences. Although some present Bucknellians may feel that this does not show the University as it really is, the effects of such a presentation may attract students who will bring Bucknell closer to the cultural Camelot that we see in the video.

Maybe future students will take advantage of the opportunities that are provided here. The Multicultural Center, Women's Resource Center, Office of Students Activities, and Weis Center all sponsor a diverse array of activities. What is lacking is not the events, but rather student participation in them.

As much as we may think our opportunities here are stifled, the videos, in a roundabout way, show us that this is not the case. The next time we complain about how close-minded, conservative, and hyper-structured the campus is, maybe we ought not blame the administration, the admissions office, or even our fellow students. Maybe, we should look within.

Gays in military pieces evoke protest

Homosexual soldiers have always served

TO THE EDITOR:

I was very disturbed by Jeff Stern's opinion piece "Those Big Guns Are Too Heavy Anyway ... Stern Speaks for Average Americans," in the February 12, 1993, issue of The Bucknellian. First of all, I'm curious, by what mandate has Mr. Stern been empowered to speak for the average American? Perhaps my opinion is that of an atypical American, but I don't mind telling Mr. Stern that his belief that homosexuals should be excluded from military service is not only un-American, but it denies the basic truth that homosexuals have served, presently serve, and will continue to serve as productive and desirable members of the military, regardless of whether they are acknowledged for their sexual orientation or not.

Mr. Stern refers to the military as an "exclusive club." I may be summarizing a bit, but as far as I know, the only real requirements necessary to join a branch of the U. S. military service are U. S. citizenship, a successful physical examination, and a vow of heterosexuality. So it would seem that the only thing exclusive about this "club" is that it denies admitted homosexuals the ability to defend their country, a country that portends to send its soldiers to war to defend democracy and the liberty of the individual.

When Mr. Stern expresses his apprehensions about "some guy admiring what a nice ass you have" while "on the front line," and "lovers on the battlefield," he upholds the foolish notion that life is a continuous sex act. Mr. Stern thus implies that life for the homosexual is nothing more than the endless pursuit of sexual interaction. There is no indication of this, correct me if I'm wrong, Mr. Stern. Consequently, the idea that homosexual orientation precludes the possibility of competent, professional service is nothing less than ignorant.

Additionally, Mr. Stern refers to "the unnecessary adjustments that are going to have to be made." Please, Mr. Stern. Homosexuals have been serving in the military since this country's inception. In fact, I'd wager that they have served in every military force mankind has ever known. You know why? Because homosexuals comprise a very real part of our population. Believe it or not, they will continue to do so. Moreover, they will continue to serve successfully in our military regardless of whether they are acknowledged or not.

The real issue here is not the admittance of homosexuals into the military. It's the recognition that they already exist there. Moreover, it's the recognition that they serve successfully and without incident, despite what Mr. Stern might have us believe.

Tell me Mr. Stern, do you need to tell "faggot jokes," as you call them, to relieve pre-test stress? Do you think that it's appropriate? Your insistence that military men have the "outlet" of "faggot jokes" as a "time-honored stress reliever" is perhaps the most ludicrous aspect of your argument. Servicemen are libel for slanderous remarks they make about their fellow soldiers. What differentiates telling a "faggot joke" from a joke about any other distinguishable group within our society? If anything, such behavior harbors mistrust amongst soldiers rather than the jovial camaraderie you detail.

Yes, Mr. Stern, I can stomach the fact that our society, as you say, is "filled with injustices," but I can only hope that the "average American" will not be party to the apathy that you so guiltlessly espouse. Our president is not a faggot sympathizer. He is a human being sympathizer. Moreover, he is simply trying to gain recognition of a state that already exists.

I am insulted that you have appointed yourself the spokesman of the average American. I am also embarrassed by your remarks. They are poorly thought out and carelessly rationalized for someone who has access to the coveted resource of a higher education.

Reader upset about gays-in-military articles

TO THE EDITOR:

Both of the opinions pieces in the February 12th issue concerning gays in the military were horrifying, in large part due to the imbecility that typifies most arguments mounted in the spirit of violence. Jeff Stern's intent to be funny (to which I have subsequently been alerted) reveals his ignorance of what constitutes satire as well as of the less pressing issues of homophobia and sexism. The views expressed in last week's Bucknellian are hardly unique (one has only to look at NYT to find many a soldier who fears objectification and unwanted sexual attention by other men, a privilege that "normal" society reserves for women), but this paper, as the University's official publication, has an obligation not to indulge in bigotry. And while The Bucknellian is not ethically bound to print only matter conceived with some intellectual acuity, this should be a priority.

The layout of the Opinions section, with a vertical line bisecting the military cartoon and dividing the two articles, implied the presentation of dual or opposing viewpoints. Clearly, this was not the case. Moreover, it would be unacceptable to find commentary sympathetic to, say, the position of African-Americans or women juxtaposed to a piece containing the words "nigger" and "cunt."

What was Proclamation Week?

TO THE EDITOR:

Many of the members of the Bucknell community may have asked themselves this week: What is going on? Well the answer to that is: Proclamation Week! This past week was set aside by the members of the Fellowship of Christian Athletes and Christians in Action to share the message of Jesus Christ in a variety of different ways on campus. Our goal was simply to communicate the message: "Hope Has Begun."—Jesus Christ being that hope. We wanted to have the chance to let the Bucknell community know that we really believe that this is true. Our attempt was not to say that this brand of Christianity is right or that this branch of Catholicism or Protestantism is the way to God, but rather we wanted to visibly proclaim that Jesus Christ is the only way to a relationship with the living God.

This week happened because as Christians we love Bucknell and everyone who is here, and that love is only possible because God has loved us...

We think it would be rather hypocritical of us as individuals and as groups to say we have been given the hope of life through Jesus and then not share it with everyone around us. Now many of you may have been offended by us even thinking about sharing or mentioning the fact that we live for and love Jesus Christ, but please understand that we decided to engage in this week because the hope of Jesus is true. Everyone of you has the explicit right and option to disregard anything that was said this week, and I hope that no one made you feel like you had to listen, watch or participate. We were not looking to make the campus proud of us or to think we are neat groups on campus. This week happened because as Christians we love Bucknell and everyone who is here, and that love is only possible because God has loved us, every single person in the world, first. Don't let others convince you that we are to be written off as radicals or fundamentalists—it is so easy to

Author of gays-in-military article explains

TO THE EDITOR:

In the last issue of The Bucknellian, I wrote an opinion article titled "Those Big Guns Are Too Heavy Anyway." I wrote the article with the mind that gays should be admitted into the military. The writing style that I chose used a sarcastic tone; in other words, I exaggerated what I considered to be the ignorant points made by those who oppose gays entering the military. I thought I was fairly obvious in my satirical voice. The majority of the campus, however, didn't agree. And so there I stood, a man accused of a crime that he didn't commit because he pretended to commit it to open the people's eyes who were guilty of it.

Of course I don't really think that way. I thought people would see that no one could really be as ignorant as the author I created, and would thus see the sarcasm. Most people just thought I was a jerk. A big jerk. Even my friends, who knew how I felt, questioned my true feelings.

So I have come to the conclusion that maybe the sarcasm wasn't as clear as I thought. I cannot blame the majority of the campus for reading it wrongly; that would be arrogant. I apologize to anyone whom I may have offended.

The good thing about the article, though, was that it spurred conversation. A friend of mine said his Renaissance Lit. professor brought me up in class. I'm not even 20 years old. In that respect, the article did what I intended it to do. So I'm a jerk; I can live with that.

OPINIONS

Get mad over sexual harassment

BY DAVID WALSH

The pet issue of campus feminists (and feminists everywhere for that matter) this academic year, without question, has been sexual harassment. Most likely spurred on by the Anita Hill affair, the interests of women have been pursued with more dogged determination than ever before, and the result is an inundation of pamphlets, seminars, and any other means of public "education" one can imagine. And while the intentions of the people involved are undoubtedly noble, the atmosphere on campus for many males (this writer included) is slowly turning into something out of a George Orwell novel.

The next time some moron calls a woman a derogatory name or gives her a dirty look, my advice to her is this: flip him off, and call him a name right back.

It can not be denied that sexual harassment is indeed a problem in society, both at Bucknell and in America at large. A male on this campus can only imagine how it must feel for a woman to enter a fraternity house with seventy or eighty brothers in it. There must be a certain amount of fear and apprehension involved, and this is completely understandable. The temptation to perceive every encounter with the opposite sex as a threat must be great.

However, it seems as though this fear has been transformed into a paranoid hysteria of late, and this is somewhat troubling. The definition of sexual harassment has become so broad that it is now virtually up to the woman to decide what it is. Something as simple as calling a woman a derogatory name can get you thirty hours of community service (it happened, no joke). In mainstream society, looking at a woman funny at a pool can get you fired (it happened to a university professor in Canada).

Does this sound frightening to anyone else? Now no one in their right mind would condone tormenting women (or men for that matter), but what kind of a hypersensitive, reactionary society is being formed when the words or actions of everyday idiots are blown up to pathological sex-offender proportions?

Classifying the above cases as sexual harassment only belittles the cases of true sexual harassment and detracts from their credibility. Imagine if every time someone called someone else a nasty name (and no doubt many of you have probably called this writer several unprintable slurs by now) or gave them a dirty look, they were brought up on sexual harassment charges. The entire campus would be at the physical plant at 7 a.m. tomorrow sorting recycled bottles.

The point is, lighten up! Pursue cases of true sexual harassment with the utmost vigor, because no one deserves to be subjected to frightening and traumatic experiences, male or female. However, the next time some moron calls a woman a derogatory name or gives one a dirty look, my advice to her is this: flip him off, and call him a name right back. (God knows, men have been doing this all along.) He'll probably be so shocked, he won't know what to do. At the very least, you can both call security and have each other written up. Because if anyone (male or female) thinks that in the real world they can prosecute every mindless cretin who makes

Get facts about rape straight

BY STEVE MURRAY

Rape. It's one of those words that throws fear into the lives of anyone who hears it. Whether it is one friend confiding in another, a professor giving a lecture in sociology, or an RA in training, rape affects us whenever it touches our lives. I say "our" lives here, because it is necessary to understand that rape is not just a problem in the lives of women, but also those of men.

Despite popular belief at Bucknell, rape is just as much a problem here as it is at any other college. If one were to consider the Security report that we are sent each year, you might see that one or two rapes happen a year. Anyone who lives in a state of reality knows this to be false.

What Security does report, in truth, is the number of rapes that were reported to the Security Office and convicted that year. Please note that this is not nearly the same as the total number of women that might seek the advice of the Women's Resource Center or Psychological Services in the aftermath of a rape, and much less than the number of women who talk to their RA's about a sexual assault. Far more are the women that stay silent, except perhaps to a trusted friend, never relating the horrible event that has destroyed their lives.

I can speak on this issue from a unique point of view. Last year, I founded Men Against Rape at Bucknell. In this capacity, many women felt that they could trust me, and confided in me the tragedy of what happened. Despite the fact that they knew I was not a trained counselor, I spent uncountable hours speaking with rape victims on Bucknell's campus, be it in person, over the phone, or anonymously through the mail. I can safely say that I worked with at least two women each week of the spring semester. I knew of one hall where over 80% of the women were sexually assaulted during their freshman year.

Women I know at Bucknell who are sophomores or older tend to have learned the rules of safety by now. Most know that if you go to a fraternity party, you go with a group of friends, you control how much you drink, and you trust absolutely no one who invites you up to his room in order to "check out my goldfish." While many may think that line is preposterous, I know of women who fell for exactly that proposition and went upstairs to a brother's room where they were subsequently raped.

Ask yourself these questions before engaging in any sexual action: Does she really want this? Would she do this if she were sober? Will we both feel good about this afterwards? Is she assenting right now?

It is necessary to establish that fraternity houses are by no means the only places that rape occurs. Dorm rooms, locker rooms, parked cars, the cemetery, and athletic fields are all places where rape takes place. Many blame security for not being there to stop it, but security can't have cars at all places at all times, and they can't have cameras in each student's room monitoring what goes on.

We do not live in a bubble, safely trapped away from all the problems of society. We live in a reality that we have to accept. We have to take precautions to ensure not only our safety, but also our conduct.

Men also have a role to play in the problem of rape on campus, as we are the ones who commit it. Most rapists at Bucknell who I have talked with said that they didn't do it, or that they don't understand how the woman might have perceived what happened as rape. It is time for men to get the facts straight, to find out what really is rape according to the university as well as the state.

If you aren't sure about a situation, whether what you are considering is rape or not, don't do it. Ask yourself these questions before engaging in any sexual action: Does she really want this? Would she do this if she were sober? Will we both feel good about this afterwards? Is she assenting right now? If any of the answers are no, be smart and stop where you are.

Even if you have previously had sex, if she says no, or is unconscious, or if she is drunk, what you are doing is legally defined as rape. Yes, that's right, if a woman is drunk, then it is assumed that she is not in full capacity of her judgment, so it can be considered rape. Save both of yourselves a lot of pain, and go no further.

Here, at Bucknell, we often think of ourselves in the confines of a safe environment. We are away from urban crime and most worries other than when the next paper is due. However, we don't live in Nirvana, but in cold, harsh reality. Rape does occur here, a lot more than anyone wants to admit. It is time we acknowledge that fact, and face the responsibilities that are part and parcel of real life. Be cautious, be aware, and be safe in how you act, regardless of your gender. Help stop the problem of rape at Bucknell.

WHY SEXUAL HARASSMENT IS VERY, VERY BAD

Sexual harassment is very, very BAD. If you do it, you are BAD, and you will burn in hell. You will burn in hell along with all the other BAD sexual harassers, never, ever celebrating Christmas again. Yep. All of you will stay with Satan for the remainder of your evil existence, drinking warm Coke from cans containing sinister hairs and watching Howard Stern's "Butt Bongo Fiesta" over and over again until your pupils dilate to the size of theoretical particles. By the way, Howard Stern is BAD. So is sexual harassment. The End.

What? You sexual harassers out there still aren't convinced? But we've spent most of this section telling you how evil and bad you are! We've pouted, shouted, and spouted threats, so WHY AREN'T YOU LISTENING!!? If you don't shape up, we're going to hunt you down and EDUCATE you. We WILL find you. We KNOW when you are sleeping. We KNOW when you're awake. We KNOW when you've been BAD or good so be good for goodness sake.

Ha, ha, ha. Just a little feminist humor there for you. We feminists have a great since of humor. Don't we, girls? Gimme an H? Gimme a U? Gimme an M. O. R? Humor, Humor it gets us far? Hooray!

Perhaps the Santa Claus allusion was in poor taste though. After all, many of us find the implications of his jolly catch-phrase (ho, ho, ho) to be degrading and offensive. The correct term for the profession is actually "Mating Service Technician." And why does he need three of them anyway? If he were to shout out simply "ho" or even "ho ho" we might let it go. But three "ho's" in a row is a big no no, and we feel it's stooping pretty darn low.

ARE YOU LAUGHING ABOUT THIS? STOP THAT LAUGHING THIS INSTANT! THIS IS NOT FUNNY!!! SO WHAT IF WE COMMUNICATE IN CAPITAL LETTERS, BECAUSE, DAMN IT, WE'RE RIGHT!!?

What's, that? You can't hear us? We're shouting too loudly in your ear for you to make out the words? Sorry.

Anyway, sexual harassment is a serious matter, presenting an overwhelming amount of catch-22's. It seems that as our thinking becomes more progressive, the media remains regressive. TV, radio, magazines, film, cartoons, videos, and toys all dictate an almost archetypal behavior pattern for girls and boys. We quickly learn who wears dresses and who makes messes, who pets cats and who swings bats, who bakes buns and who shoots guns, who plays jacks at lunch and who beats the hell out of the blond new kid down by the jungle gym because his Christmas party outfit was green and pinkish red instead of green and regular red but he didn't know any better because he was Jewish anyway and he comes home all bloody and torn and asks his dad if they can move but his dad just tells him to act like a man and signs him up for karate lessons but the kids in school find out and make him enter the karate tournament which Pat Morita helps him win by telling him that "the force will be with him, always" and so he gets the beautiful girl and the Ark Of The Covenant and his peaceful extra-terrestrial friend finally makes it home.

Whoops! I'm getting my own past life mixed up with media images again. It's an easy mistake to make. It's so easy to watch, to absorb. And all those guitar-slashing heavy metal beasts, those "boom-booming" rappers, those rifle-hefting G.I. Joes, those muscle-grunting athletes, those Coors-gulping crocodile crunchers, and those sword-swinging turtles all seem so darn COOL. They TAKE what they want with a boom-boom of their rifle and a slash of their sword. No cumbersome words are really necessary. And the women just LOVE them (except if the women are playing pool and the crocodile-crunching guy offers them an ordinary "light beer" instead of a "Bud"). These are our text books, ladies and gentlemen.

Whatever qualms we might have about the validity of our injected behavior are quickly assuaged as so-called comedians bellow out their "jokes" from the very bottom of the "gender gap." Girls act this way, guys act this way... that routine never fails to get them "ho, ho, ho'ing" in the aisles. And most times our jester and his/her audience don't even stop to ask why. Why ask why? Just drink Bud Dry. And remember to offer it to her by name. Especially if she's armed with a cue stick.

"When does attention become harassment?"

BY CHRISTINA M. TISA

Sexual harassment is neither fun to read or write about. Unfortunately, there is incredible need to do both.

Sexual harassment has the power to make women feel weak and vulnerable. It is a very foggy issue, with many repercussions and consequences, in that there are very few clear lines of definition. When does attention become harassment?

Until someone comes out and lists every action that constitutes it, things will not change. Anything that makes a woman feel uncomfortable can constitute harassment. Lewd contact, verbal innuendoes, or persistent phone calls are some of these things. It may seem a bit drastic to many people, but there is no limit to what can be deemed inappropriate.

This does not mean that a man can not show interest in a woman he finds attractive; he must act appropriately, showing respect and proper etiquette. Of course, the same goes for women. Unless a woman asserts herself to a man she finds offensive, harassment cannot take place. No one can read minds, and the only way of knowing whether or not actions are offensive is to tell the offender. If someone acts inappropriately, they must be told. If the action proceeds, this constitutes harassment.

The main point is that unwelcome or inappropriate attention is always wrong. No woman ever wants to be groped or grabbed, treated with disrespect, or treated as subservient. No one has the right to make anyone feel that way—male or female. The issue boils down to respect for fellow human beings.

If you are an offender, imagine what your sister would feel like if a man treated her the way you treat women. What would your mother say to a man who made rude comments or gestures?

From the receiving end, I can tell you that harassment is not easy to deal with. I am an independent woman, and I pride myself on my ability to handle uncomfortable situations. I thought I would fall to pieces when a man blatantly disregarded my personal sovereignty in my residence house a few months ago. I felt as though I was less than human for a few agonizing moments. The worst thing about the whole ordeal was that this man had no idea that his actions were unwelcome. In his eyes every woman would welcome sexual advances from him. What a blow to his ego when he found out that this wasn't true.

Remember this: no one has the right to harass you. If they do, make sure they know that their actions are unwelcome, and that you will take action against them. Always remember that the victim was not the perpetrator. The clothes one wears, the way they act, the people they hang around with—none of these are valid justifications for harassment. Once someone harasses you, the blame is out of your hands because no one can control the actions of another person without their consent.

Finally, a woman is not teasing you if she says no, nor is she playing hard to get. Take control of yourselves, and live right.

Guatemalan delegates clarify

TO THE EDITOR:

As members of the Witness for Peace delegation that went to Guatemala over January, we felt compelled to respond to Colleen Rush's article in the Feb. 12 issue of The Bucknellian. After conversation with several other delegates, we believe it is necessary to clarify a few points regarding the article entitled "Students spend Jan Plan fighting injustice," so that the group's goals and sentiments are not misrepresented.

First of all, the trip should be characterized as strictly an educational and consciousness-raising experience. To say that we were "fighting injustice" and to claim that we "changed the world," as the article states, is sensationalistic and misleading. Suggesting that a two-week "trek" to Guatemala would be sufficient to solve the country's problems and would change U. S. foreign policy is foolhardy and it oversimplifies the complex problems of the country. We never saw ourselves as great missionaries who would, in one fell swoop, reorder the universe, teach the world to sing, live in harmony, and heal a country that has suffered through 30 years of internal armed conflict.

In 1991 there were 778 people executed without a trial, 115 kidnappings (32 were children) and 100 torture victims.

The original focus of the article seemed to be the human rights situation, but this aspect was never adequately developed. Some quick facts: In 1991 there were 778 people executed without a trial, 115 kidnappings (32 were children) and 100 torture victims. Since the 1960's, 40,000 people have "disappeared" in Guatemala. This accounts for 42% of all disappearances in Latin America. In the early 1980's, approximately one million people were displaced and 150,000 fled to Mexico to avoid being massacred. In January of 1986, the military granted itself amnesty for all human rights violations. There is overwhelming evidence showing that the Guatemalan army and police are directly responsible for these actions. Ninety percent of the country lives in poverty, and malnutrition is one of the leading causes of death (source: Guatemala Human Rights Commission/USA).

But beyond the numbers game, our delegation was educated on the frightening daily reality of Guatemala through meetings with union leaders, women's rights advocates, college student leaders, the president of the Guatemalan landowners association, the Archbishop's Office of Human Rights and community health clinic organizers. We also spoke with CERJ, a rural-based human rights organization.

The article stated that we met with "an ambassador" at the U. S. Embassy. This is incorrect and, in fact, the U. S. ambassador to Guatemala (Ambassador Struck) left several months ago and they are waiting for Clinton to appoint a new one. However, we did meet with the U. S. Embassy economics advisor, Stephen Grow. He is not the ambassador. A delegate was quoted saying that a man at the embassy told us, "the U. S. government is the number one enemy of Guatemalans but the people are their friends." We were told this but it was in a meeting at a health care center, by a man in a marginal community outside of Guatemala City. It would seem obvious that someone at the U. S. embassy would not say the U. S. government is an enemy.

Additionally, we believe that the "dirty diaper" quote needs qualification. With little explanation, it was injected into the middle of the article and without clarification this statement perpetuates stereotypes. Left alone, this quote paints a skewed portrait of Guatemalans by depicting them as dirty, gross people who uncaringly leave their soiled children unattended. Picturing Latin Americans and the poor in general as being these stupid, slovenly people only reinforces many people's prejudices. In reality, Guatemala is a very formal country. The people do not order from J. Crew but they often wear collared shirts, never wear shorts, and always try to stay clean, and you will never see a Guatemalan wearing ripped clothing.

It was nice to see coverage of the trip, but we hope that next time the writer is more careful with the facts. Also the offertory collections at the 11 a.m. interdenominational church service (not mass as stated in the article) are going to be used to buy dental equipment for the UPAVIM (Unity for a Better Life) health center. One final note is that the University chaplain, Alison Boden, did not receive due credit for putting together the trip. She was the one who, as a WFP delegate on a trip to Nicaraqua, was inspired to share the experience with Bucknellians. It was the first of its kind for Bucknell and has had an immeasurable impact on the students who went.

Punish prisoners on death row

TO THE EDITOR:

John Shire's article ("Court ignoring new evidence of innocence") in the February 5th Bucknellian is somewhat misguided and does not accurately describe what was actually decided by the Court.

The case, Herrara v. Collins, presented the question of whether it violates due process or constitutes cruel and unusual punishment for a state to execute a person who, having been convicted of murder after a full and fair trial, later alleges that newly discovered evidence shows him to be "actually innocent." In 1981 on the basis of proof which included two eyewitness identifications, numerous circumstantial evidence and a handwritten letter by Herrera admitting his guilt, Herrera was convicted of murder and sentenced to death in January 1982. In his first habeas petition, he failed to prove that his trial had been unconstitutional—he had been given a fair trial. Habeas review does not decide innocence or guilt, but solely whether constitutional rights have been preserved.

Now, over ten years later, Herrera claims to have new evidence that proves himself innocent which, rather conveniently, places the blame on his deceased brother. The Court's decision affirmed the District Court's ruling that Herrera is not entitled to a retrial. The District Court said, "Throughout our history the federal courts have assumed that they should not and could not intervene to prevent an execution so long as the prisoner had been convicted after a constitutionally adequate trial." The fact that he claims to have new evidence is irrelevant because the District Court could not offer relief anyway, because the trial had been constitutional. Shire's belief that, "the judicial system should...enable everyone to prove their innocence, regardless of the time-table in which they are able to provide the evidence" is simply ridiculous and mocks our judicial system.

In criminal cases, the trial is the paramount event for determining the defendant's guilt or innocence. In Shire's system, a guilty verdict by the court would merely be a setback to ultimately exonerating the convicted. Shire also incorrectly claims that this ruling sets a new precedent. In Townsend v. Sain (1963), the court ruled "that newly discovered evidence relevant only to a state prisoner's guilt or innocence is not a basis for federal habeas corpus relief." Further, as Justice O'Connor explained, "the Court reserves the question of whether federal courts may entertain convincing claims of actual innocence." Justice O'Connor also noted, "Not one judge—no state court judge, not the District Court Judge, none of the three Judges of the Court of Appeals, and none of the Justices of this Court—has expressed doubt of the petitioner's guilt."

At some point in time, the State's interest in finality must outweigh the prisoner's interest in yet another round of litigation. When the convicted are finally punished, then we will have justice.

Snowstorm cost me $25,a week's food

TO THE EDITOR:

I recently parked in an "illegal" parking spot and got a $25 parking ticket! I could not believe the ticket was $25, and I had parked in a spot that I thought was legal, but turned out to be illegal when the snow melted. I think the $25 charge is way too high. Where does that $25 go to anyway? To pay for more security officers to give us more tickets? In order to pay the tickets, students often cut their food budget. With the current national economic state, most of us are lucky we are here. We have barely enough money to pay for books and feed ourselves. Toss in a few $25 dollar parking tickets (or more if you don't go to your car for a couple of days), and the budget has got to give somewhere. Students must have books to go to class, and there is no lowering those costs, so the only variable is the food budget. $25 can go a pretty long way in Lewisburg, so that could be a week's worth of food. Not eating properly leads to students being tired and unable to concentrate, which deteriorates the quality of classes.

I see two possible alternatives: 1. Lower the cost of a ticket. I think $10 would be a sufficient deterrent to illegal parking while still providing revenue to security. 2. Give those who park illegally a week's free pass to the caf. The students could then pay off their parking tickets, and academia would remain unaffected.

Student: Bucknellian abuses funds

TO THE EDITOR:

After reading the February 12, 1993 issue of The Bucknellian, I was greatly disturbed by the article entitled "Enjoy the Subtle Ambiance of Morrone's" written by Staff Writer, Mitch Goldman and Editor-In-Chief, Andrew Cohen. I am not upset by the content of the restaurant review; rather, I am disheartened by the source of the funding for it. I added up the bill for your evening at Morrone's, which to my knowledge, was footed by The Bucknellian. Assuming 6% tax and a 15% tip, your bill should have added up to around $46. I know that The Bucknellian obtains some of its funding from Bucknell University (every student pays $100 per year for a "Student Activity Fee"), and I agree that it is an organization that warrants a sizable budget. I just think that The Bucknellian's resources could be better spent. The students on this campus are very fortunate, for the University helps fund most of the clubs and organizations on campus. I agree with these expenditures; a well rounded education evolves from activities both in and out of the classroom. However, I do not agree with such an abuse of these expenditures. I feel that The Bucknellian is being too liberal by providing the Editor-In-Chief and a guest an expensive meal on a weekly basis in order to obtain information for a simple restaurant review. I cannot believe that The Bucknellian could not find a better, more enriching, use of approximately $550 per semester! There is an abundance of other well-founded clubs and organizations on this campus, especially those with philanthropic aims, that I am sure could spend this money in a more appropriate fashion.

Sincerely,

label a group of people and miss what they are saying. Please do not miss the message of Jesus Christ.

In Romans 10:13 it says, "Everyone who calls on the name of the Lord will be saved." That name is Jesus and God's promises are TRUE.

I'm sure that every one of you knows someone that is involved in one of the Christian fellowships on campus; so, our challenge to you is for you to ask us why this week happened and why Jesus is such a big deal in our lives. Fellowship of Christian Athletes meets on Tuesday nights at 9:00 in Larison Dining Hall and Christians in Action meets on Friday nights at 6:45 in Walls Lounge, ELC. You all are invited to come out to find out more about who Jesus is and how He has changed each of our lives.

Sincerely,

The voice of a new generation: Emerging techno sub-culture—cyberpunk

BY JOYCE DOLLINGER

Cyberpunk is the combination of cybernetics. It is the comparative science of electronic computers and the human nervous system, with punk, an anti-social rebellion. It has generated a new subculture of modern technology, literature, music, art, and smart drugs. Cyberpunk has been evolving naturally outside the mainstream for a long time. Science movements, computer whizzes, and a cyberpunk subculture are emerging from their from their various angles to create this new techno-phenomenon. The style of the Cyberpunks is the sci-fi look combined with intense computer graphics.

Cyberpunk began when science-fiction writers merged into the tough world of computer hackers and cutting edge technology. Stewart Brand, editor of Whole Earth Catalog labels cyberpunk as "technology with attitude," while sci-fi writer Bruce Sterling calls it "an unholy alliance of the technical world with the underground of pop culture and streetlevel anarchy." But the definition that best fits this new culture was stated by a university mathematician named Rudy Rucker. He said cyberpunk is "the fusion of humans and machines." Many believe that cyberpunk is the counterculture of the computer age. But cyberpunk is really just bringing the high-tech world into a daily setting.

MODERN TECHNOLOGY

Cyberpunk attempts to bring in a new frontier that will be computer generated. Supporters of this movement maintain that computers will be used for everything. Humans may even be able to install a jack behind their ear which can be plugged into a computer. Having a computer screen instead of eyes, they could bring up information from their mind and display it across their eyes. People would also have radio links to central computers or data bases to be able to constantly access information. The only thing that could destroy data would be a certain computer virus, akin to that of human AIDS.

Cyberpunk would enable modern technology to be combined with the seamy underlife of violence, crime, and organized running of information. One possibility is a kind of computer warfare where people would battle other's programs in order to overcome their protective passwords. Persons could find out everything about others, including information such as secret bank accounts, or their money laundering. Money and power would then become the central motivating force. Of the utmost importance would be to hire computer pros to protect, as well as pirate information. Datacops, like today's Secret Service, would guard the computer world.

Studies on the implications of Cyberpunk foresee shifts in the present world order. It would facilitate the power of multi-national corporations due to the ease of information transfer that Cyberpunk enables. World power would be placed more in these MNC's than in governments. Society would become purely capitalistic, where power and money are most important. Government, therefore, could be transformed to a state police or tyranny.

Much of cyberpunk also explores the human body. We may be able to use more artificial body parts and biologically enhance what we have. There will be much tailoring of the human body to become something different. The result would be a re-evaluation of the way people relate to one another because people will no longer have the burden of having to deal with who they are. They will be able to create who and what they want to be.

Cyberspace and virtual reality would interconnect all communication. A planetary network would be devised so data banks all over the world can be tapped. Virtual communities would evolve where all Cyberpunks could meet, gossip, and discuss inside knowledge.

ATTITUDE OF THE CYBERPUNKS

The attitude of the Cyberpunks is one of free information, hands on rule, and decentralization. It is a more Machiavellian system. There might be more more scheming and plotting in order to use other people for their own devices. It would also include a variation of Darwinism; people only out for their own survival.

ROLE PLAYING GAMES

Role playing games and cyberpunk systems are coming out from the subculture of the Cyberpunks of today. The "net", the interconnection between universities and computer logs, which people patch into for information, software, games and electronic mail, is used for huge, interactive games. At the time of log-on, many people will be playing. There is no start or end of the game and people can exit whenever they choose. There are no rules; people learn by doing. The goal is to increase one's status on the network by progressing to higher levels and becoming more powerful than others.

LITERATURE

Books like Neuromancer, written by William Gibson and Hacker Crackdown, written by Bruce Sterling, have helped to generate this cyberpunk culture. They discuss the futuristic problems that computers and technology might cause in a combination of the Road Warrior/action-violence/high-technology stories.

MUSIC

The music inspired by Cyberpunk is computer enhanced and synthetic. "Acid house" and "Rave" are labels attached to a techno-disco-hip-hop beat, and "industrial" is a more hard core sound that combines the mixing of machine synthesizers, radio and electronic feedback, and clanks and bangs. These genres are being played at clubs or big parties held in warehouses. Parties are promoted by young adults through electronic mail and word of mouth. Often dressing in outrageous clothes or urban fashion, many dancers take psychedelic drugs in order to heighten the senses.

THEATER AND FILMS

Performance art and films that deal with cyberpunk themes have already emerged as well. Off-Broadway in New York City, a show called Tubes starring Blue Man Group, contains visual stunts, art demonstrations and much audience participation. Films such as Tronn, Blade Runner, Total Recall, Terminator 2 and The Lawnmower Man also illustrate the concepts of virtual reality, human-like machines, and dystopia.

SMART DRUGS

Certain drugs or "smart drugs" would be used in this new world of the Cyberpunks. Programs would be created and placed into people's heads to change their perceptions or their personalities. Centrophenoxine, an anti-aging and intelligence booster is being perfected as we speak, while drugs such as ecstasy, L-dopa, MDA, euphoria and deprenyl continue to be used.

The cyberpunk generation of the future seems very scary and cold, but as a cyberpunk would say, "If you don't control technology, it will control you." Yet the subculture lives on, and more and more outsiders are becoming educated and enthralled by the possibilities that mind combined with machine can offer.

Students aid women in transition

SVWIT shelter for battered women seeks students to volunteer for work on hotlines

BY KATE FINK
Bucknellian Staff Writer

One of the advantages of going to a small school like Bucknell, in a small town like Lewisburg, is that getting involved is so easy. Some students choose to get involved in sports or clubs. Many others choose to use their free time to make a difference in others' lives. Susquehanna Valley Women In Transition (SVWIT) is a non-profit community service organization that avails a training program to Bucknell students who want to reach out to local victimized women.

Located in a regular house in Lewisburg, the SVWIT shelter arose out of the necessity for crisis intervention. The staff provides a support system for women who have experienced sexual assault, domestic violence, drug and alcohol abuse, or any other type of desperate situation. A 24-hour hotline, an emergency 30-day shelter, support groups, short-term counseling, legal consultations and accompaniment, information and referral, community education, and reading materials are the means by which help is offered.

The shelter operates under the "empowerment" philosophy whereby staff members do not advise the battered women but, instead, help them to decide for themselves what their next step should be. The staff discusses with them the various options they have and answers any ensuing questions, but the battered women ultimately determine their own actions. It is hoped that through SVWIT's services the victims will gain enough self-confidence and self-awareness that they will feel strong enough to confront their immediate and future situations on their own and to take control of their own lives.

The program offered to student volunteers trains them to work on the hotline. Consisting of 50 hours of group instruction, role plays, experiential exercises, guest speakers from the community, and audio-visual materials, the training provides an understanding of the "nature and scope of domestic violence as well as the historical and societal attitudes in which it is rooted" (SVWIT training manual). The group of about 20 student and community volunteers meet twice a week for four hours during a one month period and are taught by women who have at one time been victims themselves.

Awareness issues such as racism, sexism, ageism, classism, date rape, suicide and drug abuse, as well as issues specific to domestic violence such as clarification of myths and facts, why battered women stay in abusive relationships, why men abuse, and effects of domestic violence on children, are discussed in one stage of the training. It is hoped that with these issues the volunteers will learn about themselves and the factors surrounding the victims' situations so they will have more of a focus when they council. The training then focuses on counseling issues to prepare the volunteers for their telephone contact. Active/reflective listening, problem-solving, and crisis intervention skills are taught and practiced. In the third stage, the volunteer is paired with a "mentor" to see how the shelter is run day by day.

Nicola Stojak '93, who was in the training course in the fall, said, "It was more involved than I thought it would be. There are more variables in the crises women face than domestic violence." She cites the topics discussed as informative and familiar. "Most of it was information that I had heard before in my classes. But it got much more specific so that it would be helpful in the cases I might confront."

The staff makes a concerted effort to "stay positive, strong, and hopeful," says Stojak, "When you hear that even one case is a success it helps you feel that what you're doing is worthwhile." The atmosphere of the office is colorful and decorative because the work done therein can be so gloomy. Plants fill the windows and positive-thinking posters cover the walls. One painting, done by a violence survivor, depicts a woman, arms outstretched and hair blowing, tossing all her pain and hurt into the ocean. The artist says it is an illustration of the new freedom she felt after her experience with SVWIT. Says a staff member, "That painting is enough to keep me going for weeks."

Tina Cannon '93, another Bucknell student involved with SVWIT, states the need the center has for more volunteers. "Anyone who is willing to go through the program would be welcomed. Anyone who is concerned with the issues and who is not so much sympathetic as empathetic to the problems of these women could make it a very positive experience for everyone." She suggested that if a student would like to become more involved than just working on the hotline, it is possible to help out with transportation, rape counseling, and legal advocacy accompaniment. "Any enthusiastic person with lots of ideas can really do a lot," she said.

Many women do not have the job security, education, financial stability, or family networking to be able to survive on their own or with children if they were to flee a desperate situation. It is these women who seek the services of shelters such as SVWIT. It is a fact that in the United States there are three times as many animal shelters as there are shelters for victims of domestic abuse (Senate Judicial Committee). This means that each existing shelter must offer the most caring and the most extensive services possible.

The next volunteer training course begins on April 2 and will be located at St. Paul's United Church of Christ, on the corner of Market and Mill Streets in Selinsgrove. Those interested may reach SVWIT at 523-6482 or 374-7773.

Facts on Abuse

...At least 1.8 million women are battered each year in the US.

...Battering is the single major cause of death to women, exceeding rapes, muggings, and auto accidents.

...Between 2,000 and 4,000 women are beaten to death each year in the U.S.

...The suicides of 20% of white women and 50% of black women are preceded by incidents of domestic violence.

...60% of all married women experience physical violence by their husbands at some time during their marriage.

...60% of battered women are also raped by their husbands.

Art-wrenching sculpture

KRISTINA SCHURR
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Among the various sculptures already dotting the campus, a new concrete addition has found a home on the lawn behind the Music and Arts Building.

To the casual observer, this sculpture resembles three wrenches, attached at the center. But its creator, graduate student Eric Troffkin, calls it a "tripod."

Upon closer inspection, however, one realizes that the sculpture is actually one abstract sculpture duplicated three times. "It's a component system with three cement units, each cast seperately in plywood containers," said Troffkin. "The units were then connected in a way that the individual components allowed."

According to Troffkin, creating each plywood casting for the sculpture took one day. Each unit then took about three days to harden. The sculpture, which does not have a name, was created in June 1992. It was placed behind the Music and Arts building last October.

"This particular sculpture wasn't difficult to create once I had an idea about what I wanted. The hardest part is thinking about what you want to do," he said. "You can eventually figure out how to do it."

Troffkin, who graduated from Amherst College as an art major, is currently taking classes at Bucknell as well as working in the art department as a graduate assistant. He concentrates on sculpture, using concrete and other "castable materials," i.e. materials which can be poured and later harden into unique shapes.

Profile: Garrett Morgan

Kentucky-born Garrett A. Morgan, (1877-1963), received wide recognition for his contibutions to public safety. Firemen in many cities in the early 1900's wore the safety helmet and gas mask that he invented. For this invention, he was awarded a gold medal at the Second International Exposition of Safety and Sanitation in New York, in 1914. Two years later Morgan himself used the mask to rescue men trapped by a gas explosion in a tunnel being constructed under Lake Erie. Following the disaster which took 21 lives, the city of Cleveland honored him with a gold medal for his heroic efforts.

In 1923 Morgan received a patent for his new concept—a traffic sign to regulate vehicle movement in city areas. "Stop" and "Go" signs were systematically raised and lowered at intersections to bring order to the street chaos, as well as improve traffic safety. Several years later, after he had sold his design to the General Electric Company, Morgan's device was replaced with the light signal still in use today.

Avoid spring break scams by planning ahead

Whether vacationing in Nassau, Panama City, or Cancun, the advice of travel agents and students who have gone before is helpful

BY SUSAN SMITH
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Seven days and six nights in Cancun for only $349? And that low price includes airfare? How tempting is a deal like that in the dead of a Lewisburg winter? According to Allethea Bruce, however, who owns West Branch Travel in Williamsport, "A lot of tour operators who pop up for Spring Break and graduation are not reliable."

Tammy Kratzer of Carefree Travel in Lewisburg agrees, "You have to be very careful." Her travel agency does use some college tour operators, but not all of them, as there have been problems in the past.

Kratzer said, "If you use a tour operator, you have to be up for almost anything," not just sunny weather. She said that last year, a group of students were supposed to fly out of Philadelphia and that the day before they were to leave they were informed by their tour operator that all Philadelphia flights were full and that they would have to fly out of New York. This posed a problem since they had no way to the city. Finally, after applying pressure, the tour operator agreed to hire a van to drive them to the New York airport. Still, it was an inconvenience.

Bruce said that already this year many Bucknell students have called her travel agency only to find out that their tour operator isn't even listed as an official business.

Bruce also pointed to past problems such as motels being located in high crime districts and being miles from the beach. She said, "Often it's not safe to be out at night."

All tour operator Spring Breaks are not riddled with problems, however. Neil Stein '94 and eight friends spent Spring Break in Panama City, Florida last year and found that "for the money it was alright."

Seven days worth of lodging cost about $130 and the motel was right on the beach. The package also included special discounts at area bars and attractions.

While his trip was fun, Stein said, "Everyone should try it once but then they'd know that they wouldn't want to do it again." Panama City, which Stein described as "a big strip of bright neon colors catering to the Spring Break crowd," was something that "everyone should have an opportunity to experience during college."

Jen Haytaian '93, Susan Brandick '93, Nicolo Stojak '93, Anne Buck '93, and Sunny Speigel '93 frolick on a water float in Nassau, Bahamas during Spring Break 1991.

To find a legitimate tour operator and assure a problem-free Spring Break like Stein's, Bruce suggests checking with a travel agent to see if a potential tour operator is approved by the American Society of Travel Agents (ASTA). A registered tour operator will have five million dollars in insurance to protect its clients. All vacation money will be put in an escrow account. Vacation money is then transferred directly from the account to hotels and airlines. Escrow accounts are meant to assure that the client's money never falls into an individual tour operators hands and is stolen.

Travel agents can also tell Spring Breakers the exact location of their hotel. Bruce pointed out that the difference between a cheap and moderate hotel usually averages only $30-$40 per person. Sometimes taxi fare to and from the beach from a downtown hotel can cost more than $50 for the week.

Travel agents can also recommend the cheapest and safest Spring Break destinations. According to Bruce, the United States government currently has a travel warning posted about Jamaica due to its high crime and drug problems. Kratzer also warned of the crime in Jamaica and suggested that students could get "more for their money in Mexico."

Bruce also cautioned students about vacationing in South Carolina as the condos and hotels are geared more towards golfers and an older age group. She also suggested driving rather than flying to Florida, as most car rental agencies require drivers to be 25 years of age or "pay considerable extra for insurance."

Kratzer warned of the weather in South Carolina and Bermuda. She said, "It's not beach weather. You couldn't go for a swim in the ocean at this time of the year."

Other travel agent tips included booking charter flights out of Philadelphia and Baltimore and spending Spring Break on the ski slopes, as ski resort rates decrease towards the end of March.

Cancun, the Gulf Coast of Florida, and Nassau were the most recommended destinations. Susan Brandick '93 vacationed in Nassau two Spring Breaks ago with four friends and said, "It's a beautiful place to relax. The sun was great." While the nightlife was focused on one bar, her group met a taxi driver who took them to native restaurants which added to their fun. One week's accommodations, airfare, transportation to and from the airport, and taxes cost around $500.

While both travel agents warned that plans should be made soon, they admitted that there is also the spontaneous Spring Break. Bruce said, "This year particularly people want to drive somewhere."

As with those who book vacations with the tour operators, be flexible if you are one of the unplanned. Darren Millman '93 spontaneously traveled with eight friends to the Keys for Spring Break his sophomore year and "had no complaints and would do it again." With no definite destination plans, the group spent a couple of nights in a campground before driving on to Key West. There they had no problems finding a hotel.

The only previous arrangements the group had made was to bring their own beer (15 cases of warm Busch) since underage drinking is so strictly enforced in the Keys and east coast of Florida.

Tricks to a successful Spring Break go both ways, so plan ahead a little and make sure you're the one pulling the scam.

A day in the life of... physical plant worker, Bill Zimmerman

Bill Zimmerman works many long and hard hours maintaining Bucknell's grounds and facilities to give them a manicured look.

Zimmerman tackles the early morning snow so students and faculty can go about their day as usual.

KRISTINA SCHURR
Bucknellian Staff Writer

When snow hits Bucknell with as much force, as it did this week, University business continues as usual. But the reason that our school continues to run smoothly is because workers from the physical plant are out en masse, clearing the paths and parking lots. These behind-the-scenes workers provide the labor to keep the school going year-round.

Bill Zimmerman, a 65 year-old laborer for the physical plant, is one of these workers. Working at the physical plant for almost 34 years, he maintains the grounds from season to season, landscaping in the warmer months, driving the snowplows during the winter. Jobs vary from day to day, but a typical day has Zimmerman beginning at 7 a.m. when he and his crew start that day's project. Employees work until 9 a.m., when they head to the plant's coffee shop for 15 minutes of warmth and hot coffee to guard them against the damp chill of Lewisburg. Lunchbreak is from 12:00 to 12:30, once again held in the coffee shop for some soup and sandwiches.

For Zimmerman, the warmer months are filled with the grounds keeping chores of seeding lawns, raking, moving and replanting shrubbery and trees. "Not every day is just regular maintenance, though," said Zimmerman. "If something comes up you might be on four different jobs all in one day."

Winter doesn't slow down the amount of work, however; it just changes the type of jobs. "Even in the winter there's a lot of stuff to be done," said Zimmerman. "If the weather is good, we'll trim some brush outside; if it's a bad day there's always sanding and painting to be done on the machines to get them ready for the spring." Other tasks include cleaning the storage area above the art barn, taking the carpet up from the entrance ways of academic buildings if it has been a wet day, etc.

Snowy days require more effort from him. He operates one of the snowplows, meaning that he needs to arrive at work at 5 or 6 a.m. in order to start clearing the University roads and parking lots. If the snow continues for many hours, as it did on Tuesday, he stays until late that night. "We try to get as much snow up as we can on the night it falls, because if we leave it until the next morning it's much harder to move."

Although this is Zimmerman's 34th year at the physical plant, he actually worked there for one and a half years in 1949 and '50. "I left the job to help my uncle manage his furniture store. After about ten years I decided that I would probably be better off back at Bucknell and started working on the dump trucks which picked up the garbage across campus, as well as from the houses on Sixth Street where Vedder is located now."

Zimmerman just returned to work this past Monday, due to a physical illness which forced him to take a six-week leave of absence. "I came to work on two previous Mondays and by lunchtime my shoulder started to bother me and I decided that I should take it easy for a while." He plans to retire at the end of next December.

Adjusted by second semester?

College lifestyle continues to challenge many first-year students

BY T.D. ZAPPULLA

For many first-year students the anxiety of adapting to a new environment has finally ended. The most awkward stage of college life, that "dreaded first-semester," is now over. The question is now, how have most students adjusted to college life?

After acclimating themselves to the new surroundings, academia, and social situations that accompany the move from high school to college, many first-year students have been able to find their own little niche within the campus community. They are now part of that large majority which considers itself to be settled. And it's just in time for second semester.

First-year students have to tackle many new predicaments head on. One example of this is the increased workload. "My workload here is about equal to or maybe a little bit more than it was in high school," said Kim Genovese,'96, Chemistry major. "But you have to put more responsibility on yourself to do the work because there is nobody here to check it or make sure you have it done."

It is this responsibility that serves as the first step towards independence.

Just as the workload has increased, the amount of free time has decreased, causing a change in study habits. "Hours are much later here," Kim said, "During the day you're busy with classes, activities, and meetings. So the only time you have to fit your homework in is later on at night.

Tom Henderson '96, somewhat agreed. "My study habits are kind of random. There are some days where I'll come back from classes and get right to work, but then there are other times when I won't start up until about 11 p.m.; it depends on what other things I have planned for the day."

Another aspect of college adjustment is the new social situation presented by dormitory life. In high school, students were surrounded by each other seven hours a day, five days a week, but each day they received a break from each other as they finished classes and went off in their separate directions. College life extends these hours by implementing on-campus housing, where students are constantly surrounded by others. Many feel that these new living conditions will serve as the bonding agent for lasting relationships. Music major Catherine Hollyer '96, said, "Since we live together, we can get know each other better, and can develop more lasting friendships rather than just passing acquaintances."

Many freshman are breathing a sigh of relief, now that the adjustment period is over. Most had positive reactions to first semester, and a few weren't so positive, but the overall consensus was that college is a big adjustment. By second semester, you begin feeling much more comfortable.

Student sounds heard across campus

BY JANELLE OLTORIK
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Did you ever wonder what happened to that blond woman in your calc class? Or that tall guy in your bio lab? Well, he changed his bio major, and she's no longer dabbling in mathematics. They're music majors now and giving the latest student recitals.

Amy Anderson '94 and John Caponegro '94 will be performing at 8 p.m.on Feb. 23, singing in Bucknell Hall. Dave Chrzanowski '93 will follow on the organ at 8 p.m. on Feb. 25 in Rooke Chapel.

Deb Hildebrandt—The Bucknellian

David Chrzanowski '93 sitting at the organ in Rooke Chapel. Last years recipient of the Grever Award, Chrzanowski will perform in the chapel on Feb. 25 in the second of two student recitals this week.

Anderson, a soprano, and Caponegro, a tenor, will provide the first recital of the week. Their junior recital will consist of duets by Faure and Rossini, and solos by several composers including Argento, Charpentier, and Puccinni, many of which are in foreign languages.

Striving for careers in music, Anderson and Caponegro both sing with the Rooke Chapel Choir and Bucknell Opera Company while completing their majors in music. Anderson, who also participates in the Wind Ensemble, received a Knight Fellowship last summer which she says "broadened my musical horizons." During this internship, Anderson assisted a Bucknell professor in researching performance methods for reinstating a performing Collegium Music, an ensemble which performs Renaissance and Baroque music, in which she is currently a participant.

Recently completing a residency in Florida, Caponegro worked with many famous vocalists and composers while collaborating on various music projects during January. "It was an amazing experience," said Caponegro, who also participates in the Concert Chorale. "The works will premiere in the spring of 1993, and the fall of 1994. I am obviously very excited." The works include a multimedia theatrical work, and a chamber opera titled Jacob's Room.

Both performers hope to carry their musical interests into their careers, whether as solo singers or with companies. Anderson is also considering graduate school for choral conducting, and Caponegro would prefer working with a well-known opera company.

Preparation for any type of endeavor has been superb on the part of Bucknell, they both claim. "For a small liberal arts college which doesn't contain the cut-throat competition of a major conservatory, the vocal program here is excellent in terms of training, knowledge, and preparation for the real world," said Caponegro.

Chrzanowski, recipient of last year's Grever Award, an honor bestowed on an upcoming senior showing vast improvement on a musical instrument, will perform his recital in honor of Bucknell alumna Barbara Watson Grever.

Works to be performed will include organ pieces by composers such as Bach, Couperin, and Gabriele, with harpsichord and brass accompaniment. Chrzanowski chose to combine organ with brass for its uniqueness. "There is not much literature for these two instruments together. It should be quite different," said Chrzanowski. Also accompanying Chrzanowski will be the Rooke Chapel Choir.

Entering Bucknell as a biology major, Chrzanowski changed his career goals after becoming involved with the music department. "The department is outstanding," said Chrzanowski. "Everyone's exceptionally supportive of all our endeavors."

Although the music department is not particularly large in comparison to other schools and conservatories, the size remains an advantage to the students. "We receive a lot more individual attention than students at other schools; therefore, we improve much more quickly," said Chrzanowski.

Besides specializing in the organ, Chrzanowski also participates in the Chapel Choir and Concert Chorale. His future plans include continuing obtaining a master's degree and eventually a doctorate, before pursuing a teaching career.

So, check out that guy from your bio lab or that woman from your calc class, and see what they're up to now. The evenings are relaxing, cultural, and free.

Top brass toot their horns in Weis

For over a decade, the Commonwealth Brass Quintet has allowed faculty members from schools in Pennsylvania to showcase their talents. On Feb. 21, the group will present their latest concert in the Weis Center. The show will start at 2:30 p.m. and is free and open to the public.

The program for the afternoon will include "Second Military Suite in F" by Gustav Holst, "Music for Brass Instruments" by Ingolf Dahl, and "Four Spanish Renaissance Dances" as well as works by Bach and Albinoni.

Currently, the quintet is comprised of William Kenny, assistant professor of music and director of bands at Bucknell, on horn; Robert LaBarca, trombone instructor at Bucknell, on trombone; Victor Rislow, professor of music at Susquehanna University, on trumpet; Michael Trego, a band director from Mifflintown, on trumpet; and Donald Stanley, a retired professor of music from Mansfield University, on tuba.

Formed in 1981, the Commonwealth Brass Quintet strives to promote the performance of brass chamber music. Although this is their first concert at Bucknell this semester, the ensemble performed on other campuses earlier in the year.

The group has previously performed at colleges, churches, arts festivals, music educators' conferences, and the Empire Brass Quintet workshop at the Tanglewood Institute.

Professor discusses African-American pop art

Jean Auro—The Bucknellian

Jody Blake, assistant professor of art, gives a slide talk on Feb. 23 dealing with the emergence of African-American pop art in the 1960s and 70s. Titled "Aunt Jemima's Revenge: Pop Art and Black Power in the 1960s and 1970s," the discussion will focus on using art to make political and ideological statements.

BY NICOLE COBBAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

One of the most distinct forms of expression for a culture is its art work. In a glance the tone, expression, and sometimes even political statement can be read and interpreted. Jody Blake, assistant professor of art, explores the African-American culture of the 1960's and early 70's in her slide presentation titled "Aunt Jemima's Revenge: Pop Art and Black Power in the 1960's and 1970's." As part of the ongoing events celebrating Black History month, the talk will take place Feb. 23 at 7:30 p.m. in the Langone Center Forum.

For Blake, the artists of this period manipulated art to comment on the social and political climate of the decade, a decade of extreme activity in civil rights.

"It [art] was one of the ways in which African-American artists responded to the event and ideas of the civil rights movement," said Blake. "These are artists who decided, rather than to overthrow the modern art idiom, to subvert it from within. To transform it according to their own purposes."

There are several parallels which can be made between the African-American pop artists of this era and other pop artists such as Andy Warhol. Often, both genres incorporate appropriate pop art imagery. However African-American pop art is used primarily to further ideological and political statements.

Blake's talk will focus on two major avenues of African-American pop art. The first deals with popular imagery, subject matter, or symbols that are easily identified by the American public. Many of the slides use the image of Aunt Jemima, a familiar commercialized character, distorted into unconventional roles.

This method of using household objects for thematic subjects is more known to people through artists like Andy Warhol, who made famous his series on items such as the Campbell's Soup can. Blake warns, however, that there is a distinct difference. Warhol's work is often "art about forms, rather than an art about politics," said Blake.

The alternate form which Blake will be discussing is similar to the first. It centers around images of the American flag. Although this theme is more associated with Jasper Johns, another Caucasian American pop artist, again the African-American use of the flag is much more political.

In one particular painting by Ringold titled "Die Nigger," the blue section of the flag is faintly shaded with the word "die," and the white stripes are cut to form the words "nigger." The message is brutally clear. "It [the painting] is saying that American democracy is totally permeated by racism," said Blake.

Another African-American artist uses the body prints of himself combined with the American flag. In one picture the American flag is portrayed as being a noose around the artist's neck.

In her third year of teaching at Bucknell, Blake received her doctorate in art history from the University of Delaware. Recently, her interests have branched into the influence that jazz plays in African-American art. The connections between the two forms add a distinct ingredient to African-American pop art that distinguishes it clearly from mainstream pop art.

"There is a parallel between music and the visual arts," said Blake. "Jazz is a unique idiom that comes out of merging African and European idioms."

Although Blake makes no direct correlation between the statements made by the paintings in her presentation and the current racial and political situations, she says that regardless of whether the parallels are explicitly stated, "I think that we always make those connections. . . [I'll] let the artists speak with their voices."

Phillip Lindsay Mason, The Deathmakers, 1968. This painting, which recalls the assassination of Malcolm X, comments on the racial climate of the 1960's. Overwhelmed by the image of the American flag in the background, paintings like these represent the emergence of African-American pop art, the topic of discussion in Prof. Jody Blake's presentation.

Television worth staying up for

The battle has begun. After signing a multi-million dollar contract with CBS, Dave Letterman, the newly crowned King of Late-Night Television, grabs the media spotlight as well as the big bucks.

BY JOYCE DOLLINGER
Bucknellian Staff Writer

During this past January a war broke out. A late-night talk show war. Blasted all over the press, it was publicized that David Letterman, a mocker of the traditional talk show, was packing his bags and heading for the deal of his life. This summer Letterman will switch from NBC, the network which created his eleven year late-night career, to CBS, the network which will give him a three year contract worth $42 million and the 11:30 p.m. time spot he wanted since Johnny Carson retired from the Tonight Show last May.

A senior Bucknellian said, "David Letterman moved because it was media hype and so that more people would watch the show, and, thus, it would increase his ratings. Also, more people will watch him since he is on earlier."

This late-night shake-up will cause high competition with Jay Leno, the host of NBC's Tonight Show, which also airs at 11:30 p.m. "I really like what is going on because it stirs up a lot of competition and I think it will be very interesting to see how Letterman and Leno play out against each other on different networks and who wins the ratings battle," said Bob Reynolds, Weis Center Box Office Coordinator.

The loser of this whole game in show business is Arsenio Hall. Because his show is syndicated (different network affiliates buy the rights to air the show), he might not have a line-up in the coming future. Many of his best stations are CBS affiliates, and CBS will be exerting pressure on them to drop Hall for Letterman. Additionally, many stations that air Hall are also Fox stations where Chevy Chase is scheduled to air his new late-night talk show in September.

A large number of Bucknell students do watch late-night talk shows. "It is a good break from studies," said Marc Wachter '95. "It is the only thing that is basically on TV. Also, the late-night talk shows usually have quality people like David Letterman does."

Letterman seems to be the king of late-night programming, which could be the answer to why people are so fascinated by him. But, Reynolds believes Letterman's move will not affect the public. "I don't see the influence as being so pervasive that it actually changes the mind sets of college campuses," said Reynolds, "but I do think he becomes a cult icon figure and sort of the Rocky Horror Picture Show of late-night T.V."

On campus there is much Late-Night paraphernalia—T-shirts, pictures, towels, and hats. Letterman has contributed much to the American culture. The top-ten list, which was introduced in 1985, is a much imitated idea around. Letterman also boosted Leno's career. Long before Leno adopted the Tonight show he was a regular feature on Late-Night.

More importantly, Letterman's show biz irony created the new and improved atmosphere of the late-night talk show. Letterman's personality has also penetrated what people think about him. Bob Reynolds said, "Dave is a little bit of an egomaniac, hence his appeal. He is a little bit off-center and is really friends with nobody. He is a renegade, fly by the pants, beat-the-hell-out-of-the-competition type guy. People like Dave because Jay Leno and Carson before him were the suitcoat and tie, pinstriped industry-type people and even though Letterman wears the tie and suitcoat, you know he does not feel comfortable in it. He has a younger appeal because he is so brass, so controversial, and so willing to put down everybody he sees. He says things that everyone would like to say but don't have the nerve to actually say."

The list of Letterman antics that added to his success are numerous: Larry "Bud" Melman, Letterman's awesome fall guy; stupid pet tricks that will live in infamy on college campuses; Letterman's velcro suit; and of course Letterman's sidekick, Paul Shaffer, and the "World's Most Dangerous Band."

> "I think it will be very interesting to see how Letterman and Leno play out against each other on different networks and who wins the ratings battle."
> —Bob Reynolds, Weis Center Box Office Coordinator

Yet, what people recall most is his treatment of his guests, General Electric (the company which owns NBC), and his street theater with Meg, the woman who works for Simon & Schuster, the ringing random pay phones, and "who would ever forget things like dropping melons off a five story building. That was just a brilliant idea. So simple, yet so much fun," adds Reynolds.

In the end, while the public gained his humor, David Letterman gained two of the things he always wanted—one of the most generous entertainment contracts in the history of television and the public support longed for from NBC, but eventually gotten from rival network CBS.

Monk performs Atlas in Weis Center

Susan Naughton—The Bucknellian

Students walk the Coleman stage with Meredith Monk (center with braid) as part of an exercise for Monk's workshop. The versatile performance artist, Monk conducted a residency this past week combining most of the areas of the fine arts.

MONK

Alexandra, now played by Sally Gross, returns home in the third section, "Invisible Light," and remains seated at a table with nothing but a pot of coffee. From her childhood bedroom watch her two younger selves.

"It's a piece about spiritual quest, about lost values, but it's structured in the form of one person's life—one woman's life," said Monk.

The rehearsal process for Atlas resembled something like the workshops that have been taking place in Coleman. Famous for constantly reworking scripts during rehearsals, Monk rarely begins with a finished script or score. When Monk first sat down with her cast, all she brought with her was what she called "a kind of catalogue of ideas."

"Monk composes the way a choreographer does, grafting her material onto living bodies, tailoring material to the voices and personas that she has to work with," said Deborah Jowitt, writer for The New York Times. "She fairly burrows into a rehearsal—trying her own part, then sitting out and watching, stepping into someone else's part...sliding an arm around a performer who's just finished a draining scene without taking her eyes off the rehearsal."

Talented in multiple areas of performing, Monk is unique in that she has not limited herself to one area of expertise. Monk inherited the musical inclination of her family, and began movement exercises at a very young age. She also enrolled for classes in Dalcroze Eurhythonics, which instructs students to incorporate musical values with movement.

"One of the early processes of my work was trying to combine these things in one way or another," said Monk. "That was a very strong statement to make in our culture." Monk explains that although her versitility highlights her as unique in America, this country is one of the few cultures that does not combine multiple areas of the fine arts. Asian, as well as African cultures overlap almost all areas with one another. And Monk is interested in all of them.

"We're all people of the world," said Monk. "You can't have a narrow viewpoint. I'm interested in the whole world. In a sense it's like looking at culture or humanity from a bird's eye/God point of view."

Atlas showcases Monk's acclaimed singing, dancing, and composing talents into "a work as heart-warming as it is avant-garde," said Nancy Cook, manager of the Weis Center. However, the version brought to the Weis Center is a modified concert version of the full scale opera.

As a result, Atlas appeals to a wide range of audiences. "This is an amazing and unique opportunity for people at Bucknell and in the region to see and experience what's happening right now in American creative arts," said William Boswell, director of cultural events. "It's up-to-the-minute but accessible and should appeal to fans of music, theatre, dance, and opera."

Album Review

Stradlin's back in town

BY MICHAEL LETTS
Bucknellian Staff Writer

In the fall of 1991, Guns N' Roses lost the second of its five original members. Rhythm guitarist and childhood friend of Axl Rose, Izzy Stradlin left the band amidst a media blizzard of possible explanations for the split. Well, now some fifteen months later, the release of Stradlin's debut album with the Ju Ju Hounds makes it clear that getting back to his roots was Stradlin's number one objective. He even mentioned in an interview that his only interest was in making an album that mirrored his favorite music.

Izzy Stradlin, ex-member of Guns N' Roses, returns to the music scene with his debut solo album. Composed of cuts mirroring Stradlin's favorite artists, the album is an powerful re-entry for the famed guitarist.

Known for his love of The Rolling Stones, Stradlin accomplished his goal with flying colors. With it's rough, tough, and nail rhythm guitar laid down on top of an always present organ, wonderful slide guitar (provided by Rick Richards, ex-guitarist of The Georgia Satellites) and Stradlin's cigarette scarred, Keith Richards sound alike voice, one might think the album is a compilation of unreleased Stones tunes.

Yet, Stradlin performs his, shall we say, tribute with flair. Songs like "Bucket O' Trouble" tend to move more towards Stradlin's heavier days of old with a driving beat and aching guitar, and his unusual, although enjoyable, cover of Jimmy Cliff's "Pressure Drop" takes Reggae to a new dimension.

Perhaps the most rewarding aspect of the album is Stradlin's drive towards a new life above and beyond the shadow of Guns N' Roses. As he puts it nicely on the album's best track "Train Tracks," "You gotta change the backdrop/ Gotta keep the Faith." His reflections on his past in songs like "Train Tracks" power through the music, making his confidence in his new life quite evident.

However, Stradlin is compassionate and smart enough not to completely bury his past and take his time spent with Guns N' Roses for granted. On the first single from the album "Shuffle it All," he quietly sings, "Feel the motors winding on/ there ain't no news./ If you see those old friends out there/ tell them that I send my love." Added bonuses include joint vocals and guitar with Ronnie Wood on "Take a Look at the Guy" and the album's beautiful finale "Come on Now Inside" where Stradlin sums up the entire album in one line, "Look outside, I think the sun has come back/ Look outside, I think it's come again." Yup, the smile's back on Izzy Stradlin's face.

Auditions for spring play held

The Department of Theatre and Dance is holding auditions for its Spring Parent's Weekend play Sunday night. The title of the work is Our Country's Good by Timberlake Wertenbaker, a play about a group of prisoners who produce their own production from within jail.

Auditions will be held in Vaughan Lit 105 Sunday and Monday night at 7:00 p.m. Attendance to only one of these auditions is required.

The play will be directed by Bob Gainer, professor in the department of theatre and dance.

Copies of the play are on reservation in the Bertrand Library under Theatre to be looked at before the audition, although no former reading of the material is required to audition.

All interested people are invited to audition, whatever their background in theatre. For more information call Bob Gainer at x1235.

Concert Review
Payn sings on

BY KATIE DEBONVILLE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Diversity, international flavor, and true musicality—to attend a concert that exhibits any of these qualities is a treat. All three of these were displayed last Thursday night in Bucknell Hall when Dr. Catherine Payn, assistant professor of music, performed the first faculty recital of the Spring semester. Joining Payn were harpist Elizabeth Etters-Asmus and Dr. William Payn, associate professor of music, on piano.

First on the program was Robert Schumann's "Three Byron Songs, op. 95." The three movement piece, sung in German, demonstrated a side of the harp that isn't often seen. Etters-Asmus proved that the harp can do a great deal more than provide background music for angels. The volume of the harp covered the voice for a moment before giving way to Payn's talent.

The second movement of the work, marked by chromaticism and a general melancholy feeling, was followed by the triumphant third movement in which Payn displayed her ability for singing with a strong vibrato.

Poulenc's "A Sa Guitare," Caplet's "Deux Sonnets," and Tournier's "La lettre du jardinier" comprised the French portion of the evening's performance. The first piece featured a dissonant harp section, whereas Caplet's work demonstrated the contrast between the harp and vocal lines. The non-stepwise motion of the vocal part was carried well by Payn. The harp took on a background role in the third piece, which followed the text of music. When the text was lamenting, the vocal line was soft, slow, and melodic.

Lee Holby's "Two Arias" proved to be a crowd pleaser. The first aria was based on Turgenev's A Month in the Country. The piano part, more melodic than that of the voice, was an excellent contrast to the wide range of the vocal part.

The second aria, from Thorton Wilder's Our Town, was a melodic aria that was performed with a great deal of emotion. Again, Payn displayed her powerful vibrato, which helped to convey the sadness and wonder present in the text.

Following a brief intermission was William Holab's "To Sleep," for which Etters-Asmus returned to the stage. Ending the program was "Siete Conciones populares Espanolas" by Manuel de Falla. This seven movement work for voice, piano, and harp combined multiple elements to demonstrate a Spanish feel. Often the harp resembled a Spanish guitar. Payn used ornaments like trills to achieve a seductive Spanish sound. The use of pedal tones in the piano created a strong sound that in no way overpowered the harp or voice.

This recital marked the first of several faculty and student recitals to be performed this month. Payn will perform later this semester with the Bucknell University Orchestra.

The answer can be found on page 19.

SPORTS FRIDAY

BUCKNELL UNIVERSITY LEWISBURG, PA 17837

STAT OF THE WEEK: Basketball captain Juliet McGee '93 needs only 17 points to become the 8th women in Bucknell history to reach 1,000 points.

Women face Lehigh for the third time

BY JON TERRY
Bucknellian Staff Writer

After running its Patriot League record to 7-5 with an impressive 90-62 win over Navy on Wednesday, the Bucknell women's basketball team will look to make it two in a row tomorrow evening at Lehigh. The team will then have a week of rest before next Saturday's showdown with first place Holy Cross.

Lehigh, who lost three players to season-ending knee-injuries before the season even started, sports a Dallas Maverick-esque 1-22 record, with their one win coming over Colgate. Tomorrow's game will actually be the third time these two teams have met this year. The Bison recorded their first win of 1993 by beating Lehigh 89-75 in the Florida International Sun and Fun Tournament. Juliet McGee '93 led the team with a then-career-high 31 points and 17 rebounds.

In the rematch in much-colder Lewisburg three weeks later, the Bison were too much for the Engineers, winning 90-56. Twelve different Bucknell players scored points in that game, with McGee leading the way with 17. K.C. Vlah '96 had one of the better games of her young career, scoring 14 points on six-for-six shooting from the floor.

Lehigh is led by a pair of sophomores—guard Mary Beth Bedics and six-foot center Jean Klepczynski. Part of the reason the Bison beat Lehigh so handily the last time the two teams met was their ability to shut down these two players, the top returning scorers from last year. Bedics was held scoreless, while Klepczynski could only muster five points. Both players got in foul trouble. It was reserve Leigh Detweiler who did most of the scoring that night. The reserve forward scored 18 points on 7 of 11 shooting from the floor.

Poor shooting by the Engineers (they shot just 35% for the game) helped enable Bucknell to jump out to a 44-19 first-half lead, and the Bison never looked back.

Ladies run it up against Navy; fall to USMA

BY NEIL BARDACH AND MIKE MELESKY
Bucknellian Staff Writers

This past week in women's basketball, the Lady Bison dropped two games on the road to Patriot League foes, and won convincingly at home on Wednesday night in another Patriot League contest. Since Patriot League play began, the Bison have only posted a 1-4 mark on the road, but they are an impressive 5-1 at home in Davis Gym.

On Feb. 10 , the Lady Bison lost to a strong team at Lafayette by a score of 84-68. In this game, the two teams committed 60 fouls, 34 of which were called on the orange and blue. The mark set a single game Patriot League record for fouls. In the game, one more player fouled out (six) than reached double figures in scoring (five).

The team looked good in the first half and entered the locker room down by just five points, 35-30. However, Lafayette's high pressure defense was just too much for the Bison in the second half, and they scored just 33 points to Lafayette's 49.

Despite the loss, the Bison did have their bright spots. Juliet McGee '93 had eight points from the free throw line and 32 points over all, matching her career high. Also, McGee pulled down 12 rebounds, giving her a double-double, her eighth of the season to that point, and first of three for the week.

Bucknell remains on a roll heading into the final week

Breakin' Bison sink Navy, maul Army

BY LARNIE J. BOOKER
Bucknellian Staff Writer

This past week could have been billed as the week the Breakin' Bison went to war, as Bucknell matched up against the United States Military Academies, Army and Navy. Yet, in reality, the term "massacre" would have been more appropriate as the Orange and Blue upped its season record to 18-5 overall, 11-1 in the Patriot League.

First, we'll begin with the Black Knights from the Hudson. Last Saturday, the team travelled to New York riding a four-game winning streak, thus maintaining a first-place tie with the Crusaders of Holy Cross.

From the outset of the game, it looked as if a battle front would be mounted by Army behind the scoring of junior forward David Ardayfio, as he scored 16 of the home squad's first 22 points and helped pace the warriors in black to an early four-point cushion, 22-18. The Army brigade continued to roll behind 57% shooting from the floor and went on a 12-2 run over the next six minutes of the game to bring the score to 34-22.

"They came out more intense then we did," said Rayond Brown '94. "It took us a little while to realize that they weren't going to roll over and die, so we had to play hard."

With that in mind, Bucknell armed its big guns and fought back. The Bison's leading scorer, Chris Simpson '94, led the attack with six unanswered points in under a minute, and tri-captain forward Mike Bright '93 led an assault from long range with two three-point bombs to close out an 18-2 run and the half and give the Orange and Blue the slim margin of 40-36.

The second half attack by the Bison sent the soldiers in black retreating. The Breakin' Bison ran out to a 11-2 run and never looked back. Aradyfio once again was the lone gun in the Army arsenal, and he ran out of ammunition. The junior finished with 28 points.

Bucknell simply outgunned its opponent as three players scored in double figures. Simpson led the team with 19 points. Bright attacked the Cadets from all angles, scoring 17 points, garnering ten rebounds, dishing seven assists and recording four steals. The Bison were also helped by Army's 30% shooting from the field in the second half.

Matt Clark '93 nails one of his four trys against Navy last Wesdnesday night in Davis Gym. The sharpshooter from Puerto Rico tied his career high and has helped to solidify a strong Breakin' Bison bench.

Cagers to head to Bethlehem; host Loyola

BY JON TERRY
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The Breakin' Bison just keep on rolling. Winners of six games in a row and 13 of their last 14, the first place Bison are simply taking care of business these days. Bucknell is in the middle of a five-game stretch against opponents not expected to challenge for post-season honors, to say the least.

After three straight routs over teams from the Patriot League's second division—Lafayette, Army, and Navy—the competition actually gets softer this week. Tomorrow night the Bison travel to Bethlehem to face Lehigh. The Engineers were once traditional contenders in the Patriot League, and the Bucknell-Lehigh rivalry has produced some of the most memorable games in the histories of both schools.

Take last year's game in Bethlehem, for example. In what was arguably the most exciting game of the year, Paul Olkowski '93 sent the 1,000 or so Bucknellian road-trippers into a frenzy with his last-second layup which gave the Bison an important 95-94 victory.

The series also includes the game that head coach Charlie Woollum described as, "the most exciting game I've ever been involved in." Woollum was referring to Bucknell's epic 103-100 double-overtime win over Lehigh in the semi-finals of the East Coast Conference in 1987.

Track begins final preparations

BY CHRIS DROWNE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The word from the track and field office the past couple of weeks has been, "Stay the course, still making progress." Fortunately for the staff, that election rhetoric isn't being challenged by anyone, except Lehigh.

"It's a pretty even meet with Lehigh right now," said Head Coach Art Gulden, looking as if he enjoyed the challenge. His teams have always thrived on such challenges, and now have only one week to prepare to meet that challenge at the Patriot League Championships next weekend.

Unlike the other meets, Gulden and staff will treat tomorrow's meet on an individual basis. Up until now, all the training and evaluation had been done on a team scale, but not this weekend.

"Those tired or a little banged up will rest, while the people who need to sharpen their technique or have to qualify or improve their seedings for the championships will compete," said Gulden. That training will take place in the field house against several local schools.

Last weekend's training also took place here on campus. "We made progress in most of the events, but not in everyone," said Gulden, referring to last weekend's Bucknell Winter Track and Field Classic.

Well, giving credit where it's due, Bucknell earned six first-place finishes. Jim Farrer '93 took gold in both the mile (4:20.3) and 1000-yard run (2:19.2). John Lewis '93 and Mike Bronson '93 are doing their best to hold up the Bison's distance hopes. Lewis qualified for the IC4A Championships in the two-mile run with his time of 9:07.4. Bronson's time of 14:22.7 in the three-mile run earned him a first place finish.

Two freshmen also won events for Bucknell. Ed Loges '96 won the 60-yard high hurdles in 7.6 seconds. The triple jump crown went to Karim Abdul-Martin '96, who leaped 45' 11.75". One of Loges' former high school teammates, Rick van Emburgh '95 ran the 440-yard dash in 50.6 seconds. That time was good enough for second place in the meet and seventh place on Bucknell's all-time list.

One area where Gulden's troops will need to progress further is the weight events. Erik Stieler '96, heeding his coach's challenge, put the shot 46' 11" and finished third last weekend. That throw ranks ninth-best on Bucknell's all-time list.The countdown has begun, and the Bison have six days to prepare themselves for the stiff challenge from Lehigh. "We've been challenged in the past and won. I see no reason why we can't do it again this year," concluded Gulden.

Bright shines for Breakin' Bison

Senior keeps team on top as one of the best careers in Bucknell history draws to a close

BY SCOTT GRISIN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

One of the many reasons for the success of the Bucknell Breakin' Bison this season has been the leadership of tri-captain Mike Bright '93. Throughout his career, Bright had always shown the athletic ability that made him one of coach Charlie Woollum's most prized recruits ever. But this year, for the first time, Bright is looked up to for more than just his scoring ability. With the graduation of former captains Patrick King and Bill Courtney, Bright has stepped up as a much-needed and appreciated leader on and off the court.

Winning is important to Bright. "Wherever you go you want to win and be happy," he says, and his past is full of winning moments. In 1987, Mike scored the winning basket to give Monessen High School the PIAA Class A championship. He then spent a year at Fork Union Military Academy, where he played for a team that finished 22-7. So why would such an outstanding basketball player decide to continue his career at Bucknell University, when he was being heavily recruited by scores of Division I schools, including West Virginia, Pitt, and Miami?

Bucknell head coach Charlie Woollum believed that Bucknell was the right choice for Bright. "He was at Fork Union playing for a good friend of mine, and we followed him all year," says Woollum. "There were a lot of other people recruiting him. It was a situation where we just hung on and stayed with him—he also had a really good visit and enjoyed the players who were here."

Mike also thought Bucknell was the school for him. "I had a lot of reasons for choosing Bucknell," he says. "For one thing, the tradition here—Coach Woollum's winning tradition and his goal of graduating kids and things like that were positive to me, as well as the fact that he stuck in there when other big schools were around. He also let me know that he wanted me, not only as a player, but also as a person. As I started weighing my options, Bucknell rose to the top in academics and the tradition of winning, even though they weren't always on television like West Virginia and Pitt."

In addition to wanting to play basketball, Mike wanted to study engineering. "With the engineering, Coach Woollum and how he treated me when we talked, and the location of the school—only three and a half hours from my house—after weighing everything, Bucknell was on the top."

> "Without question he has been one of my favorite people over his career. I feel very close to him, and I look forward to the day he finishes playing so that we can just be friends."
> — Charlie Woollum
> Head Basketball Coach

Bright came to the Bison in 1989, and got off to a great start. "I came here not knowing I was going to even play right away," he says. "I knew that Coach Woollum liked to play people with experience, and he never liked to rush any youngster into a situation, but when I came here, he saw right away that I was ready above any other player out there."

He started every game as a freshman, was named to the East Coast Conference All-Rookie Team, and by the time his first collegiate season was over, Mike was already earning himself a place in the record books. After his season-high 20 points in his first career game, he went on to lead the Bison in rebounding and steals, while ranking second with 20 blocked shots, and third in scoring. His 314 points rank fourth among all-time Bucknell freshmen.

Bright continued his success the following year when he became the only sophomore named to the all-league team and earned Second-Team All-Patriot League honors. He set the Bucknell single-season record with 69 steals and finished second on the team in both scoring and rebounding during the season.

Last season Bright had a record-setting year. He set the school single-season record for three-pointers in a game with seven, broke his own record from the previous year with 71 steals, and set a Bucknell record with 171 three-point attempts. He added his name to the Patriot League record books as well, leading the league in steals (2.54 per game), ranking second in three-point percentage (38.6%), sixth in blocked shots (1.11) and rebounding (7.4), and eighth in field-goal percentage (47.7%).

Bright tries not to think of his accomplishments while he is playing, however. "After every game you hear 'I broke this' or 'I just did this'—it's a great feeling, but I don't think about it. It's something you look back on after you're done. You don't think about it while you're doing it or while it happens," says Bright. "If you do that, then you most likely won't make it." This philosophy is obviously paying off as Bright finishes his final season of Bucknell basketball. As one of the tri-captains, Bright has taken on the leadership role in the wake of Pat King and Bill Courtney, a role which he was never formally given during his first three years.

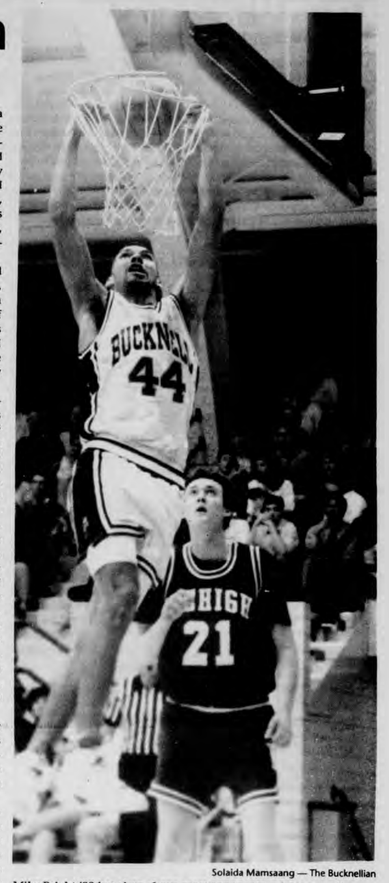
"Sophomore year, I had the most experience coming back as a sophomore than anyone on the team," says Bright. "I had more experience than Bill Courtney, and Pat King didn't even play at all. My experience was my leadership. I may not have been named captain, and I may not have been always talking and screaming on the court, but that's not my job even today—that's the point guard's job."

"Through actions, I think I led the team my sophomore, junior, and senior years. There are certain times when a certain play is part of being a leader—those are the things that determine a leader. This year I took on the role of being named the leader, but I think on the court my job is basically the same."

"He is a very talented player—there is no question about it," says Woollum. This season he continues to climb the all-time scoring list, leads the team in rebounding, and he has already passed his old record for steals in a season. From year to year, Mike has drawn more and more attention to himself from opposing teams. "Every year, new aspects of my game came about, but that was because of the attention that I got. First year, no one really knew about me, so I got a lot of drive-in dunks. The next year they took the drive away from me because they knew I could do that, so I developed my outside game. And now I have to put all of that together in order to become a good player because now they know I can shoot, they know I can drive, they know I can pull up."

"If he does the things his senior year that I think he can," lauds Woollum, "he will be the best three-man that we've had. There is no question that he is lingering in that category."

With only three more regular-season games remaining, Mike Bright's exceptional Bucknell career is approaching its end. "Without question," says Woollum, "he has been one of my favorite people over his career. I feel very close to him, and I look forward to the day he finishes playing so that we can just be friends."



Solaida Mamsaang — The Bucknellian

Mike Bright '93 has risen above most opponents in becoming the Patriot League's All-Time leading scorer and third in Bucknell history. This season, the tri-captain has taken over a great deal of the leadership responsibilities and has led the Bison to six straight wins.

Faces In The Crowd

Solaida Mamsaang — The Bucknellian

Several of Bucknell's faithful choose to ignore the introduction of Navy's starting line-up during last Wednesday night's Patriot League contest in Davis Gym. Maybe these fans were searching for some form of competition in the sports pages (the Dallas Mavericks perhaps?) because the Midshipmen appeared seasick throughout the entire contest. Undoubtedly, all of the fans will be paying closer attention next weekend when the Crusaders from the College of the Holy Cross come to Lewisburg.

Mike Van Doren epitomizes successful wrestling program

BY NEIL BARDACH
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Earlier this season, wrestler Mike Van Doren GR reached a milestone that most collegiate wrestlers only dream of. On Feb. 6 in a dual meet against Navy, Van Doren notched the 75th win of his career, making him one of the most successful wrestlers in Bucknell wrestling history.

The friendly, outgoing Van Doren declines to congratulate himself on this accomplishment, however, and said of the 75th win, "It really wasn't that special. [It was] just another win towards a hundred [wins]. You look for a hundred." The 22 year-old Van Doren, who currently has 78 career wins, has been wrestling for 17 years.

Van Doren, who wrestles in the 150-pound weight class, has many fond memories of his collegiate wrestling career, but his favorite "moment" was this most recent January. He said, "the team was wrestling really well, beating North Carolina and N.C. State, and going to California and doing well there. It was a very good month." Van Doren had a good month himself, winning big matches against North Carolina and N.C. State, ranked 16th and 19th in the nation respectively by the Amateur Wrestling News magazine. He also won against Cal Poly-San Luis Obispo, a team that had been ranked previously by the AWN.

Bob Ferraro, head coach of the wrestling team, had only good things to say about his captain, one of four captains in the team this year, "Mike is a tremendous team leader and a tremendous role model. Mike sets goals for himself, and he is committed to achieving those goals through hard work. And, obviously, Mike gets great results. [He] works very well with the other members of the team." Ferraro also has respect for Van Doren off the wrestling mat. "Mike is extremely self-motivated, and very goal oriented. [He] has a tremendous work ethic."

Van Doren is in the last year of his eligibility for the wrestling team. Although he will finish his graduate degree this semester, Van Doren will be back. "I'll be back next semester to help with the wrestling team through December. Then, who knows? I'll probably work for my family, and I'd like to coach wrestling at some level." If experience is any indication, Van Doren should not have any trouble landing a coaching job.

Van Doren and the wrestling team will compete at 7 p.m. tonight in Davis Gym against Rider.

technical fall over Mike Lazich. A pair of wins in the final two bouts brought Millersville back into contention, but the Bison reached the finals for the second straight year with the 19-18 victory.

In the tournament's championship match, Bloomsburg scored victories in eight of the contest's ten bouts to take a 20-point victory for its second consecutive championship. Bucknell was able to get on the scoreboard with Elliott's 15-7 major decision at 134 pounds that made the score 7-4. The Huskies were then able to win four consecutive bouts, a string that included a 9-7 decision at 150 pounds that ended Van Doren's undefeated dual bout string at eleven contests. Despite the loss, the graduate student still leads the team in victories with 24, including six pins that ranks second to Wellman. Ferraro stopped the run by scoring the final points of the 30-10 defeat. The 177 pounder's win by forfeit completed the team's only 4-0 weekend and raised his season totals to 23-2, including a perfect 12-0 in dual bouts, with four pins and six more technical falls.

Despite the defeat, head coach Bob Ferraro was pleased with the weekend's results. "I thought that we did very well. It was tough to wrestle four matches in less than 24 hours and to come back and beat a good Millersville team twice was quite an accomplishment.

"Bloomsburg has a strong team, but four of the bouts could have gone the other way and that could have given us the win," Ferraro continued. "On a different day, in a regular dual match, I think that we would beat that team."

The Bison have had the week to rest up before completing the regular season this weekend. The team will take on ECWA co-leader, Rider, tonight and finish the season tomorrow in Philadelphia, against Drexel.

Also performing well for the Bison against Lafayette was Monica Nawarskas '94. In the game, Nawarskas scored 15 points and grabbed seven rebounds. It was the first time since Jan. 13 that she had reached double figures in scoring in a game.

Bucknell then travelled to West Point, where they dropped the match to Army by the close score of 59-50. The loss denied the Bison from securing home court advantage for the quarterfinals of the Patriot League playoffs. The game was tied after the first half, 27-27, with the teams exchanging the lead numerous times. However, the Cadets went on a 10-2 run early in the second half. The Bison responded shortly thereafter, going on a 14-8 run of their own, sparked by seven points apiece by McGee and Anne McGovern '93.

The difference in the game was the wide margin in free throws. Army sank 10 of 11 free throws in the second half, while the Bison dropped only three of seven attempts in the second frame.

In the game, McGee recorded another double-double, scoring 16 points and grabbing 11 boards. McGovern was the only other Bison in double figures, scoring 12 points.

The orange and blue turned it around Wednesday night against Navy as they routed the Midshipmen, 90-62. The Bison scored 51 of their 90 points in the second half. Coach Juliene Simpson said of the game, "That was our best team effort all year. We focused on our two strengths for the whole game. Offensively, we got out and ran the floor. Our fast break was very effective. Defensively, our full court press was outstanding. It was more effective because we seemed more comfortable utilizing the full court press than we were earlier in the year."

In the game, the Bison had four players in double figures, including McGee who again recorded a double-double, grabbing 10 rebounds to complement her 19 points. It was McGee's fourth straight double-double, and her tenth this season. Simpson said of McGee, "She still hustles from beginning to end. She has no great natural basketball skills; her technique is not great, but she just works very hard." McGee's 19 points brought her within 17 points of achieving 1,000 career points. Simpson said of the mark, "It's an amazing accomplishment, because during her freshman and sophomore years, she really didn't play that much. This has all pretty much come about in the last two years."

Peter Ho — The Bucknellian

Point guard K.C. Vlah sets up the half-court offense against the United States Naval Academy last Wednesday night in Davis.

Also scoring in double figures were Nawarskas, Lauren Wagner '96, and K.C. Vlah '96. Nawarskas scored 16 points and also grabbed eight rebounds. She shot 6-8 from the floor, and dropped four of six free throws. Wagner nailed six of eleven shots from the floor, including a three-pointer. Vlah, a candidate for the Patriot League Rookie of the Year honors, scored12 points, more than twice her season average, and she was perfect from the charity stripe, scoring on all four of her attempts. Coach Juliene Simpson said of Vlah, "She is one of the best freshman in the league. Unfortunately, she has not received any rookie of the week honors. The news media goes primarily by points." Simpson is convinced that Vlah will be a force in the Patriot League, saying, "K.C. will be the premier point guard in the league."

The win put the team in good position for the upcoming Patriot League playoffs. Remarking on her team's playoff hopes, Simpson said, "The way we played (Wednesday), we could win the whole thing. But it would be helpful if we had the first round at home. Right now, we have to do what we can control. We need to beat Lehigh and Holy Cross." Simpson would like to play at home as much as possible, but she realizes that they may be on the road. "Any time you are at home, it is an added plus. If we are away, Army at Army is preferable over being at Lafayette."

The Bison must truly do everything they can, as the season is rapidly dwindling. Tomorrow, they will travel to Lehigh, where they will play at 5:15 p.m.. Their final regular season home game will be next Saturday against first place Holy Cross.

PATRIOT LEAGUE Notebook

BY CHRIS DROWNE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Several reasons, not least of all cold weather, led to Colgate University's recent decision to drop its baseball program at the conclusion of the 1993 season. Director of Athletics and former Washington Redskin All-Pro Mark Murphy said, "The decision was influenced by the shortening of Colgate's academic calendar, complicated by NCAA requirements for a minimum season of 27 games." Murphy went on to say, "Given the springtime weather in Hamilton, and the fact that finals now start the first week in May, the baseball team ends up playing most of its games in a two to three week period in April. The schedule often forces players to miss classes just before finals. Moreover, the move to the Patriot League places Colgate in competition with schools that provide much greater instructional support to their baseball programs."

A committee comprised of students, faculty, and administrators recommended the decision. Apparently, the issue had been debated for over six years. The decision follows a recommendation made earlier by a long-range planning committee studying gender equity. The balance of men's and women's sports will now be closed and free up funds that can be used to address resource issues in athletics.

The baseball program at Colgate is over 100 years old and has suffered through 20 straight losing seasons, including an 8-54 record over the past two years. During the mid-'50's through the '60's, the Red Raiders advanced to the NCAA Division I playoffs, including a World Series appearance in Omaha in 1955.

Colgate Sports Information Director Bob Cornell contributed to this story.

ond half.

On Wednesday, Charlie Woollum's squad received a visit from a young Naval officer by the name of Robinson. No, not David—he plays for San Antonio—yet his younger brother Charles made a cameo appearance at Davis Gym. Navy could have used David.

"Our previous couple of Navy games were tight and sloppy. We didn't want to get into that type of game in our own building," said reserve guard/forward Matt Clark '93. "Basically we just wanted to take care of business."

All season tri-captain Bright has been using the basketball court as an arena for theft. Navy should have opened the brig door and prepared a spot for the Bison's all-time steals leader. On the visiting squad's first trip down the court, the Orange and Blue bandit swiped a pass and took it the other way for two. On the next trip down court, Bright disrupted another pass which Brown converted for two on a short jumper. Before the final buzzer sounded, Bright, the Patriot League's all-time steals leader and a Monessen, PA native, would be found guilty of four thefts to lead the home squad.

Navy was simply overmatched from the opening tip. Bucknell jumped to a quick 13-4 lead with 12:42 left to play. The Bison continued to abuse the seemingly shipwrecked sailors from Annapolis by outscoring them 14-2 over a 5:24 stretch to bring the score to a 40-15 with just over a minute left to play. Guard Sekou Hamer '96 added (sea?)salt to the bloody open wounds of the beleaguered Middies with a three-pointer with four seconds remaining in the half to bring the score to a 43-17 count.

Russell Peyton '93's consistent play has been one of the main reasons for Bucknell's success.

"They shot pretty poorly, and we were able to take advantage of that and build up a substantial lead, " said assistant coach Tommy Thompson '60. "But you have to give our defense a lot of credit."

Navy shot only 18% (5-28) from the floor and never seemed prepared or able to threaten Bucknell's lead.

The Bison opened the second half and maintained its business like form, not allowing Navy to close within 26 points. Tri-captain point guard Russell Peyton contributed ten points of his team-leading 18 points in the second half. Clark '93 burned up the three-point line hitting 4-4 from long range to give him a career high 12 points for the evening. Once again the balanced distribution of points helped lead the Bison to victory, as four players scored in double figures. Tri-captain center Paul Olkowski '93 cleaned the boards recording six rebounds.

In a feeling of sympathy, Woollum began to employ the services of those players who have seldom been called upon. During the last seven minutes of the game, the reserves held the Middies in check as our battle-weary soldiers closed out the week. Guard Jason Janego '94 contributed eight points, including two three-pointers.

The Breakin' Bison recorded a school record 11 three-pointers in the 29-point victory.

The Breakin' Bison remain atop the Patriot League in a hotly-contested battle with Holy Cross. Will the Bison win the war, or just the little battles?

Bob Ferraro '94

Wrestler Bob Ferraro '94 has been selected as The Bucknellian's Athlete of the Week for his continued dominance on the mat. The Lewisburg native and son of Bison head coach Bob Ferraro, Sr. currently boasts a 23-2 record, highlighted by an undefeated four win week. Despite being asked to wrestle at several different weights, he is 12-0 in dual meets with four pins and six technical falls.

Though he is a junior academically, Ferraro still has two more seasons of wrestling eligibility remaining.

house at Camden Yards, Cal Ripken and Harold Reynolds turning two like it's never been turned before, and Mike Mussina throwing a no-hitter or four.

In fact, every baseball fan goes into a season thinking his or her team is better than last year. Although my roommate, the Pirate fan, would rather have Barry Bonds in left than Al Martin, and Brewer cheese-heads probably hate to see Paul Molitor go, if you are a true baseball fan you have hope. It does not matter which team you like; right now that team is tied for first place. Only our four sweet words make us realize that.

So as you follow the endless footage of calisthenics and reports on rotator cuffs and tendonitis, have hope and be well. The pitchers and catchers have reported.

Jumpers soar at Bucknell Track Classic

Women's track hopes depth will help them defend their Patriot League indoor title

BUCKNELLIAN TEAM CORRESPONDENT

How hard can it be to run really fast, take off on one foot, and land in a pile of sand? Or how about running and doing a hop, skip, and a jump? Try it sometime, and you'll discover how difficult it truly is to do well.

On Saturday, jumps coach Jo Giannettino was delighted to see her athletes have an outstanding day at the Bucknell Track and Field Classic which attracted over 12 schools. The meet would have been bigger had the snow not deterred some folks from making the trek to Lewisburg.

> "Right now, I would consider us to be the favorites to win the league."
> — Art Gulden
> Head Coach

To begin, in the triple jump, Bucknell took third, fifth, and sixth, with Kelly Peet '96 (35'10 3/4"), Tanya Barnes '95 (34'6 1/2"), and Jenny Thomas '94 (34'4 3/4"), respectively. In the long jump, it was Mary Clare Thompson '95 (16'9 3/4") and again Barnes (16'6") leading the way as they placed second and third. With her jump, Thompson leapt onto Bucknell's All-Time top ten list. Barnes, who missed much of last year with a knee injury, has really come into her own this year. She looks better with every meet, jumping for the second week in a row to a personal record by almost three inches.

In the high jump, pentathalete Norine Nadeau '96 jumped a personal record of 5'0" and placed third. Teammates Dawn Ellery '94 (2nd, 5'2") and Monica Carnahan '95 (6th, 4'10") also scored for the Bison. Coach Jo's jumpers look as if they are peaking just in time for Patriot Leagues (Feb 27).

Overall, Bucknell women had a successful day, taking first in nine events. Actually, Bucknell athletes won every event from 600 yds through the 2 mile, including both the 4 x 400m and 4 x 800m relays. Winners were Bridget Dean '95 (600yd, 1:29.6), Maria Ryan '96 (800m, 2:24), Gina Abraham '93 (1000yd, 2:45), Kathy Wurster '94 (1 mile, 5:13), and Kristen Opdyke '93 (2 mile, 11:08). The other individual winners were Tameka Hinton '95 in the shot put (40'5"), and Julie Diercks '93 in the 200yd (27.1).

Winning events is, without a doubt, a key to winning a meet, but what will carry the Lady Bison in the Patriot League Championship meet is depth. For the first time in few years, the orange and blue have numbers, especially in the middle distances. Lots of healthy, fast bodies are crucial for indoor track, as there are five middle distance events plus three relays, made up of primarily middle runners. An indication of this depth is that Bucknell placed at least two people in the top six in each of 12 events.

"Right now, I would consider us to be the favorites to win the league," said head coach Art Gulden.

The Racin' Bison are home again this weekend as they host Bloomsburg, Lock Haven, Shippensburg, and Susquehanna in their final meet before Patriot Leagues.

Berardinelli Finalist for Postgraduate Award

David "Whitey" Berardinelli '93 is one of 20 finalists for the National Association of Collegiate Directors of Athletics/Walt Disney Company Scholar-Athlete Postgraduate Scholarship.

Berardinelli, who just completed a fine career as a wide receiver, led the football team in receptions the past two seasons. This past season he earned Second-Team All-Patriot League honors as he caught 42 passes for 735 yards and three touchdowns. His 95 career catches for 1,609 yards ranks sixth and fith in Bucknell history, respectively.

Off the field, Berardinelli has twice been honored as a First-Team Academic All-America. He was chosen as one of two I-AA recipients of the National Football Foundation and College Hall of Fame Scholar-Athlete Award, which carries with it an $18,000 graduate fellowship. Berardinelli also received an NCAA Postgraduate Scholarship worth $5,000.

Ten of the football finalists for the NACDA/Disney Award are from Division I-A institutions, while ten are from non-Division I-A institutions. Fifteen additional finalists, representing sports other than football, will be chosen in April. NACDA's Blue Ribbon Committee will review the 35 finalists and select ten winners who will each receive a $5,000 grant to be used towards postgraduate studies, a total of $50,000 in scholarships, funded by Disney.

Olkowski Named to District II Academic All-America Team

Paul Olkowski '93 has been named one of five student-athletes who were selected to the 1993 GTE District II Basketball All-Academic Team as selected by CoSIDA.

Olkowski, the starting center on Bucknell's first-place 18-5 team, was averaging 7.9 points and 5.5 rebounds through the Army game last Saturday. The 6' 8" senior has started 83 consecutive games since his sophomore season, and earlier this year had a career-high 23 points against Lafayette. A studio art major from Fredonia, NY, Olkowski has a 3.3 GPA. He also painted the cover of this season's media guide and, as a result, was featured in Eastern Basketball.

In order to be nominated, a student-athlete must possess at least a 3.2 GPA and be a starter or key reserve on his team. These five players will now represent District II (New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, West Virginia, and the District of Columbia) on the national Academic All-America ballot.

Lehigh thugs who Bucknell fans loved to hate, despite their tremendous ability. With the graduation of those two, plus Jay Hipps and Steve Yaniga, the Engineers lost over 5,000 career points after last year. This year, their head coach Dave Duke has Chuck Penn, the Patriot League's leading scorer and by far their most talented player. Duke's problem, however, has been finding four other competent players to fill the roles left vacant by Krizansky, Mbonu, Hipps, and Yaniga. Rich Hudock and Mike McKee have struggled at the point guard spot, with Hudock battling injuries all year. Freshman Rashawne Glenn will probably start at that position as he gains more experience. Allan Campbell has shown flashes of being a good shooter for his 6'7" frame, but other than that, the front line simply will not scare anyone.

Earlier this year in Lewisburg, Russell Peyton '93 and Chris Simpson '94 each tallied 23 points as the Bison won 91-75. For Peyton, it was one of his best efforts of the year. The point guard's 23 points established a career-high, but just as impressive were his seven assists and five steals (only one turnover) in 37 minutes on the floor.

Lehigh finally got their first conference win of the year on Wednesday, as they knocked off Army at Stabler Arena. Tradition dictates that the Bison should be victorious tomorrow. In each of the last six years, the season series has been a sweep. Bucknell won all three meetings in 1986-87, Lehigh won all three in 1987-88, Bucknell won both in 1988-89, Lehigh then won five straight between 1989-91, and then Bucknell won both meetings last year. So the Bison's January win logically predicts a win tomorrow.

Next Wednesday, the Bison take a break from Patriot League action to take on Loyola (MD), a team Bucknell defeated soundly in January in Baltimore. Despite a sloppy effort (the team had 16 turnovers), the Bison led by as many as 19 points on their way to a 75-59 win. Mike Bright '93 led all scorers with 17 points. Raymond Brown '94 had 16, while Peyton chipped in with eight steals.

Loyola is led by burly forward B.J. Pendleton, who resembles a defensive end more than a basketball player. Forward Mark Sparzak had a good game against the Bison earlier this year, but the Greyhounds, who are still looking for that elusive fourth win of the year, are not very deep and not very talented.

Tom Schneider, a 1969 graduate of Bucknell, was forced to resign as head hoach at Loyola earlier this year, and their athletic director took over as head coach. The Greyhounds still have a Bucknell connection, however. Assistant coach Mark Lezanic '87 played on the 1986-87 Bison squad that reached the NCAA Tournament.

Swim teams go to Colgate for Championships

Men look to improve upon last winter's fourth place finish

BY SUSAN FUMAGALLI AND CHRIS DROWNE
Bucknellian Staff Writers

Despite their 3-6 dual meet record (2-2 in the Patriot League) the men's swimming and diving team has reason to believe that it can improve on last season's fourth place finish at the Patriot League Championships. Coach Dick Russell's troops left Lewsiburg Wednesday afternoon for Colgate knowing that they could swim with last year's champion, Fordham. The Bison defeated the Rams in a dual meet earlier this season, 158-80.

Co-Captain Jay Gross '93 will be counted on heavily to score several points for the Bison. The Newton, MA native is the defending champion in the 50 and 100-yard freestyles and the100-yard butterfly. He finished the year undefeated in the 50-yard freestyle and finished second just once in the 100-yard freestyle this season.

Stu Harris '95 has the burden of swimming the two long freestyle races, the 1,000 and 1,650-yard races. He is the defending league champ in the former. Rick Steenson '95 finished second at last year's championships in the 200-yard butterfly.

Other Bison expected to score include Steve Droste '93, co-captain Marc Murphy '93, Dietrich Conze '94, and Sloan Broderick '96. Droste has led the backstrokers in the 100 and 200-yard events. Murphy will be entered in the distance events. The 500-yard freestyle duties will fall to Conze, while the 100 and 200-yard freestyle races will be handled by Broderick.

Trials began yesterday morning, and some finals were completed last night. For those results, please see the Patriot League Swimming Championship Results boxes on this page.

Women must overcome diving gap to top the military academies

BY SUSAN FUMAGALLI AND CHRIS DROWNE
Bucknellian Staff Writers

Having been the bride's maids the past two years, this winter's women's swimming and diving team hopes to become the brides at the annual Patriot League Championships.

The military academies have split the previous two championships (Navy last year and Army in 1990-91) and, along with the Bison, are favored to make a run at the title. Bucknell left Wednesday for Hamilton, NY with an 8-2 dual meet record (4-1 in the Patriot League). That lone league loss was to logical powerhouse Navy.

Head coach Lynn Kachmarik, last year's Patriot League Coach of the Year, will be counting on several outstanding individual performances. Co-Captain Margaret Grunow '93, who owns an infinite amount of school and pool records (too many to mention in one article), is favored to bring home four gold medals. She is the defending champion in the 50-yard freestyle and 100-yard butterfly, and she is undefeated over the past two years.

Linda Fink '95 holds records in the distance events (500,100, and 1650-yard freestyle races) and should score for the Bison. Stephanie Boles '95 and Allyson Gillespie '96 represent the best of Bucknell's breaststoke contingent. Dominant backstroker Kathleen Hartnett '94 will try to defend her titles in the 100 and 200-yard races.

The big danger for the Bison comes not in the pool, but in the air. Navy outscored Bucknell 142-6 in the two diving competitions last year. Debra Zapotocky '95 will be sorely missed as she studies abroad this semester. However, Julie Kotarba '96 has shown great promise and could challenge for the one-meter title.

Trials began yesterday morning and some finals were completed last night at Colgate. For those results, please see the Patriot League Swimming Championship Update box on this page.

Those Four Sweet Words

We interrupt this college basketball season to bring you the four sweetest words of the year. Don't be mad, you can start reveling in Bison-mania again in a few minutes—just work with me here. This weekend all the sportscasts will be talking about those four sweet words; ESPN's SportsCenter will probably have live reports on those four sweet words.

"What are they, already?" you're likely screaming by now.

Well, here they are: Pitchers and catchers report. Les lanceurs et les les receveurs presentent. Los lanzadores y los receptores se presentan.

For those of us whose metabolisms follow the baseball calendar and not the traditional Julian calendar of days and months, we can already smell the peanuts and Cracker Jack, not to mention the freshly-cut grass. Hope you don't have hay fever.

These four sweet words are yet another reason why baseball is the best sport there is. It's the only sport where some positions come to training camp before others. I mean, you don't hear such phrases as "power forwards and two-guards report", or "left tackles and punters report", but "pitchers and catchers report" is the phrase that wakes all of us baseball junkies up from the deep hibernation we've been in since mid-October. Boy, do I need a shave.

These four sweet words fill us all with hope. Even fans of the Cubs and Red Sox have hope. I doubt your grandparents were even alive the last time either of these teams won a World Series. Yet Bostonians are already bowing to Andre Dawson, and Cubs fans actually think they have some pitching this year.

As a die-hard Baltimore Oriole fan, those four sweet words have me thinking of Harold Baines aiming for the ware-

Wrestling to end regular season this weekend

Team finishes week 3-1; runner-up at Bloomsburg

BY MITCH BENTON
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The Bucknell wrestling squad continued its surprising season with a 3-1 weekend that included a runner-up finish at the second annual Bloomsburg Duals tournament. On Friday, the squad was able to jump out to an early 15-point advantage against Millersville and withstood a late rally to take a 23-21 victory. At the tournament, the Bison topped California (PA) in the first round, 29-23, and followed that with a 19-18 victory in a rematch with Millersville. In the championship round, host Bloomsburg won eight of ten bouts to claim the title, 30-10, dropping Bucknell's record to 10-2, with the losses coming to the 15th-ranked Midshipmen of Navy and the 19th-ranked Huskies.

The two matches with Millersville were very similar, with Bucknell taking early leads and the Marauders cutting the lead by dominating the heavier weights. The Bison victories were highlighted by the surprising success enjoyed by 142- pound Ron Wellman '95. His Marauder counterpart, senior Tom Barley, entered the match as the eighth-ranked wrestler in the nation according to the Amateur Wrestling News, but Wellman was able to turn the former All-America in the third period of Friday night's match, scoring a pin at 5:14 of the bout. On Saturday, Wellman continued his undefeated weekend by beating Barley again, this time on a 6-5 decision.

The 142-pounder's pin on Friday was bracketed by senior captain Phil Elliott's dramatic, double overtime 3-1 decision at 134 pounds and captain Mike Van Doren 's '92 first period pin over Jeff Rosas at 150 that gave the home squad a 15-4 lead. After captain George Swann '93 scored with a 7-3 decision in the match's first Main Event, Bucknell had gained a 15-point lead heading in to the intermission.

The Marauders were able to regroup at halftime and came out of the break with a major decision at 158 pounds. The fourth Bison captain, Bob Ferraro '94, increased the advantage to 23-8 by scoring a 24-9 technical fall at 177 pounds. Millersville was able to take the final three bouts of the evening, a pin and two major decisions, but the rally came up short and Bucknell escaped with a two-point victory.

The California match was highlighted by three Bucknell wins on forfeit and Wellman's second pin of the weekend, a 24 second thrashing that was his team-leading eighth of the season. The sophomore's 3-0 weekend brought his season record to a 14-13 mark.

A 21-15 first round victory over third-seeded Liberty gave Millersville another opportunity to take on the second-seed, Bucknell. The rematch was nearly identical to the previous contest and when Van Doren pinned Rosas for the second time in as many days, this one coming in 4:00, Bucknell held a 14-6 lead after five bouts. After two consecutive Millersville wins at 158 and 167 pounds, Ferraro again stopped the run with a 16-0 shutout, his second consecutive

Grapplers face Rider tonight in Davis Gym at 7:00

BY MITCH BENTON
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The Bucknell wrestling squad will finish its 1992-93 regular season this weekend with a pair of East Coast Wrestling Association matches. The competition begins as the team takes on Rider College tonight in a match that should decide the conference's regular season champion. Rider will come to Davis Gymnasium sporting a 10-3 record, including a perfect mark in ECWA action. The Broncs, who have spent much of the season in the Amateur Wrestling News' Top 25, have fallen only in their toughest bouts, against 15th-ranked Navy, 16th-ranked Cornell and 17th-ranked Lock Haven

When asked to look ahead at the match-ups, head coach Bob Ferraro commented, "Rider has a lot of talent, but so do we, and nobody in the conference has faced the kind of season and schedule that we have. I think that that experience will really help."

The contest should mark the final regular-season home match for several of the Bison. Four of the scheduled Bison starters will be seniors competing in Davis Gym for the final time during the regular season.

Besides ending an era dominated by current Bucknell captains, Mike Van Doren '92, Phil Elliott '93, and George Swann '93, the showdown with Rider will also mark a career milestone for Ferraro, who will be coaching a Bucknell dual match for the 300th time in his career. By far the school's all-time leader in coaching matches and victories, Ferraro has totaled a 146-149-4 record that includes 55 victories since 1988.

Against Rider, Bucknell will be looking to get a fast start against the Broncs strong lower weights. The 126-pound Swann will be taking on sophomore Matt Finacchio, the younger brother of former ECWA champion Dan Finacchio, who has compiled a 15-5 mark on the season. After compiling a 6-6 mark in tournament competition, Swann has gone 10-2 in the Bison's dual bouts, including a 3-0 mark in conference action. The 134-pound Elliott also enters the match with 16 victories, including five by fall—the third highest total on the squad.

Bucknell will be looking for bonus points in the 150- and 177-pound bouts, where Bison captains and victory leaders Bob Ferraro '94 and Van Doren will be taking on very inexperienced competition.

Rider will be led into Davis by former two-time ECWA champion John Hangey. The senior enters the match with a 29-2 record and is currently the fourth-rated 190-pounder in the nation, according to the AWN.

Although he warns against overlooking Drexel on Saturday, it is apparent which squad the elder Ferraro is ready to take on. "Drexel has a good team," he says with a grin, "but we're ready for Rider. We really want to wrestle Rider."

Faculty affected by recent tenure, retention decisions

Departmental recommendations overturned by URC

BY TARA GILLIGAN AND SUSAN SMITH
Bucknellian Staff Writers

Decisions concerning which professors will be granted tenure reflect the standards of the University and the heavy emphasis placed on teaching excellence. "To say that they [professors] don't meet the standards of teaching isn't to say that they're bad teachers," according to Eugenia Gerdes, dean of arts and sciences.

Feelings of resentment exist nonetheless.

Two professors, after being recently turned down for tenure during the six-year review by the University Review Committee (URC), are now faced with the possibilities of appealing their cases. Gordon Meyer, assistant professor of management, and Susan Smith-Baish, assistant professor of electrical engineering, received notice in December that the URC is recommending that the University not grant them tenure.

According to University policy, Meyer and Smith-Baish had 15 days after the Dec. 15 announcement to officially ask the URC to reconsider its decision. The two also have until Feb. 15 to appeal their cases on the basis of procedural flaws.

Both Meyer and Smith-Baish declined comment and members of the URC would not comment on the status of their appeals.

In addition, several other professors received negative reviews and will therefore not have their contracts extended past next year. The URC decided not to renew the contract of Priscilla Reis, assistant professor of management, who did not complete the necessary requirements of the fourth year review.

John Wallace, assistant professor of biology, received a negative recommendation in his fourth year review, but after appealing the decision it was reversed.

Anne Badger, assistant professor of English, did not pass the second year review which requires completion of a dissertation. [See related article, page 1, for explanation of procedures.]

The two-tiered review process leaves plenty of room for resentment and disappointment, especially when the URC feels it must reverse the decision of a department's recommendation. Such was the case in the tenure denial of Meyer.

The tenure process: A detailed, delicate task

BY SUSAN SMITH AND TARA GILLIGAN
Bucknellian Staff Writers

While tenure and academia may seem to be inexplicably linked, the truth remains: "A provisional appointment is a probationary one which does not include the right to permanent employment," according to the faculty handbook.

Fifty-five to sixty percent of all professors that Bucknell hires receive tenure. The lifelong guarantee of employment is something that must be earned over a six year period at Bucknell.

Far from a simple evaluation process, reviews are conducted after the second, fourth, and sixth year of teaching. Student evaluations are compiled, peer review considered, and samples of scholarship and other relevant teaching materials are shared between two review committees.

First, a departmental review committee (DRC) considers the type of course taught

Students frustrated by ticket distribution

BY DENISE MAUTONE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The chaos that transpired during the sale of basketball tickets on Monday morning has left many disgruntled students in its wake. Students and staff hoping to obtain tickets for Saturday night's basketball game versus Holy Cross were jostled and pushed in the mob scene surrounding the Elaine Langone Box office.

THE POLICY

The switch to distributing tickets prior to the basketball games only started this year. Athletic Director Rick Hartzell met with BSG in the fall and both mutually agreed that tickets should be obtained prior to the games. "At that point, we figured that one student would be able to pick up 4 tickets providing they had 4 BU IDs," said Hartzell.

However, this policy was changed in mid-January in response to the outbreak of ticket scalping. "Since scalping is illegal," said Hartzell, "we decided we needed more selective measures." Fans would only be allowed to obtain one ticket.

Despite these changes, the policy again switched back to allowing up to 4 tickets per person, provided they had 4 BU IDs. This was in response to complaints from faculty and staff last Friday. According to Hartzell, professors were concerned that students would skip classes under the one ticket per person system. "They felt that this would place undue stress on students, putting them in the position of having to choose between classes or a game," said Hartzell.

WAITING

Though ticket distribution did not officially begin until 9 a.m., fans were seen waiting on line as early as 7:30 a.m. According to Marcy Bzdak, who works at the LC, "I arrived at 8:40 a.m and students were sitting on the floor waiting for the counter to open. They were all quiet and calm. It all seemed pretty orderly."

There was a "line" until 8 a.m classes let out. But as the crowd became larger, the "line" resembled more of a huddle. "Then people just started filling the lobby area and the hallway," reported one observer. The scene only became more chaotic after the 9 a.m classes were let out.

Greeks confront social problems

BY ANDREW COHEN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

With eight fraternities on social probation as of Feb. 1, and five on probation currently, attention in the Greek community has focused on the Interfraternity Council's (IFC) Greek Monitoring Team (GMT). Scott Alfieri '94, president of the IFC, said that rumors that GMT can be biased and is responsible for the probations do exist among rank and file Greeks. These rumors however, are based on a "misperception," said Alfieri.

"[Greeks] should realize it was not the IFC that put them on social probation. GMT does not involve social probation. The only time social probation comes about is when security officers write a report which is examined by the peer review board [IFC's disciplinary body comprised of one member from each house] and involves a violation of university policy," said Alfieri.

GMT is designed to ensure that BYOB, not mandated by the university but instead by the IFC, is being followed.

"We look to see that people at the door and behind the bar are TIP certified [i.e. they have gone through the university's training program], wristbands are being handed out correctly, and that the environment is set up in the most conducive nature to allow BYOB to work," according to Alfieri. GMT is also more restricted in its enforcement powers. For example, "We don't have the power to card people," said Alfieri.

GMT sanctions follow a four tiered system where a fraternity would receive: a $3 fine per brother, $5 fine per brother, $5 fine per brother and call to the house's alumni association, and $5 fine per brother and call to the house's national headquarters for successive violations.

Alfieri said that he attributed most of the murmurings about unfairness to the misperception about GMT's supposed power put a house on social probation. In addition, he said that "GMT has gotten much more effi-

Old Bison to be reborn

BY ANDREW COHEN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The Old Bison Renovation Committee (OBRC) held its first meeting Thursday to plan the physical layout of the building located next to Smith and Vedder halls that, until the completion of the biology building last year, was host to the introductory biology laboratory.

The committee's task, according to Mitch Goldman, assistant director of student activities, is three-fold. OBRC is responsible for "working with Molly Ross, craft room director, to move the craftshop in there," said Goldman, creating student lounge space, and working with the Old Bison Allocation Committee (OBAC) to construct student organization office space.

"The focus of OBRC," said Goldman, "is on the student recreation space. We want to create a coffee-shop type atmosphere with snacks, gourmet coffee and other assorted non-alcoholic gourmet drinks, so people will have another social option."

OBRC is soliciting student input on how they should design and decorate the student lounge space. From 12 p.m. to 1 p.m. this Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, and Friday they will have a table in the Langone Center mall for students to present their ideas for the space. Other proposals can be presented to Goldman in the Office of Student Activities (OSA).

In addition, OBRC is holding two "Old Bison Cafe Preview Nights," according to Goldman. At 10:30 p.m. to 12 a.m. on Tuesday, and 10 p.m. and 12 a.m. on Thursday, students are invited to come for "free gourmet coffee and gourmet soft drinks" like those that will sell in the Old Bison, said Goldman.

According to Goldman, the craftshop and student lounge space plans are expected to be completed "by the end of April, and absolutely no later than by the end of the semester."

The third charge of the OBRC is the most complicated, and, as such, has a more nebulous target date, although Goldman said that he hopes that the plans for this phase will be complete around the end of the semester. Once the Old Bison Allocation Commit-

Cheating becomes difficult moral issue

BY DEB MANASSE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

A student looks over his freshly graded test, reading the professor's comments and frowning a bit over the 'B' that it took him a solid week of studying to get. A quick glance at his neighbor's blue book reveals a big, red 'A', easily garnered after only a single night's pouring over illegal fraternity test files.

After three weeks of research, a student sits down to write her final term paper. After all that reading, these concepts seem second nature to her. Quickly making it the third page of her paper, she gets to a passage that lends itself perfectly to the article she has just been reviewing. She incorporates the author's ideas into her own argument, not bothering to cite the work. No one will know, she thinks. Besides, she's changing a few words, so its okay.

A professor encourages lab partners to work through problems together. When writing up their reports, two best friends decide that splitting the questions between them will save a lot of time. This way, they'll be helping each other but still getting the basic idea of the assignment.

According to a November 11 article in the Chronicle of Higher Education, cheating is as prevalent as ever. In fact, the article cites a survey conducted by a Rutgers University professor, in which 67 per cent of students from the 31 highly selective colleges and universities polled, admitted to cheating in college.

"I really wish students took academic responsibility seriously," said Debra Mathinos, assistant professor of education and member of the Board of Review on Academic Responsibility. "I'm afraid I'm seeing too many students that don't cheat because they don't want to get caught. I don't think that enough students have thought enough about their own personal value system."

Heydt appointed new trustee

BY MARIA GLOD AND DEB MANASSE
Bucknellian Staff Writers

The board of Trustees recently named its newest member with the appointment of Stuart Heydt, president and chief executive officer of the Geisinger Foundation.

This announcement comes just in time for the March 12 "Trustee Access Day," designed to give members of the University community a glimpse of the inner workings of the Board of Trustees as well as to keep the Board members in touch with the concerns of the campus.

Heydt's appointment is significant, for it provides a direct link between the University and the other top professional corporation in the area. President Gary Sojka, who serves on Geisinger's board, sees the advantages in this reciprocal relationship.

While Heydt provides a local link to the Board, other members are far less accessible. To increase their accessiblity to the campus community, other members of the board will visit Lewisburg next week.

Despite this opportunity to meet the trustees face-to-face, many students still find the role of the Board of Trustees to be unclear.

"Because of the nature of the relationship between the Board of Trustees and the campus there is a limitation to how recognized the Board is on campus," said Robert E. Smith, former Board president.

Realizing that much of the work they do is beyond the public eye, the Board is opening new routes of interaction between Trustees and students.

The Board of Trustees, which formally meets twice a year, is broken down into four main committees and several sub-committees designed to Timothy Sweeney, professor of management and department chair, said that the department unanimously supports the DRC's recommendation to grant tenure to Meyer. "I respect the process. I simply think that the URC made a mistake of very serious proportions," Sweeney said.

Several other colleagues of Meyer were astonished. "We were all very surprised and shocked," said Elaine McGivern, assistant professor of management and member of the DRC.

Reaction among students was varied. Steven Godfrey '93, a teaching assistant for MG101 for two years, said, "I find it tremendously disturbing that the University does not appear to value Professor Meyer's contributions to course development and his consistent teaching excellence."

Other students, however, gave mixed reviews. Though Meyers seems really to enjoy working with students, "in class, he relies upon student input too much. Discussions are too student-driven," according to Craig Beach '93, management major. Overall, though, Beach approves of Meyers as a professor. "He is very easy to approach. Students can go to him with a problem—academic or otherwise," he said.

Larry Shinn, vice president for academic affairs, is a standing member of the University Review Committee.

Similar mixed reactions emerged after the announcement that the URC had decided against recommending Smith-Baish for tenure. One electrical engineering student said of Smith-Baish, "I thought she was good in the classroom; she was really easy to understand. Her biggest problem was that she was bad in lab preparation. We'd show up for lab, and a lot of times it seemed like labs had been thrown together at the last minute."

Another student simply said, "I found her to be a very caring teacher. She really tried to teach the best she could."

To some extent, these reactions are unavoidable where individuals' professional lives are at stake. The decision to recommend that a professor's contract not be renewed is extremely harrowing to all individuals involved.

Members of both review committees must decide whether the professor fits the description included in the Faculty Handbook under the category "Responsibilities of the Faculty," which states: "The effective teacher enhances the quality of the student's life and encourages the student to enrich the lives of others."

According to Thomas Rich, dean of engineering, no member of the URC takes this task lightly. Although Rich agrees that "in general, the people at the departmental level know the person better," he sees the URC as providing another vital vantage point. The URC, because of its diverse membership, is better able to view tenure and retention cases as part of the larger picture, as they fit into the broad University scheme. "I really think it is best the way it is, even though I wish I could find a way of doing it differently," he said.

Each member of the URC brings a different perspective to the discussions and, according to Rich, each member votes as an individual with no hidden agendas. "The voting patterns on that committee really reflect individuals voting according to their conscience. Administrators don't vote as a block," he said.

Rich said that in one sense, it is wrong to discuss a person's being "denied tenure" or to assume that because the University has hired an individual, that professor will remain teaching at the University. He stresses that when a professor is hired initially, it is with the assumption that he will sign a two-year contract and that after favourable second and fourth year reviews he will be offered an extension to his contract. But not until an individual is given tenure will he necessarily be offered an extension of his contract. "'Denied tenure' is an unfortunate term," said Rich. "The granting of tenure is an affirmation process. People don't realize that."

The process itself is harsh, not only for the faculty members under review, but also for the members of the committees. As an administrator, Rich feels the intense pressure of the committee creeping into other areas of his job. Being an appointed member of this committe "makes it hard to go back to colleagues and get them to agree on something else," he said.

Larry Shinn, vice president for academic affairs and standing member on the URC, said, "At Bucknell, one of the reasons why it is so painful for us when a colleague doesn't achieve tenure is because we hope that everyone can."

Richard Fleming, associate professor of philosophy and chair of the URC, describes his commitment to the review process as an "onerous and very difficult task."

focus on specific issues relevant to the university. The committees on educational policy, University relations, complementary activities, and financial policy meet on a regular basis. Two students and two faculty members are present at each of these committee meetings to provide the Trustees with a voice of the campus community. The current BSG president and another student are also invited to attend the semi-annual meetings of the entire Board.

In addition to this direct contact with students and faculty, the Board has recently begun to meet for an annual fall retreat. During the retreat the Board does not attend to any business matters, rather they are presented with information concerning the current state of the University. "We very specifically preclude business from this meeting," said Sojka. "It is an educational and interactive session."

Although the Board does make a concerted effort to keep well informed of day-to-day life at Bucknell, its true function is to be more concerned with the bigger picture.

"The overall role of the Board of Trustees is to set policy for the future of the University and to make sure the university finances are being used consistently with those policies," said Smith. "The interaction with the university should be on a regular, periodic basis."

"They have to keep tabs on the big picture," said Sojka. "The Board of Trustees is the continuing, sustaining aspect of the University and everything eminates from them. They hire a president who hires faculty and a support staff."

According to Sojka, the Board, as a self-sustaining body, maintains a forward-looking perspective within its own membership as well as with the University as a whole. Through the means of a nominating committee, the Trustees search for individuals who they feel would be a valuable addition to the Board. "I see the present nominating committee being very interested in getting more gender diversity, more racial diversity, more economic diversity," said Sojka.

The Board chooses its own members and also works to ensure that the current members are serving efficiently. "The Board continuously reviews the performance of its own members. There is great care given to whom is invited to be on the Board, but there is also constant monitoring of performance once they are on the Board," said Sojka.

In addition to setting financial policies, the Board itself provides a great deal of financial support for the University. "The Board of Trustees really does provide a lot of financial resources for the operation of the institution," said Sojka. Although many of the Trustees are able to give generously to the University, it is not required of the Board members. "This is a very important role for the trustees but I don't think the Board can be made up only of people who have the good fortune to have that kind of money," said Smith. "There should be a balance."

PUBLIC SAFETY LOG

UNFORTUNATELY, THIS IS WHERE PEOPLE ARE PUTTING TOO MANY RETIREMENT DOLLARS.

Every year, a lot of people make a huge mistake on their taxes. They don't take advantage of tax deferral and wind up sending Uncle Sam money they could be saving for retirement.

Fortunately, that's a mistake you can easily avoid with TIAA-CREF SRAs. SRAs not only ease your current tax-bite, they offer a remarkably easy way to build retirement income—especially for the "extras" that your regular pension and Social Security benefits may not cover. Because your contributions are made in before-tax dollars, you pay less taxes now. And since all earnings on your SRA are tax-deferred as well, the money you don't send to Washington works even harder for you. Down the road, that can make a dramatic difference in your quality of life.

What else makes SRAs so special? A range of allocation choices—from the guaranteed security of TIAA to the diversified investment accounts of CREF's variable annuity—all backed by the nation's number one retirement system.

Why write off the chance for a more rewarding retirement? Call today and learn more about how TIAA-CREF SRAs can help you enjoy many happy returns.

Benefit now from tax deferral. Call our SRA hotline 1 800-842-2733, ext. 8016.

and the breadth of material presented by the professor. The DRC reads student course evaluations to determine whether the professor presents material clearly, offers sufficient help outside the classroom, and provokes students' interest in the subject.

Next, the university review committee (URC), comprised of three permanent administrators and four elected faculty members representing all disciplines, reviews the DRC's decision and looks at the same material as was presented to the DRC. The URC provides a wider scope for review, following standards set forth in the faculty handbook and thus ensuring consistencies across departments.

The DRC and URC review young faculty members three times over a six year period because, "we really do want people to have enough feedback to improve," said Dean of the Arts and Sciences Eugenia Gerdes, standing member of the University Review Committee (URC) which conducts reviews on professors' progress and eligibility.

According to another standing member of the URC, Larry Shinn, vice-president for academic affairs, "Statistics say that almost everyone can make it if they're willing to do their teaching and scholarship in a way that is typical of Bucknell."

The responsibilities of a Bucknell professor include teaching, scholarship and service to the community. "Teaching is the principal activity," said Dean Gerdes. The faculty handbook verifies that expectation by stating, "Effective teaching at Bucknell is essential."

Scholarship, in the form of research and publication of a book, script, poem, journal article, or presentation of a piece of artwork, is the second form of criteria for tenure. "Scholarship is related to teaching, however," said Dean Gerdes.

According to the faculty handbook, publishing "improves teaching effectiveness by encouraging the faculty to keep abreast of new trends and ideas, to reevaluate existing ideas and theories, to think seriously on a professional level about concepts and issues that are part of the corpus of knowledge to which students are exposed, and to obtain valuable feedback by offering the results of this thinking to peers for their judgment and enlightenment."

Since Bucknell's philosophy values teaching over rigorous research, the review committees look at the quality of scholarship, rather than the amount produced. According to Shinn, "Some institutions literally use numbers. We don't."

Faculty are also supposed to assist in the governing and policy-making of the University by serving on committees.

According to Gerdes, "Some young faculty members leave because they want a different type of institution." Some professors prefer universities where there is more emphasis placed upon publishing and research and less of a teaching load required and vice versa.

During the six year review process, Bucknell also loses professors because a spouse can not find a job or because the professor does not enjoy living in a small town. "Some self-select themselves out of the system," said Gerdes.

According to Rich, of those professors who remain at Bucknell to the six year probationary period, 97% are recommended for tenure and approximately 90% of them receive tenure. In this way, Bucknell is an anomaly. Most universities only grant tenure to 60-70% of their professors at the final stage. According to Shinn, "We don't want to be weeding out and literally firing 30-40% at that advanced stage."

"It's much more important to be tough at the hiring point than it is at the review point because there we've already made a commitment to a person and we hope that they are making a commitment to Bucknell and the students," said Shinn.

Professors may be dismissed at the end of the two year, four year, or six year review.

After the second year of teaching, a professor has to have completed the doctoral dissertation or terminal degree, started to publish, and have shown effectiveness in the classroom to have the teaching contract renewed.

After the fourth year, consistent, committed, competent teaching must be demonstrated, scholarship must be published, and participation in University affairs is mandatory in order to continue on the tenure track.

"We do not very often say no to people at the two or four year level. We do write strong letters to give them a clear picture of what they need to do to succeed," said Shinn.

To many young faculty, the letters of feedback are disheartening, however. "None of us likes to say, professionally, you are not good enough to teach at Bucknell," said Shinn.

According to Shinn, the tenure review process and decision is a difficult one, but "there will be hundreds of students, thousands perhaps, who will have that professor." Shinn is afraid that "sometimes because we focus on the pain all of us feel about the individual, we forget that there are a lot of individuals that will be affected by a bad tenure decision."

It is typically at the sixth year tenure review that the disappointments occur.

An appeals process serves as an option for those who feel that their case were improperly handled. The URC announces its decisions on Dec. 15 of each year. A professor who has not been recommended for retention or tenure has 15 days in which to issue an appeal to the URC.

Also, a professor who feels he has been rejected on a procedural violation—sexual or racial discrimination, for instance—has until Feb. 15 to formally appeal the decision. This type of appeal is submitted to the Committee on Academic Freedom and Tenure (CAFT). The CAFT, once it reviews the case, "may direct the URC to conduct a new review, or it may direct that committee to appoint an ad hoc committee for such a purpose," according to the faculty handbook.

The recommendation of the URC, while more binding than that of the DRC, is not the final stage. The URC forwards its recommendations to the president, who then decides how he wants to present it to the Board of Trustees.

Appeals are a necessary part of the process due to the inherent flaws in any tenure system.

According to President Sojka, the process is long and burdensome. "And I'm not sure that that's in any body's best interest—in the best interest of the young faculty member, the institution, the students, or the protection of academic freedom. The problem is, nobody's figured out a way around that problem," he said.

Rich, too, is plagued by the excessive workload, but said, "I really think it is best the way it is, even though I wish I could find a way of doing it differently." He said the URC has discussed ways of streamlining the review process, but in the end decided that it would compromise fairness.

Gerdes said, "One way that the process might be improved is the way student evaluations are collected." Each department distributes its own list of questions to students at the end of each term; there is no common form. Also, students are rarely informed of the importance of the evaluations.

Gerdes also pointed to inconsistencies in the make-up of DRCs. In some departments all professors sit on the committee; in others, three professors are elected. Additionally, some departments allow only tenured professors to serve on the committee, while others allow a mix.

However, some individuals involved in the process argue that the URC combats these differences.

Tenure remains a difficult aspect of academia, yet it is a crucial way to protect academic freedom. According to the faculty handbook, "Wherever the freedom of inquiry or the liberty of an artistic expression is compromised, the life of the University is in jeopardy."

University Tenure Requirements

2nd year retention:	•Successfully completed doctoral dissertation or terminal degree •Effective teaching •Begun to publish
4th year retention:	•Consistant, competant, committed teaching •Published •Participates in Universtiy affairs
6th year retention:	•Record of fine teaching •Publications earned respect of dept. •Contributed significantly to departmental, inter-departmental, or University affairs

BSG proposes change for tenure process

BY TARA GILLIGAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Heather Jobson—The Bucknellian

Brian Mannix '94, BSG president

Displeased with the limited student advice sought in the process of granting tenure to faculty, the Bucknell Student Government (BSG) voted overwhelmingly Sunday to recommend including students on both the University Review Committee (URC) and the Departmental Review Committee (DRC).

"It came to my attention that there are no students" on the committees which review tenure, said Brian Mannix, president of BSG. He stressed that BSG's proposal is not an "us-against-them" move, but rather an attempt to further legitimize the current process.

In the current system, which has been in place for a decade, two review committees are involved in the decisions to retain current faculty and to grant tenure after six years. The DRC, composed entirely of faculty in the department of the individual being reviewed, submits its recommendation to the URC, a mix of administrators and faculty. The URC has authority to reject the recommendations of the DRC.

According to Mannix, faculty and administration response has been mixed. He expects some professors to feel "slightly threatened" by the motion, but said others have already been very receptive. Mannix said one professor told him, "I think it is a really good idea, and I think it can happen."

While students are not actively involved in either level of review, their course evaluations are considered by faculty and administrators. In addition, according to Larry Shinn, vice president for academic affairs and standing member of the URC, often departments will ask students to write letters or form external committees.

While Shinn opposes the BSG motion to include students on the two committees, he believes "students need to be more educated in the way they fill out evaluations."

Shinn was not alone in his belief that the two review committees are "the wrong place for students."

Thomas Rich, dean of engineering, said it would be unfair for the University to expect such an extraordinary time commitment from students. He said that URC members spend up to 70 hours in a month reviewing the cases, and asking students to commit to the same would be unreasonable.

The impetus for this motion came in part from the campaign platform of Garrett Austin '94, member of the University Committee, when he ran for a seat in BSG. He proposed, then, that a separate student committee be established as a third level of review. Dissatisfied with the mode of teaching in some of his courses, he believes students can offer the most appropriate suggestions in granting or denying tenure. "There's no one who knows better how good the method of instruction is than the student," he said.

Elaine McGivern, assistant professor of management and participant in her department's review committee, said she believes that "two reviews instead of three are sufficient."

"It seems like students are on every committee except these two," Mannix said, arguing that including responsible students on committees could only enhance the current system.

Sunday's vote is part of a larger attempt by BSG to increase student involvement in crucial University decisions. While in recent years, the University has made significant moves to listen to more student recommendations, Mannix said there are "still a lot of areas where we don't know we could be involved."

Mannix said he spent much of January preparing for his new role as BSG president and reading the faculty handbook. He became convinced that there are a number of areas in which students really should be more involved.

"It's a question of us taking the power that's already there for us. I don't think there's anyone who doesn't want us to have an impact," he said.

This semester, BSG will be reviewing the entire University governance system, according to Mannix. "There needs to be more of a balance and more equal weight in decision-making than there is now," said Mannix, who would like to see more of a parallel between the faculty government and the student government.

Mathinos said that the board generally sees three different types of academic responsibility cases - those which are pre-meditated instances of cheating, those in which the student didn't realize at the time that what they were doing was dishonest, and those which Mathinos referred to as "the stress reaction."

"The board has had the deliberate, pre-meditated cheating, but fortunately there is not a huge incidence of those," said Mathinos.

According to Mathinos, cases in which students either are not aware that they are cheating or cheat in a state of panic about their grade are much more common.

"There is the form of cheating related to the question of what is an appropriate amount of collaborative effort," said Mathinos. "Students have a hard time knowing where group projects end and cheating begins."

Although it is important for faculty members to be clear about their expectations, part of the responsibility for this kind of ignorance falls on the students themselves, according to Maureen Murphy, associate dean of arts and sciences

"It is very important for students to ask when they are in doubt and to follow those regulations," said Murphy. "Students should ask their professors what they expect."

Plagiarism constitutes another considerable portion of "unintentional" cheating charges. According to Mathinos, many students come to Bucknell without having learned the correct way to cite sources.

"Students learn to write papers a certain way in high school," said Mathinos. "There you can copy a chapter of the Encyclopedia Brittanica, so students don't know when or how to cite."

"This kind of cheating is the easiest to do something about, " said Mathinos. "We just need to educate people."

Toward this end, Bucknell has made available a brochure entitled "Academic Responsibility at Bucknell" which outlines what actions constitute cheating, fabrication, plagiarism, and academic misconduct, and details the procedures to be followed in suspected cases of academic irresponsibility.

In addition to its obvious use as a reference tool for students, Mathinos said that the pamphlet can also be useful as a means for professors to approach the subject of academic responsibility.

"Professors can use the brochure as a focal point of a discussion on the issue," said Mathinos.

The variety of academic irresponsibility Mathinos categorizes as "the stress reaction," however, is more difficult to address because simple availability of the facts about cheating is not enough to combat it.

"It's distressing that we are seeing much more of this kind of cheating," said Mathinos. "It's very difficult of deal with."

According to Mathinos, "the stress reaction" usually occurs when a student is doing marginally in a particular class. The student becomes so concerned with attaining an acceptable grade, that when an opportunity to cheat presents itself, he or she takes it in a panic.

"Other students can look at unintentional cheating as an honest mistake," said Mathinos. "This type of cheating is different. We are all stressed, but we're supposed to be learning how to deal with stress and at the same time maintain our ethics."

According to Mathinos, although students from a variety of majors become involved with incidents of academic misconduct, cases of the stress reaction appear to be a function of academic department.

Mathinos said that students in certain disciplines often perceive their majors to be more rigorous and stress provoking than most, contributing to the likelihood that these students will cheat. "It may be that it allows students to feel less guilty about cheating," said Mathinos.

The University is hoping to combat this form of cheating by encouraging students to consider the implications of academically dishonest behavior before they are faced with the pressure for grades that develops once they begin their program.

"We are trying to work preventatively," said Mathinos. "During freshman orientation we are getting faculty and students together to talk about what the expectations are at Bucknell."

Murphy agrees that education and awareness is the best arsenal against cheating. "If students really cared about how much cheating went on they could put pressure on their peers," she said.

Murphy added that all students have reason to be concerned about the amount of cheating that exists on campus.

"I believe that cheating affects the whole community," said Murphy. "As a member of an academic community, students have the responsibility to do their own work. When that doesn't happen, the honest person is affected as well."

Zen master and Tibetan flutist to visit campus

BY NEIL BARDACH
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Next week the University will host visits by Reverend Keido Fukushima, a Zen Master and head abbott of the Tofukuji Monastery in Kyoto, Japan, as well as Tibetan flutist Nawang Khechog, who performed the opening ceremonies for the Earth Summit this fall.

Fukushima was born in 1933 in Kobe, Japan. He joined the Rinzai Zen group of Buddhism in 1947. He completed his graduate studies at Otani University in Kyoto, Japan, and joined the monastery of Nanzenji in 1961. In 1971, he became the vice abbott at the Hofukuji temple in Okoyama. In 1980, he went to Tofukuji as the leading Zen Master. In April of 1991, Fukushima was appointed the head abbott of his school of the Rinzai school of Buddhism.

Fukushima will visit many colleges in the United States, including Claremont College in California and Xavier in Cincinatti.

As the head priest of the Rinzai sect of Zen Buddhism, Fukushima has worked with Claremont College students for 11 years; also, he is one of the few Zen monks in Japan who welcomes foreigners to stay at his temple.

Fukushima will give a lecture entitled "The Way of Zen" on Wednesday, Mar. 3 at 7:30 p.m. in the Elaine Langone Center Forum. He will be accompanied by his disciple, Jeff Shore, who will act as his translator, although Fukushima does speak English.

On Thursday, Mar. 5 between 4 and 5:30 p.m. Fukushima will hold a calligraphy demonstration. The demonstration will be in the Elaine Langone Center Forum. Also, Fukushima will lead a meditation on Friday, Mar. 5 from 3 to 4:30 p.m. in the Meditation Chapel in Rooke Chapel.

Visiting also during the week is Nawang Khechog, a Tibetan Flutist. Born in Tibet, Khechog fled to India in exile after the invasion of his native Tibet by Communist China. He has been a Tibetan monk for 11 years and has studied philosophy and meditation under Tibetan masters in Dharmsala, India.

Khechog is an accomplished musician, and he plays musical instruments from around the globe. Among his instruments are bamboo and Native American flutes, Australian Aboriginal didgeridoo, and South American clay okharina.

Khechog will give a concert entitled "Sounds of Creative Peace," on Friday, Mar. 5 at 8 p.m. The concert will take place in Bucknell Hall.

Nawang Khechog will perform at Bucknell Hall next Friday at 8 p.m. Khechog opened the Earth Summit using various native instruments.

All events in conjunction with these visitors are free and open to the public.

The events are co-sponsored by the University Lectureship Committee, the Bucknell Association for the Arts, the department of religion, and the Columbian Quincentennial program.

tee (OBAC) makes its decisions as to which, and how many student organizations will receive office space, OBRC will work with OBAC to decide on the most efficient physical layout for the offices.

The decision as to which groups receive space, how much, and for how long is entirely in the hands of the all-student OBAC. The committee was put together jointly by Goldman, and Kristin Skarie, director of student activities. Since the "allocation of the space" which, said Skarie, comprises eight rooms roughly the size of the OSA, "is such a politically charged issue, we wanted to create a fair and diverse committee."

Jean Auro—The Bucknellian

Mitch Goldman and Kristin Skarie, director of the Office of Student Activities, review the blueprints of the Old Bison.

Skarie and Goldman submitted a list to "student groups where the representatives (of the fifteen person committee would come from) with as many different groups as possible to the Committee on Complementary Activities (CCA)," said Skarie.

OBAC includes representatives from the Bucknell Activities Council, Bucknell Student Government, Committee of Women's Leadership, First Year Governance, FLAG&B, the Interfraternity Council, International Spectrum, OSA Office Managers, Panhellenic Council, Residence Hall Association, and five at large students.

Once CCA offered support for this breakdown, each of the groups was asked to nominate three people for the committee, said Skarie. "That enabled us to ensure balance with race, gender, and class year." The committee as it exists now, according to Goldman, will ensure that "any student group has just as fair of a chance as any other student group."

Student organizations are to present space requests to OBAC, where decisions will be made "not by a vote, but more by consensus and agreement which will take longer but will ensure that people don't just vote for their own groups," said Skarie.

The committee will remain standing after the first decisions are made and will decide on term lengths, if any, for the organizations' offices.

After the allocation decisions are made, OBAC and OBRC will work together to recommend a layout for the offices. Options under consideration include having "one office for many groups, many little offices, or a combination of the two," said Goldman.

OBAC has not had its first meeting yet. However, its members will have to work hard if they are to complete their recommendations by the end of the semester so construction can take place this summer.

PUSH AND SHOVE

Students, as well as professors, were seen cutting the "line" in order to get their tickets. Sonny Spiegal '93, said, "Since I work at the Information Desk, I walked behind the counter to see how the whole situation was going. I thought to myself, 'My God, what is this madness?' I waited on line for 2 hours and still didn't get a ticket. I could easily have gotten a ticket from someone behind the counter, but I just didn't have the heart when I saw all those people standing on line."

By 10 a.m., Bzdak recalled, "Anyone standing near the counter was crushed by people shoving behind. Some people didn't bother standing on line." Apparently, students began handing their IDs to friends already waiting on line. "Some students," told Bzdak, "were using IDs of friends who were currently abroad."

"Between 10-11 a.m. there remained roughly 50 tickets with at least 200 people still waiting in line," said Bzdak. John Guthrie '95 complained, "When there were about 50 tickets left, they only gave out one ticket per person."

Meanwhile, observers reported that previously, anyone could obtain tickets regardless if they had the proper ID. All they had to do was mention the names of students and have someone from behind the counter cross off the name in a directory.

Geoff Behrens '96 stood on line for a friend. "It was a bunch of mad people," he said. "I heard a couple of people say they were gonna get a ticket no matter what. It was pandemonium until security came."

BRINGING ORDER

Public safety arrived shortly after 10 a.m. and attempted to bring some order to the scene. Public Safety Officer Tony Mileto said, "This is ridiculous. Look at this—this isn't even organized! They should have called us this morning, and we would have been up here from the start." He continued, "Public safety could have taped off the line and had just one entrance. Those who wait in line get rewarded with a ticket. We've got people who have been waiting since 9 a.m. and they are no farther than they were when they started."

Such a crowd was not anticipated by the staff behind the counter. Bzdak reflected, "I expected it to be a mess but not like that." Hartzell spoke for the Athletic Department and said, " We took the chance that there would be big lines. I don't know what the staff behind the counter could have done, more than what they were already doing. They are professional people, and you just have to trust their judgement".

According to Hartzell, the whole purpose of distributing the tickets from the Langone Center was to provide greater convenience to the students. "If we decided to distribute tickets from the Christy Mathewson ticket window, we would have had students standing outside in the cold and missing more classes. However, students were reported to be cutting not only classes, but exams for the sake of getting tickets."

PROBLEMS OF A SMALL GYM

"As long as you have more people than space," said John Dunlop, dean of students, "You're going to have this problem. There's far more interest in basketball than there are seats in the gym." This seems to be the crux of the problem, as reiterated by both Hartzell and men's basketball coach, Charles Woollum.

"The building is just not big enough," said Harztell. "Last year we had upwards of 3000 people jammed into the gym like sardines. This year, the fire marshall cracked down on us and would absolutely not allow us to seat more than 2,500 people, and that even includes standing room for 250 people."

On top of that, last year's renovations set seating back 250 seats, from seating fro 2,500 to 2,250. However, these renovations were completed with the intentions of assuring better safety for students, as well as other fans, related Harztell. Said Hartzell, "If ever there was an emergency, there would be an awful lot of trouble."

STUDENTS' REACTIONS

Some students, after waiting on line all morning still did not get tickets. "It was utter ridiculousness!" said Guthrie. "We pay 20 grand a year and we can't even see our own basketball team play." Spiegal lamented over the fact that she would be missing the last home basketball game before graduating from Bucknell. "There should have been some order," said Spiegal. "The method chosen to sell tickets kept changing. There was no consistency. This was so unfair to so many people that I felt they should have just redistributed the tickets."

However, some students weren't as calm about remaining empty-handed after all that waiting. Comments ranged from "I'm so pissed" and "You've got to be kidding me" to some rather colorful and expressive expletives. One student approached his friend and asked, "Do you want to scalp?" Oddly enough, student Behrens found the situation humorous. Behrens mused, "I found it all funny. I was going to give my ticket to my friend since I won't even be here this weekend. I guess if the ticket had been for me, I would have been pissed too!"

Afterwards in the Bison, students could be heard criticizing the University. "I can't believe that they didn't think they were going to have a line," said one student. One student proposed to Dean Dunlop, "Can't they [tickets] go on sale at like 4 o'clock in the morning so that everyone has a chance to get one? I mean, I had a class that I wanted to go to."

Varsity team members Chris Simpson '94 and Raymond Brown '94 were available for comment as they were walking up the steps of the Langone Center during ticket distribution. "Man, the game's not even worth it." Obviously glad at the prospect of not having to wait on line Brown added, "We definitely need a new place to play. But I don't care—I already have a seat!"

REACTIONS FROM STAFF AND ADMINISTRATORS

Hartzell was far from happy with the outcome of the ticket distribution.

He said, "I'm unhappy because it's a travesty when our students can't see out team play. If I were a student, I would be upset too. Maybe this whole ordeal will get to the attention of the appropriate trustees. There's no doubt that this building is outdated. It's not the type to support a student body such as ours. I'm willing to take whatever abuse people want to give. I'm open to any suggestions to how we can accomodate about 8,000 people in 2,500 seats."

On a more upbeat note, Bzdak stressed, "I think the students felt badly for those of us behind the counter. No one was rude to me! Actually, someone even brought me a soda."

ALTERNATIVE VIEWING

Students wishing to view the game but do not possess tickets can watch it from the Bison on the campus channel 40.

There is also a possibility that the local channel 8 will set up a microwave dish on top of the gym so that anyone could view the game on any television. However, this likelihood is entirely dependent on that network, not Bucknell.

client through these last few semesters with several checks to ensure fairness."

The process whereby a fraternity would be facing GMT sanctions is three-fold. Three GMT members who, according to Alfieri, "have all had the same training and are from three different houses write a report based on their visit to each fraternity which they all co-sign." In this first step of the process, "The fraternity officer that brought them around the house is permitted to read the report which eliminates the possibility that GMT is out to get a house. Any discrepancies can be dealt with then," said Alfieri.

The second and third steps of the process are much like the U.S. criminal justice system, with the IFC executive board serving as a grand jury and the IFC peer review board serving as a trial jury.

The IFC executive board takes the observations of the GMT and decides whether there is enough evidence to warrant a peer review board hearing.

In most cases, said Alfieri, "Even if we are questionable, we'll let someone else decide. We may not be the best ones to make that decision so we'll let the peer review board do it."

With the University system in place, one may question why GMT is even necessary. Alfieri said that GMT is the enforcement arm of BYOB, which the University does not require Greeks to follow.

However, according to Alfieri, following this non-University regulation is key to the long-run survival of the Greek system.

"BYOB must work. It will reduce our liability criminally and to the extent that parties are run properly. It will put us into better compliance with Act 31 and the social host doctrine, and most importantly, we must do it for insurance reasons. We're a society that likes to sue, unfortunately," said Alfieri.

This semester, according to Alfieri, "The presidents are starting to realize BYOB is here, and they are starting to come together and cooperate more so than in past semesters."

The major problem in the past has been that when one house finds a way to get around BYOB, the other houses "will adopt the same technique so they can also have as much fun as possible," said Alfieri.

In addition to working through the IFC, Alfieri, as well as Casey Corbett '94, president of Panhel, are taking their message to non-Greeks who expect to be served when they attend Greek functions.

"It's not just a Greek problem," said Alfieri. "We're sort of in charge of the social scene even if we don't want to be due to the environment of Bucknell so we have to show the Bucknell community the necessity to start acting responsibly toward alcohol."

Alfieri said that he realizes the progression to full implementation of BYOB will be slow.

However, on the weekend he visited houses as part of GMT, "People were starting to bring beer—granted, not as much as we'd like—but we are working on that," he said.

Alfieri characterized the current probationary status of many fraternities as a "time of reflection."

In the next month, he said, "A lot of houses will be coming off probation. If houses get busted again, they are potentially going to lose house party. This period may help them to reflect on that."

Red Cross taps Bucknell

The local Red Cross will sponsor a blood drive on Mar. 10 and 11 in Larison Hall in conjunction with the service fraternity Alpha Phi Omega. Kari Ann Kerr '94 and Cleydi Jimenez '93 are organizing volunteer staff and donor recruitment for the two day event.

Dominos will provide free pizza for all blood donors. Kerr hopes that the incentive of free pizza will entice people to donate their blood.

Ruth Burnham, Union County Red Cross Chairperson, said of the drive, "No one really knows when they'll need blood, so come out and donate for someone who really needs it today!"

Trustee to give address

Sharon A. Lambly, vice president of human resources for Hershey Foods and a member of the University board of trustees, will give a talk on Mar. 1 at the Bull Run Inn in Lewisburg. The focus of her speech will be "Strategic Direction in Human Resources." Lambly's visit was arranged by the University's student chapter of the Society for Human Resource Management.

Lambly's program will begin with a social hour at 5:45 p.m., and the program will follow at 6:45 p.m. For more information, contact Trace Nevil at Evangelical Community Hospital (717-522-2716).

Students sing to Fun Flicks

Students will have the opportunity to display their creative talents today. Fun Flicks, a make your own video lip synch program, will be held in the Terrace Room today from 3-9 p.m. Admission is free.

Tomorrow, there will be an awards show in Vaughn Lit. auditorium. There will be nine prizes worth a total of $1,000.

Women can learn defense

A program on women's social defense will be held on campus Tuesday, Mar. 9. Presented by social defense expert Dave Menacker, the event will include a lecture and demonstration at 8 p.m. in the L.C. Forum on ways college women can protect themselves in social situations. This will be followed by a 9:30 workshop in the fieldhouse during which participants will have the opportunity to practice the skills they have learned. This campus-wide event was initiated by Delta Delta Delta.

Off Campus

Brown boots alleged racist

Gilbert Moore '94 turned himself in to the Dean's office at Williams College after posting several racist, anti-African-American messages on the door of the Black Student Union on campus. Moore is an African-American.

According to sources closely involved with the case, Moore was suspended for a full semester.

If Moore is suspended, as many as 15 African-American have threatened to leave the school if Moore's punishment is not suspended. These students claim that Moore was merely attempting to stimulate "intellectual discourse on race relations" by posting the notes.

Holy Cross now recycles

Holy Cross University students returned from winter vacation recently to find a new recycling program in place. The program, which resulted from a recent Massachusetts legislative ruling, went into effect over the break despite an amendment to the legislation that will postpone the deadline for compliance with the new law until Apr. 1.

Tufts Frat is on probation

On Jan. 28 the Delta Tau Delta fraternity was found guilty of public obscenity and sexual misconduct by the Inter-Greek Council Judiciary Board at Tufts University. The fraternity was placed on a two year probation after the Board concluded its investigation concerning the fraternity's actions last spring. Said Dean of Students Bruce Reitman, "This is the most serious case the IGC Judiciary Board heard last year."

Lehigh bans smoking in UC

On Tues. Feb. 9 Lehigh University's Student Senate voted to outlaw smoking in the University Center.

Until this rule was passed, students were allowed to smoke in designated areas in the University Center. According to previous regulations, students were permitted to smoke only in the rear of the Lehigh Cafe, a student gathering spot. However, according to several students, this did not prevent the entire area from becoming smoke-filled.

Lehigh frats violate rush

Last week, the Interfraternity Judiciary Committee at Lehigh University found two fraternities guilty of violating the school's new rush policy. The two fraternities, Phi Kappa Theta and Delta Tau Delta, were sanctioned for extending a formal invitation (pre-bid) to rushees prior to the University's official rush period.

Drexel Greeks are homeless

At this time, it is unknown as to the cause of a fire that completely destroyed the Pi Kappa Phi fraternity house on the campus of Drexel University on Feb. 19. All 29 brothers who were in the house at the time of the fire escaped safely, though one of the brothers suffered a minor burn on his foot.

The house, which dates back to 1885, was fully equipped with fire alarms and smoke detectors. The alarms were activated at 6:23 a.m., when the fire started in a bedroom on the second floor.

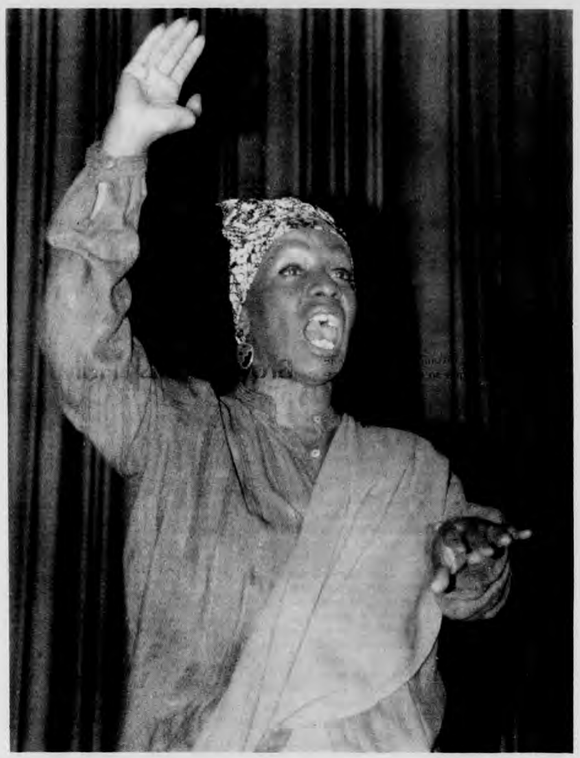
Black History Month: An African Experience!

Black History Month provided an opportunity for Bucknellians to appreciate a culture to which most have had little exposure. Students and faculty worked for months to coordinate a schedule of events ranging from dramatic presentations, to art exhibits, to musical entertainment. These events provided a chance for the Bucknell community to experience the vast cultural impact that blacks have had throughout the country. Many came to realize, as a result of the Hugh Masekela concert, that black culture is the root of modern music. It is the purpose of Multicultural Programming to stimulate thought and conversation, and that was the result of the past month.



Clockwise from left: African artwork (Center Gallery) such as this sculpture by the Fang tribe served as inspiration for Picasso and other Cubists; Moses Molelekwa relaxes backstage after Hugh Masekela and His Band finished their concert in the Weis Center; Fang memorial drum donned with a monkey skin top;Vinie Burrows performs her one-woman show *Sister! Athletic Department shot airball with basketball tickets

An angry mob swarms near the Langone Center information desk. Students and professors alike vie for position at the front. Tired tempers flare as the crowd's killer instinct takes hold.

No, this is not the Halloween riot. No one has been drinking. The light of day is shining. In fact classes are in session, though attendance is low. The cops are not there, in fact, no one in a position of authority on the pending conflict is present. And the administration is not involved at all.

This time, it was the athletic department's inept handling of basketball ticket distribution Monday morning which brought out the worst in many Bucknellians. Considering that this is the last regular season home game of the year, a game that will decide the Patriot League championship, and that there were five hundred fewer tickets available than normal, the athletic department should have planned ahead.

The athletic department prides itself in developing student athletes. Distributing tickets to a sporting event in the middle of classes shows a blatant disregard for the entire reason we are attending a university. Such a stunt is unthinkable at a university with Bucknell's academic reputation.

Athletics have a very important place here—none more so than basketball. But they need not interfere with academic life. What could the department have been thinking? Did they forget that classes are scheduled for Monday mornings?

There was never any effort to ensure that the distribution would be fair and orderly. Controlling an angry mob is not the job of LC operators. The athletic department might have anticipated some confusion and even chaos. After all, there have been four different distribution policies (including the upcoming tournament), there were similar problems with the Fordham game, and this is an even bigger game.

With everyone jockeying for position, only the strong survived. Crowds of students pushed the weak away in order to get their tickets. Even professors lied about having class in order to avoid the line and risk of not getting a ticket.

Crafty students took advantage of the athletic department's lack of planning by lying about friends and roommates who could not pick up tickets. The operators eventually caught on and they had to make policy for the athletic department.

There was no plan. There was no order. There were no representatives of the department. There was no regard: for fairness, for academics, for doing their job.

And after Monday's fiasco, how does the athletic department respond? "See you at the stadium bright and early at 9 a.m. Monday morning!"

It's not the basketball team's fault, nor the coach's. They are the people we want to see. Ticket distribution is not their responsibility. The burden lies in the athletic director's office. Is there any one present to bear it?

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Problems with distribution of basketball tickets made many students unhappy

Faculty cutting line was worst

TO THE EDITOR,

I am writing to express my thoughts on the way basketball tickets were distributed for the Holy Cross game on Monday. There were several flaws in the distribution of tickets, including crowd control, ticket policy, and faculty tickets.

One issue was the mob mentality of the waiting students on the second floor of the Langone Center. While no one expected students to wait in a neat and orderly fashion, the scene that unfolded was mayhem. Students in line were four to six across the hall, with students clearly pushing, shoving, and cutting in line. Did anyone from the Athletic Department consider the possible crowd control problems that could have and did arise from such a situation? Was the Information Desk in the center of the LC the best place to distribute tickets, with such a number and concentration of students in a closed area? In deciding where and when to distribute the tickets, was it considered that Security may have been needed from the beginning, at 9 a.m., rather than at 10:30 a.m., when they were called to the scene?

Furthermore, the tickets were distributed on a Monday morning, when many students were required to be in class. Granted, many students did cut class to wait in the line, but what about those students that had a test at 9 a.m. Monday, or for which class attendance was required? By the time those students arrived at 10 a.m., the line was already circling the second floor.

One of the biggest flaws was the policy that students could obtain up to four tickets with four IDs. First, this policy was never publicized to the student population after it was announced late Friday afternoon. Students learned of this policy through the "grapevine" over the weekend. Further, as this policy made its way through the line as students waited, the IDs kept coming forward to friends and acquaintances who were further up in line. Was this fair to the other students waiting in line who had no one to pass their IDs to? While this policy was initiated to accommodate students who did have class, it clearly was abused and failed in its intent.

Rick Hartzell, Athletic Director, did not arrive until 10 a.m., when the situation was already out of control. He too, like many of the students in line, found out about the four-ID policy at this time. Shouldn't a representative from the Athletic Department have been present at the beginning of the ticket distribution through the end? Additionally, did the lines of communication regarding the ticket distribution policy not reach all of those involved?

However, while students were waiting in line, the biggest abuse of all was taking place. Faculty and staff of the University were cutting and receiving as many as six tickets for their immediate family. The question that arises is why should faculty and staff be allowed to cut, and further, receive multiple tickets? Are not sports and sporting events held for the students of Bucknell? Faculty and staff wanting tickets should wait in line like students. Though some faculty who were cutting explained that they had classes to teach, is that not their job? What about those students mentioned above who were in a similar predicament, but could not cut because their ID was white and not orange? Do faculty children and relatives need tickets, when student demand was so high and Bucknell students would appreciate those same tickets and seats more? Faculty and staff should be limited to two tickets, so that they may bring a spouse, friend, or child.

The point is that the Athletic Department did not put enough thought into the ticket distribution process. One solution to these problems may be the following. First, hold it on a weekend, early in the morning. This accomplishes several items. First, students and staff do not have to worry about their academic schedules. Second, by holding it in the morning, those students who have supported the Bison and really want tickets will make the effort to get in line in spite of the time. The tickets should be given out at the stadium with the policy of one ticket, one ID, with names crossed off in one directory as students receive their tickets. Further, the line could be directed into the stadium and looped around the track, with crowd control and direction provided by Security. In this atmosphere too, the Athletic Department staff could have full control and responsibility for the actions that take place.

Sincerely,

NEIL H. AMWAKE '93

Vedder hall seeks a better way

TO THE EDITOR:

After witnessing the manner in which the University distributed the tickets for the Holy Cross game, we are greatly disturbed. The tickets were given out on Monday morning at 9:00 a.m. Students who wished to receive tickets were forced to stand in line for over two hours, subsequently missing their class commitments. Several professors with whom we spoke were not pleased, knowing that their classes would be cut by students wishing to obtain a ticket. Some students who were more resourceful either cut the line or had their friends get the tickets for them.

Some students who were more resourceful either cut the line or had their friends get the tickets for them.

The student body should have showed more responsible behavior and formed a single-file line and protested the line cutting. One needed only to show several Bucknell ID's and in some cases only give the names of the persons for whom they were getting tickets. The University has failed to stick to its policy of one student/one ID/one ticket. Furthermore, this policy of distributing the tickets on a Monday morning discriminates against students who may have had an exam and could not afford to skip class to get a ticket.

We see an alternative. The basketball tickets in the future could be distributed on the weekend, when students are not pressed by class commitments and the myriad of other activities in which they are involved. Also, the University should employ security officers to oversee the mob of students and prevent the pushing, shoving, and line cutting that was so prevalent Monday morning. If these problems had been anticipated sooner, we would have had a much fairer distribution of tickets and a happier student body. Also, we personally might not be so pissed off if we had had a chance to get tickets.

Bad situation: missing classes to get tickets

TO THE EDITOR:

I was very disappointed to not get a ticket to Saturday's basketball game. The way the tickets are currently distributed is a clear conflict of the ideals of our league. The Patriot League was established to promote academics as well as athletics. If one wanted to attend Saturday's basketball game, s/he had to miss class to wait in line for tickets. Many students missed class and stood in line only to have the tickets sell out before they got to the front of the line. The ticket policy for this season was structured so students could attend games free of charge. While this works out well, we are defeating our own purpose if students have to miss class in order to attend games. I am sure the lines will reappear for any championship games that Bucknell hosts.

Hopefully, we can devise a better way to distribute the tickets. Moving the sale time to one when there are no classes is an alternative, but students will still line up well in advance of the sale time. I think the best alternative is a mail system, first come, first served. While it adds paperwork, it could be implemented for championship games only. Students would not have to miss classes, and would simply receive their tickets in the mail. It seems to work well for the Rooke Chapel candlelight services, so why not basketball games?

Sexual harassment pieces roundly criticized

TO THE EDITOR:

P.O.W.E.R. would like to respond to page 7 of the February 19 Bucknellian in order to clarify why sexual harassment, this so-called "paranoid hysteria," has increasingly received widespread attention. Sexual harassment was not "invented" recently, but has been part of the oppression of women as long as patriarchy has existed. The reason why educational programs about sexual harassment are finally being implemented on college campuses, in business settings, and in government offices across the country is because women refuse to be silent about men's abuse of power.

Last week's Bucknellian failed to address the actuality: in the repressive male-dominated system of patriarchy, sexual harassment is the fault of the men who take advantage of power dynamics! By blaming gender roles and socialization, as the writers last week did, the responsibility for sexual harassment is taken off individuals and put upon society. Sexual harass-

Why is Sojka silent on school's alcohol problem?

BY ROSS FEINGOLD

It's been said that ultimate responsibility lies with the person in command. With such a responsibility comes the obligation of explaining to those you command the reasons why something went, or is in the process, of going wrong. In the case of Bucknell University, President Sojka is in command, and he has a lot of explaining to do. His ship is taking on a lot of alcohol, and it is going down very quickly.

That 20/20 did not show up does not mean all is once again pristine here at Bucknell. The students know full well why 20/20 considered this university, and most students are mature enough to admit that they would have found what they were looking for, if Barbara Walters and crew had actually shown up. The only reason 20/20 would not have found evidence of students consuming incredible amounts of alcohol would be if the evidence was hidden, which just might have occurred. That only goes to show that there is indeed a problem. It is not necessary to examine the problem in detail here; we all know the details and costs all too well.

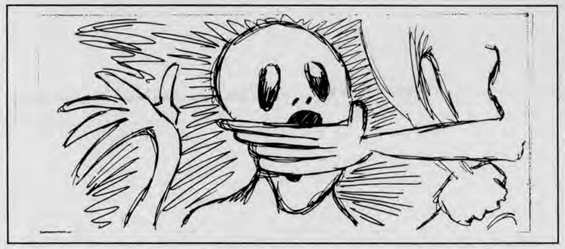
President Sojka is in command, and he has a lot of explaining to do. His ship is taking on a lot of alcohol, and it is going down very quickly.

But now word is getting out. A college guide book ranks Bucknell at the top of several alcohol-related categories. A national television program considers coming here to do a piece on our problem.

It does not end there. Word will filter to our parents who pay an exorbitant amount of money for our time here. Word will get to prospective students, and watch what will happen to the quality of the applicants, as the party-minded decides this university offers what he or she wants, and the academic-minded passes on coming here. Word will get to the alumni, and eventually they will want to know why their money is going down the drain with the after-effects of a night of partying. Word is spreading outside of the bubble, but one person inside of the bubble seems to want to avoid admitting that there is an epidemic.

The President has chosen to become Silent Sojka on the matter. Instead of taking a stand and admitting that something is very wrong, the President and the leadership hide while a problem that will have expanding negative ramifications worsens. They hide behind a new alcohol and disciplinary system, a response to their obviously failed measures of the past, and this too is doomed to failure because their is no command at the top to vociferously implement and defend University policy. With all the junk mail we receive, a letter from Silent Sojka addressing the issue is certainly, as the person in charge of this sinking ship, an obligation of his—not to mention his obligation to parents and the alumni.

One can run, but one cannot hide. Unless a serious effort is made to remedy the alcoholic tendencies of this campus, someone will be held accountable, and that person will be the person in command.



"Draw the line" on censorship

BY BRIAN ENG

Everyone has an opinion. Everyone has the need to voice their personal views and to express their emotions. In this age of loud, opinionated artists, journalists, comedians, and musicians, censorship is an issue that seems to always come up, regardless of who the artist is or what they stand for.

Today, is seems that all artists are being constantly reminded of the issue of censorship. Even comedians are being censored. To bring this to a campus level, consider the performance of Henry Cho.

When Henry Cho came to campus, he was probably one of the biggest comedy acts that Bucknell had for the year. We all know that during his act, he made some homophobic jokes that offended some, and amused others. It is because of these couple of jokes, which offended a few people, that Henry Cho is not being asked to come back next year.

Henry Cho is a major act who was willing to perform on campus and because of a few jokes, now he's gone. Bucknell social life is on life support as it is; we don't need this kind of censorship.

Censorship is hurting Bucknell in this case. Henry Cho is a major act who was willing to perform on campus and because of a few jokes, now he's gone. Bucknell social life is on life support as it is; we don't need this kind of censorship.

I can understand how Henry Cho might have offended some homosexuals who listened to him. But he made many jokes that could have offended other parties as well. He made many Asian jokes also; I didn't see SAAB (Students for Asian-American Awareness at Bucknell) fighting to have his act removed from campus. Personally, I am an Asian-American student here, and when I heard those jokes, I wasn't offended. The reason I wasn't offended was that I understand.

Henry Cho is an artist—he practices the art of comedy, the art of making people laugh. I think he does it quite well, judging by the roaring laughter from the crowd. He wasn't deserving of the treatment he received. Some will argue that I wasn't offended because he was Asian also. Personally, I find Asian-against-Asian comments just as offensive as others, so that's not the case. If Henry Cho was white, black, Hispanic, or anything else, I would (honestly) feel the same way.

The truth is that censorship does nothing to help anyone. The only thing it does is hurt. With Henry Cho, censorship hurt the artist, the school, my opinion of the homosexual community that opposed him, and my opinion of the individuals who made the decision to remove his act for further years.

Take music as another example. The amount of censorship that has been placed upon music in recent years is frightening. With major changes in the emphasis on record stickers and the censoring of any material a particular group finds offensive, the entire premise of the First Amendment to the Constitution has become warped.

What happens everyday to artists like Ice-T is wrong. He had an opinion to voice, through his music. When he did so, everyone around him pressured him until he pulled "Cop Killer" off the shelves. What supporters of the police basically did by censoring Ice-T was force him to withdraw his opinion.

When any particular group finds any material offensive, there is always a great controversy about censorship. This should not be the case. Any artist should have the right to express his or her views regardless of the opinion of others. If an individual or group of individuals finds something offensive, they have the right to state their opinions in the opposite direction, but they do not have the right to try to censor the views of their opposition.

This isn't even an issue that deals with the First Amendment or any political questions. It has to do with morals. It's not right for people to be able to say, "I don't agree with your opinion. Take it back."

Censorship goes directly against the First Amendment and needs to end. People everywhere need to realize that others have different opinions about different issues, no matter how extreme the case. As I said before, we need to draw the line somewhere. No matter how you look at it, everyone has the right to speak.

Evangelists: Leave me alone

BY JASON SPIEGELMAN

Did anyone else grow tired of the almost constant harassment received from members of Christians in Action and the Fellowship of Christian Athletes last week? I have, and the experience has caused me to question the intentions of those individuals.

It is with much internal conflict that I write this article, but it is one that I feel compelled to write in view of some of the events which occurred last week. As every member of the Bucknell community knows, last week was designated "Proclamation Week" by the members of CA and FCA. We have all seen the table in the Langone Center Mall every day, and the numerous fish posted on each inch of available wall space in every building on campus. Similarly, many of us were witness to the Coffeehouse performance given by members of the groups, and we have been subject to the evangelizing that has taken place at the uphill LC each day.

My personal conflict is this—I believe that every person in this country has the right to believe what he or she wants to believe, and that person has the right to say these beliefs. These rights are guaranteed in the First Amendment to the Constitution of the United States. It would be very presumptuous of me to try to claim otherwise, so I won't do so. I also believe that these people have a right to attempt to convince people that their view is correct—to try to sell their product, so to speak. The only problem is this: where should the line be drawn? I was made to realize how much the actions of these University groups upset me when I had the following experience.

I was walking past the uphill LC when I was approached by a strange male. He asked me if I was member of CA. Understanding that this person did not know me, I informed him that I am not, as politely as I could. He went on to ask me if I would like to join, and I informed him that I am not interested because I am Jewish. His attitude immediately lost any cordiality, an he made this statement: "If you don't change your ways, you're going to go to hell."

I walked away as offended as I could possibly be, and spent quite a bit of time in the next few days deciding what to do about this. In discussing my encounter with friends that I can confide in, I discovered four other people who have been told the same things by members of CA.

Realize that some of us don't want to have you shoving your love down our throats, and we want you to keep your religion to yourselves, or at least away from us.

My purpose must be made abundantly clear. I don't mean to extol the virtues of Judaism. In fact, I would like to say that these opinions are mine, and I don't represent Hillel in any way. I don't claim that CA and FCA should shut up and go about their business, because I don't have the right to make that kind of demand. I don't claim that there is anything wrong with these people having religious affiliations that contrast mine, because that is the freedom that makes this nation America.

I merely want to say this: there are some of us on campus who want to be left alone by groups like CA and FCA. I personally resent having to read the word of Jesus Christ when I walk to class. I don't like being told that I am going to hell because I am Jewish. I very much detest being made to feel that I am somehow less "righteous" or more "evil" because I have chosen a religion that differs from others.

It seems to me that the extreme actions of the members of CA and FCA have conveyed an almost anti-Semitic, anti-Buddhist, and anti-anything else attitude that makes me feel unwelcome here at Bucknell. I was speaking with a member of CA who happens to be a friend of mine, and his response to my disdain was, "We wanted to stir things up on campus." Fine. Stir things up if you must, but incorporate a little decorum next time. Be sensitive to the feelings of others, even if they represent things that you find impossible to accept.

Last week's Bucknelli in contained a letter to the editor from the "members of Christians In Action and Fellowship of Christian Athletes," which said, "We think that it would be rather hypocritical of us as individuals and as groups to say that we have been given the hope of life through Jesus and then not share it with everyone around us." My request is this—realize that some of us don't want to have you shoving your love down our throats, and we want you to keep your religion to yourselves, or at least away from us.

Many of my good friends on campus are members of CA, and the possibilities for those friendships to exist in spite of the religious differences is born from respect, mutual respect. If you show that respect to everyone, there will be no bruised feelings, and no resentment.

If you would like to respond to this article, please feel free to write to the opinions editor, or directly to me. Intelligent responses to The Bucknellian will be considered for publication. Rash hate mail to me will be given as much consideration as I gave to joining CA.

Learn some neglected history during Black History Month

BY LARNIE J. BOOKER

Why is there a Black History Month? I mean, what does it accomplish? Why is it only one month? Are the eleven remaining months White history months? Why is the awareness of Black history relegated to 28, sometimes 29 days? As February will be gone in two days, and with it Black History Month, I feel that it is necessary to review and reflect on its importance.

Black men and women's contributions to American culture, as well as world culture, should not be ignored. By designating the learning of Black history to a limited period of time, we restrict the knowledge available to people.

History should not be the accumulation of his story, meaning Caucasian male history; it should be the collection of our stories, all men and women. It should include the contributions of all people that has led to advancements in all fields—arts, music, literature, engineering and science.

For people of any race, their history plays a vital role in their motivation and approach to different situations. For Black people, this couldn't be any truer.

Take this time to close your eyes and imagine what life would be like without the contributions of Blacks. According to history we have the light bulb courtesy of Thomas Edison, yet it would not have been possible without the filament that was invented by Lewis Latimer. How would modern-day cities manage automobile traffic, had Garrett Morgan not created the traffic sign? How far would NASA's explorations have gone without the space mapping and tracking skills of Katherine Johnson and the computer coding developed by Annie Easley?

This information has been neglected or just forgotten because it could not have all been learned in 28 or 29 days. How does one expect to teach or learn centuries of information in 28 or 29 days? What do we do after these four weeks have past, forget about Black history?

Even when Black history is covered, significant portions seem to be missing in action. It is far too often the case that people see Black history as having started with the slave trade. I'm sorry but that's only the one chapter of Blacks' experience in the United States. Black people have a long and prestigious history that dates back to one of the most powerful and successful people the world has ever known—the ancient Egyptians, who, by the way, were African. It has been my experience that people see Egypt as some distant, far-off land. Wake up, it's part of the African continent.

For people of any race, their history plays a vital role in their motivation and approach to different situations. For Black people, this couldn't be any truer. Black people bore life to the rest of the world. We ruled the world, yet had everything stripped from us. The Egyptians built the Sphinxes so that there would be images for people of the future to remember them by. Yet the Europeans removed the noses to hide the fact that they were Black. The architecture of the ancient Egyptians has been so revered and marveled at that, when the buildings in nation's capital were built, they modeled the structure of the buildings designed by the ancient kings.

But these are not things which history tells us. The Africans were kings, rulers, and warriors of their own land with a culture all their own. The Europeans and early Americans removed them from their homeland, broke up their families, and robbed them of their culture and religion to act as slaves. Think about that and tell me how it makes you feel.

Be careful when noticing items that have been attributed to Europeans. Make an attempt to get the full story because I'm sure something has been left out. The next time you go to study your history, be sure that's it all inclusive or you'll only be getting half the story.

What does Black history mean for non-Blacks? For Blacks, our history stands as a tool for motivation. It reminds us, first, that we are a people that must return to our rightful places as kings and queens of the land. Second, despite the harsh conditions that our ancestors had to endure, we have reached positions which command respect in the United States and throughout the world. Through the tolerance and strength of our ancestors, we feel that there is nothing that we cannot accomplish, regardless of the length of time that it may take or the level of difficulty.

With all of this in mind, please remember that Black history does not begin on Feb. 1 and end on Feb. 29. For Blacks, it is a 365-day, 24-hour long period, as it should be for everyone.

Astronomical posters stolen from Olin Science

TO THE EDITOR:

You all know that much of your learning actually occurs outside the confines of the classroom. Homework assignments, research papers, group study sessions, even informal conversations with classmates are all useful in improving your comprehension of the material. Indeed, most students actively pursue these activities.

An important aspect of learning that is often overlooked is your everyday experiences—what you see, smell, or otherwise sense. As you go about learning material in more formal situations, you automatically apply this new learning to the world around you. What you may have seen and overlooked hundreds of times suddenly becomes "visible" because you now have a new piece of knowledge which allows you to make sense of it.

No new images will arouse new thoughts and ideas.

The faculty here at Bucknell understands this aspect of learning, and many try to augment your experiences by providing various perceptual stimuli. You may hear music coming from an office that brings back a memory, or see posters on a wall that make you wonder about new worlds.

It is this last example which has prompted me to write this letter. To create a perceptual experience for the students, I had placed a number of posters in one of the hallways in Olin Science. These posters depict Jupiter and its satellites—Callisto, Ganymede, Europa, and Io—as well as a view of our place in the Solar System and our galaxy. Over the past two years, I have had a number of students ask me questions about these posters—clearly, my efforts had born fruit.

Unfortunately, someone on campus has decided that these posters would look far better in their room than in a place where all can appreciate their beauty and be impassioned by their purpose. Last semester, two of the posters were stolen. This past Saturday, four more were stolen. What is particularly vexing is that two trips were necessary for this latest theft. When I discovered the first two gone, I reinforced a poster that had been partially loosened. I returned later to find it and another gone.

When University property is stolen, the University replaces it and passes the cost on to you, the student. When personal property is stolen, such as these posters, they are not replaced, and you, the student, lose more than just money—you lose the opportunity to have your mind stimulated and expanded. You see, I too, learn from my experiences. I have learned that my attempt to provide an opportunity for all to enjoy the beauty and mystery of space has been misinterpreted as an opportunity to get free posters.

I would like to thank the students who have expressed their appreciation and interest in these posters over the past two years. If the posters are returned, I will again place them in the hall for all to see and appreciate. However, I cannot afford to keep replacing stolen posters—no new images will replace those that were stolen, and no new images will arouse new thoughts and ideas.

Sincerely,

DAVID J. LIEN

Too many Bucknellians printed

TO THE EDITOR:

Have you ever noticed the towering piles of Bucknellian newspapers that remain unread at the end of each week? At 6:30 p.m. on Tuesday, February 23, there were 1,172 in the Langone Center. That is over 1/3 the number of students enrolled at Bucknell!

How does The Bucknellian staff determine the number of papers printed each week? One would hope that they would realize that a large percentage of the papers printed are not being utilized and adjust accordingly. To make matters worse, the on-campus recycling program is unable to find markets for the newsprint and is forced to give it to local farmers for animal bedding. However, reusing the newsprint in this manner is no excuse for the waste that is being generated each week.

Sexual harassment "is a reality and fear"

TO THE EDITOR:

Who is it exactly that Mr. Walsh wants to "get mad" about the issue of sexual harassment, and on what grounds? We've read his opinion piece "Get mad over sexual harassment" in the February 19, 1993 issue of The Bucknellian quite a few times and are rather confused as to what his intent actually is. On one hand he advises women to fight back against sexual harassment by "flipping men off and calling them names right back" and concurrently seems to be rallying men to disregard the informational pamphlets and seminars concerning the latest "pet issue of campus feminists."

Since we can't determine what you actually intended we'd like to address some of the things that you actually said. First of all, sexual harassment may currently be a pet issue in the media, but unfortunately it is a reality and fear in the lives of millions of women. Secondly, women afflicted with intense cases of "paranoid hysteria" are not the ones to define what currently constitutes sexual harassment—male dominated legislative and judicial boards are. The examples Mr. Walsh uses to support his claim that some women abuse their right to report men for sexual harassment are weak, unsupported, and are, in turn, impossible to take seriously ("no joke"). We'd be eager to hear the details of these cases of name calling and funny looks that bring about disciplinary/legal action.

Lastly, concerning your advice about how to handle these situations, Mr. Walsh: How exactly does one distinguish between an "everyday idiot" and a "pathological sex offender"? Will he tell you if you ask him? Or maybe it will become more evident after one "flips him off and calls him a name," perhaps provoking the offender to do more than harass. What a reasonable and safe way for a woman to diffuse a potentially dangerous situation. Thanks for the advice Mr. Walsh.

We're sorry if Bucknell is getting too Orwellian for you, but we feel that awareness through education is the best pro-active way to "fight" sexual harassment.

HARASSMENT

ment is nurtured in a patriarchal society because it keeps those who are benefiting from the system of domination in positions of power.

Steve Murray claims that people should "be cautious, be aware, and be safe in how [they] act"; however, women do not need a man to dictate our behavior. Too often we have been forced to act "responsibly" to avoid abuse by men, when in reality the men who commit sexual abuse must reexamine and redefine their own behavior.

David Walsh's belief that "the definition of sexual harassment has become so broad that it is now virtually up to the woman to decide what it is," is a reactionary response again which does not suggest that men need to reevaluate their behavior but that women should just "lighten up." Flippant statements such as this are often made to oppressed groups in order to reduce our credibility by suggesting that we are "making it up." By blaming the victim, men deny the prevalence of misogyny in our society and continue to behave as they wish without having to be accountable for their actions.

Mr. Walsh also suggests that sexual harassment is merely about "calling someone...a nasty name," but it is about much more than that. The working definition of sexual harassment that the Women's Resource Center provides and that Bucknell enforces is "the subjection of a person to unwanted verbal or physical sexual attention, repeated unwelcome sexual advances, the coercion of a person into a sexual relationship, or retaliation for the refusal to comply with sexual demands." There is quite a discrepancy between this definition and unpleasant name-calling, is there not?

Walsh is erroneous in suggesting that we use the same degrading and humiliating tactics that men have used for centuries in order to disempower women. Audre Lorde wisely points out that we cannot disassemble the master's house with his tools.

Making jokes about sexual harassment, as illustrated by last week's article by Marc Haimes and cartoon by Steve McNutt, reduces the seriousness of the problem, thus promoting and suggesting approval of sexual abuse. Mr. Haimes' allusion to a woman as a prostitute ("ho") is not only offensive, it is what contributes to the oppression of women and, consequently, sexual harassment. Mr. Haimes goes on to speak of "feminist humor," but his humor is based on subjugation and ridicule.

The cartoon depiction of a "ho" by Mr. McNutt was an objectification of a woman, supposedly in correlation with the section of Mr. Haimes article making light of prostitution and Santa Claus. This woman was drawn by Mr. McNutt as no real woman looks, but as woman are too often portrayed: thin, large-breasted, partially undressed, and heavily made-up. The continued depictions of women as sex objects in the media encourage male violence against women. This prototype leads men to think that sexually harassing and assaulting women is acceptable, since we are merely thought of as body parts, rather than whole people with feelings.

By ridiculing and objectifying women, both Mr. Haimes and Mr. McNutt contribute to sexism and sexual harassment, rather than satirizing them out of existence.

We find it interesting that three of the four authors of last week's articles on sexual harassment were men. Eliciting responses from a wider range of people, including women, would have given the discussion a broader perspective. Finally, women will continue to report men who sexually harass women to the Women's Resource Center and to the Department of Public Safety because we are serious and because we envision a world where women are safe from physical and emotional harassment.

Christian says hatred of homosexuals must stop

TO THE EDITOR:

The issue of homosexuality seems to be a continuing topic of concern at Bucknell, as evidenced by the two articles appearing under the Opinions section of the Feb. 12 edition of the Bucknellian and the articles written in response this past week. I was glad to read that some members of the Bucknell community found the second article offensive and uncouth. I did read Mr. Stern's apology, but we still must deal with the ideas that Mr. Stern presumed some people to hold. No wonder that homosexuals feel uncomfortable in an atmosphere that spawns such attitudes. As a Christian, I was deeply disturbed to read such disdainful language aimed at homosexuals. My guess is that those with such views will be labeled homophobic. A better descriptor would be something along the lines of misoarsenokoitic, meaning hatred of homosexuals, from the Greek words for hatred and homosexual. Society's problem is not a fear of homosexuals or homosexuality, but a disdain, and even hatred, for homosexual individuals.

Christians in general have been labeled homophobic, perhaps rightfully so in some cases. Misunderstanding sometimes breeds fear. Christians certainly need to repent of the lack of love that Christians in general have shown homosexuals. I, personally, need to ask forgiveness of the homosexual community for not making more of an effort to understand and care about you as individuals. Two weeks ago, I attended the lecture on homosexuality given by Mr. Mario Bergner. His presentation gave me a greater sense of compassion for homosexual individuals and an understanding that those who call themselves Christians need to show more love and friendship toward homosexuals.

A comment I overheard with regard to Mr. Bergner's lecture surprised me: "I'm surprised that Christians sponsored this speaker; I thought that they hated homosexuals." Those who carry the label Christian do so because of their desire to be obedient to Jesus, and He commands Christians to love all people with His love. Homosexuals have a need to be loved as much as anyone; may Christians respond to this need in a compassionate way! I want to say "thank you" to Christians in Action for sponsoring Mr. Bergner and showing that they do indeed care about homosexuals.

Insofar as the Christian expresses love for homosexuals, he or she is politically correct. But as soon as we express the idea that any sexual activity outside of a monogamous heterosexual marriage is against God's desire for humanity, we are labeled as "intolerant," "homophobic," or "closed-minded." It is curious to me that the very individuals who label me as such are intolerant of Christian thinking. There is nothing inconsistent with the desire to show compassion for a homosexual and yet not condone his or her sexual orientation. Anyone who does not like the way Christians live and think, and acts on that dislike, is as equally wrong as those who act on their dislike of homosexuals.

May I ask the reader two favors: 1) Don't shy away from friendships with homosexuals; seek to understand and love them, and 2) If you disagree with my above stated Christian viewpoint, seek out and form a friendship with a Christian, and try to understand and love him or her. If we seek the above friendships rather than political agendas, this campus will certainly be a more tolerant place.

Weekend blast in Weis and Rooke

This weekend marks another session of high-quality entertainment on campus. Starting off the weekend will be the New Vic Theatre of London's production of The Canterbury Tales at 8 p.m. tonight at the Weis Center. Tickets for the Canterbury Tales are $5 with a BUID, available at the Weis Center Box Office. The Westminster Chapel Choir will perform on Sunday, Feb. 28 at 11 a.m. in Rooke Chapel. A free-will offering will be collected at the chapel concert.

Applauded by the Washington Post as being "Chaucer with a vaudevillian spin, a wicked sense of fun, and the taste of a bar room brawl," The Canterbury Tales is an uproarious retelling, in modern English, of Chaucer's lusty tales. The performance promises adventure to cheer, villians to boo, hysterical romance, and slapstick humor.

James M. Jordan will conduct the Westminster Chapel Choir in Rooke Chapel Sunday, Feb. 28 at 11 a.m.

The cast includes Micky O'Donoughue, co-founder of the New Vic Theatre, as the Miller. Directing the production is Michael Bogdanov, also a co-founder of the group.

"It's a great evening of theatre that involves the audience; you can hiss at the villian, cheer for the hero, and vote for the best story in one of the funniest, most outrageous comedies ever staged," said William Boswell, director of cultural events at Bucknell.

The New Vic has played to more than two million people in the British Isles, gaining an extraordinarily high reputation for presenting with outstanding quality a unique and lively theatre experience.

Included in the program for Sunday's concert by the Westminster Chapel Choir are works by Mendelssohn, Bardos, Britten, Matthias, Palestrina, and Wilburg, as well as traditional folk songs and spirituals.

The group is one of five major choirs at the School of Music of Rider College in Princeton, NJ. Composing the members of the choir are the newest undergraduates attending Westminster Choir College.

Founded in 1946, the choir has toured since 1960, performing in churches, schools, and concert halls as well as with symphony orchestras, including the Trenton Symphony Orchestra, the York Symphony, and the Queens Symphony.

The Westminster Chapel Choir is directed by James Jordan, who joined the Westminster faculty in 1992. Prior to teaching at Westminster, Jordan served as chair for music education at the Hartt School of Music at the University of Hartford, where he conducted the Hartt Symphonic Choir and served as music director for the Greater Hartford Youth Chorale.

Choirs under Jordan's direction have performed frequently at the national and regional conventions of the American Choral Director Association and the Music Educators' National Conference.

De-'myth'-defying cultural views

Naomi Wolf, author of the bestseller The Beauty Myth, will speak on Tuesday, Mar. 2 at 7:30 p.m. in the Elaine Langone Center Forum as part of Women's History Month at Bucknell.

BY ARA METJIAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Naomi Wolf, author and feminist, will present her lecture "The Beauty Myth: How Images of Beauty are Used Against Women," to begin the series of lectures, candlelight ceremonies, and films that will take place to celebrate Women's History Month. "The Beauty Myth" will take place at 7:30 p.m. on Tuesday, March 2, in the Elaine Langone Center Forum. The lecture will be followed by a question and answer session with the author. Admission is free and open to the public.

Wolf's lecture "The Beauty Myth" is based upon her book of the same title which displays the attitudes that are present in society concerning the definition of what is considered "beautiful." "It is one of the books that will be long remembered after its time," said Janice Butler, director of the Women's Resource Center.

Wolf, a Yale Graduate and Rhodes Scholar, originally never had the intenion of writing a book about the societal implications of beauty. Her focus shifted while she was studying at Oxford when someone implied that she attained the scholarship on account of her looks. Disturbed by the comment, Wolf also discovered that other women in the program had also had similar insinuations made towards them, and further found they had suffered bouts with eating disorders, just as she had.

So what began as a plan to document the theme of beauty in literature turned into a three year project to illustrate what she believes to be a victimization process that "produces self-hatred, physical obsession, terror of aging, and dread of lost control."

"The Beauty Myth" stems from what appears to be a problematic trend in this country. Women comprise 87 percent of those who undergo plastic surgery. $20 billion was spent on cosmetics last year, while the diet and exercise industry raked in another $33 billion.

In addition to the financial dillema, there also exists the problem of those who starve themselves, vomit their meals, or suffer from the low self-esteem of not fitting into the definition of beauty. Wolf contends that the backlash against feminism is using ideals of beauty as a political weapon to undermine women's advancement in society.

There is much criticism of Wolf's book, coming not only from men, but also from many feminists who believe that this issue is a distraction from much more important issues like rape, sexual discrimination, and civil rights violations. In addition, many are upset that the book portrays women as unable to make up their minds, or unable to make decisions on their own.

However, many do agree with the main tenet of Wolf's book, namely, that someone else is making the decision for women as to what should be considered "beautiful." Said Butler, "It is very important for students to understand how media and society help to shape the definition of beauty."

Although the book has many unfounded facts, barrages the reader with random statistics, and has been claimed to contain "unsupported claims" and "sloppy research," it raises many provocative questions. It examines how personal appearance is used against that person, regardless of merit, and probes whether attitudes concerning beauty constitute an actual conspiracy to thwart feminism or are the productof effective advertising.

A two-time winner of the Academy of American Poets Prize, Wolf is the author of a recently published volume of poetry. Her essays and book reviews have appeared in The New Republic, Glamour, Ms., and The Washington Post.

The lecture is sponsored by the Pennsylvania Humanities Council, the Student Lectureship Committee, the University Lectureship Committee, the Women's Resource Center, IFC, Panhellenic Council, Alpha Chi Omenga, Phi Gamma Delta, and Student Health Services.

Don't be late for class

Soprano Nicosia-Civitano offers masterclass in voice

Class is in session in the department of music. Soprano Judith Nicosia-Civitano will give a master class at 8 p.m. on Thursday, Mar. 4, in Bucknell Hall. The class, entitled "Vocal Techniques for Contemporary Music," is free and open to the public.

Nicosia is a graduate of Western Illinois University and the recipient of a master of music degree in piano accompanying and coaching from Westminster Choir College. She also attended the International Maurice Ravel Academy in St. Jean-de-Luz, France, to study with the late Pierre Bernac.

In the past she has performed Handel's "Messiah" and Bach's "B minor Mass" with Robert Shaw, as well as having soloed with David Randolf's Masterworks Chorus at Carnegie and Avery Fisher Hall.

Winner of the 1981 Montreal International Voice Competition, Nicosia has received additional awards including a career award from the National Institute for Music Theatre, a Sullivan Foundation grant, and three consecutive fellowships to Tanglewood. Talented in opera as well as contemporary music, Nicosia won the American Opera Auditions and an Opera America finalist position.

Currently Nicosia is an associate professor in the Mason Gross School of the Arts at Rutgers University. As governor of New Jersey National Association of Teachers of Singing, she conducts vocal workshops across the country.

Accompanying Nicosia will be Kathy Shanklin, organist/choir director at St. Martin's Episcopal Church and staff pianist for the Princeton Ballet School. Shanklin holds a bachelor's degree from Western Illinois University and a bachelor of arts degree in organ performance from Indiana University/Purdue University.

Give your brain a break from the books

Are you interested in the knowledge and predictions that our predecessors held? Then see the "Weather and Wisdom: 19th Century Almanacs," one of three exhibits now at the Bertrand Library. Running now through Mar. 25 on Lower Level One of the library, this exhibit features "highly colorful masterpieces of detailed design" that supplied our American families with educational reading material, as well as provided our navigators, farmers, fishermen, tradesmen, travelers, and homemakers with helpful hints.

Almanacs, appearing as early as 3000 B.C. with the beginnings of astronomy, were first published in the United States in 1639. Precursors to today's magazines, they predate newspapers by 65 years.

Do you know how to prevent yourself from contracting Whitlow of Felon? Hoofland's Almanac and Family Receipt Book For Everybody's Use educated our ancestors about the symptoms and treatments of illnesses such as fever, measles, whooping cough, scarlet fever, and croup.

In the same way, The Times Almanac informed readers of when and where to witness the eclipses of 1880, the precise times of the beginning of each of the four seasons, and when best to view morning and evening stars.

Ranging from agriculture to mathematical to legal guides, almanacs provided history, art, news, literature, and a wide variety of other interesting tidbits of information for the public.

In keeping with the University's semester-long focus on the African experience, another exhibit, "Rice and Wine," is on display now through March 5 in the main lobby of the library.

The Casamance region of Senegal has a unique technology for the cultivation of rice. Preparing and seeding the nurseries, along with cultivating the rice fields when the rain begins, is done by the Ehing men. The Ehing women transport and plant seedlings, harvest the rice, pound it, and then prepare it for cooking.

Palm wine holds a significant role in the lives of the Ehing. Not only is it drunk as a daily ritual, but it is given as a gift representing an important part of marriage ceremonies. Overall, its most important ritualistic use comes when it is slowly poured over shrines during prayers offered to the spirits.

The process of tapping-of-wine, climbing the palm trees every morning and evening, is a task performed by the Ehing men.

Hand-crafted objects including woven palm leaf baskets, a libation pitcher—used for pouring, a gourd—used for drinking, hand-woven cloth and photos depicting how the artifacts are used, are on loan from Marc Schloss, associate professor of anthropology. These are also on display in the showcase in the main lobby.

"Salvador Dali," the traveling exhibit of reproductions from The Salvador Dali Museum in St. Petersburg, FL, is featured in the Current Periodicals Area, Level Two of the library, now through June 8.

Dali, born 1904 in Figueres, Spain, became internationally known when three of his works, including "The Basket of Bread," were displayed in the Third Annual Carnegie International Exhibition in 1928 in Pittsburgh, PA. In 1929, Dali traveled to Paris, where he joined the Paris Surrealists Group and eventually became its leader.

His first major retrospective exhibit, given to him by The Museum of Modern Art in New York, came in 1941. The Masterworks, 18 large canvases concerning scientific, historical, and religious themes, marked the period when Dali began to move away from Surrealism and work towards Classicism. Some of these famous works include "Hallucinogenic Toreador," "The Discovery of America by Christopher Columbus," and "The Last Supper," all of which are included in the exhibit at the library.

After spending his last six years in seclusion, Dali died, Jan. 23, 1989 in Figueres, Spain, from heart failure with respiratory complications.

Our ancestors relied on almanacs in the same way we depend on the Weather Channel. Books such as the ones included in "Weather and Wisdom: 19th Century Almanacs," the latest exhibit on Lower Level One of the library, kept people updated on natural phenomena such as frosts, eclipses, and seasonal changes.

The sounds of poetry

Molly Peacock, poet-in-residence for the spring semester, will give the first of two poetry readings this Sunday at 8 p.m. in Bucknell Hall.

BY MARY JORDAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The Stadler Center for Poetry has long been famous for bringing contemporary poets and writers to campus for the benefit of the entire community. This Sunday, Feb. 28, at 8 p.m., poet-in-residence Molly Peacock will present the first of her two poetry readings in Bucknell Hall.

This semester, Peacock is teaching a poetry workshop and is touring with her poetry readings. She will give her second reading on campus on Apr. 25, and will then return to Bucknell June 7-18, to conduct the Bucknell Seminar for Younger Poets.

A Buffalo native, Peacock received her BA from SUNY at Binghamton and her MA in writing from Johns Hopkins University. Peacock has been appointed to teach at many colleges, including Columbia University, N.Y.U., Hofstra, and Barnard in its Writers on Writing Program.

Peacock has three books to her credit: And Live Apart, Raw Heaven, and Take Heart. In addition, journals and magazines such as Poetry, The New Republic, and The New Yorker have published many of her works. Likewise, many of her short stories, essays, and interviews have been published. Her reviews have been seen in The New York Times Book Review.

Peacock has been presented with grants from the National Endowment for the Arts, the New York Foundation for the Arts, and the Ingram Merrill Foundation, and has won the PEN/NEA Fiction Award, a New Virginia Review Fellowship, a Creative Artist's Public Service Grant, and fellowships from the Danforth Foundation.

Poet Robert Creeley said, "Molly Peacock has a genius for saying the most necessary things in the quietest way." As well, poet Carolyn Kizer raves, "Molly Peacock is the kind of poet that means the most to me. She knows that form is needed to contain the pain and chaos of our lives."

Why I am Not a Buddhist
By Molly Peacock

I love desire, the state of want and thought of how to get; building a kingdom in a soul requires desire. I love the things I've sought—you in your beltless bathrobe, tongues of cash that loll from my billfold—and love what I want: clothes, houses, redemption. Can a new mauve suit equal God? Oh no, desire is ranked. To lose a loved pen is not like losing faith. Acute desire for nut gateau is driven out by death, but the cake on its plate has meaning,
even when love is endangered and nothing matters.
For my mother, health; for my sister, bereft, wholeness. But why is desire suffering?
Because want leaves a world in tatters?
How else but in tatters should a world be?
A columned porch set high above a lake.
Here, take my money. A love face in agony, the spirit is gone. Here, use my rags of love.

Slapstick comedy kicks off Sibling's Weekend

Derique McGee performs his comedy and music routine tonight in the Bison, kicking off Sibling's Weekend '93.

Bucknell kicks off Siblings Weekend with a bang as comedian Derique McGee performs in the Bison tonight at 9 p.m. Labeled "The Mystique of Derique," McGee is a master at his craft—music and mime. Audiences of all ages will howl with delight at McGee's routine of slapstick comedy taken from the silent era, performed with the innovation of the 1990's.

McGee begins his act strapped to a life-sized doll. The two begin dancing, combining the waltz, acrobatics, and moonwalking into an eccentric and humorous experience. Skilled at vaudeville tricks as well, McGee is as talented with his hat as he is on his feet.

Other highlights of the performance include a hambone body music routine in which McGee slaps his chest, thighs, and mouth, creating musical sounds and rhythms as he roams the audience for volunteers to join him in creating rhythms together. Combining the timeless sound of the hambone with a modern day twist, McGee changes into a high-tech spandex suit and takes the traditional art of hambone into a time warp to the present. The suit itself is rigged to perform sounds so that when touched, McGee becomes his own one-man electric band.

McGee's performance is followed on Friday by the annual Fun Flicks event. Participants perform in their own mini-movie or MTV-style video through the magic of special effects. The mobile video recording studio, provided by the Kramer Agency, Inc., allows for a variety of possibilities to fulfill the wildest fantasies. Videos will be recorded from 3 to 9 p.m. in the Elaine Langone Center Terrace Room, with a Fun Flicks awards ceremony to begin at 8 p.m. on Saturday in the Vaughan Lit. Auditorium.

Rounding out the list of activities for Sibling's weekend will be comedian Joey Kola. Having performed on MTV's Half Hour Comedy Hour, Showtime's Comedy Club Network, and A&E's Evening at the Improv, Kola is no stranger to receiving laughs. Kola will be hosting the Fun Flicks awards show Saturday night.

"Oh Captain, my captain..."

Bucknell bids farewell to Harvey M. Powers, Jr., 1923-1993, professor of English and theatre, emeritus

BY NICOLE COBBAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Students passing by the University Theatre in Coleman may notice a sign at the entrance which reads "On the occasion of the 80th anniversary of Cap and Dagger, the Bucknell community gratefully acknowledges the invaluable contribution to the life of the theatre made by Harvey M. Powers, Jr., professor of English, director of the University Theatre, through his scholarship, artistry, and generosity of spirit." On Tuesday, Feb. 23, faculty, students, and friends joined the Powers family in the theatre to mourn the death of Powers and to honor his lifelong commitment to theatre at Bucknell.

Although Powers had been retired for seven years, his presence on campus was still felt by students and faculty members alike, and the legacy which he created carries on. Cap and Dagger continues its tradition of Harvey Awards, the annual ceremony of initiating new members into the theatre society and the giving out of awards for the year.

A graduate of Tufts University with a masters of arts degree in writing, speech, and drama from Johns Hopkins University, Powers came to the Bucknell campus in 1949, never intending to stay more than a few years. With a passion for acting, Powers came with the idea that teaching was a temporary break from his newly begun stage career. However, his exposure to dramatic literature in graduate school and his realization of the hardships facing a beginning actor transformed his temporary residency in Lewisburg into a permanent one. Powers would go on to receive a Ph.D. from Cornell University.

The theatre department was non-existent when Powers arrived on campus. Plays were rehearsed in Bucknell Hall and produced either there or in the Lewisburg High School Auditorium. Hired as a professor in the English department, Powers became engulfed, not by what Bucknell had to offer in the performing arts, but by his vision of things to come.

"There was no on-campus theatre in 1949," said John Zeller at the memorial service on Tuesday. "Rehearsals were held in the platform at the austere Bucknell Hall...and when the curtain went up...it was on the stage in the auditorium of the Lewisburg High School where backstage work space was zero, and a change of scenery involved encroachment on the entrance corridor. I don't think Harvey really minded. It was theatre. It was good theatre, and it was his."

Powers quickly established his presence on campus as the first teacher dedicated to the performing arts by directing The Vagabond King in March of 1950. He earned himself the nickname "The Great Golden God" for both his striking blonde hair and palpable enthusiasm for theatre, and immediately became the force behind the theatrical productions at Bucknell, as well as for Cap and Dagger, the campus drama society for students.

What Powers offered to students was a new outlook on theatre. He believed firmly that actors were the instruments used to transport the audience to fictitious settings. He relished in the idea of "living theater."

"The theatre embodies universal truths in flesh and blood," said Powers in an interview for Bucknell World. "Reading a play is one kind of experience; seeing it translated into the immediacy of a theatrical event is an entirely different kind of experience, one truer to the playwright's intent. The audience learns vicariously, just as the actor learns mimetically, what it's like to inhabit the world of another. The audience's suspension of disbelief and its willingness to end its emotions and imagination to the scene on stage are integral to its teaching power."

The idea was catching. Powers directed at least one, and sometimes as many as three productions a year. Under his guidance, theatre exploded onto campus. By 1959, theatre was introduced as a concentration in the English department, and, more importantly, theatre found its home on campus in Coleman Hall. With Powers' production of Kiss Me Kate baptizing the University Theatre stage, Bucknell theatre finally came into its own.

Powers was promoted to full professor in 1970. He served for 14 years as director of Bucknell's Summer Institute for Foreign Students and in 1973 was honored with a Lindback Award for Distinguished Teaching and the Class of 1956 Lectureship. He also served as chairman of the theatre department of the Pennsylvania Governor's School for the Arts and in 1977 was appointed president of the Theatre Association of Pennsylvania.

By 1979 the Powers vision was finally coming to fruition. Theatre was introduced as a major in the English department, and the contributions Powers had made generated unprecedented interest in theatre. Eight years later Powers' invaluable dedication would be recognized when he would be selected to chair the first department of theatre at Bucknell.

In that same year Powers also saw his vision of the Tustin Gymnasium converted in the state-of-the-art Tustin Studio Theatre, a black box theatre with unlimited capabilities. The intimate, 'experimental' theatrical space provided the rarest opportunities for the 'living theatre' Powers had always cherished.

Powers interests lay, always, in providing his students with the most complete education he could offer. Even after the department had staked its claim on campus, students still remained heavily active in all aspects of theatre. Plays were selected by a joint panel of faculty and students, and students were given the opportunity to direct their own projects in the "cocktail" theatre season Powers initiated.

"I like to think that everything we do is an experiment," said Powers. "We want to provide the richest theatrical experiences we can."

Even today those projects exist in full force. Bucknell has long been recognized not for having the largest college theatre department, but certainly for having one that provides the most opportunities and guidance to its students.

By the time Powers retired in 1986, theatre was well established on campus. The staff consisted of Powers, designer F. Elaine Williams, technical director and lighting designer Stephen Chene, and director Robert Gainer. Since then the department has grown to incorporate the discipline of dance, and the faculty has likewise increased to six full-time faculty-members.

"Harvey's generosity of spirit and understanding of human nature made him an incredibly perceptive director and teacher," said Williams, now director of theatre. "He had an ability to assess a student's or a performer's needs and to gently guide the learning process."

Powers continuing inspiration to students and theatre members was evidenced by the tremendous turn-out at Tuesday's memorial service. Even students that had never met Powers knew of his legacy and the overwhelming respect he had gained from students and colleagues. Cap and Dagger members—the newest generation to benefit from Powers's gifts to the campus—were on hand to usher.

Dr. William Payn, professor of music, provided two of Powers' most cherished songs on piano, "A Simple Song" from Mass by Leonard Bernstein and Air on the G String by Bach, a favorite of Powers after he heard one of his students sing it with the Chapel Choir.

Rev. Jim Hammerlee began the ceremony with a scripture reading, followed by a personal remembrance of Powers, the strength he brought to campus, and the overwhelming popularity he held with everyone who knew him.

"It is so fitting that we meet here in the University Theatre," said Hammerlee. "So fitting that we can be together in the space where so many of us built and bred our friendship with Harvey. We see the family in row H [Powers' row for all productions in the theatre], and we acknowledge seat H-114 [Powers' traditional seat]. I'm sure many of you join me in the fitted memory of the deep voice chuckle that came from that row during many a production."

John Zeller, speaking after Hammerlee, agreed. "This is where he would wish to be remembered," said Zeller. "[This is] how he would wish to remembered—as a teacher, sitting in his theatre, talking to his students."

Edward Hermann '65, stage and screen actor, read several of Powers' favorite selections from plays. He concluded with the simple, blurry-eyed delivery, "Good night, sweet prince. Flights of angels sing thee to thy rest."

Powers is survived by his wife, Betsy, his daughters Christina Van Buskirk and Diane Powers, his son Marc, a '74 alumnus of Bucknell, four grandchildren, and one great grandson.

Harvey M. Powers, Jr., professor of English and theatre, emeritus, stands in the University Theatre Green Room. Dedicated to his art and to his students, Powers is largely credited as the force responsible for Bucknell's thriving theatre community.

In remembrance of Harvey Powers

"As actor, director, and teacher, Harvey Powers inspired many generations of Bucknell students. He received the devotion and loyalty of his students and colleagues, who all recognized a man of unusual humanity and feeling."
—Gary A. Sojka, President

"Students were immediately drawn to a light and energy in Harvey that radiated from his love of his art and his love for teaching."
—F. Elaine Williams, director of theatre

"And I was struck at how profound and far-reaching Harvey's influence has been, not only on those who chose careers in theatre, but on those who, because of Harvey, continue to see how important theatre is in our search for truth, in our celebration of humanity."
—Jeff Plunwett, alumnus

"Bucknell has theatre facilities and support systems for theatre arts students that rival any professional theatre in New York and those at other schools across the country. I believe there is a very exciting future ahead for the theatre arts at Bucknell, and we can thank the foundation built by Harvey for most of that."
—Richard Humphrey '74, directed first production in Tustin Studio Theatre

"Harvey was a no-nonsense teacher with the ability to relate to his students on the same plane. It was never as much teacher/student as friend/friend. And how much easier it was to study and learn from someone who shared his thoughts, experiences, and knowledge rather than talked the information down to you."
—Mark Alan Lipschutz '71, stage production manager and technical advisor, Evita, San Bernardino Civic Light Opera

"I remember his kindness, lack of pretension, devotion to the art of theatre, and what perhaps is his greatest gift: the knack of treating me as a creative force worthy to be listened to. He also had a wonderful sense of humor that kept us from becoming too impressed with the artistes we presented to the world. In short, he treated us as human beings worthy of respect. A mighty gift to an awkward, love-sick galoot."
—Edward Hermann '65, actor, television, movies, stage

"From the vantage point of many years, I now understand that Harvey's supreme gift was the ability to create, both in class and in rehearsal, an atmosphere of trust in which it was possible for the best we beginners had to offer to emerge."
—David Ackroyd '62, actor, stage and television

"Harvey was more than teacher/director. He was the spiritual center of the group of us who loved the theatre, and we measured our growth in terms of our communications with him. The more we understood about what he spoke, the more wisdom and understanding we assumed we had."

Examining the history of blacks at Bucknell

At the close of Black History Month, a student chronicles the many and varied achievements of his Bucknell forebearers

BY LARNIE J. BOOKER
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Writer's Note: It was very difficult to research this topic. I found that the University does not save information categorizing people in terms of their ethnic backgrounds. This information was gathered from the University archives located in the Bertrand Library as well as from various individuals, who serve as living timetables containing a great wealth of knowledge.

February is Black History Month. It is a time when everyone reflects on those blacks who have made significant contributions to the United States and the world as a whole. Let us take the time to recognize the significance of blacks at Bucknell and the history that they have made.

STUDENTS

The graduating class of 1875 was not simply the twenty-ninth class to earn Bucknell degrees. This class was immortalized when Edward McKnight Brawley, Bucknell University's first African American graduate, received his degree. A Bucknell degree helped Brawley achieve a great deal of success before he passed away on January 13, 1923. After his departure from Lewisburg in the fall of 1875, he became a minister and an educator. He was the first president of Selma College and also served as president of Morris College. After his tour of duty at Morris college, he became a professor at Shaw University in North Carolina. Several blacks have had the opportunity to attend Bucknell because of Brawley's heroism as a trailblazer. Among those were James Worris Moore '53 and Elizabeth McCray '52, Bucknell's oldest living black male and female graduates.

HOUSING

How were Seventh Street House and Edwards House designated as the African American studies houses? Were they always used as such? The address 21 Walker Street is Seventh Street House. The house that was built in 1914 by the brothers of Delta Theta Upsilon Fraternity. In 1918, the fraternity merged with Sigma Chi and thus the house became the Sigma Chi Fraternity house. The brothers of Sigma Chi resided at the intersection of Walker and Seventh Street until 1950 when a new house was built. With the departure of Sigma Chi, the house underwent $14,000 worth of renovations and was converted into a women's dormitory until 1965.

The following year, the house was to be used as the women's dorm and the French house. In 1969, it became known as the International House; used as a residence hall for women interested in foreign languages and cultures. It replaced what had previously been the French, German, and Spanish houses. Nine years ago, in 1983, the house was given its current designation as the women's African-American Studies house.

If you were to address a letter to 218-220 South Sixth Street, you would be sending a letter to the residents of Edwards house, named after one of its previous owners, Merle M. Edwards '03, a former Bucknell soccer coach who helped to develop and implement the first intramural sports program at Bucknell. This house did not always have the late coach's name. In 1951, the University purchased the building from David Kunkle and his wife Florence. At that time, it was renovated and remodeled so that it could be used for faculty housing. After remodeling, the house stood as Kunkle house. In 1959, the name was changed to Edwards house in remembrance of the late soccer coach. In 1966-67, E-house as it is affectionately known, was used to as a women's dormitory, just as Seventh Street House was. In the same year as Seventh Street House (1983) received its current designation as the African American Studies house for women, Edwards House was designated as the counterpart for men.

SPORTS

The 1940's was a decade in which several professional sports dismantled the color barrier. However, Bucknell did not transcend that discriminative practice until the late 1950's. Henry Livas '60, armed with a tennis racket, became the first black male to play tennis. Richard Boddie '61 became the first black male to run track. Frank Wood '62 and Gil Holmes '64 became the first black swimmers to represent the Blue and Orange. The '70's saw the emergence of Harvey Carter '73 on the Davis Gymnasium floor, Milton "Skip" Waddell '77 on the baseball diamond, and Albert McKnight '79 on the lacrosse field. Black female athletes have only participated in three varsity sports—basketball, swimming, and track and field. Pat Sermon '79 was the first black Lady Bison of the hardwood, while Debra Russell-Brown '87 became the first black swimmer.

In 1983, wrestler Thomas Scotton '78 and distance runner, Thomas McLean '78 became the first two blacks inducted into the Bucknell Sports Hall of Fame. Scotton helped pace the Grapplin' Bison to prominence in the late seventies, acquiring a career record of 89-4-1. McLean has the distinction of being one of the greatest runners in Bucknell history. He is the only University athlete to win an NCAA University championship. There are no black female athletes represented in the Bucknell Sports Hall of Fame. However, that is no indication of the contributions black women have made to Bucknell sports. Furthermore, with athletes such as basketball star Juliet McGee '93 and track and field star, Tameka Hinton '94, it should not be long.

GREEK LIFE

There are eight nationally recognized traditionally Black fraternities (4) and sororities (4). The first of these organizations to make a home at Bucknell were Phi Beta Sigma Fraternity, Inc. and Zeta Phi Beta Sorority, Inc. The Brothers of Phi Beta Sigma made up the Iota Gamma Chapter which existed here throughout the seventies and into the early eighties. The chapter became inactive because all of the brothers graduated. Little is known about the chapter of Zeta Phi Beta, however they suffered the same fate as the Sigmas.

In 1983, three female students at Bucknell, having pledged through Millersville University, were initiated in to Delta Sigma Theta Sorority, Inc. However, the women never established a chapter of this sorority at Bucknell because they never acquired sufficient membership to do so.

In 1989, four young men, Michael G. MacKay '92, Alvin McCoy III '90, Robert E. Chambers, Jr. '91 and N. Scott Gunn '91 were initiated through an active chapter at East Stroudsburg University into Kappa Alpha Psi Fraternity, Inc. In 1992, the Mu Beta Expansion Colony, as it was known at the time was formally chartered as the Xi Kappa chapter. This chapter still exists on Bucknell's campus today, and is the smallest of all of Bucknell's Greek-Letter organizations, with seven brothers.

BLACK SPEAKERS

Despite, Bucknell's remote location in the picturesque Susquehanna Valley, it still manages to attract some of the most well-known and educated speakers. Many prominent black doctors, ministers, poets, and actors made appearances on Bucknell's campus throughout the years. Their words stood then, as they remain now, to inspire and enlighten the student body, faculty, and surrounding community. Well known psychologist, Dr. Alvin Poussaint, was a guest of the University in the 1970's. Poets B.F. Maize and Sonia Sanchez spread lyrical verses on the students in Lewisburg on more than one occasion. Well known actor, director, producer, and writer, Spike Lee, lectured in Davis Gym in 1990. Rooke Chapel has been the site of lectures of two famous ministers. In 1990, Dr. Ralph Abernathy, a civil rights advocate, preached his message to a full capacity audience. In 1958, Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. addressed the Bucknell University student body. Other well-known blacks to speak at Bucknell were writer, Alex Haley, NAACP President Benjamin Hooks, the daughter of Malcolm X, Attallah Shabazz, Doctor Samuel Proctor, comedian Dick Gregory, poet Gwendolyn Brooks, and educator Joe Clark.

FUTURE

For centuries to come, blacks will continue to attend this university and continue to make history. Who will be the first black trustee or the first black school president? At this time we can only guess. However, time will reveal such individuals, and bring about many more shining moments and stars within the African-American community at Bucknell.

Temperance House provides serenity at the right price

BY ANDREW COHEN AND KAREN LAFFLER
Bucknellian Food Critics

The Temperance House, like Aladdin, is a diamond in the rough. Across the way from Cole's Hardware on North Third Street, it may not be the Hope diamond, but its quaint atmosphere, inexpensive food, and pedestrian accessibility make it a must for Bucknellians who want classy dining without going broke in the process.

Although it offers very slim pickins' for the vegetarian palette, there is a wide variety of beef, chicken, and seafood entrees priced from $9.00 to $20.00, all of which come with a dinner beverage and two "complements," which include fries, baked potato, tossed salad, and applesauce. For those on strict budgets, the Temperance House offers good sized sandwiches ranging from $2.25 to $6.50.

After telling a very accommodating waitress the sad story of his life, Andrew was able to order a special chef salad ($6.95, only one complement), that, unlike any on the menu, did not include the flesh of an animal. Karen ordered broiled fresh scallops ($8.50) with broccoli in lemon dill and french fries (for Andrew).

With the arrival of a cheesestick appetizer, Andrew found himself in a most unfamiliar position; he disagreed with Karen. She found the cheesesticks to be lacking, due mainly to the fact that they were made with Monterrey Jack rather than stringy Mozzarella cheese. Andrew, however, being much less discerning in such matters argued that with some of the horseraddishy mustard, one could not distinguish the Temperance House from the Sicilian town of Corleone, famous for its cheesesticks and lupras.

After returning from this fantastical jaunt to the old country, Lionel Richie's Truly seemed to signal the arrival of the main course. Karen's scallops were indeed fresh, not the sea legs some restaurants try to get away with, and they were so tasty that she did not need the side of butter served with them. Andrew's salad was bountiful served with two sides of ranch dressing. The lettuce, though certainly not hand picked that day, got the job done.

Karen's broccoli with lemon dill was adequate but prepared not to offend. The sauce could have been tangier as far as she was concerned. The fries and potato, both of which Andrew ended up eating were both tasty, though also prepared not to offend. If we had one complaint, it was that the food was not risque enough—if you want to achieve greatness in any field you have to take some chances.

As the lemon meringue pie called Andrew's name, Karen was good enough to order cherry pie for Andrew as well. The copious meringue made for excellent eating. It did not fall off the lemon as sometimes happens, and mixed well with the lemon custard to bring out the taste of the fresh lemons—this being a point that Karen picked up as she stole a few bites when Andrew was busy with her dessert. The cherry pie did not distinguish itself, but that may be more a function of the choice since one cannot do brilliant things with cherries and a crust. The Temperance House also offers more exotic desserts which Andrew and Karen passed up not wanting to catch a buzz from the liqueured desserts.

For those who do take a drink from time to time —don't worry—the Temperance House has a fully stocked bar from which one can order "A Temperized Cocktail or Highball," and wine.

The quiet and detached, yet welcoming atmosphere makes this a good place to bring the family or a date.

BSG takes to the waves

BY KATE FINK
Bucknellian Staff Writer

In an effort to reach more students and to solicit more student response about campus issues, Bucknell Student Government (BSG) has decided to take a ride on the airwaves. A new BSG talk show hosted by Will Taylor '94 is being broadcast on WVBU 90.5, Bucknell's radio station, for an hour and a half each week. According to Brian Mannix '94, BSG President, the two shows have been "really effective and very promising."

Each week, two BSG officers will be on the air to discuss what is on the BSG agenda, to take suggestions, and to hear opinions about any subject pertinent to student government. Past topics, such as the Jan Plan or the new cafeteria, have been featured, but all topics of conversation are encouraged.

"The discussion has not necessarily focused on the featured topic. We've talked about things that are not related to BSG, like racism and sexism," said Mannix. "Anything that affects people on campus is up for discussion."

BSG has been battling student apathy, and it is hoped that the radio show will reach and hold the attention of a wide variety of students. "I think its going to work. We have already taken action about concerns expressed on the show such as smoking in the library," said Mannix.

Tune into WVBU (90.5 FM) on Fridays from 5-6:30 p.m. and voice your grudges, concerns, and opinions.

Marts Hall post office worker Caroline Hartman licks all postal problems and stamps every Bucknellian with her invaluable service

BY KRISTINA SCHURR
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Hundreds of people trek in and out of the University Post Office every week, buying stamps, sending letters and packages, and picking up certified and registered mail. But while the people are always changing, the face of Caroline Hartman remains the same.

Hartman has worked behind the service counter at the University Post Office in Marts Hall since 1977. Before taking her present position at the post office, however, she worked at the window counter of Administrative Services for seven years, taking work orders and keeping some books.

"I started working part-time at Administrative Services when I was a senior at Mifflinburg High School. After graduation I started full-time. I've been here ever since. I like just about everything about the job; if I didn't, I probably would have moved on by now. Things have settled down pretty much into a routine."

A typical work day for Hartman begins at 8 a.m. Sorting the in-coming mail addressed to on-campus faculty and staff members along with co-worker Barbara Selsam is first priority, but 8:30 a.m. signals the opening of the service window. It's time to wait on the customers. Hartman is responsible for checking in all registered, certified, and express mail as it is delivered from the post office in town, as well as providing Bucknellians with many of the services of a regular federal post office, such as sending packages and letters, and selling stamps.

In addition to her window duties, though, she also helps to organize the mail flow as it comes into and leaves the post office. The post office operates with a swing-shift type of hours. Since only one person will be working the two windows during the lunch hour, she often goes around to the mail sorting side in order to get the outgoing mail ready for the courier to pick up in the afternoon.

"Monday and Friday are our busiest days," said Hartman. "On Monday students seem to always have a lot of things to send out which they've prepared over the weekend; Friday is when many faculty members get their work organized and sent out before they leave." A day at the post office ends at 4:30 p.m. with her daily report of window transactions.

Although Hartman and Selsam are the only two regular post office employees, being situated across the hall from Administrative Services makes them a part of a much larger circle of employees. "I would definitely say that we're one big family down here," said Hartman. "We're known as the department with the most parties; we celebrate everyone's birthday and other special holidays. We even have something called 'Salad Day' where everyone brings in something for a salad and we all eat lunch together."

Hartman feels as if she is in touch with many students on campus. "I think that I could say that I know the majority of people on this campus," she said. "I'm a pretty friendly person and have had conversations with many students throughout the years—but I'm sometimes surprised when they remember me as they're walking across the campus. I think the best part of my job is meeting and getting to know so many different people," said Hartman.

Bucknell's hidden outlaws—Eee-i-eee-i-o

Rules and regulations fail to prevent Bucknellians from sharing their college experience with creatures of all sorts

BY COLLEEN RUSH
Bucknellian Staff Writer

What do a pig, a snake, two hamsters, a skink, two ferrets and a guinea pig all have in common? They've all found homes in the hearts and residence halls of students at Bucknell. And, they are all illegal residents.

In the University Handbook, under Regulations Relating to Residence units, Section 8, subpoint f, states that "all animals, including birds," are prohibited in residence units. Despite the regulation, many students on campus are willing to take the risk and pay the price to keep their furry/scaly/slimy friends within the confines of their room for the security, comfort, and calm feeling the animals provide.

Though the reasons for having a pet are similar, the range of animals on campus varies from wet to dry and exotic to average. No group of animals is discriminated against on this campus, because no pet seems to be too cute, too ugly, too big, or too small for students.

Nietzsche and Gabrielle are not, by any means, your average pets. The male, named after the German philosopher, is a three and a half foot long elaphe guttata guttata snake. The female, named after the archangel, is a two-foot long pythonis regis snake. While the snakes are neither the friskiest nor the most playful pets, the owner finds their presence "very calming."

Top: Nietzsche, named for the German philosopher, is a three and a half foot long elaphe guttata guttata. The voracious snake munches on a mid-day snack of white mouse.

Left: Cecil, a two foot long corucia zebrata, or Giant Skink, shows off his best profile. The reptile, unlike Nietzsche, fares on berries and vegetables.

Right: Oreo, the guinea pig, is a popular pet whose main attributes are oinking and squeaking.

Bottom: Fish, the lone goldfish, maintains a legal status at Bucknell, unlike his furry counterparts.

Susan Naughton—The Bucknellian

"They are calming because they are very slow moving. They seem to look at life much like the Buddha does. They are always in the now," the owner said.

Caring for the snakes is a relatively easy task. For the most part, the snakes take care of themselves. Cleaning the tank, changing the water, and taking the snakes to Clyde Peeling's Reptileland for periodic check-ups is part of the regular maintenance routine.

Feeding the reptiles is another story. The snakes eat two mice every one to two weeks. The owner, noting slight ethical problems with feeding the snakes, said, "I have some moral qualms with the feeding part because I don't eat meat, myself. Sometimes I have nightmares about rats coming to attack me. At this point, though, neither [snake] would do well if I let them go."

Cecil, a two foot long corucia zebrata, or Giant Skink, is an object of both entertainment and education for his owner. "He's very fun to watch because he's a silly looking thing," said the owner. "I bought him mostly out of curiosity."

The five and a half year old reptile is an herbivore, eating only fruits and vegetables. "He likes corn and fresh strawberries," said the owner.

Cecil's hobbies include licking things, climbing in trees (weather permitting), and crawling into vacant flip flops. Though the animal is not easily misplaced, when he does manage to flee captivity, he is easily found. "He sneezes a lot, so when he's lost, I find him when he sneezes," said the owner.

Ben and Jerry, two Dwarf hamsters named after the ice cream entrepreneurs, can fit approximately five Cheerios into their cheek pouches. The nocturnal creatures are about two inches long and spend most of their day sleeping under mounds of cedar shavings, or in one of the miniature plastic barrels on the bottom of the cage.

The hamsters also have a variety of toys for amusement and exercise, including a stationary wheel and hamster ball. Needless to say, Ben and Jerry are not lacking in the entertainment field. The hamsters get a full work out every night on their running wheel and during the occasional hamster ball race on the hall floor.

"I never was much of a pet person," said the owner, explaining the attachment to her fuzzy friends. "But they [Ben and Jerry] are small, easy to care for, and cute."

Fish, the appropriately named and jointly owned goldfish, is the only legal pet in the crowd. Though the fish has no unique qualities, one co-owner said the fish "bounces itself off the walls of the bowl a lot."

Whether his behavior is sparked by suicidal tendencies or boredom, Fish's long-term outlook is bleak. He is preceded by numerous other fish that died in the line of duty under the same ownership.

"Goldfish are hard to maintain," said the other co-owner. "It's really a trial-and-error process. We have tried everything from cleaning the bowl every other day to feeding them more."

Ricky and R.C. eat cat food and are trained like cats, but the faux felines are actually ferrets. The caretaker of the animals is keeping them for her fiancee who is in the Navy and unable to take care of them. Though not the rightful owner, the surrogate keeper attends to the ferrets as her own. Care for the animals includes cleaning their cage and litterbox and feeding them.

Arnold the pig is a new addition to the family of pets on campus. The black pig arrived at his new home on Wednesday. Arnold's diet consists of leftovers, and his new residence is a pseudo-pen in his owner's room.

Though the pig's only notable behavior so far is that he sniffs and chews on admirer's feet, the owner hopes to teach Arnold a few unusual tricks.

While Arnold is not the most exotic pet, he is probably the most surprising. The owner, explaining his reasoning for getting a pig, said, "I got him because pigs are interesting and cleaner and smarter than dogs."

Oreo, the guinea pig, is the lucky recipient of "tons of attention," according to the owner. The guinea pig was a given as a gift to the owner. Though she feels guilty about having Oreo at Bucknell, the owner said she also feels a strange "animal attraction" to the pint-sized fur ball. The owner said that Oreo's repertoire of amusing tricks and talents consists of "oinks and squeals."

According to the pet owners, the old saying, "Rules are meant to be broken," certainly seems applicable to Section 8, subpoint f. Many of the owners expressed their disgust with the University policy on pets.

"The University should revise the guidelines on the pet policy," said Ben and Jerry's owner. "So many people have them anyway, and if they [pets] are caged and can't get out, and the roommates don't mind, why shouldn't students be allowed to have pets?"

Nietzsche and Gabrielle's owner shared this sentiment, saying, "If you keep them [pets] in your room and to yourself, it's [having a pet] not a problem."

Name the animal, and in all likelihood, someone at Bucknell has some form of it hidden in their seemingly innocent dorm room. Whether or not the rules forbidding animals in residence halls change, pet lovers on campus will continue to bring their unique animals into their rooms, either for the sake of having them or for the peace of mind that most pets provide.

SPORTS FRIDAY

BUCKNELL UNIVERSITY LEWISBURG, PA 17837

STAT OF THE WEEK: Last weekend at the Patriot League Championships at Colgate, the Bucknell teams combined to set 10 pool records.

Track teams gear up to host Patriot League Championships

Women aim for second consecutive indoor title

BUCKNELLIAN TEAM CORRESPONDENT

Last year, the Lady Bison put on a track and field clinic at Lehigh University as they won the Patriot League Indoor Championships by over 60 points. But as the song goes, "What have you done for me lately?" Last year is in the past and this year the Bison are a different team with different strengths. Can they pull off a win for the second year in a row? Are they the team to beat?

"On paper, we are the favorite, that's not a lie. But being the favorite means nothing. We're not going to win the meet by just showing up. We need to be there in mind, focused, psyched up to run," claims head coach Art Gulden. The coaches feel that Fordham and Lafayette are also in contention for the coveted Patriot League title. Let's examine how Bucknell looks in the different events:

Hurdles and Sprints

With the loss of Paula Lyons '95 to injury, one might think that Bucknell is in trouble in the hurdles. Although it is a setback, Bridget Dean '95 and Norine Nadeau '96 have things well in hand. It should be a great race, as the top three hurdlers are separated by one-tenth of a second.

The shorter sprints should be dominated by Bucknell's All Time sprinter Tameka Hinton '95. But she can't be complacent as Lafayette senior Tina Beth Pina is thirsting for a title and has the top time (7.17 FAT) in the 55m. Look for seniors Dana Harbst and Julie Diercks to also pitch in some much-needed points.

In the longer sprints Bucknell is not as dominant, as their top 400m runner, Sharon Shilling, ranks only 7th. She'll get help from Dean, Beth Muehl '94, and Leah Johnson '95.

Jumps

If there is an area of the team that gets an 'A' for improvement, it is the jumps. It is so deep that Amy Mears '96, who jumped over 16' last week is running the 55m. (Each team may only enter four athletes per event). Two-time indoor champ Dawn Ellery '94 will lead the way in the high jump.

"She is a great competitor who knows how to win," said teammate Kristen Opdyke '93.

In the long and triple jumps, Bucknell has incredible depth. Look for Kelly Peet '96, Mary Clare Thompson '95, and Tanya Barnes '95 to score points for the Bison.

Throws

Bucknell has only two throwers, but the key is quality. Hinton and Kristen Overturf '96 are the top two shot putters in the League. Overturf is also in the top five in the weight throw. Bucknell could get an edge

Men look to depth in order to repeat as league champs

BY CHRIS DROWNE AND JON TERRY
Bucknellian Staff Writers

The time for cliches has reached its high point. Now, more importantly than ever, it's time to put up or shut up for the Bucknell men's track team.

The Bison are the two-time defending champions and host this year's Patriot League Championships tomorrow morning and afternoon in the fieldhouse.

"It's going to be a great day of track, and one of the best sports weekends of the year here on campus, " said head coach Art Gulden, referring to tomorrow's championships as well as the men's and women's basketball showdowns with Holy Cross. "If you are a sports fan and you are bored on Saturday, you've got to be dead!"

Bucknell's main competition will come from Lehigh and Lafayette. The Engineers have been putting pressure on the Bison all year, but stumbled last weekend in losing a dual meet to rival Lafayette. That win propelled the Leopards into mild consideration as one of the favorites to win the conference title.

Getting back to those cliches, "If we come out focused mentally we should win the meet because we're physically ready," said Gulden. "We've put in the time and done the work. We're as healthy as can be expect-

Breakin' Bison ravage foes; ready for Holy Cross war

Bucknell looks to burn the Cross in front of sell-out crowd

BY JON TERRY
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Let's get ready to rumble! This bout is for the heavyweight title of the Patriot League. In the orange and blue corner, with a record of 20-5, 12-1 in the conference, are the Bucknell Breakin' Bison. In the purple corner, also with a record of 20-5, 12-1, are the Holy Cross Crusaders. Okay men, let's come out fighting and give the fans, most of them anyway, what they stood in line to see.

Tomorrow afternoon the score will be settled. These two first place juggernauts will battle it out for the Patriot League regular season championship, and just as importantly, for the home-court advantage throughout the league tournament. If you don't think that this is a critical advantage, consider that the two teams have compiled a combined home record of 22-1 this year, with the Bison a perfect 11-0 in Davis Gym. And just to show how dominant these two teams have been this year, Bucknell and Holy Cross are a combined 29-2 since Jan. 9.

The Bison have been on cruise control of late. After Wednesday's 116-85 bombing of Loyola (MD), they have won eight straight games, and 15 of their last 16. They have won their last six games by an average margin of over 20 points per contest.

Flash back if you will to Jan. 30. That afternoon the Bison fell behind by as many as 18 points in the first half, but their performance in the second half, especially the one turned in by Mike Bright '93, set the tone for the rest of the season. Bright scored 20 of his 27 points in the second half, while Chris Simpson '94 poured in a career-high 31 as the Bison battled back. After cutting the lead to one at 84-83, Bucknell came up with a steal, but Simpson could not convert a tough jumper in transition, and Holy Cross held on for the 88-86 win.

It may have been that second half, however, in which the Bison proved to themselves that they could play with anyone in the league. Three games later Bucknell pounded Fordham and have rolled ever since. Bright, Simpson, and lately Russell Peyton '93 have stepped up as leaders, realizing that they are that close to living out their dream—a berth in the NCAA Tournament.

It certainly will not be easy. To get there, Bucknell will have to win three tough games, two of which will likely be against the Crusaders. Holy Cross has talent and versatility at every position. Forwards Rob Feaster and Rick Mashburn provide the league's best front court, with John Young and Frank Powell posing as threats both inside and outside

Breakin' Bison derail Engineers, sprint past Greyhounds

BY SCOTT GRISIN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The Breakin' Bison (12-1, 20-5) rode all over mass transit this past week, as they secured their second straight 20-win season with two victories over the Engineers of Lehigh (1-11, 3-21) and the Loyola (MD) Greyhounds (2-22).

Bucknell expected to win both contests easily seeing that its opponents had a combined record of 5-43, and they did just that, amassing 206 points in the two games. The 20 wins this season paired with a 21-9 record last year give the Bison their first-ever back-to-back 20-win seasons.

Last Saturday Raymond Brown '94 put up a shot one minute into the game against Lehigh. The shot did not go down, but Paul Olkowski '93 got the rebound and put the rock off the glass for the first points of the Hi Corbett Field. What's that? Is it a high school football stadium in Virginia? An airfield in Maine? Unless you are a big fan of Major League Baseball or are up on your Cleveland Indians trivia, you have probably never heard of it.

This former spring home to the Indians is now the home of one of the latest additions to the National League, the Colorado Rockies. Beginning their first season this spring, the Rockies and the Florida Marlins are contributing to the deterioration of Major League Baseball, and if things do not begin to change, America's Pastime may soon become a part of America's past.

The League is watered down with mediocre players, so what does the league do? They open the flood gates even further with two new teams, and right now, Major League Baseball is drowning.

Run down your favorite team's roster, and I bet you will find at least four players who belong in the minors. (Sorry Mets fans, but Anthony Young has got to go.) Remember the heroes of last year's playoffs and World Series? Ed Sprague now has a starting job at third base with the Jays, and where did Francisco Cabrerra come from? Can anyone even name any three players on Cleveland's roster?

Pitching is already bad enough as it is in the Majors, and this will only get worse with expansion. Prior to the last expansion in 1977, there was only one team in baseball with an ERA of over 4.00, but in the season after the Toronto Blue Jays and Seattle Mariners joined the American

Lady Bison wrap up fine regular season

Tourney position in balance as Holy Cross comes in

BY JON TERRY
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The Bucknell Lady Bison are in a must-win situation if they have any hopes of hosting a Patriot League Tournament game. Bucknell is currently tied for fourth place in the league with Army, but the Cadets would win any tie-breaker because of their better record against the better teams in the conference. So the Lady Bison must beat Holy Cross tomorrow in Davis Gym, and at the same time root for Lafayette to beat Army in Easton. It is definitely a possibility.

Lafayette is in third place and is playing well, so it is not unthinkable that they could help out Bucknell's cause. The only thing left to do is beat Holy Cross. Just that simple.

Actually it won't be that simple. The Crusaders, who beat Bucknell 80-50 in Worcester earlier this year, are in first place in the Patriot League and are the odds-on favorite to win the league tournament. Despite the talent of Holy Cross and the earlier disappointing effort, the Lady Bison certainly have every chance to win.

First of all, they are a much different team on their home floor. Bucknell is 5-1 in conference play in Davis Gym this year. The team is hoping that most of the sell-out crowd will remain from the earlier men's game to give them a significant crowd advantage.

Secondly, the team's confidence must be high because it knows it can beat Holy Cross. They did it just last year, in fact. Last Feb. 8, the Lady Bison upset the Crusaders 72-66 in their biggest win of the year.

Holy Cross is led by 6'2" forward Norinne Powers, last year's Patriot League Player of the Year. Powers' front-line mate Beth Godfrey also goes 6'2", and Bucknell's Juliet McGee '93, Monica Nawarskas '94, and probably Kelly Kempton '93 and Nicole Reffner '95 will have to be physical in order to stop them. Holy Cross is also a very deep team. Their leading scorers the last time the two teams met were reserves Laurie Carson and Lauren Maney, although they got many of their points after the game was out of reach.

The Crusaders, who start four seniors and one freshman, are very strong defensively. In addition to holding the Bison to just 31.5% shooting from the floor in January's game, they held McGee, Bucknell's leading scorer, to just nine points.

If the Lady Bison can't score inside, they will have to rely on big nights from their guards. Lisa Fink '93, Anne McGovern '93, and Joy Sandler GR were just one for eighteen from the floor in the last meeting. Those three, plus K.C. Vlah '96, have been much more productive than that this season, and they will have to be tomorrow.

Bucknell will open up the Patriot League Tournament on Mar. 2 against Army. The only question is where the game will be held. A win tomorrow will go a long way toward getting that game at home.

Holy Cross will play either Lehigh or Colgate in Worcester in the first round of the tournament. Should both the Crusaders and the Lady Bison win their first round games, there could possibly be a rematch between the two teams in the semifinals.

Bucknell routs Lehigh for the third time this year

NEIL BARDACH
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Last Saturday in Bethlehem, the Lady Bison defeated the Engineers of Lehigh by a score of 73-60 in an important Patriot League match-up.

The Bison held the Engineers to only 18 first-half points. The Orange and Blue dominated every offensive category, shooting 58.1% from the floor in the first frame, including 71.4% from three-point land.

The Bison were fouled early and often by Lehigh, as three Lehigh players fouled out before the night was over. The Bison capitalized in the first half, shooting 77.8% from the charity stripe.

The Bison cooled off in the second half, in part because of the extensive use of less experienced reserves. However, despite being outscored by 17 points in the final frame, the Bison held on for a comfortable 13-point victory over the hapless Engineers, who are stuck with only one win for the year going into the final week of the regular season.

McGee leads on and off the court

Juliet McGee '93 has emerged as one of the better players in the Patriot League in 1993

BY MIKE MELESKY
Bucknellian Staff Writer

"Maybe by your senior year you'll get some playing time." Those words uttered during the 1989-90 season by former Lady Bison coach Lori Howard were perhaps indicative of her attitude. This lack of appreciation of talent may in part explain the conflict that drove Howard to resign from the coach's position after the 1990-91 season. More surprising may be that the freshman who was the recipient of that demeaning comment was none other than Juliet McGee '93, one of the more prolific scorers and rebounders in Bucknell's history. McGee ranks in Bucknell's all-time top ten in those two categories.

But McGee does not gloat over these accomplishments. To questions about scoring her 1,000th point, a milestone which she accomplished last Saturday against Lehigh, she replies, "It's exciting to score 1,000, but it's not like I couldn't sleep that night or anything."

As coach Juliene Simpson explains, "When she scored 32 [points] against Lafayette, I told her that she played well for us offensively and defensively. Without hesitation she replied, 'I'd give up the 32 for 2 if we could have won.' It just shows her unselfishness."

Indeed, although she is a great scorer and rebounder, McGee's greatest contributions come in the locker room. She is undeniably one of the biggest team leaders.

Simpson comments, "Our seniors didn't have good leadership when they were younger, as a result of the conflicts with the former coach. So it took all of the seniors time to adjust—they didn't know what was 'good' leadership—but they've all learned through trial and error, but Juliet just stands a notch above."

McGee also leads by example. She spends countless hours in the gym, practicing her shot or lifting weights. In fact, her most admirable attributes may be her attitude and determination.

"[As a leader], it means you always have to come to practice up, never down. People look at the way you feel. You always have to be positive. If I act like I think we can win, other people might think, hey, maybe we can win this one."

"She's very coachable. When something needs to be done, she always looks to see what she can do to make the team better. I'm gonna miss her—but there's no way to replace her."
—Juliene Simpson
Head Coach

Coach Simpson says, "She's more than just a player. It's always 'what can I do?'...We look to her for so many things."

As a freshman and sophomore, McGee received limited playing time. She had wanted to transfer, but "My mother wouldn't let me." After her sophomore year, however, she had decided to go to Providence. That is, until she had a meeting with her new coach.

"She's the greatest thing since cable TV," says McGee. "She's a positive role model, always positive. She turned Bucknell around for me. I started to hate basketball, and I spent so much time playing. With her it was different. She was always trying to help."

The coaching change appears to have done wonders for her career, as evidenced by her second team All-Patriot League selection last year. McGee is also respected on the court. She is regularly double and triple-teamed, so she went back to the gym and worked harder.

"Teams were taking away her left hand, since she's a left- handed shooter," says Simpson, "so she worked on going to her right. She also added an outside shot, and has become able to penetrate off the dribble."

When McGee came to Bucknell, she was "self-conscious and unsure of herself. She doesn't have the natural ability to just walk right out on the court and produce immediately. She's worked hard for everything she's achieved," remarks Simpson. Her enthusiasm is contagious. She organizes a pre-game motivator for each game, and is always hustling for that extra edge over her opponent.

According to the Lady Bison head coach, "She's very coachable. When something needs to be done, she always looks to see what she can do to make the team better... I'm going to miss her—but there's no way to replace her. There's so many intangibles. There's no way to say everything she does for this team. "

With the regular season finale against Holy Cross and the Patriot League playoffs approaching, the end of an era comes upon Lady Bison basketball. While others will follow, no one will be able to replace Juliet McGee. As Coach Simpson simply states, "She's one of the most enjoyable people I've every coached."

Juliet McGee '93 shows her shooting stroke against Lehigh on Saturday. McGee scored 20 points in the game and went over the 1,000-point mark for her career. The senior tri-captain ranks in the top ten on the Lady Bison all-time scoring and rebounding lists. The Providence, RI native has been one of the main reasons for the Orange and Blue's drastic turnaround in just one year.

Ferraro, Sr. heads rags-to-riches wrestling program

BY NEIL BARDACH
Bucknellian Staff Writer

For any team to be successful, it requires a dedicated group of team members. The team members must be motivated and dedicated to the cause of helping the team win. However, these team members also need a knowledgeable coach, one who is just as dedicated to winning as the rest of the team. The Bucknell wrestling program has such a coach.

Bob Ferraro, Sr. has been at the helm of the Bison wrestling program for the past 20 years, and he has enjoyed phenomenal success, both long-term and short-term, as this season has illustrated. Ferraro, who initially took over a squad that did not enjoy as much success as some of the teams he has put together over his two-decade stint, has led this year's team to an 11-3 regular season record.

"Our goals for the season for the season were one, to be conference champion; two, to have two All-Americans on the team; and finally, to finish in the top 20 in the country."
—Coach Bob Ferraro, Sr.

Bob Ferraro, Sr., in his 20th year at the helm of the Bucknell wrestling program, has led this year's team to an 11-3 record, and a top 25 ranking is just out of his grasp.

Ferraro wrestled at Indiana State University, and then acted as an assistant coach at ISU for two years after graduating. Following his career at ISU, he coached for just one year at the high school level before taking over at the head of the Bison program, and he has held the position for the last 20 years.

Says Ferraro of the season, "I'm happy with the 11-3 record, especially when you consider the level of competition we've been up against. Every school on our schedule was a full scholarship school. Also, six of the teams we wrestled against were ranked in the top 25 in the country at one time during the season."

Rankings are determined by The Amateur Wrestling News, a wrestling periodical. The Bison have been noticeably absent from AWN's rankings, despite their phenomenal success this season.

Ferraro has been in an interesting situation for the past three seasons, because his son, Bob Ferraro '94, has been one of his premier wrestlers.

Ferraro (Sr.) says, "It has been very enjoyable coaching him."

But is it hard for the coach to stop being the coach, and start being the parent, and vice versa?

Says Ferraro, "Sometimes that's difficult, but we have a good relationship, and that makes it a lot easier."

With the ECWA tournament at home this weekend, Ferraro reflected on the team's goals for the season.

He says, "Our goals for the season were one, to be the conference champion; two, to have two All-Americans on the team; and finally, to finish in the top 20 in the country. Right now, I have no reason to believe that we can't accomplish all of those goals."

Bison break to cable TV

BY BO SMOLKA
Special to the Bucknellian

Fans who were not able to get tickets for the sold-out Bucknell-Holy Cross basketball game Saturday afternoon can see the game on television, as the Community Cable Network (CCN) will broadcast the game live, with coverage beginning at 1:40 p.m.

CCN operates on Cable Channel 8 and can be received in Lewisburg, Danville, Milton, and Watsontown.

The telecast will be the same feed that has been broadcast closed-circuit throughout the Bucknell campus for each home game this season. The broadcast involves one mid-court camera, with a simulcast of the Bison Sports Network radio play-by-play featuring Bob Behler and Jim Cotner.

"We're very excited about the broadcast," said Behler. "A lot of people have really bent over backwards in a short period of time to make it possible for the Lewisburg community to see the game. Ron Podlesny of CATV, Roger Thomas of Bucknell's physical plant, and Richard Pauling and Tom Carl of Bucknell's media services all deserve a great deal of credit."

This will be the first live telecast in Davis Gym's 55-year history. CCN has also announced plans to carry Bucknell's first-round playoff game on Mar. 3, and the semifinal game on Mar. 6, which the Bison will host provided they win the first-round game. Both of these games are scheduled to begin at 7:30 p.m. with the telecast scheduled to begin at 7:10 p.m. each night.

Breakin' Bison fans of the past react to the excitement on the Davis Gym floor. Nothing gets by head coach Charlie Woollum and his coaching staff, of course, who are equally as animated. The present day Bison expect a sell-out crowd for tomorrow afternoon's first-place showdown against Holy Cross. Students flooded the Langone Center information desk for tickets, which were gone in roughly two hours.

Swim teams shine, records fall

Women finish second, men fourth at Patriot League Championships last week in NY

BY SUSAN FUMAGALLI AND JON TERRY
Bucknellian Staff Writers

The Bucknell women's swim team put on an impressive display in finishing second in last week's Patriot League Championships at Colgate last week. Navy, the league's powerhouse, won the title convincingly. The men's team finished fourth at the championships, which was won by Army.

Co-captain Margaret Grunow '93 continued her dominance of the sport by chalking up three more championship titles on her way to a share of the Patriot League Outstanding Swimmer award. Grunow, who many will say is the best female swimmer ever to perform at Bucknell, became the first person in school history to win four 100-yard freestyle titles. Her time of 51.23 in that event just missed the Bucknell record held by—Grunow, of course. Her time in the 100 free did set a Colgate pool record, one of five pool records set by the women.

Jay Gross '93, seen here in practice on Wednesday, won three gold medals at the Patriot League Championships at Colgate last week. Gross was named Co-Patriot League Outstanding Swimmer.

Grunow was also victorious in the 100-yard butterfly in 56.02, good enough for pool, school, and league records. She also defended her title in the 50-yard freestyle. In all three of her wins, Grunow met the NCAA provisional qualifying standard. As if she didn't already have enough championship titles, Grunow was also a member of four winning relay teams, which included the 200- and 400-yard medley relays and the 200- and 400-yard freestyle relays. All four relays set new Bucknell and Patriot League records.

Linda Fink '95 recorded a win in the 1,650-yard freestyle. Her time of 17:25.90 established a new Patriot League Championship and Bucknell record. It was the first conference gold medal of her career, and she became just the third Bison swimmer to win gold in that event at a conference championship.

Kathleen Hartnett '94 defended her title in the 200-yard backstroke in a time of 2:05.60.

The men's team finished fourth, which was about as expected. Steve Droste '93 and Jay Gross '93 were named Co-Patriot League Outstanding Swimmers as they carried the Bison.

Gross won his third consecutive conference title in the 50-yard freestyle and the 100-yard butterfly and established new Colgate pool records in each event. His 50 free time met the NCAA provisional qualifying standard by just two-hundredths of a second. Gross also defended his 1992 100-yard freestyle title, which also set a pool record and qualified him for NCAA's.

For Droste, the success was a bit more special. The senior had never won a championship gold medal, but he shined in his final Patriot League meet, capturing the 100- and 200-yard backstroke events, as well as the 200-yard individual medley. Droste's trial time of 51.64 in the 100-yard backstroke was a career-best, and third best in Bucknell history. Droste also recorded personal-bests in the 200-yard backstroke and the 200-yard individual medley, the latter of which set a pool record.

Margaret Grunow '93 won gold medals in three individual and four relay events at Colgate last week. Grunow met the NCAA provisional qualifying standard in all three of her individual events.

Gross and Droste were also members of three gold-medal relay teams, one of which (the 200-yard freestyle relay) set a new Bucknell record. The 400-yard medley relay team came from behind to capture the 1993 crown and at the same time set yet another pool record. The Bison edged second-place Lehigh by just five-hudredths of a second in that event. The 400-yard freestyle relay squad also captured gold in 3:03.60.

So all in all it was a day of records and gold medals for the Bucknell swimmers. Navy's women and Army's men were prohibitive favorites to win the league titles thanks, in part, to their superior diving teams. Some of Bucknell's younger swimmers, such as Lynda Walford '95, Jeanne Klawon '95, Rick Steenson '95, and Doug Reid '95 showed some promise for the future. With Grunow, Gross, and Droste moving on after this year, these and other young swimmers will be looked to to keep the Bison near the top of the Patriot League.

Grapplers fall to Rider, beat Drexel

Phil Elliott '93, seen here in his match against Rider last Friday, has 17 win this year.

BY MITCH BENTON
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The Bucknell wrestling squad closed out the 1992-93 regular season by scoring a split of a pair of East Coast Wrestling Association matches last week. The Bison dropped out of a first place tie with Rider College as the Broncs came to Davis Gymnasium last Friday and defeated their hosts by a 24-10 score. Bucknell finished the season the next afternoon in Philadelphia with a conference victory over Drexel, 29-16. The weekend's action gave Bucknell a 4-1 record in ECWA action and an 11-3 mark overall, equaling the school's all-time best for victories in a season, last accomplished by the 1989-90 team that finished with an 11-5 record.

Head Coach Bob Ferraro stressed the fact that there was still a great portion of the team's goals to be met.

"When we started, we set out our goals for the season. They included winning the conference tournament and sending four or five guys out to the NCAA's. From there, we wanted to place at least two All-Americas and finish in the Top 25 nationally."

The team's chances for success in the upcoming ECWA tournament, to be held in Davis on Mar. 5-6, took a blow last weekend as a pair of starters sustained injuries that made their status doubtful. Against Rider, 190-pound Tom Boyd '95 was forced to retire due to a back injury reaggravated in wrestling the nation's fourth-ranked 190-pounder, the Broncs' John Hangey. Although he competed against Drexel, dropping an 8-3 decision, Boyd appears doubtful until next season.

Facing Greg Rosenbaum in the match against Drexel, 142-pound Ron Wellman '95 also had to default. A leg injury has made the team's leading pinner questionable for the tournament.

On Friday night, Rider was able to jump out to an early 9-0 lead and eventually cruised a 14-point victory that gave the Bison their first conference loss of the year and put the Broncs' on track for the ECWA's regular season title. After dropping the first three bouts of the evening, including 126-pound George Swann's '93 only conference loss of the season, a 13-7 decision to Matt Finacchio, Bucknell captain Mike Van Doren '92 put the squad on the scoreboard. Wrestling in the last home dual bout of his illustrious collegiate grappling career, the 150-pounder scored a 14-2 major decision that cut the visitors' lead to 9-4. The victory, coupled with the following afternoon's technical fall, left Van Doren with a team-high 26 victories, including six pins for technical falls and eight major decisions, and a perfect 5-0 mark in ECWA competition.

Rider pushed the lead again by winning the next two bouts, but the Bison answered as 167-pound Mike Rush scored an 11-4 upset over Rider's Mike Rush, previously 19-5 on the season. A 9-7 decision by captain Bob Ferraro '94 at 177 pounds brought the team to within five, at 15-10, but the injury default at 190 and a 6-2 win in the heavyweight bout, gave Rider the 24-10 victory.

George Swann '93 outmuscles his Rider opponent. Swann actually lost this bout, his first conference loss of the year. Swann rebounded the following day against Drexel with his 17th win of the year.

Despite knocking off the Bison, Rider must still earn the conference's championship. The Broncs still have to take on last year's champion, Central Connecticut State. If the Blue Devils, already losers against Bucknell, can repeat last year's victory over Rider, the ECWA will have its second consecutive three-way tie for the regular-season title.

On Saturday, Drexel was able to score first with an 8-4 victory at 118 pounds before Bucknell seized the lead with one point victories in the next two bouts. Swann, one of this season's Bison captains, was able to raise his season record to 17-9 and 4-1 in the conference, with a 6-5 win at 126 pounds. Another captain, 134 pound Phil Elliott '93, scored his 17th victory of the year with a 5-4 win that pushed the team score to 6-3. After the Wellman injury, Van Doren gave Bucknell the lead back with his 17-1, second-period technical fall. The Dragons scored a major decision in the 158-pound bout, but the Bison locked up the win with consecutive pins from Rush in just over two minutes, and Ferraro in just under five.

Ferraro's victory marked the fifth time that he has pinned an opponent this season and pushed his overall record to 25-2, with a dual mark of 14-0, the best Bison dual-bout season since 1976 when Tom Scotton finished the season at 15-0.

The Bucknell grapplers will be off until the championships come to Lewisburg. The quarter- and semi-final competitions will be held during afternoon and night sessions on Friday, Mar. 5, while the consolation and championship rounds will take place the following afternoon.

Patriot League names new boss

BY SCOTT GRISIN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

In December, The Patriot League Council of Presidents announced that Constance H. Hurlbut, the current Associate Executive Director with the Council of Ivy Group Presidents, has been selected to succeed the retiring incumbent, Carl Ullrich, as the third Executive Director of the Patriot League.

Rev. John E. Brooks, S.J., President of the College of the Holy Cross and chair of the eight-member Search Committee, expressed his pleasure with the appointment of Hurlbut, saying, "This committee believes that Constance Hurlbut, who was chosen from among 65 candidates, will provide exciting, innovative and positive leadership for the Patriot League as we enter a new age for intercollegiate athletics."

Established in 1984, the Patriot League brings together a group of highly-selective, academically-strong colleges and universities with similar philosophies on their contribution of athletics to the educational mission. Hurlbut brings a wealth of experience to the League, having served the past six and a half years with the Ivy Group, where she has assumed a growing responsibility for the organization's activities.

The retiring Ullrich has served in the intercollegiate athletic community for 42 years as an athlete, coach, and administrator. Ullrich also believes that Hurlbut will be an outstanding leader for the League: "Connie has had on-campus experience in her work with the Ivy Group, working with Athletic Directors, Compliance Coordinators and coaches, as well as with Presidents and Policy Committee members. She will bring a stimulating, positive, and new approach to the leadership of the League."

Appointed as the first Associate Executive Director of the Ivy Group in July of 1989, Hurlbut has had numerous responsibilities, including the processing of all NCAA and Ivy Group team and individual eligibility matters; interpreting NCAA, ECAC and Ivy legislation; administering the Ivy Group drug education policy; and managing the Ivy Group's NCAA Conference Grant Program and Student Assistance Fund. As the Ivy Group's NCAA Legislative and Compliance representative, she has also worked closely with member institutions in assisting them in preparation for NCAA certification and institutional compliance reviews.

Prior to her duties as the Associative Executive Director, Hurlbut held the position of Assistant Executive Director with the Ivy Group for three years, where her responsibilities included the writing and editing of all League publications and the publicity of football, men's and women's basketball, and baseball. She also provided legislative interpretations for member institutions.

A 1983 graduate of the University of Pennsylvania, Hurlbut began her career in athletic administration as an Asa S. Bushnell intern with the Eastern College Athletic Conference. In 1984 she was appointed the Conference's Assistant Commissioner. As the ECAC's Assistant Commissioner for two years, Hurlbut was responsible for implementing and administering championships in 16 sports; producing and editing all publications; managing a two-person internship program; and supervising the production and distribution of all conference publicity for the 243-member athletic conference.

Hurlbut, whose husband Steve is the Associate Commissioner of the Northeast Conference, will begin her tenure as the Patriot League Executive Director on July 1, 1993.

Tourney ticket policy announced

Tickets for the Patriot League Men's Basketball Tournament first-round game, scheduled for Davis Gym on Wednesday, Mar. 3 at 7:30 p.m., will go on sale to the general public and the Bucknell community beginning Monday, Mar. 1 at 9:00 a.m. until 1:00 p.m. at the Christy Mathewson Memorial Stadium ticket windows. Any remaining tickets will be sold at the Davis Gym ticket office Tuesday morning at 9:00 a.m. Tickets will be sold on an individual game basis only.

Approximately 300 tickets will be available to the general public and 1,000 tickets for the Bucknell community. League policy dictates that the visiting team receives 500 tickets to sell, but any of those tickets that go unsold will be available the night of the game beginning at 6:00 p.m.

All tickets for the Patriot League Basketball Tournament are reserved, assigned seats, and tickets for adults cost $7 for the first-round game, $8 for the semi-finals, and $10 for the championship game. Tickets for students and children cost $3 for each game. According to ticket policy, there will be no free tickets for Bucknell students, faculty, or staff as there have been during the regular season.

Bucknell students may buy one ticket per I.D. card, and bring a maximum of four I.D.s when purchasing tickets. An I.D., however, may only be used once for each game.

Tickets for games following the first round will go on sale the first business morning following the victory.

Bring your tents to Christy Mathewson Memorial Stadium in order to get your basketball tourney tickets!

Margaret Grunow '93, Steve Droste '93, and Jay Gross '93

Swimmers Margaret Grunow '93, Steve Droste '93, and Jay Gross '93 have been named The Bucknellian's Athletes of the Week for their dominant performances at last week's Patriot League Championships held at Colgate University.

Grunow won a total of seven league titles as she recorded individual victories in the 100-yard freestyle, the 100-yard butterfly, and the 50-yard freestyle. In addition, Grunow was a part of four triumphant relay teams. With her win in the 100-yard freestyle, she became the first four-time champion in that event in school history.

Droste, who had never won a league title, took home three gold medals. A winner in the 100 and 200-yard backstroke as well as the 200-yard individual medley, Droste finished his Patriot League career in style.

Gross won the 50-yard freestyle for the third straight year, and he also added titles in the 100-yard butterfly and the 100-yard freestyle.

The three swimmers combined to set 10 pool records, five Bucknell records, and five Patriot League records. In addition, they were all named Co-Patriot League Outstanding Swimmers.

Overall, the women finished second at the meet, while the men finished fourth.

Trivia Answer:

The Bucknell men's and women's swim teams, led by the three seniors named above, combined to set 10 pool records at Colgate at the Patriot League Championships last week. The Bucknellian wonders if Colgate even has that many.

Baseball looks to pitching in 1993

Weather permitting, the Bison hope to open up at James Madison this weekend

BY JON TERRY
Bucknellian Staff Writer

While most of the campus is still thinking of basketball and sledriding, the Bucknell baseball team has its mind on this weekend's season-opening two-game series at James Madison. Head coach Gene Depew and his team are hoping that the wintery weather will subside at least for the weekend.

Depew is optimistic that the games will be played. James Madison has been practicing outside all week, and it opened up its season on Wednesday against Georgetown. Another advantage is that James Madison plays on an Astroturf field, making it easy to clear of snow.

The team, looking for its third straight winning season, faces one of the largest and toughest schedules in school history. The 48-game schedule includes a seven-game trip through Florida, four games against Big Ten teams, and the addition of solid Army and Navy teams to the Patriot League.

The Patriot League will now be comprised of two divisions. The Bison will compete in the South Division along with Lafayette, Lehigh, and Navy. Teams will play four games each against teams within their own division and two each against the remaining teams in the other division.

"I feel that the league is going to be very competitive this season," said Depew. "[Last year's co-champions] Fordham and Lafayette are going to be very solid again. By adding Army and Navy to the league, we added two quality teams that were always contenders in the EIBL (Eastern Intercollegiate Baseball League)."

The strength of the team this year is the depth of the pitching staff. Jake Kazanjian '93 led the starting staff in victories (six) and earned run average (2.95) last year, and Kazanjian along with Kurt Waldner '93 will make for one of the better top-two starters in the league. Waldner proved last season that he is one of the best control pitchers in the league, as evidenced by his team-high 43 strikeouts while issuing just 11 walks. Lefties Denis Maguire '93 and Rich Heller '94 both threw well in the fall and figure to round out the rotation.

Depew will have some interesting decisions to make this year about his staff. He is in the enviable position of having a whole lot of quality pitching, although he must find a way to get them all innings so they stay sharp. Other talented throwers include Kyle Morris '95, who will also play first base, Jim Stevens '94, who is back after an injury-plagued 1992, and Dave Scranton '95.

With the league schedule set up so that the team plays doubleheaders on Saturdays and Sundays with single games during the week (usually against non-conference competition), Depew looks to use his top four starters on the weekends, and then a type of "bullpen by committee" in the non-league games where he gets several other pitchers a few innings each.

"We feel that the new schedule gives us an advantage because of the depth of our pitching," said Depew.

Matt Sniegocki '93 will be back in center field this year. A pleasant surprise last year after replacing all-conference center fielder Roger Ahrens '91, Sniegocki hit .302 with a team high 11 steals last year. Steve Gyimesi '93 only played in seven games last year, but after starting in right field in each of his first two years, Gyimesi will be back at that position again this year. Dwight Steward '95 will likely start in left field this weekend.

Co-captain Mike Kearns '93 anchors the infield at second base. Kearns, who has hit leadoff each of the past three seasons, hit .322 last year and led the team in runs scored (27) for the second straight year. Co-captain Larry Trout '93 returns to third base this year. Trout, whose production dropped off a bit last year due to an injured back, will look to regain the stroke that made him an all-conference third baseman in 1991.

The other two infield positions will look somewhat different from last year. Scott Sutfin '94 will be the regular shortstop. Sutfin, who has spent most of his career backing up Bill Rinker at short or playing the outfield, has proven he has a quality bat (.329 average in 28 games last year), but will need to be consistent with the glove.

"Scott doesn't have much college experience at shortstop, but he has excellent range, and we are confident he can do the job," said Depew.

Kurt Waldner '93, pictured here in a 1991 game, is one of the top pitchers on a very deep staff. Waldner and Jake Kazanjian '93 make up an imposing one-two punch in the starting rotation. The success of the Bison's hurlers this year will dictate their success in the expanded Patriot League.

Second baseman Mike Kearns '93 — Third baseman Larry Trout '93

Infielders Mike Kearns '93 and Larry Trout '93 have been selected as co-captains for the 1993 season based on a team vote. Two of seven seniors on the roster, Kearns and Trout will have plenty of help in providing the veteran leadership required to keep the team in contention for the Patriot League title.

In addition to being Academic All-America candidates for the second year in a row, the two captains will also anchor the Bison's batting order. Kearns, a leadoff hitter, hit .322 last year and led the team in runs scored with 27.

Trout, who tied for the team lead with three home runs last year, will hit in the middle of the order. Nagging injuries caused his production to drop off somewhat last year, but the civil engineer from Virginia will look to get back to the first team form that helped him get named to the all-league team in 1991 starting tomorrow in his home state.

Feaster will be looking to quiet the crowd tomorrow with his dunking ability. His baseline follow-up jam against Bucknell earlier this year was one of the better slams of the year, and Feaster has also been seen on ESPN SportsCenter's Plays of the Week.

The Crusaders' back court is also extremely strong. With Roger Breslin at the point and Bill Walker at shooting guard, Holy Cross has two seniors with experience, the ability to score, and heads on their shoulders. On Jan. 30, Breslin had his typical solid—if not spectacular—effort, producing nine points, nine assists, two steals, and no turnovers.

Look for Bucknell to play its usual up-tempo game tomorrow. One of Holy Cross's few weaknesses is that they are not a deep team.

They generally only use seven players. Powell, who along with Bucknell's Mike Walsh '93, is one of the best sixth men in the league, will get the most minutes off the bench. Derek Farkas will also get some time at the guard spot. The only other Crusader with even a remote chance to see time tomorrow is forward Carlos Clark, who played four minutes against the Bison in Worcester.

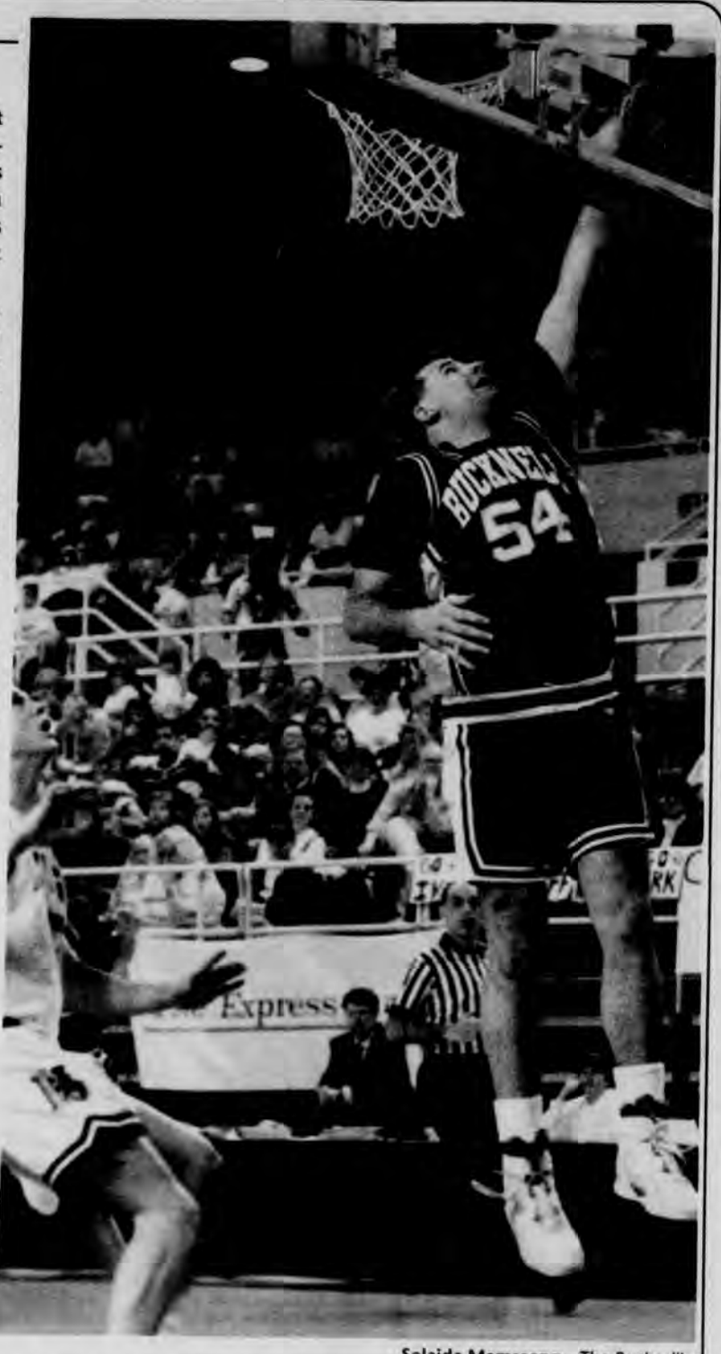
So while tomorrow's game will decide who gets the ring, the game will likely be overshadowed on Mar. 10, at the Patriot League Tournament Championship. However, while all the fans can sit and dream about being on ESPN again, the Bucknell players and coaches can't be looking that far ahead.

If the Bison win tomorrow, they will most likely face Lehigh or Army in the first round of the tournament. Those two teams are tied for last place at 2-11. Army plays at Lafayette tomorrow, while Lehigh travels to Colgate. Should both teams lose tomorrow, it would take a coin flip to determine who finishes last and has to play the first-place team.

If both teams win tomorrow, that would create a three-way tie for last with Lafayette, Lehigh, and Army. In that situation, Lafayette would finish sixth based on its win over Fordham, Lehigh would finish seventh because they would have beaten Colgate, and Army would finish last.

There is another possible tiebreaker to be worked out between Fordham and Colgate, who are both 8-5 in the league and favored to win their home games tomorrow. Should the teams remain tied after tomorrow, Fordham would be considered the third-place team thanks to its win over Holy Cross.

All of this is just speculation, however, as Bucknell must first think about Holy Cross tomorrow. After that, the coaches and players will tell you it does not matter who they play in the tournament. They feel they can beat anybody in the league, and based on the way they have been playing over the last three weeks, it's hard to doubt them.



Solaida Mamsaang—The Bucknellian

Super sixth-man Mike Walsh '93, seen here taking it strong to the goal at Lehigh's Stabler Arena last Saturday, has been a force in the low post this season. Walsh's return to the team is a major reason why the Bison are in strong position to take the league title.

MEN'S TRACK

ed for this time of the year, which is always a key." Another key will be the superior depth and balance of the squad which should pull Bucknell through.

Several Bison performers will be looked to for much-needed points. Sprinter Brad Bernardini '94 has been solid all season, and he ran the fastest time of the year in the Patriot League in the 55-meter dash. Rick Van Emburgh '95 has had success in the 400-meter and 500-meter runs.

In the longer distances, look for Jim Farrer '93 and Tom Eagleson '93 to perform well in the mile and John Lewis '93 in the 3,000-meter run. Mike Bronson '93 should challenge in the 5,000-meter event. Colgate's Ray Appenheimer appears to be the favorite in three of the long distance events, but Bucknell's depth should help them score well.

The Bison are also strong this year in the jumping events. Brian Preputnick '96 and John Plante '94 are strong in the high jump, and Karim Abdul-Matin '96 is the favorite in the triple jump.

Gulden summed up his cliches by noting, "It's great to be home, but the team that comes out with the greatest intensity and competitiveness will do well."

To his credit, though, Gulden's troops have always turned his cliches into facts.

on Fordham here, as they [Fordham] have no one ranked in the top 15.

Middle Distance/Distance

Quality and depth are the keys here. Kathy Wurster '94 has been on fire this season and should contend for the title in any event she runs. Don't count out "old timer" Gina Abraham '93, as she is a gutsy performer who loves to out-kick her opponents. Also watch for Becky Tobin '95, Maria Ryan '96, and Jessica Wilhelm '95 to race into scoring positions. In the 3,000m and 5,000m, Kristen Opdyke '93 and Bridgette Mayer '96 will have their hands full, as both Fordham and Lehigh sport quality athletes here. But Opdyke is hungry for her first indoor title and will be driven by the haunting memory of being out kicked in last year's 3,000m. Newcomer Mayer is has been impressive this season and looks to carry on Bucknell's dominant distance tradition.

Relays

The championships meet almost inevitably comes down to the relays, and Bucknell is as good as anyone. Everyone is tired and sore by this point in the meet, so the winners of the relays are those who "want it more." The 4 x 400m, 4 x 800m and the Distance Medley Relay will be an exciting finish to a what is sure to be a great meet.

BREAKIN' BISON

game and a 2-0 Bucknell lead. The Engineers never got any closer.

The Orange and Blue jumped out to a 7-1 lead and then went on a six minute 18-5 run culminating with a trey from Chris Simpson '94 and a Lehigh time-out. The break did not help the Engineers, as the Bison continued to knock them off their tracks. A Brown dunk was part of 12 unanswered points for Bucknell, which were in turn part of a 20-7 run to close out the first half.

The Bison began the second half up 49-21, and they increased their lead to 36 points at the 14:12 mark when Russell Peyton '93 drove in for a layup. Peyton was the game's high-scorer with 21 along with seven steals, one shy of the school record.

After missing his first three attempts from beyond the arc, Bright gave the rim a rest as he downed nine consecutive three-pointers.

The two teams exchanged layups and turnovers for the next ten minutes when the score was 85-58 with 4:23 to go, and then the Engineers started a run of their own—including a 14-0 run in the closing two minutes—pulling within ten as time expired.

Four other Bison beside Peyton scored in double figures, including Mike Bright '93 with 15, Chris Simpson '94 with 13, and Brown and Matt Clark '93 added 11 apiece en route to a 90-80 win.

Practice was held in Davis Gym on Wednesday as 1,800 fans watched the good guys from Bucknell maul the Loyola Greyhounds with its first hundred-plus point performance of the season, 116-85.

Brown slammed the ball through the iron off of yet another Peyton steal to start the game, and that set the tone for the evening. Bright, however, not wanting to be outdone, answered Brown's dunk with a reverse jam after his own steal. The two worked together the very next time down the court as Bright dished to Brown for yet another jam and a 6-2 lead.

After missing his first three attempts from beyond the arc, Bright gave the rim a rest as he downed nine consecutive three-pointers in the game—both a Bucknell and a Patriot League record. His 33-point performance was a career high for Bright, eclipsing his 29 against Colgate earlier this season.

"They came out in a zone defense, and they had no one on the arc," said Bright. "I just stayed with the offensive flow and let it come to me naturally, and they just started going in."

The Bison simply ran all over the Loyola squad, as Bright, Brown, Olkowski, and Simpson scored in double figures, scoring a combined 78 points. Coach Charlie Woollum also made frequent trips to the end of the bench, giving some of his players some much-desired playing time. Sekou Hamer '96 dropped eight points and grabbed three rebounds, while Jason Janego '94 added four, Dave Steigerwald '96 had three, and Kihlon Golden '96, Kevin Wenk '96, and Pat Hook '95 had two points each.

"I think it was just a good win," said Brown. "It helps us to get pumped [for Holy Cross]. We weren't looking past them because in order to get to the game Saturday, we had to play this one as hard we had played any other game this year. I think we did that, and the score indicates that."

The Breakin' Bison close out the regular season tomorrow with the first place showdown against the College of the Holy Cross at 2 p.m. in Davis Gymnasium. The game, which sold out in two hours, will determine the top seed going into the Patriot League Tournament next week.

LADY BISON

Leading the Bison in scoring once again was center Juliet McGee '93, who scored 20 points on the evening, as she sank nine of 13 attempts from the floor. McGee also pulled down seven rebounds, ending her streak of consecutive double-double games.

Incidentally, the fourth point that McGee scored on the evening was her 1,000th career point. This makes her only the eighth player in Bucknell history to reach this milestone, and it is even more remarkable because McGee was not a full-time player during her freshman and sophomore years, receiving only token playing time.

Leading the pack in rebounds was K.C. Vlah '96, who pulled down nine boards on the evening to complement her seven-point effort.

Also scoring efficiently for the Bison was forward Anne McGovern '93, who notched 19 points on the night, including four-of-seven from three-point range, and five-of-six free throw attempts.

Also, Joy Sandler GR notched 12 points, shooting four-of-nine from the floor, and three of four from the charity stripe.

BASEBALL

When he is not on the mound, Kyle Morris will play first base. At 6'4" and 220 pounds, Morris is imposing no matter where he plays. He could turn out to be a valuable part of the lineup hitting from the left side. Depew also noted that Morris has worked hard to improve the defensive side of his game.

With the graduation of catcher Mark Kennedy '92, John Martine '94 will step into the number-one spot behind the plate.

"[Martine] is good at handling the pitchers, and he has really developed into a good team leader," said Depew. With the grueling schedule this season, backup catcher Brian Koch '95 will see a lot of playing time both behind the plate and at the designated hitter spot.

One of the major keys to the season is making up for the offensive production lost by the graduation of Kennedy, Dave Koerner '92, and Jim Zervanos '92. The return of Gyimesi should help, but players such as Sniegocki, Trout, Morris, and Martine will be counted on to carry the load offensively.

Based on the strength of the pitching staff and team's experience, Bucknell is a pre-season pick to challenge for the Patriot League title. The schedule is certainly tough—just six of the first 27 games are in Lewisburg—but the team can't help but improve simply by playing a lot of baseball.

League, there were 14—that's a 14-fold increase. Last season there were six such teams, so if everything follows the same pattern, there will be 84 teams with ERAs over 4.00—better start adding some more teams, Mr. Commissioner. By the way, just who is the Commissioner of baseball, anyway?

Even in a league filled with poor pitching, the Rockies and Marlins won't be contenders for a long time, if ever. "Now wait a second here," you might be shouting. "The Rockies and Marlins will get better with time—look what the Blue Jays accomplished," you say. Sure they are just starting out and they have to build their teams up slowly.

Unfortunately, you build with gold bricks in the world of Major League Baseball, and these teams will not be able to afford to build much of anything. They will not be able to pay the astronomical salaries being paid to even the mediocre players. Look at the Pittsburgh Pirates—they have been in the League for decades, and they still do not have the money to keep players like Barry Bonds. The main reason Toronto was a successful was because they did it all with money and tremendous fan support—two things Colorado and Florida will be lacking.

On the bright side, there may actually be a way for these two teams to be play-off contenders. The League is looking at an expanded playoff format involving a wild card team. Great. Now the baseball postseason will last almost as long as the NHL playoffs. So hop in the car and take a trip to Hi Corbett Field because hey, you never know. It ain't over until the fat lady sings.

THE BUCKNELLIAN

Sexual assailant accosts students

BY TARA G. GILLIGAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Several women filed complaints to Public Safety this week after receiving a campus-wide safety alert which described an incident of sexual harassment. The students claim to have been accosted by a man whose description exactly matches the one given in the alert.

In the initial incident, which occurred Tuesday at 12:30 p.m., a female student noticed that a particular pick-up truck drove past her several times as she was jogging west on Smoketown Road. According to the alert, the driver exited his vehicle and jogged past the student twice, once in each direction, and uttered a remark to her which she was unable to discern. As she returned to her residence, the driver followed her and then departed.

The two other students filed complaints about a similar incident involving a man whom they believe fits the description of the first incident.

In one of these incidents, two female students noticed a man as they were walking around the golf course at noon on Tuesday. He made a lewd comment to one of the women. At 12:45 p.m. that same day, the women saw him again while they were shopping at Weis Markets. Although neither believes he followed them to the store, he did make another vulgar comment to them.

According to Public Safety reports, a man, supposedly the same one involved in the other incidents, approached one of the women as she was walking north on South Third Street on Tuesday morning. As he walked past her, the man made a lewd comment to her.

The first victim described the suspect as a white male in his late 20s. He has dark hair and a receding hairline, is between 5'5" and 5'6", weighs 200 pounds, and has a pot belly. He was dressed in a tie-dyed shirt and tight blue spandex shorts. The victim of the Mar. 3 harassment could not recall seeing a tie-dyed shirt but said he was wearing spandex and otherwise fit the description.

One happy camper...

Dave Fries '93, pleased to have obtained tickets to Wednesday night's game against Lehigh, camped out after the game to beat the rush for Saturday tickets. Equipped with TV and VCR, he said, "We made sure everything worked before we came here this afternoon and put the tent up once in a parking lot near where I live to make sure it all worked."

Breakin' Bison gear up for semi-final against Colgate

BY JON TERRY
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Whew, that was a close one! No, you were not dreaming; the Lehigh men's basketball team did almost pull off the upset of all upsets on Wednesday night, proving to the Breakin' Bison that they are not as invincible as they have led us to believe over the last several weeks.

The 45 minutes of agony that the 1,513 (only 1,513!?) fans were put through on Wednesday should have Bucknell—fans and players alike—fired up like they have never been fired up before. Based on the tents that were pitched outside the fieldhouse just hours after the Lehigh game, and the fact that all the tickets were sold by lunch, it is evident that the fans are indeed pumped.

What about the team? Well, it is probably wrong to say that they weren't ready for Lehigh. The Engineers simply came to town with a plan, executed it almost to perfection, and almost won the game. By slowing the pace of the game down to a crawl, they took the Bison out of their game and caused them to lose some of their edge. But the aggressive play of Matt Clark '93 and Mike Walsh '93 off the bench no doubt served to inspire the sluggish starters, and that inspiration should carry over into the Colgate game.

Colgate, too, should be inspired. They are coming off a tough quarterfinal game in which they had to scramble to beat Navy, 84-80, for their first Patriot League Tournament victory ever. Remember also that the Red Raiders, who are enjoying their most successful season in school history this year at 18-9, have given the Bison fits this year.

On Jan. 9 in Lewisburg, Colgate shot the lights out in the first half, taking a 50-40 halftime lead. Bucknell turned up the defense in the second half and finally pulled out a 92-83 win that was closer than the score indicated.

On Feb. 3 at Colgate, the Bison raced out to a 36-22 halftime lead, thanks mostly to poor shooting (23.7% from the floor) by the Red Raiders. Bucknell watched their lead slip away in the second half, however, as Colgate began to convert from in the paint. Colgate actually took the lead about midway through the second half, and the two teams went back and forth the rest of the way. When Darren Brown's three-point attempt rimmed out, and his teammates could not tip in the rebound at the buzzer, the Bison were able to get out of town with a 65-63 win.

Brown, a First-Team All-Patriot League selection, is Colgate's best player. Brown led the league in rebounding with an average of 10.9 boards per game, and he was seventh in the league in scoring at 16.5 points per contest.

Perhaps Colgate's biggest weapon, and the reason why they have improved on last year's total of 13 victories, is guard Tucker Neale. Neale, who transferred after one year at

Bison basketball playoff tickets are in high demand

BY MICHELLE MANZO
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Bucknell basketball fans are a rare breed. Just minutes after the close win over Lehigh in the first round of the Patriot League playoffs, Dave Fries '93 and his cohorts set up camp to await the opening of Davis Gym for Thursday morning ticket sales for the second round Saturday game.

Tickets have been tough to come by lately, with a smaller number of seats than usual in Davis Gym, and an unorganized, chaotic manner of distribution. On Monday, students and faculty waited at Christy Mathewson Memorial Stadium for tickets to the Lehigh game. Although tickets went on sale at 9:00 a.m., the most devoted fans had been lined up outside for over three hours.

Students seemed disheartened as they waited in the cold to purchase the $3 tickets for Wednesday night's game. Most of the complaints stemmed from the fact that the purchasing process was extremely slow. Mary Presecan '96 declared she would only wait thirty minutes in the cold for a ticket, a situation she labeled as "really depressing."

Gerald Commerford, assistant dean for housing, waited outside to purchase tickets for his family. "There are 100 people in line, and 100 different suggestions on how they could do it differently," he said.

He said that he was surprised that the tickets were not being sold in Davis Gym. "It would be nice to be inside in an auditorium where there is heat," he said.

After experimenting with this and the ELC method of distribution, the Athletic Department sent notices to students and faculty this week that Saturday game tickets would go on sale at 9 a.m. Thursday inside at Davis Gym.

Leane Hood—The Bucknellian

Under the new ticket distribution system, students and faculty can wait in the warmth of Davis Gym to purchase tickets.

Still willing to brave the cold, however, Fries, Chris Boner '95, and Mike DiGuglielmo '95, set up a tent with the opening facing into the gym door. To entertain themselves through the night until the 9 a.m. Thursday opening time, they brought a rented generator, and settled back on mattresses to watch Hoosiers on the TV and VCR they brought with them while they waited for Dominoes to show up with their pizza.

Seeing the first tent set up, other groups of students ran to stake their ground. When most students were sleeping in cozy rooms, the few diehards were sleeping outside—some in tents and a

Faculty are vulnerable to administrative dismissal

BY SUSAN SMITH
Bucknellian Staff Writer

While it is unusual for a professor's performance to warrant release from the University, removal of tenure and gentle nudges into retirement have occurred at Bucknell.

In the last ten years, Larry Shinn, vice-president for academic affairs, can recall five or six incidents of teaching problematic enough to initiate the removal of tenure. Typically, "it's a matter of the professor acknowledging responsibilities," he said.

To safeguard against problematic teaching performances, tenured professors are subject to the merit review process every three years.

Andy Bush '93, a civil engineering major, said, "I've had one new professor who was poor, but she's not here anymore. I had another professor who was brilliant, but couldn't communicate. I didn't get anything out of the class."

According to Shinn, "When the faculty and chair of the department discover that there is a real problem in the classroom, they try to help the professor to improve and become successful."

According to the faculty handbook, "The willful failure to fulfill obligations for teaching, sexual harassment of students or colleagues, conviction of a serious crime, and physical interference with students or colleagues in the exercise of their civil or academic rights are examples of adequate cause for dismissal."

Shinn sights academic dishonesty, moral trepidation in the form of sexual harassment (twice), and poor teaching with the failure to adjust and improve as the reasons behind some of the more recent releases.

Professors have also been encouraged to leave the University due to older age.

Students face charges for 'joke'

BY TARA G. GILLIGAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The Lewisburg Police Department (LPD) filed charges against two students Tuesday for discharging fire extinguishers into several rooms in the Vedder and Larrison residence halls and for aiming them at other students.

Michael A. Kavanagh '95 and Christopher McCarthy '95 face up to ten years in prison and maximum fines totalling $5600 after being charged with two misdemeanors and two summary offenses.

Kavanagh described the incident as a "practical joke" but declined further comment. McCarthy refused to comment.

The charges follow an in-depth investigation by the Office of Public Safety. According to a report issued by LPD, a fire alarm was activated on the third floor of Vedder Hall. Kavanagh and McCarthy, who share a room in Swartz, are alleged to have discharged fire extinguishers into the rooms of several other students, damaging property and choking students "who hung out their windows to get air."

The report also states that the two are alleged to have been involved in a second incident which occurred early on Feb. 18 in Larison Hall.

According to Gil Rotchford '96, whose room was heavily hit by the extinguisher's spray, Kavanagh and Atkins had been drinking that night.

Guy Atkins '96, Rotchford's roommate, said that they had to move out of their rooms for several days following the incident. Atkins computer and answering machine were damaged by the spray, but both have been fixed, he said. According to Atkins, Kavanagh and McCarthy spent one Saturday cleaning up the rooms they had damaged.

Atkins and Rotchford are both friends of Kavanagh and McCarthy.

Both Kavanagh and McCarthy have been charged with the following: two counts of institutional vandalism (second

Techincal directors suspended

BY TARA G. GILLIGAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

For unspecified reasons, Steven and Chrissy Chene, campus technical directors, have been suspended indefinitely from their positions within the University as of this week.

Nancy Cook, operations manager of the Weis Center, confirmed that the husband and wife team had their contracts suspended, but refused to comment further. Barbara Shailor, vice president for student service, said she could offer no comment at present.

While no one in any position of authority has commented substantively on the suspension, sources indicate that serious work codes have been violated.

A Physical Plant worker confirmed yesterday that the locks to the Chene's office in the Weis Center had been changed.

Steven Chene said that he had, in effect, been issued a "gag order" by the University and said he had been "told by administrators that I am not allowed to discuss the matter." He had no further comments.

His wife also declined to comment.

Several students employed by technical services expressed their hesitancy to discuss the matter.

misdemeanor), one count of criminal conspiracy (second misdemeanor), two counts of criminal mischief (summary offense), two counts of disorderly conduct (summary offense), and three counts of harassment.

Each of the second misdemeanors carries a maximum sentence of two years in prison and/or a $5000 fine. The maximum sanction for each of the summary offenses is 90 days in prison and/or a $300 fine.

Although Donald Heiter, chief of police, doubts that Kavanagh and McCarthy will receive the maximum sentence, he insists that their action represents a serious threat to other students. "It could have been a whole lot worse, especially if there had been a fire in the area where they released the fire extinguishers," he said.

few others in blankets on the ground.

Under this newest system, students were given numbers and were then allowed to wait in the gym until it was their turn to purchase tickets.

Thursday's distribution system seemed overall to run more smoothly than any previous method. Not everyone waiting for tickets obtained one, but the distribution was more orderly, and everyone remained warm.

Still there were suggestions to place a map of the gym where students could decide where they want to sit before arriving at the ticket window.

Under the current distribution policy, students may buy up to four tickets by producing four student IDs. Students in line on Monday and Thursday generally seemed to be carrying at least one other ID aside from their own to buy tickets for friends. One first year student, however, said he resents the "four IDs per person" policy. He said, "If you really want to go to the game, get up and get them yourself."

Explaining the reasoning behind the four ID rule, Athletic Director Rick Hartzell said, "We don't want to put students in the position of choosing between going to class and picking up tickets...I've got to try to do what's best for the most people."

Moving the location of the ticket windows from the ELC to the stadium has "expedited the process somewhat," according to Hartzell. At the stadium there were two ticket windows, whereas in the ELC only one was available.

Under the new set-up for the Patriot League playoffs, the top-ranked team is given home court advantage, which means Bucknell will be at home for each game of the tournament. This is the first year that Bucknell has had to sell tickets to tournament games. New restrictions set by the fire marshal have meant limiting the number of people allowed into the gym for games.

Hartzell agreed with students suggestions that perhaps a meal card system would be more efficient in selling the tickets. The Athletic Department has plans to implement such a plan in the following basketball seasons.

Those who are unable to purchase tickets for the games will be able to watch the tournament on the local cable channel 8. According to Hartzell, this is the first time there has been "an overwhelming interest in games," and he noted optimistically that "this is a great problem to have."

Memorial service slated for Ralph Rees

A special moment of next weekend's Celebration for the Arts will be a memorial service for Ralph Rees '39, professor of English emeritus, 11 a.m. Saturday, March 13, in Rooke Chapel.

Rees, who died in November, joined the Bucknell faculty in 1947, the same year he received a master's degree from Bucknell. The recipient of a doctorate from Penn State University, he taught at Bucknell for 40 years, retiring in 1987.

A founding member of the Bucknell Association for the Arts, he also founded the annual spring Celebration for the Arts and coordinated its programs for a number of years. Honored by the Association in 1983 with its award for dedication to the arts, he also was part of the planning committee for the Weis Center for the Performing Arts.

In 1985, he was named to the board of directors of the Northeastern Pennsylvania Television Association, which operates WVIA-TV and WVIA-AM. Rees conceived and negotiated the WVIA videotaping of the Rooke Chapel Candlelight Christmas Service, which was retaped last year. WVIA has established the Ralph Rees Endowment to raise funds to bring more Bucknell arts performances to public television.

Sojka to host forum

BY ANDREW COHEN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

President Sojka will host an open forum entitled "Direction Setting" at 4-5:30 p.m. on Monday in Vaughan Lit Auditorium.

The forum was originally called "Restructuring," but this alarmed many members of the University community, since it seemed to imply that there would be cutbacks, according to Sojka.

The forum will, however, concern itself with "budgeting and financial concerns," said Sojka who was quick to point out that focus is proactive rather than reactive. "The University is not at this moment facing a crisis. On the other hand, it is important that we look ahead so that hopefully, we can avoid the kind of crisis situations other colleges and universities are presently experiencing or underwent in the recent past."

Sojka will be joined by vice presidents Larry Shinn (academic affairs), Barbara Shailor (student services), and Barry Maxwell (administration) who will each bring the perspective of their zone of financial responsibility to the forum.

This is the first of the "Direction Setting" forums, others will follow although the time table is unclear.

The forum is open to students, faculty, administrators and support staff.

PUBLIC SAFETY LOG

Thursday, February 25

At 6:21 p.m., Public Safety Officers responded to a motor vehicle accident at 7th Street and Moore Avenue intersection. A University student and a visitor to campus were the operators of the vehicles. Moderate damage was sustained to both vehicles. There were no injuries.

Friday, February 26

A University student reported to the Public Safety office of being the victim of harassing phone calls. Investigation is continuing.

Resident of Vedder Hall reported that three males were presently in the building soliciting perfumes. Officers responded and located the individuals, and escorted them from campus.

Saturday, February 27

At 12:21 a.m., a resident of Carey House reported that person(s) unknown had broken a window pane out in her room with a snowball. Window was temporarily patched, until proper repairs can be made.

While on patrol at 12:48 a.m., officers detained a suspicious individual in the Lower Harris parking lot. Upon further speaking with the male, it was observed that the individual was allegedly under the influence of alcohol, and under the legal age of 21 yrs. Subject identified and transported back to his residence.

At 2:15 a.m., officers did recover a keg of beer and a tap from between two parked vehicles on St. George Street. At 11:00 a.m., a student residing off campus reported the theft of the above items to Lewisburg P.D. LPD will conduct the off campus investigation.

Officers responded at 11:48 p.m. to Harris Hall for a reported fire alarm activation. Unknown person(s) did discharge a fire extinguisher for no apparent reason. In addition, a pull station was activated on the ground floor. Investigation continuing.

Sunday, February 28

At 1:58 a.m., a resident of Swartz Hall reported to officers that there were four window panes busted on the 4th floor of A wing, at the end of the hall facing the library. It is unknown when the vandalism occurred.

A resident of Harris Hall reported to Public Safety Officers at 4:05 a.m. that person(s) unknown did vandalize items in his room. Incident occurred between 11:30 p.m. and 3 a.m., this date. Investigation continuing.

Student Security Aide reported to officers of finding a vending machine vandalized at 5:52 a.m. in Swartz Hall. The front glass panel had been smashed, and an undetermined amount of merchandise was removed.

At 6:10 a.m., while cleaning up the glass from the vandalized vending machine in Swartz, a Physical Plant custodian sustained a laceration to his arm. He was transported to Evangelical ER for treatment.

Monday, March 1

At 4:00 p.m., two University students reported being the victims of dog bites in Northumberland County while riding bikes. The Pennsylvania State Police were contacted as well as the dog law officer of jurisdiction who will handle the investigation. Both victims were treated at the SMS and released.

At 6:55 p.m., a University student reported that her car was vandalized while parked in the area between SPE and Chi Phi.

A University student who resides in the Phi Psi house reported that his cassette player was removed from his unlocked room while he was asleep.

At 12:25 p.m., a University student reported that while jogging around the golf course, she noticed a male driving a pick-up truck acting suspicious. Public Safety Officers, as well as the local police were notified and did check the area.

Tuesday, March 2

At 9:33 p.m., Public Safety Officers responded to Smith Hall on the report of an assault in progress. Upon arrival, it was discovered that two roommates had become involved in a confrontation. Investigation continuing.

Library thefts dwindle

BY SARA K. WALKER
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The thefts which had been taking place in the library last month seem to be a thing of the past. Vincent DeCerchio, director of Public Safety, stated that there have not been any in a couple of weeks.

Like any other crimes on campus, the only ones that the community knows about are those which have been reported. DeCerchio, upon checking his records, states that there have been no reported thefts as of late.

Anne de Klerk, library director, reaffirms DeCerchio's statement that no thefts have occurred recently.

De Klerk believes that the significant decrease in thefts is a direct result of cooperation between and among the library staff, campus security, and the student body.

Due to the extra effort on behalf of the students to be more aware and conscientious of their personal property, their belongings are less accessible and, therefore, are less likely to be stolen, said de Klerk.

Jean Auro—The Bucknellian

Unattended bookbags, calculators, and other possessions have been the target of continuing thefts in the library this semester.

The tips that were suggested and posted included bringing only necessary belongings to the library, leaving personal valuables at home, bringing personal items and books when leaving study area, being alert to the belongings of other students, and finally reporting suspicious persons or situations to the library staff or Public Safety.

Communication has been the most effective means to stopping the thefts.

The library staff and campus security posted and sent out notices to students and faculty, which described the problem and encouraged everyone to take certain precautions.

DeCerchio stated that the reason the thefts have presently stopped is because "people were alerted and prepared to take action," therefore, the culprit became scared.

In other words, it takes the responsibility and cooperation of the afflicted, combined with, as stated by DeCerchio, "tipping off the responsible party and letting them know we're on to them."

Academic accreditation is under reviewal process

BY NEIL BARDACH
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The Middle States regional accrediting agency is currently reviewing the University's accreditation through comprehensive self-study. The University undergoes this type of intensive review every ten years.

According to Barbara Shailor, vice president for student services, "There are a number of accrediting agencies throughout the United States, and Middle States is the name of the geographic area where we are located, so they are in charge of our accreditation. If an academic institution is to retain its accreditation, it must be reviewed periodically [by an accrediting agency]." In addition to conducting a major review of the University every ten years, Middle States conducts an interim review every five years.

Members of the Bucknell community, rather than members of the Middle States agency, review the University. "The University conducts what is known as a comprehensive self-study. There are many different kinds of self-studies, and a comprehensive study looks at every part of the University. They look to see what the University is all about, what it says its goals and objectives are. There are many factors that figure into the final report," said Shailor.

Middle States will send an accrediting team to the campus after the internal review. "The accrediting team consists of members of other institutions. They come onto our campus and talk to members of the community before making a final decision," said Shailor.

Middle States, as the University's official accrediting agency, has some influence over the types of programs that are implemented or deleted from the University's curriculum, including such programs as the January Program.

"I think that Middle States, the last two times they reviewed us, back in 1983 and 1988, raised questions as to the January Program's effectiveness," said Shailor.

One the Middle States goals is to encourage innovation and experimentation, and according to Shailor, "If you talk about innovation and experimentation, you see a lot of new and creative things, like the new curriculum in the College of Arts and Sciences. You can't just look at one program; you have to look at everything in a total context. You are going to end some programs and start others over a period of ten years."

Students denied Safe Rides

BY SHANNON SKOPAK
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Heather Jobson—The Bucknellian

Under normal weather conditions, the Office of Public Safety and Delta Delta Delta sorority offer an escort service, but recent inclement weather has prevented some students from getting rides.

During one recent night-time snowstorm a student calling for a Public Safety escort was denied a ride.

Vincent DeCerchio, director of Public Safety, responded to this incident by saying, "we never turn anyone down for a ride, but it was too dangerous and there were too many requests because of the snow."

The incident was not isolated. The recent snow storms have plagued the campus and have prevented Public Safety from granting some requests for escorts. Stories of this nature are not uncommon during sloppy winter nights.

On bad weather nights when travel advisories have been issued for the area, Public Safety has tried to establish the urgency of students request before they grant an escort and has, on occasion, turned down requests.

According to DeCerchio, abuse of the Safe Rides program has become a problem, and not just on cold and snowy nights. DeCerchio remains emphatic in insisting that Safe Rides is not a taxi service, and the "problem with taxiing is that an escort is taken away from someone who needs it. Taking people from party to party isn't the purpose of Safe Rides." Safe Rides are offered for safety, not convenience, he stressed.

Safe Rides is sponsored by the Delta Delta Delta sorority and operates seven days a week after dark, or the tentative hours of 10 p.m. to 2 a.m. on weekdays and from 10 p.m. to 3 a.m. on Friday and Saturday. The boundaries for a safe ride are the area of town between the University, Market Street, and Route 15. An escort will be provided to no more than two individuals from the same origin to the same destination. To prevent abuses of the system, rides from Public Safety will not provide a ride for an individual twice in one night.

One of the current alterations to the Safe Rides program is the employment of work-study student, John Motto '94, to be the coordinator of Safe Rides. The job of the new coordinator is to make sure the program runs more efficiently and to provide better services. Public Safety has been committed this semester to cutting down on abuses and thoroughly training all drivers. Walking escorts will also be provided in addition to vehicle escorts.

DISMISSAL

when their mental and physical capabilities begin to decline, "both students and faculty from time to time might say about a colleague, 'I'm not sure that person has been alive the last 20 years let alone now at the age of 70,' " said Shinn.

According to Shinn, "There will be a few, perhaps, who hang on longer than they should."

Most professors retire before age 70 despite the lack of age limit. Maine, which lifted its teaching age cap ten years ago, has only experienced a one year increase in its professors ages.

Susan Harris '94, a liberal arts major, said, "I think if they're a good enough professor then there shouldn't be an age when they retire."

Martin Booher '95, also a liberal arts major, said, "It should be determined by the person's health."

To safeguard against problematic teaching performances, tenured professors are subject to the merit review process every three years. At that time, the chair of the department looks at student course evaluations and the professor's scholarship.

Bucknell crime levels are above average

BY SARA K. WALKER
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Bucknell University, when compared to other colleges and universities in the surrounding areas, is known as having some of the highest crime statistics. But according to Vincent DeCerchio, director of Public Safety, we may not be hearing the entire story.

Bucknell's statistics are considerably higher than other college campuses "because other schools are not being completely accurate about their crime statistics," he said.

> "[Bucknell's statistics are considerably higher than other college campuses] because other schools are not being completely accurate about their crime statistics."
> —Vincent DeCerchio, Director of Public Safety

DeCerchio stressed that the statistics at Bucknell are accurate, and that the University never tries to disguise the truth. As long as the act is reported, and can be verified that the incident occurred, then it will be reflected in the crime statistics.

The verity of Bucknell's crime statistics, although they may seem high, is beneficial because the statistics paint an accurate picture of life on the campus and its immediate area. Other university and college campuses, according to DeCerchio, portray a false picture and eventually it "comes back to haunt them."

Bucknell, as well as all other colleges and universities in the state, is required to report its crime statistics to the Pennsylvania State Police once a year in accordance to the "Pennsylvania College and University Security Information Act," also known as Act 73. This act went into effect in 1988 and includes all criminal incidents on university owned property. All information is compiled into one book reflecting the criminal and non-criminal acts.

Also, Bucknell is required under the "College and University Right to Know Act" to report its crime statistics to the Federal Government at the end of every calendar year. These reports go directly to the FBI in Washington, D.C. This Public Law 101-542 was passed in November of 1990 and pertains to all colleges and universities in every state, not only Pennsylvania.

Both of the above described laws require that the crime statistics of college campuses be issued to the community. The available statistics include facts from the past three years for comparison purposes.

Applicants can gain knowledge of crime statistics upon request.

The incidents that are reported are classified into three different categories: criminal, non-criminal, and off-campus. The criminal occurrences include those acts which take place on university owned property, as does non-criminal occurrences. The off-campus statistics include happenings that take place on non-university owned property, but which is supervised by the University. Examples of this are incidents which take place in fraternities which are not owned by the University.

Candles held to Bosnians

A worldwide candlelight vigil will be held on Monday, March 8. Bucknell's vigil will be held between 12 a.m. and 1 p.m. on the uphill side of the Langone Center to support the more than 30,000 women and girls of Bosnia who have suffered rape and torture during the civil war there.

To observe International Women's Day, everyone is encouraged to wear a rainbow-colored ribbon to show support for the empowerment of all women regardless of their color, class, religion or nationality.

The vigil is co-sponsored by the Bucknell Women's Resource Center and Susquehanna Valley Women in Transition.

Asians sponsor Ling to speak

Amy Ling, associate professor of English and the director of the Asian American studies program at the University of Wisconsin, Madison, will present the lecture "Creating One's Self: The Eaton Sisters," at 7:30 p.m. in the Langone Center Forum.

The lecture, sponsored by Students for Asian Awareness at Bucknell (SAAB), will explore the boundaries of identity, ethnicity and gender in the works of two Chinese Eurasian sisters as part of the observance of International Women's Day at Bucknell.

Writing center extends hours

By popular demand, the writing tutor has returned to the Mac Lab from 8 p.m. to 11 p.m. on Sundays; there will now also be a tutor available from 7 pm to 10 p.m. on Thursdays in the Roberts Hall Writing Center to accomodate students who live uphill.

Other available hours: 8:30 a.m. to noon and 1 to 4:30 p.m. Monday-Friday in Roberts; 6 to 11 pm Sunday-Thursday in Vedder; 6:30 to 9:30 p.m. Sunday-Thursday in Smith. Drop-ins are welcome, but appointments are appreciated.

Greeks get accolades

The Interfraternity and Panhellenic Councils returned from the Northeast Panhellenic and IFC Conferences on Sunday with several awards.

The 1992 Panhellenic Council received honors for Overall Panhellenic Achievement for their programming.

The IFC returned also with awards for excellence.

Overall, Bucknell's greeks came back with seven awards from such areas as Publications and Academic Excellence.

The three-day conference attracted over 1,000 participants and was held in Stamford, CT.

Off Campus

Pregnancies increasing

Unplanned pregnancies at Colorado College have reached a fifteen year high. According to Nancy Wilsted, women's health care nurse practitioner at the college, "We usually see two to three cases each semester, and this year it has definitely increased." The actual number of unplanned pregnancies is unknown since many women seek assistance and health care from off-campus sources.

Wilstead feels that "we give children more information about driving cars and handling money than we do sex." Many students that she sees have had little or no sex education.

Holy Cross tuition rising

Holy Cross parents have received letters from Rev. John E. Brooks, president of the college, detailing a tuition increase for the 1993-94 academic year.

Tuition will rise to $17,200 and room-and-board costs will rise to $6,300 which raises the total cost for one year of a Holy Cross education to $23,500.

Students are outraged by the increase, and many are concerned that financial aid will not keep up with the rising cost of education. William R. Durgin, Treasurer and Vice President of Business Affairs said last year, "It's just the cost of doing business and this is a business." Durgin refused to comment on this year's increase.

Crime falls at Lehigh

The Lehigh campus crime rate has dropped fourteen percent according to the Uniform Crime Report filed by Pennsylvania. According to the report, theft is the most frequently committed crime at Lehigh.

Vandalism, alcohol offenses and theft constitute seventy percent of crimes, but according to John Smeaton, assistant vice president for student affairs at Lehigh, "If we could reduce the alcohol abuse, we could reduce the criminal activities."

Federal law has required all colleges and universities to report crimes occurring on their campuses to the proper state authorities.

Women, gay enter rush

A small group of women and an openly gay men have decided to participate in rush events at Tufts. The women were welcomed by fraternities to all of the rush events, but were told that they could not receive bids due to the fact that offering women membership would result in the loss of their national charter. The openly gay man is qualified for a bid because there is a non-discriminatory sexual gender policy; he is also a legacy of the fraternity.

According to their press release, the women feel that the fraternity system is "the largest form of institutionalized sex discrimination remaining in the country."

ARTS AND ENTERTAINMENT

African author fosters Black culture

BY ARA METJIAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Although Black History month has passed, there are still many African American events to sample at Bucknell. Since Larry Shinn, vice president for academic affatirs, made the suggestion in May of 1992, the "African Experience" has been in the stages of planning. Consisting of concerts, lectures, dramatic representations of folktales, and art exhibits, the "African Experience" will serve to show the Bucknell community the diversity of cultures. This week, world renowned author and political activist Ngugi wa Thiong'o visited Bucknell to present a lecture and workshop.

Ngugi wa Thiong'o, born in 1938 in Limuru, Kenya, was educated in Makerere University in East Africa. After completing his education there, he continued on to Leeds University in Great Britain. While he was a student, Ngugi wrote novels that often times explored the question of colonial relationships in Kenya. His novels discuss the divisions created by colonialism, Christian missions, and Western education. Some of his works include The River Between, Weep Not Child, A Grain of Wheat, Petals of Blood, and Devil on a Cross.

> "It was revealed to me that night that in this country we should have a factory for manufacturing human parts like mouths, bellies, hearts and so on, spare parts for the human body..."
> —from Devil on A Cross by Ngugi wa Thiong'o

As he developed in his writings, Ngugi began to move his focus towards political and cultural aspects in his home country. His repertoire moved from novels to African forms of expression. This new phase manifested itself during the 1970's and 1980's. His focus then shifted to the rural nature of community theater in Kenya. It was this transition period by which Ngugi was influenced in the most profound way.

Janet Hayes, visiting associate professor of history, said that while Ngugi was working within rural communities in Kenya, he helped the people to develop their own plays.

"Ngugi was challenged by the people as how to portray all that was happening culturally in Kenya, and also to express people's resistance...to the new ruling class in Kenya," said Hayes.

From this opening came a powerful voicing of the peasants and workers. The play I Will Marry When I Want portrayed much "resistance and human action in dynamic ways," according to Hayes, that the government of Kenya banned the play and jailed Ngugi for one year when it was viewed in Nairobi.

In prison Ngugi kept an account of his prison experience and entitled it Detained. The work chronicled the conditions in which he was kept. Said Hayes, "The result of this whole experience was to radicalize Ngugi." Even though there was no trial, or even charges brought against him, Ngugi was practically forced into exile. He escaped to London, then traveled to New York where he has taken up an academic position in the Department of Comparative Literature at the City University of New York.

Recently Ngugi has devoted much of his time to speaking out against imperialism. Many of his recent works are argumentative essays connected with movements to foster African culture. Some of his newer works include Matigari and Decolonizing the Mind.

Despite his exile from his native land, Ngugi has managed to keep in close contact with his people and culture. Through a system of friends and colleagues, he is kept informed as to the changes that are shaping the future of Kenya.

In his visit to campus, Ngugi will present his lecture "Moving the Center: Towards a Pluralism of Cultures" Mar. 4 in the Langone Center Forum. Ngugi also gave a workshop titled "Post-Colonial Politics and Culture" in the faculty lounge this afternoon.

BY MATT FRENCH

When the Tustin Theatre curtain goes up tonight for the opening performance of James Clavell's The Children's Story, it will mark the culmination of a year's work by student director Nina Knoche '93. It will also once again demonstrate the department of theatre and dance's continuing commitment to the full participation of students in all facets of theatre: acting, design, and directing.

The Children's Story, written by author and playwright James Clavell, best known for his book Shogun, is a story of manipulation, impressionability, and youth. In a small town classroom, third graders are faced with the task of understanding the events which have unfolded during the previous two weeks—a bloodless coup in which the government of the United States has been overthrown. The student's teacher is replaced by a government appointed teacher who proceeds to instruct and mold them by methods which border on propaganda, convincing them to cut up the American flag and abandon their thoughts concerning "God and country."

The play, using the facade of innocence and youth, hides a powerful message. Even though Knoche chose to direct this work because of her strong interest in theatre for younger audiences and theatre's use as a teaching tool for children, the underlying messages are decidedly adult.

"In a world in which the occurrence of 'latch-key' kids and 'home alone' scenarios are increasing, the importance of teachers is growing," said Knoche. "Teachers are playing an increasingly significant role in not only the educational, but moral and emotional development of our children. Teachers have been consistently undervalued in our society, and this play demonstrates the power they actually command."

The Children's Story, while originally written with an anti-Communist message, is being interpreted by Knoche with an anti-Neo-Nazi slant, which seems more realistic in the post-Cold War era. It addresses questions such as when should children and students question authority, and what is the reality behind the many messages children are indoctrinated with in modern society. These are questions Knoche hopes to raise by presenting The Children's Story.

Knoche has previously directed a January One Act which she translated from the original Spanish version and a "cocktail," a short one act play done for her sophmore directing class. In addition, she assistant-directed the fall production of The Singular Life of Albert Nobbs with Gary Grant, chair of the department of theatre and dance, and has acted and stage-managed in several other productions. She took on a mainstage production in partial fulfillment of her Honors program.

As with most students hoping to graduate with Honors in their field, Knoche was required to submit a proposal to the department of theatre and dance and to take prerequisite courses in directing. Upon having her proposal approved, she started the long process of trying to find a suitable piece to direct. After reading numerous scripts of plays dealing with children and children's issues, Knoche decided that Clavell's play was the "most exciting, thought-provoking, and entertaining."

Directing The Children's Story has allowed Knoche to work with professional set and costume designers. This has helped her, as a director, to learn to communicate ideas and concepts on the technical side of the production. Since The Children's Story is billed as part of Bucknell's mainstage season, Knoche has been given a budget which has allowed for more extensive props and sets, which she did not have in her previous directing projects.

Knoche, expecting to receive her BA in both Theatre and Spanish in May, has always enjoyed the performing arts. Formerly an International Relations major, Knoche says she is glad she came to Bucknell, and she has enjoyed working with a theatre department which she considers "open-minded, supportive, and flexible."

Presently the president of Bucknell's honorary theatre society Cap & Dagger, Knoche became involved in the theatre as a freshman by attending Cap & Dagger meetings.

Knoche feels the creative process is the most rewarding aspect of the theatre, and she became increasingly involved in theatre at Bucknell because she enjoyed working with "unique, creative individuals who shared her appreciation of the theatre as a valuable form of expression."

Knoche attributes much of her success in directing, which requires open-mindedness and the ability to be flexible and understanding of characters and actors alike, to her parents. She feels that their unwavering support of her choices, most importantly her decision to enter the field of the performing arts, a notoriously risky and financially uncertain profession, and their encouragment has allowed her to grow not only as a director but as a person.

A native of Madison, Wisconsin, Knoche hopes to obtain an internship following graduation, possibly in stage management. After a year or so of work experience, Knoche hopes to enter a three year Master of Fine Arts program, such as the ones offered at Arizona State University or the University of Texas at Austin. Eventually, she hopes to open her own theatre in Baltimore and produce plays, both classical and contemporary, while also directing children's theatre once a season.

In the meantime, Knoche has just finished putting the finishing touches on The Children's Story. After almost a year of planning and research, one can only assume that the production will be as entertaining as it is thought-provoking.

University must open itself up to justice

Five hundred years ago there were no courts of law to adjudicate criminal cases in England. Instead, defendants appeared in The Star Chamber. The small, dark and foreboding room was that way for a reason: judgment was swift, there were no appeals, and the trial was held in total secrecy—no one knew what transpired in the hearing, no one could report to the people whether justice had been done, and therefore, that The Star Chamber meted out justice had to be taken on faith, if at all.

Bucknell has its own Star Chambers and they need to see the light of day, the light of justice.

The University talks out of both sides of its mouth when it comes to openness. Open forums abound to purport the image that everyone is a part of the decision-making process. But when it comes to important issues, decisions that affect us all are made in secrecy; the rationale for such decisions is left behind the closed doors.

What could be more important than maintaining academic integrity at a community premised upon the pursuit of education? As such, cases of academic dishonesty fundamentally effect every one of us. But they are adjudicated behind the closed doors of an academic dean's office. Much else is left behind: concrete cases of what does and does not constitute cheating; the elements of trust and honor in scholarship which make academic honesty such an important issue; and the fact that there are consequences for dishonesty.

The same disciplinary violations that are a matter of public record when committed in town are deliberately covered up by the University. On the one hand, alleged vandals, assailants, and even rapists who are found guilty by the University seem to be protected by this secrecy while the rest of the campus remains ignorant of the risk; however, the accused have the most to lose with secret hearings.

Although the University has apparently revamped the judicial system, no system is immune to the need for public scrutiny which ensures that defendants and victims alike are treated fairly.

The reason that such cases need to be a matter of public record is not so that the offenders will be further punished, although they should be held responsible for their actions. Justice is a public issue.

A judicial system can only work when all people are aware of why it exists and how it functions. When the public is ignorant of the goings-on of justice, it has no basis on which to challenge it; grave flaws in the system can go unchecked, unbeknownst to the people it is designed to protect, and very often, even to the people working within it.

At other universities students challenge decisions because they have information. They fight for justice, they debate not only the "system" but specific cases within it, and in doing so, strengthen the entire community. At Brown, for example, over fifteen students threatened to leave the university due to the suspension of an alleged racist. They care because they know.

The administration of justice effects all of us. Opening our judicial system can only benefit the entire University community: students will be more informed, defendants will be assured of a proper and fair treatment, and the University can rightly glow in the confidence that its decisions are being delivered within a prosperous and healthy community.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Sojka speaks about campus alcohol issues

TO THE EDITOR:

The letter to The Bucknellian last week by Ross Feingold provides an outstanding opportunity to address the issue of drinking on the Bucknell campus. Mr. Feingold, who is in his first year here, is apparently unaware of the rather active involvement of this administration in years past to try to improve the situation on campus with regard to student drinking. Though it is clear that Bucknell, like virtually every other college campus in America, has a problem with underage drinking and abuse of alcohol, significant progress has been made in recent years. The number of incidents of alcohol abuse has been steadily declining; the student body has been, by and large, reacting positively to educational counseling and disciplinary efforts on behalf of the University to improve the situation.

However, I am struck by the irony that the pages of The Bucknellian carried a rather different criticism of the administration just a few years ago. Rather than suggesting that we had been silent or inactive with regard to the drinking problem, we were regularly castigated by letters to the editor and in editorials criticizing the University for "trying to live students' lives for them." I think it is now fairly well understood by all persons who are deeply concerned with the misuse of alcohol on college campuses that the ultimate responsibility lies with the students themselves. We can try to create an atmosphere in which it is difficult for underage persons to gain access to alcohol; we can try to provide an environment which through education, counseling support, and sanctions discourages abusive use of alcohol by persons of any age; but ultimately, students will live their own lives. Many come to us with experience as drinkers and with the expectation that they can continue those practices once they come to college. This is wrong thinking. The need for students to assume greater personal responsibility has been recently noted by the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania when it expressed its view that "it would be inappropriate to impose an in loco parentis duty upon a university." The University cannot do more than seek in reasonable ways to dissuade behavior that is contrary to our State law.

> The number of incidents of alcohol abuse has been steadily declining; the student body has been, by and large, reacting positively to educational counseling and disciplinary efforts on behalf of the University to improve the situation.

Having been a member of both national and state-wide task forces dealing with substance and alcohol abuse on America's college campuses, I am well aware that students face ofttimes overwhelming peer pressure which might lead them to inappropriate activity. In a press conference held on this campus last year, I presented the findings of the Governor's Task Force, of which I was a member, on alcohol abuse on Pennsylvania's campuses. The principal take-home lessons of that report were that our students do know that it is against the law to drink under the age of 21; they are becoming increasingly aware of the legal risks that they take, should they engage in that activity. It is also becoming clear that students still all too frequently abuse alcohol, even though they know that the misuse of any mind or personality altering substance carries with it enormous health, social, and legal risks. We will continue to impress upon our student body the need to be aware of these dangers and to assume their rightful responsibility to live their own lives in an intelligent way.

Again, I thank Mr. Feingold for the opportunity to once again raise this important issue with the Bucknell student body.

Yours truly,
GARY A. SOJKA

Whatever happened to love thy neighbor?

TO THE EDITOR:

It was with great sadness that I read Jason Spiegelman's article, "Evangelists: Leave Me Alone." This article, which appeared in The Bucknellian on Friday, Feb. 26, confirmed many of the concerns I have felt regarding the subject of religious intolerance at Bucknell. At the same time, it sparked feelings of frustration which have become all too familiar to me and others who share and encourage my perspective.

Let it be made clear that the intolerance of those who are not Christian is in fact quite un-Christlike. Christ never instructed the disciples to denegrate other belief systems and lifestyles to recruit followers to Christ. Instead, Christ preached the use of only moral means to gain moral ends.

> Christ never instructed the disciples to denegrate other belief systems and lifestyles to recruit followers to Christ.

Here at Bucknell, I have known literally hundreds of Christians. Many of these individuals equated Christianity with feelings of acceptance and love, but some applied these concepts only to other Christians, and sometimes, only to other Christians of a particular religious sect. Such practices run counter to the teachings of Jesus. Such "exclusive witnessing" is not what Christians are called to do. There are no conditions on the words that tell us to love our neighbor.

And so, I ask a question: What is the Christian community at Bucknell doing if we are not reflecting the values of our LORD?

We Christians are called to love our neighbors. It does not tell us to love our neighbors only to the extent that they are other Christians. The Bible does not dictate that our neighbors must be heterosexual or anti-choice. In fact, the Bible does not teach on the subject of abortion at all. Therefore, one's views on abortion are a matter of personal choice and should never be linked to one's religious faith.

More than anything, let us remember the Bible is over 2000 years old. It is ridiculous for there to be people on this campus that continue to stand against women speaking in church or seeking ordination to the ministry. I have heard some of these same individuals try to explain why women should not have voting rights or the right to hold elected office. Let us recognize a need to move beyond such patriarchal thinking and not let our religious practices and beliefs become a way of furthering women's oppression. We should not assume God is male when we have no actual proof of God's appearance, and we do instead have records of there existing before Christ a woman-centered culture.

Finally, let the biblical quote emblazoned on the side of Rooke Chapel remind us all what it is that the Lord requires of a Christian and focus from this day forward to "do justice," "love mercy," and "walk humbly with our God." My prayer for this campus is that before we say we act in the name of our God, we take time to consider the values Jesus would want us to emulate. I believe what is required of a Christian is very clear, and those requirements call not for condemnation but for a true love.

Respectfully,
CARY E. CHAMPLIN '94

Eschinger will be missed

TO THE EDITOR:

The front-page story about the resignation of Jon Eschinger as Director of Computer Services was distressing to me and to others who value Jon's 20 years of service to Bucknell. The facts about the new management seem to be in order. It is the opinions expressed by two students with a very time-limited view that I find to be unfair and wrong. Many faculty, administrative staff, support staff, and students have worked with Jon over the last 20 years; to quote the opinion of a '92 graduate and a current student as the overall campus impression of Jon's service is ludicrous. Perhaps there was more information in the missing end of the story, but what is presented is inadequate. It is also my experience that David Murray's self-definition as an expert is often in conflict with the facts.

Computer Services is tasked with a thankless job of satisfying an insatiable ap-

Clinton student-service plan needs some work

BY THE CURRENT ISSUES THEME HALL

On Monday, Mar. 1, President Clinton laid out, to an enthusiastic crowd of Rutgers students, his plan to revamp the federal college loan process, a proposal which has been much anticipated since his announcement of such a program early in his campaign.

Many liberals cannot wait for the proposal to breeze through Congress; they see it as a monumental program which will do for the nation what the Peace Corps has done for the world. (Not coincidentally, 32 years ago Clinton's mentor President Kennedy created the Peace Corps.)

Here is how Clinton envisions the program: the Government would pay for the education of students desiring a college degree but lacking the necessary funds. In return, the graduates would repay the Government in the form of public service (or can opt to pay back the loan by deducting a percentage of their incomes). Clinton's hope is that such a program would encourage graduates to enter much needed low-paying positions throughout the country, such as teaching and public health.

What a great idea...on the surface. In typical Clintonesque style, our idealistic President has failed to offer specifics as to where he will get the money to pay for the program (which he projects to cost $7.4 billion by 1997), nor has he announced what precisely this new corps of workers would do.

Perhaps they would build houses with Jimmy Carter, or maybe they would teach the illiterate to read, but what happens down the road when the government is force-feeding 25,000 new bureaucrats into the system annually? After four years of college, the Government will be obligated to find jobs for these people.

Do we need this many "helpers" (statistics show that 90 million Americans already volunteer their time without Government prodding), and perhaps more importantly, what will happen to the millions of current bureaucrats who are still nailed into their deskchairs? At least he has Hillary finding a way to pay for their health benefits.

With the announcement of President Clinton's new work-service proposal, we believe that the students of this campus should take the time to consider the varying options that will enable students to work off their education. This proposal results from the current failure of the federal system of student loans. The default rates on these loans is astronomical and a severe drain to the funds accrued from the taxpayers.

On Mar. 1, USA Today stated that there are currently five million students, out of fourteen million overall, who are receiving federal assistance. Roughly 70% of those students receiving aid will default on their loans. In light of these circumstances, we feel that Clinton's proposal is a necessary first step in establishing a system that will accommodate all individuals who seek higher education and cannot afford to pay for it; however, there are several pitfalls that we strongly believe must be carefully avoided.

Clinton has stated that this summer 1,000 students will be accommodated for the summer's pilot project; growing to 25,000 next year. It is projected that 100,000 students will be accommodated by 1997. The number 100,000 pales severely in comparison to the five million who actually receive aid. This suggests that job opportunity and funding will be among the most severe pitfalls of the plan.

Further, there has been some speculation as to whether or not public service should become mandatory for all students, regardless of whether or not they can afford to pay for their education. It does not appear as if this part of the package will ever become effective because there simply aren't enough career placement opportunities; however, the majority consensus here seems to favor a plan that will not make public service mandatory. After all, isn't the American way to be able to choose where you will be educated and how you will pay for this luxury?

We do not believe that any drastic new entitlement programs should rely on deficit spending as its means of support. Along those lines, we do not feel that defense spending should be cut to bare bones in order to accommodate this plan. Rather, we would suggest that funding for the public-service proposal should come from unnecessary bureaucracy spending. Congress should carve its useless pork programs from the federal budget and use savings here for a much more important cause: ensuring that every American will have the opportunity to attend college, should he/she desire to do so.

Overall, we like the plan, as long as it stays within the guidelines that we have established. It is nice to know that our President is making strides to improve a failing federal loan system. We can only hope that the plan is successful, or it will mean another wasted continuum of tax and spend.

Savor life in the Bucknell Bubble!

BY JOSH DEWALD

So you think the "Bucknell Bubble" hinders us? It kills some of the value of Bucknell as a quality institution? You say we're choking on the bubble mixture and missing part of that valuable college experience—detached from the real world? The bubble is suffocating us!!! Well, I say you're wrong, and I submit that we had all better enjoy the bubble while we have it to hide beneath.

Just look at all the positive conveniences the bubble affords us, actually facilitating our learning as students. It eliminates outside distractions, it allows us to remain focused and concentrated on our goals and the task at hand, and it provides an excellent educational environment for faculty, administrators, and students alike. I admit that at times this may be undesirable—you'd love to run off into the city or a nearby bar and forget college, and so would I. But in the end we all have to admit that the bubble keeps us more on track than out of touch.

We have newspapers, we have television, we have cars, a bus system, nearby trains, and telephones; how "isolated" from the outside world are we? It's not that difficult to stay in touch and informed, if that's what you desire. In fact, I'd even go as far as to suggest that the bubble presents us with an ideal situation in our dealings with the so called "real world." There are many people who would maim others for the position of being able to tune in or tune out the relevant world around them at will. We are some of the few who, for four years, have the luxury of doing so.

Just look at how much of the "real world" we really are missing, or how much we'd really like to be subjected to anyway; I'd suspect it's not much on either count. I think that once we step out there we'll find that a lot of it isn't as wonderful as we'd hoped. There will no longer be an environment in which it is easy to apply yourself, relatively easy to manage stress, or easy to detach oneself from the rat race for awhile. Assuming that we live the average American life span, we'll have approximately 53 good years of the outside world to roll around in, perhaps more than enough in some cases.

I'll be the first to admit that there are some things missing, but the overall product is an excellent learning environment, a living situation that's relatively safe and conducive to an education, and a very fine university.

Even the lack of diversity isn't that big of a deal. We know this campus is not a viable cross-section of America, but supposedly the University is working on that, so let's give them a chance before we begin to complain.

It's easy enough to leave campus for awhile if the bubble occasionally gets stifling, and ten or twenty years from now I think we'll all look back and relish the thought of our four years at the "country club."

ANALYZING HELL

Hell. It's a hot place. Even in the winter. It's a place echoing with violent shouts and piercing screams. A place where there are rats, pigs, and elaphe guttata guttata snakes named Nietzsche (after the German philosopher). Wait. I'm sorry, those are just the Bucknell dorms. Hell is really much, much worse. But what exactly goes on there? What are we missing as we hide up here on earth? And how do you get there from here? Do they show movies on the flight? Is there a non-smoking section, so to speak? Can you get kosher meals? Yes, we all have numerous pressing anxieties about the afterlife—but most of them revolve around one simple question: "How much can I get away with up here on earth and still be safe?"

Frankly, I think the blunt answer to this question is a bit scary. In fact, it's so scary that many of us are forced to repress our earthly actions simply out of fear—which is no fun for anyone. I know for me personally, every time that nagging urge to mutilate someone and have some real excitement crops up, there's always that little voice in the back of mind. Thou shall not kill...you'll go to hell!...you'll go to hell, my friend... it chants to the tune of "We Are The World." And most of the time, I put down my chain-saw and heed the warning. Any good Pavlovian subject would do the same.

Unfortunately, according to Christians in Action, my restraint will still do me no real good. Because of my religion, I have no choice in the sensitive matter of my postmortem residency—no choice at all. And that's just not fair. Because, when it comes to hell, I'm very pro-choice. P. C. for short. And aren't all P. C. people supposed to go to heaven—even the ones that write didactic letters to the editor about sexist columns? I mean, I could spend half my time putting Nilla wafers under my tongue and plastering phallic looking fish all over campus or whatever a non-hell-goer is supposed to do. But actually, as a self-indulgent writer, I have more fun putting smokey dressing on salad and consequently creating columns with chain-saw allusions and C allitterations that could be forwarded directly to the psychological services office for some interesting results...

He hints of Nietzsche and mass mutilation AND he likes his carrots raw. What could it possibly mean?

Hmmmm. Sounds like back in third grade his Autonomy vs. Oedipal stage was rendered latent by a repressed archetypal Skinner box filled with fluffy electric-shocking bunnies which forced him to write narcissistic drool whenever the bell was rung and thus the dreams of foiling the Joker with absolutely no help from Robin were only a defense mechanism for a need to absorb the Laffer curve with a wrinkled napkin and without raising taxes. Holy Hell, you're right! It's all so clear now.

Of course, in third grade I thought that you would only get sent down there if you were "evil." And that seemed perfectly appropriate. Because, back then, evil was easy to define. Basically, it was anything that made you pout or cry or lose your turn. But when Derek Khan beamed me too hard with the big red rubber ball in Spot Dodge, and I loudly sentenced him to eternal damnation, and he started crying, Miss Porter put me on the sidelines. And so, because of Derek Khan and Miss Porter, I missed an entire period of my favorite game. The experience mentally scarred me for life. But at least I have the satisfaction of know-

Military gay ban is blatant discrimination

TO THE EDITOR:

I would like to applaud the balance on the Editorial page in the Feb. 12 issue. Despite the ignorance of many readers, I would applaud Jeff Stern's creative satire which implied that the justifications for excluding homosexuals from the military are brainless. It is unfortunate that educated people no longer understand or appreciate satire. Perhaps the ignorant should be fed the flesh of young Irish babies by their English professors. While I have enjoyed the weekly debate over the issue, I feel compelled to address the substantive arguments surrounding the military's ban on homosexuals.

The military's ban on homosexuals has been defended as part of the military's larger policy to prevent sexual misconduct. Misconduct is intolerable, but the Uniform Code of Military Justice already provides strict punishment for those who act inappropriately, whether they be heterosexual or homosexual.

Colin Powell, in particular, defends the Department of Defense's policy on the grounds that relationships might develop which would compromise the integrity of fighting units. Powell admits, however, that there are already homosexuals serving in the military. Nonetheless, he asserts that if servicemen can be openly gay, they will find one another with greater ease, and therefore, there will be a greater likelihood that relationships will form. This assumes that homosexuals will come out if the ban is lifted. Admittedly, some will, but given the current attitude toward homosexuality in the armed services, most will not. Furthermore, relationships within small combat units could be dealt with by strict punishment or even voluntary transfers. Again, it is the misconduct which must be dealt with, not the presumption of misconduct based upon sexual orientation. It boggles the mind how Colin Powell remains calm in the face of the Tailhook scandal and then come unglued when President Clinton suggests lifting the ban on homosexuals.

Perhaps the most ludicrous argument is that soldiers have to shower together, and therefore, it would violate some sense of privacy to force heterosexuals to shower with homosexuals. Of course, even proponents of this argument are forced to concede that homosexuals are already present in the armed forces. Males in particular have retorted that showering with openly gay men would make them uncomfortable. The argument seems to be that ignorance is bliss. If heterosexual soldiers consider homosexuals to be a threat, wouldn't they really prefer to know the source of the threat?

Others who support the status quo suggest that homosexuals can serve their country, so long as they keep quiet about their orientation. Many of those who have been discharged from the military attempted to do just that. Every branch, particularly the NIS, has enforced the policy vigilantly, prying into the private lives of servicemen and women. From 1974 to 1983, the military discharged 14,311 men and women with charges of homosexuality. Over this ten-year period, the military spent at least $180 million of taxpayers' money to train, investigate, try, and then discharge these individuals. This is quite a price tag to get rid of individuals which the DOD's PERSEREC report noted performed their duties "as well or better" than their heterosexual counterparts.

> The arguments in support of the ban are nothing more than a front for the underlying feeling that "your kind are not welcome here."

In the past the courts have refused to hear any cases dealing with the DOD's policies. Recently, however, the Ninth Circuit heard one such case and concluded that the DOD lacked any logical basis for excluding homosexuals as a class.

All the repercussions aside, the military's ban on homosexuals is blatant discrimination which should not be tolerated in a society which prides itself on individual civil liberties and equality. As President Clinton has recognized, it is a matter of principle. The military is the last branch of the federal government which terminates employees solely on the basis of sexual orientation.

The military used these same arguments to discriminate against African-Americans and women before members of those groups were successfully integrated into the services. In the case of homosexuals, they already have a track record of serving this country.

The arguments in support of the ban are nothing more than a front for the underlying feeling that "your kind are not welcome here." The bottom line is that DOD Directive 1332.14 is antiquated, discriminatory, and unjustifiable; it's time for a change.

I would urge interested Bucknellians, regardless of their position, to send a brief note to their representatives on Capitol Hill before the July vote. This is still a democracy, which does not tolerate tyranny by the military. It remains to be seen if, as Americans, we will tolerate tyranny by the majority.

Multicultural experiences create new thinking

TO THE EDITOR:

This past month I've been attending the Bucknell Bison basketball games in Davis Gym. Before each game started, an African-American woman would proceed to sing what I later found out was the Afro-American National Anthem. After all, this is Black History Month, so what is the big deal with this? In fact, I think it is great when any race wants to celebrate their history, especially when I've never truly been taught about it in my formal education. Whether it be a song, lecture, or article in The Bucknellian, I think it is extremely important to be constantly discovering things around you.

However, the word I'm hearing around some people is, "Why are they singling themselves out? I mean, why don't we just go ahead and sing the Irish National Anthem and the Italian National Anthem? My forefathers struggled in this country too when they came over. Why can't we have our own history month to talk about how we've been oppressed?"

I say, "Then go ahead and do it. I'd listen to your history." Then they tell me, "It's not important. We're all Americans anyway." Well, let me say that there are many people in this country who don't feel a part of this so-called American Dream to which many of us at Bucknell feel everyone has had an equal opportunity. I think that if we opened our minds and looked back into history, we would find out why certain groups, such as the African-Americans, want to speak about what happened. For if we have no knowledge of our history, how will we ever solve the problems of today which originated yesterday?

I think the problem is not that we are ignorant, but that through our education, very few of us are taught how to think. Most of us just repeat what we have read in books, or what we have heard from somebody else, and thus our thinking is the outcome of our very limited experience.

Students here have experiences of seeing different cultures by going abroad, dealing with the many emotions of a death in the family, or simply watching the sunset in the early spring evening. All of these experiences are inside of us, but are we sensitive enough to allow them to really sink in and ripen?

It is only through this sensitivity towards everything around us that there is a different kind of thinking—a thinking which is not limited by our conditioning in life. We are all raised in different families from different areas and are educated in all kinds of different beliefs. Therefore, when we have an experience, we tend to see it through our conditioning, whether it be liberal, conservative, socialist, or some kind of religious faith. So by holding firmly to one set of beliefs or another, we're only looking at things through our particular prejudice or tradition. We'll never have any contact with reality or what truly is.

Instead of trying to open our minds to something we don't understand, we'll usually wind up criticizing it. The moment we do this, we position a barrier between the possible relationship. But, if we just observe, then I think we all would be amazed how much better our relationships would become.

So the next time we see something we may not know about, let's just try to observe alertly and keenly. Allow it to sink in and ripen. I believe we will then find our thinking will become astonishingly more acute. We would then be learning all the time. Black History Month is now over. How many of us can say that we learned anything?

petite for assistance and equipment from an ever-growing community of users. No, they don't always please everyone and there are some vocal critics, but my experiences, as a computer science professor, heavy user of computer labs, and avid Macintosh and Sun workstation user, have been overwhelmingly positive. Sessions are regularly held to solicit user input; how many students who think there are problems took the time to attend them? Limited resources and rapidly changing technology make Computer Services' job difficult, as do users who think that their personal problem is more important than everyone else's. The provision for campus-wide server-based Macintosh software, and student e-mail and Internet access, attest to the desire to provide support and success of the support given. The strong cadre of good student assistance also shows a concern for the user. The positive, cooperative attitude of the entire Computer Services staff is a reflection of Jon, his personality, and his leadership style. Apparently differences with the administration have led to his resignation. It's a tough job. I wish the new management well, but especially I wish Jon Eschinger the thanks and respect he deserves.

P.O.W.E.R. apologizes to those hurt, but will continue speaking out

TO THE EDITOR:

To all the women of Bucknell:

We, the members of P.O.W.E.R., would like to address some of the questions we have heard concerning the rape statistics and effigy we placed in the academic quad last semester. Our intent was by no means to make survivors of sexual assault relive their painful experiences, and we apologize to any women who may have been hurt by the sight of the effigy.

We want to work towards the safety of all women and respect the views and feelings of women who have suffered from men's actions in the past. We understand that some women may prefer to deal with such experiences privately. However, we as a group feel the need to focus attention on the reality of rape and other sexual abuse and to publicly express our rage. We encourage women to join committees of the Women's Resource Center, Feminist Outreach, or other women's organizations in order to make their voices heard in ways in which they feel comfortable.

> Perhaps another apology should come from the individual(s) who mutilated the effigy, tearing her limb from limb and displacing her body parts in the bushes. The violence of these actions is no joke...

Perhaps another apology should come from the individual(s) who mutilated the effigy, tearing her limb from limb and displacing her body parts in the bushes. The violence of these actions is no joke; it is directly representative of the objectification and abuse women face daily. The perpetrators of crimes against women are the true sources of women's pain.

One of P.O.W.E.R.'s goals is to promote awareness of important women's issues and to vocalize the need for, and demand, change. Men must understand that it has never been appropriate to rape, attack, or harass women. It is in the face of the staggering apathy and lack of accountability among men concerning violence against women, as well as the pervasiveness of the violence itself, that we choose radical means of breaking the silence. We believe that enforced silence is a facet of the oppression of women, and that speaking out is part of the revolution against our oppression.

ing that the two of them will burn together.

Nowadays though, evil has gotten more difficult to define. Dr. Scott Peck, psychologist and Christian author of the spiritually affirming book The Road Less Travelled, tends to think that evil people are the ones who wish to kill, injure, or impede other life-forms in some way, shape, or form. Evil people might do this partly for self-gain and partly for self-satisfaction. So therefore, if a writer manages to convince people that his prosaic, sentimental book filled with religious dogma and pop psychological jargon, chastened with the title of a frequently misinterpreted Robert Frost poem, and given the price tag of a convertible BMW is helpful to them, he'll be on his way to that big Spot Dodge court in the sky. Because, brothers and sisters, he had the transcendent power that comes with faith and he BE-LIE-VED!!! No need to analyze or scrutinize his actions and motivations. No need to ask him how he prefers his carrots, or if he dreams about falling, or if he tucks to the left or right...he helped people!

But what about the pilots who crusaded into the Gulf and dropped bombs for our country? What was on their minds? Do they get special consideration? Even the ones that inadvertently killed...our boys? What about the reporters who wrote headlines like "Kickin' Ass?" Or the millions of Americans who switched from MTV to CNN so we could watch the Terminator II special effects which rivaled even the Bud Bowl in technological innovation? And what about football itself for that matter? Where does it stand on God's score card? Suddenly things seem to be getting muddled. Everyone knows that religion should be simple and easy, black and white—something the masses can understand and BE-LIE-VE in. We all need something to believe in...to hold onto through thick and thin...to give us release and tranquillity in times of need. Hence the theory of "penis envy." And along these same pointed lines, perhaps it all boils down to one simple question. If we munched as we watched the big game (a habit many Americans enjoy), did we eat carrots or Nilla wafers?

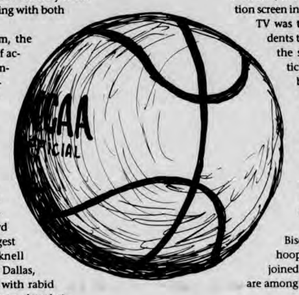
Where was the OSA for basketball game?

TO THE EDITOR:

Two issues were dominant in last week's news coverage: the chaos surrounding basketball ticket distribution and the prevalence of alcohol on campus. The handling of the campus broadcast of the Holy Cross game showed the usual total ignorance in coping with both problems.

In an effort to combat the latter problem, the University has diverted increasing amounts of activities money to "alternative social programming," i.e. coming up with interesting activities to keep students from drinking; increasingly this money is being taken from other very worthy purposes. As usual, though, the Office of Student Activities (OSA) and the Bison Programming Committee (BPC) wouldn't know an actual alternative student activity if it ran over them, as it did last week.

Since most students desiring basketball tickets were denied, one would think that Student Activities would prepare for the crowd shut out of Davis for the Breakin' Bison's biggest game since 1989. In that last game, Bucknell played Syracuse in the NCAA Tournament in Dallas, and the Langone Center Forum was packed with rabid Bison fans watching the satellite feed on campus closed-circuit. (It was even better than being there, as cavernous Reunion Arena was sparsely filled for the game.) I was not disappointed about being without a ticket Saturday, as I fully expected the same atmosphere this weekend.



However, the Forum was locked Saturday, and the projection screen in the Bison was not even set up. The big screen TV was turned on the game, but far too many students tried in vain to jockey for position in front of the screen in a scene reminiscent of Monday's ticket distribution. The BPC can put down the big screen for A Different World each week, but not for the biggest campus event of the year. The OSA can spend money to bring in comedians who have bombed on several cable networks, but they can't pay someone to unlock the Forum and turn on the television. Of course, why would they want to orchestrate an event which will actually unite the campus and allow people to have fun together without alcohol?

After another strong season the Breakin' Bison are poised to make the big boys in college hoops take note, but the OSA and the BPC have joined the Athletic Department in proving that they are among the not-ready-for-prime-time players.

Pro-life, pro-choice—both sides are wrong

BY ANDREW COHEN
Bucknellian Columnist

The propaganda is strewn across the campus. Everywhere we look we see the pro-life/pro-choice debate played out. And one fact keeps smacking me in the face: they are both wrong.

The whole approach to the debate has, as so often in American politics, totally ignored the root cause—there are far too many unwanted pregnancies in our country.

> The whole approach to the debate has...totally ignored the root cause—there are far too many unwanted pregnancies in our country.

We see posters decrying the fact that 69% of all abortions are for economic reasons. If the pro-lifers are so adamant about ending abortions, why not divert some of the money from your political action committees and use it to stop abortion for real: pay a woman's salary for the work-time she loses during pregnancy and finding a new job; pay for the child's food and medical expenses; and maybe, even pay to change the social system so that everyone has the means to support a child.

Pro-choicers, on the other hand, might well divert some of their money to make effective contraception available to everyone as well as getting educational programs to those who may need them.

These changes will not end the problem or the conflict, but both groups, if they are so committed, might forget their political differences and work toward something that both would be happy with—eliminating the need for abortion.

This means that things will have to change, and both groups may have to make ideological compromises, such as working toward a common goal and, in the case of those with strong religious beliefs, realizing that contraception may be the lesser of the two evils involved. Both groups need to put their money where their mouths are.

Incidentally, why does each group persist in not recognizing what the other wants to be called? On the one hand we have pro- and anti-life, and on the other, pro- and anti-choice. We call other groups in society, such as African-Americans, by what they want to be called. So let each name itself. Pro-life and pro-choice, you are both wrong.

Part one: A look at the new, improved caf

Responses to student suggestions for the cafeteria address thought-provoking and informative issues facing the new director

BY MARC HAIMES
Bucknellian Staff Writer

An exclusive mid-day interview with Tim Tenon, the new acting head of dining services, was a culinary correspondent's dream come true. It was also a silver opportunity to sample some of those new caf ice cream flavors and get the triple scoop on Hank's absence, Wood's presence, and all of the sudden changes.

Yes, the virtual buffet of change has effected all Langone Center diners in one way or another—whether it be the roving Bison salad bar, the mysterious "closing" and "re-opening" of the Galliker iced tea distributors, or this bizarre new bulletin board currently adorning the wall of the caf's downhill cloakroom...

The new caf features a variety of food stations fit to please any taste.

I was a few minutes early, so I took a moment to examine the colorful display. Stapled to the board were dozens of specially printed student feedback (so to speak) cards, baring scribbled suggestions from assorted caf and Bison diners. Under each card was a personal response signed by Tim Tenon himself. Curiosity aroused, I squinted through the glass.

"Chicken tenders are so-o-o-o yummy!" one student's card declared. "Can you make them available daily?"

Mr. Tenon's response was courteous and straightforward. It stated that "We cannot have them available every day, however we will have them available more frequently."

Another feedback card was slightly more belligerent than the chicken tender person's. "Hello, cafe!" someone had scrawled. "4 juice machines. Same red stuff in each one. Hey, what's the deal here? Variety anyone?" It was signed anonymously and somewhat ominously, "Thirsty in Lewisburg."

Mr. Tenon showed no signs of intimidation. "Our fault. Product did not come in from the warehouse in time. This should have been corrected by the time you have seen this."

The complaints continued, ranging from "Rice Crispy Treats stink" to "Pasta too mushy," but the replies were all similar. Mr. Tenon's detailed comments showed a genuine eagerness for student "concerns" and a willingness for any and all change. The acting head of dining services quickly identified the source of a particular complaint and promptly explained how things would be corrected.

Even the touchier matters were handled with sensitivity. When one student imputed that, "Every time I see [specific cafe worker] she crosses her eyes and lifts up her shirt," the response was reassuring and affirming.

"She must like you as not everyone gets this service and treatment."

As I finished scanning down the columns of student gripes and praises, one card, a card with only four bold faced words, caught my eye.

"I'LL BE BACK—HANK"

Although Tim's response was unsigned, the handwriting was a match. "Hank—You are always welcome here! P.S. Breakfast price= 4.20, Lunch=5.25, Dinner=6.50. Cash gladly accepted."

On that note, I turned towards the dining service office area, unsure of what I had gotten myself into.

Upon entering Tim's outer office, the new manager was easy to locate (not that his appearance was particularly extravagant). Tall and trim, he wore sensible rounded glasses, straight-laced shoes, a snug brown blazer, a neat black beard (flecked with gray), two pens in one starched shirt pocket, and rings around two of ten fingers. Yet, it was the air of calm efficiency, the quiet control that cued me to his status within the ranks of dining services. As I first observed him, he was speaking frankly to a nodding student. Above his head, a number of brimming clipboards hung from the wall. On the cover page of one of them was a single word: BAGELS. An entire clipboard devoted to bagels. I was suitably impressed.

When he spotted me staring from the doorway, Tim offered a smile and held up a finger in the "one minute" gesture. Fifty-eight seconds later, we stepped into his inner office. He motioned for me to have a seat and then tugged out the chair behind his own ascetic desk. He was preparing to be interviewed in his office! I had to think quickly if I was going to get that free ice cream.

The caf suggestion board is just one way Tim Tenon hopes to include students in the ongoing changes.

"I figured you could show me around the new caf set up and we could chat over lunch," I suggested subtly. Tim Tenon, the man who had informed "Hank" that his "Cash [was] gladly accepted," readily agreed.

As we entered the caf through the kitchen, avoiding the register person, I mentioned to Tim that I was rather hungry. I had worked up quite an appetite in my Tuesday morning dance class.

Perhaps Tim had perused my past columns in preparation for this interview or maybe he was just skeptical about the idea of a male in a dance class, because he glanced strangely at me, probably hoping for a giveaway smile.

There was none.

And after we established that I was, in fact, "serious," we quickly changed the subject, moving on to the meat and potatoes of the new dining service.

Browsing through the various stations, Tim gave me the run down on a few of the immediate changes. Some were obvious, like the new stir fry area, where, according to Tim, students could be "creative." Other transitions were more subtle. For example, as we wandered by "Grills and Frills" Tim pointed out that the steak sandwiches now used real beef instead of the processed steak-um of cafeteria past. As if to make his point, Tim requested a steak sandwich along with a heaping portion of cheese fries and helped himself to a small bowl of Dutchess soup. Still feeling a bit insecure about the reaction to my dance class endeavor, I passed up the quiche and ordered the same.

After deciding to go up later for the ice cream, we made our way to the back of the caf where I got ready to ask all my tough questions—to get all the juicy caf gossip. As I readied my mental agenda, I barely noticed I was biting into my sandwich until BANG... FLAVOR!!! More than flavor, it was delicious, fantastic. Definitely the best steak sandwich I've ever had at Bucknell, probably the best meal I've ever had at Bucknell. I took another bite of the sandwich. Still great. And then a bite of a steaming cheese fry. Incredible! The unthinkable was happening. The final product, the thing that really mattered, had noticeably improved. However, my guard did not remain lowered. There were questions to be asked, rumors to be clarified, and scoops of ice cream to sample. So I put down the mouthwatering, non-processed treat and began.

Part Two of Marc Haimes' lunch with Tim Tenon will appear in next week's Features section.

A day in the life of a caf worker

An inside glimpse of Dining Room Assistant Donna Funk

BY COLLEEN RUSH
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The cafeteria may have undergone some major changes over the last month, but the familiar faces that greet students as they are served remain the same. Dining Room Assistant Donna Funk is just one of the many cafeteria workers who ensure the smooth operations of serving approximately 1370 students.

A native of Sharon, PA, Funk moved to the Lewisburg area in the 1970's. In 1988, Funk began work at Bucknell performing secretarial duties in the Administrative Office. Later, she moved to the cafeteria, and has not left since.

Funk's average day starts at around 11 a.m. when she arrives at the cafeteria for the lunch shift. As a dining room assistant, she is responsible for putting out the registers before each meal. Funk also helps to set out the food for each individual station, as well as assign each worker to the particular station in which they will work.

While Funk does not have a food station that she prefers, she said that the Belgian waffle station is probably the easiest to attend because it requires less work. Hesitant to designate her favorite station, Funk said, "It's all the same really. You're still working."

Overall, Funk said the most positive aspect of working in the cafeteria is the atmosphere. "I enjoy the students and I like working with them. I like communicating with people," Funk said, "We joke around a lot too, so everything is not so serious all the time."

The down side of working in the caf, said Funk, is having to watch over and correct students when they break the rules. The biggest problem, Funk noted, is students taking food out of the cafeteria. "We have to control the outflow of food," said Funk, "because if a student takes a sandwich or food item out [of the caf], and it spoils and they still eat it, we could get the blame for that student getting sick."

Another unfavorable part of the job is reprimanding students who sneak into the outside doors of the cafeteria. "I don't like playing police woman," said Funk. "I feel like a meanie when students put me into the position of having to turn them away."

Donna Funk watches a student at the stir fry bar.

In reference to the tremendous changes that have occurred in the caf over the last month, Funk said that the improvements were astounding. "The food is 100% better, the variety is overwhelming and the amount of food waste going out of here has decreased," said Funk.

From the outside, the caf may appear to be a relatively calm place, but Funk recalls a few occasions when things got a bit weird. Remembering an evening when the lights went out in the caf, Funk said, "It got really dark in here because it was so dark outside. We had to get candles out for the entire place."

Funk recalled another occasion from a few years ago when a student wore his roller skates to dinner. "He roller skated to get his food and all around the cafeteria. He was very different," Funk said.

Hi-Ho, Hi-Ho, it's off to play we go

BY KRISTINA SCHURR
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The interests of the 26 current theme halls are very diverse. The various hall interests range from environmental and social issues, to health and fitness, to fine art appreciation. One hall, however, provides its residents with an opportunity for both community service as well as fun and games with children.

Swartz 4-C is home to a unique group of women. Their hall theme works in conjunction with the Cooperative Nursery School on the corner of St. Louis and Third Street in Lewisburg. Three days per week, two hours each time, the women take turns volunteering at the nursery school. Besides helping with the pre-schoolers, these students also help to organize and prepare materials for the childrens' activities.

Because the women of 4-C have almost a full hall which participates in the program, this project does not monopolize the students' time. They help at the nursery school on Tuesdays, Thursdays and Fridays, rotating the days that each woman goes so that their volunteer times per person is only about two or three days per semester. "Working with the children and their parents has been such a good experience," said one of the two coordinators of the theme hall, Joanne Lewis,'95. "I think our theme hall has been successful in that we are providing people with some benefit, as well as getting outside of Bucknell and into the town of Lewisburg.

Interestingly enough, not all of the women who live on this hall are elementary education majors. Their studies run the gamut between engineering majors, biology, chemistry, physics, etc. "It's not a common major which we share, but rather just a common interest in children, as well as their well-being," said Lewis.

The Cooperative Nursery School, which has been in existence for about ten years, is run mainly on a volunteer basis. One full-time employee, Michelle Cowher, operates the program; childrens' parents help out on a rotating basis. Said Cowher, "Having the students come to help us has definitely been an asset to our program. It's so nice to have an extra person because we can always use as many hands as possible."

Located in an upstairs part of the Lutheran Curch, the nursery school provides a useful service for the residents of Lewisburg. Said Marsha Tarves, one of the volunteer mothers, "This kind of cooperative nursery school is so beneficial because the children are able to interact with others their own age, as well as develop the social skills necessary for kindergarten."

For more information about how you can plan ahead for a theme hall, contact the Office of Residential Life.

Name that theme hall

BY KRISTINA SCHURR
Bucknellian Staff Writer

For many first-year students unsure about their living arrangements for the coming year, theme halls provide an interesting alternative to the room lottery system. Theme halls are block-booked upper-class residence halls which center around a common interest of the residents.

These theme halls provide residents with an opportunity to plan living arrangements with friends well in advance of their would-be lottery pick, as well as tie the residents together with a common purpose for achieving theme-related goals.

This fall will mark the third year of theme halls at Bucknell. Said Kari Messing, Associate Director for Residential Life, "During the first year that theme halls were in effect, the Office of Res Life didn't have much accountability for their progress. That is, we didn't keep specific records of their programs. And on the students' part, I don't think they really understood the concept of theme halls."

Last year, increased requirements were asked of theme hall members, such as a mid-semester evaluation of the group's efforts by the Office of Residential Life. Via these evaluations, the groups could reassess the goals which they had set forth in their theme hall proposal, as well as examine the different approaches by which they could achieve these goals.

"With regard to whether the residents on these halls have met their goals," said Messing, "I believe that this past year has been pretty successful. I'm really happy that many floors successfully achieved the goals which they had set for themselves."

Messing also noted that the theme halls which were most successful in achieving their goals were those which were situated on traditional residence halls, such as those in Swartz and Roberts. "It seems that the hall environment is more conducive to good group interaction than are the living arrangements of Bucknell West." As of now, all theme halls for next year will be located in Swartz.

Jason Snyder, '95, one of the coordinators for the Social and Environmental Issues Hall in Swartz, said, "While we haven't met every goal we had set, we made great efforts throughout the year to accomplish most of them." Some projects which this hall has undertaken include Adopt-A-Highway, and raising money for Greenpeace, as well as aiding last fall's hurricane victims in the Southeast U.S. Said Snyder, "Being a part of a theme hall was a great way to really do something worthwhile for other people."

New olfactory options in perfume ads

BY JOYCE DOLLINGER
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Perfume scented magazine ads are usually a good way to market a particular fragrance, but how unappealing is buying a magazine and being bombarded with a rainbow of clashing and unwanted fragrances? In an effort to revolutionize the perfume advertising industry, a Los Angeles marketing firm has introduced Scent Seal, a "new scent delivery system," manufactured by Thermedics Inc., a developer of biomedical products and biomaterials. This creative way of promoting a fragrance eliminates the unwanted release of a scent, while allowing the consumer to test an unaltered fragrance.

Scent Seal is a thin, hermetically sealed, leakproof package of a fragrance based gel. Once the consumer peels off the top layer of the Scent Seal packet, fragrance is released from the gel just as it would be released from a bottle of perfume.

In many magazine ads, the standard scent strips, where the consumer pulls on the paper and scent vanishes or the modern scratch and stiff, where one rubs the ads for the release of the smell, are usually an annoyance to scent sensitive readers.

In 1991, Elanie Trebek-Kares, the president of Scent Seal Inc., developed the new fragrance seal to promote a new and improved way of marketing fragrances in magazine ads. The Scent Seal is targeted to benefit fragrance marketers, consumers, and the media. For the marketer it delivers a "wet" fragrance sample to the consumer, retains true fidelity and integrity of the fragrance, and does not leak or break. It also allows for creative advertising and promotion. With the seal, the consumer can actually apply the wet fragrance to the skin, travel with the fragrance, and use the seal for a sachet because the smell lasts for five months after opening.

The seal could potentially benefit the magazines that market the new ads. A hopeful advantage to marketing the seal, instead of scent strips, is that it will eliminate complaints from magazines consumers about leakage and unwanted smells. Also, because the scent from the seal lasts for up to five months, magazines will have a longer shelf life. Finally, since the product was approved for second-class mail, magazines will not pay an extra fee to have the perfume advertisement printed.

Scent Seal Inc. has been endorsed by Annette Green, President of The Fragrance Foundation, a New York based trade group. Green said, "I believe the future growth of the fragrance industry will depend on technological breakthroughs, such as Scent Seal, which address the consumer and the media, as well as changes in environmental and retail considerations."

Green said, "A year from now the paper scent ad won't exist." Green's prediction may come sooner than expected. Many perfume manufacturers are using or are planning to use Scent Seal for new perfumes. At this point, Vogue is the first magazine to experiment with the new method of advertising perfume scents. In the March issue of Vogue, Giorgio Beverly Hills promoted its new perfume Wings with Scent Seals.

UNFORTUNATELY, THIS IS WHERE PEOPLE ARE PUTTING TOO MANY RETIREMENT DOLLARS.
Every year, a lot of people make a huge mistake on their taxes. They don't take advantage of tax deferral and wind up sending Uncle Sam money they could be saving for retirement.
Fortunately, that's a mistake you can easily avoid with TIAA-CREF SRAs. SRAs not only ease your current tax-bite, they offer a remarkably easy way to build retirement income—especially for the "extras" that your regular pension and Social Security benefits may not cover. Because your contributions are made in before-tax dollars, you pay less taxes now. And since all earnings on your SRA are tax-deferred as well, the money you don't send to Washington works even harder for you. Down the road, that can make a dramatic difference in your quality of life.
What else makes SRAs so special? A range of allocation choices—from the guaranteed security of TIAA to the diversified investment accounts of CREF's variable annuity—all backed by the nation's number one retirement system.
Why write off the chance for a more rewarding retirement? Call today and learn more about how TIAA-CREF SRAs can help you enjoy many happy returns.

Taylor keeps audience in stitches with songs

BY NICOLE COBBAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

His resume contains oddities like "Hair: Vanishing blonde; Weight: 175 wet; Cholesterol Level: 190; Most Frequently Asked Question: 'How's your brother?'" But to Livingston Taylor, performing is no joke, it's a career. Performing 100 nights a year, Taylor joins the Bucknell community for an AIDS benefit concert in the Weis Center at 9 p.m. tonight. Tickets are $2 and are available through the Weis Center Box Office or the Langone Center Box Office with proceeds going to the AIDS Resource Alliance.

Born in 1950, Taylor comes from a musical family. Brother James has climbed Billboard charts with his folk guitar brand of music, and his other siblings Kate and Alex have carved their music niche as well. Taylor credits James with having introduced him to the guitar, Taylor's instrument of choice.

"James was my first guitar teacher, though he was kind of reluctant," said Taylor. "I was 13, and he was just a couple of years older than I. I'd watch him and then try to do what he was doing. After a while, doing it wrong would drive him so crazy that he would show me how to do it right."

Although the two brothers share many commonalities in their music, Livingston stands well on his own as a successful performer.

Michael Eck, reporter for the Times Union, said of Taylor, "Despite living in the shadow of the big man [James Taylor], nobody does what Livingston Taylor does as well as Livingston Taylor."

With six albums to his credit, the latest being Life is Good, Taylor draws his inspiration from an era appealing to a decidedly older audience than the crowds he draws.

"Dad used to play the original cast recording of My Fair Lady all the time, but the players I first loved were the Kingston Trio, Peter, Paul, and Mary, Ray Charles, and Perry Como," said Taylor. "The material coming out of that period—from the thirties up into the early sixties—was complete and fully crafted, with intros, bridges, choruses, verses, and endings. And they were lyrically very well developed."

Taylor's own music models after folk performers such as the Kingston Trio or Peter, Paul, and Mary. He looks at songwriting as a three component piece of work made up of the melody, the chords, and the lyrics.

With an affinity for the art of songwriting, Taylor holds an extreme aversion to the recording process. "I hate being in the studio, hanging out for hours over a hot tape machine," said Taylor. "I don't have any type of discipline for that."

His talents come to fruition under the lights, before an audience. Known for his humor and light banters with his audience, Taylor keeps his shows personable and funny, even in houses as large as Weis. Equipped with his guitar and banjo, Taylor delivers his own works mixed with standard favorites such as "Jailhouse Rock," and sprinkles everything with a good dosage of fun.

But despite the humor and joking in his performances, Taylor remains a dedicated musician. "Above all else," said Artie Traum, Taylor's producer, "this guy is serious about his music."

Pittsburgh Ballet Theatre members Tamar Rachelle and Ernest Tolentino perform in "Unknown Territory" by Choo-San Goh. PBT is conducting a series of campus and community activities Mar. 7-13 with the department of theatre and dance.

For a performing artist, to study with the master in one's field provides a learning experience beyond any text book technique. The Bucknell community has the opportunity this week to observe and learn from one of the most prestigious ballet companies in the state, the Pittsburgh Ballet Theatre. In residency from Mar. 7-13, PBT will conclude their stay with a performance in the Weis center next Friday night at 8:30 p.m. Tickets for the concert are $10 with a BU ID and are available through the Weis Center Box Office.

The company will be teaching classes in all areas of the performing arts, including dance, theatre, and music. Dance students will study technique in ballet, modern, and jazz dance with PBT teachers Shari Holloday, Mary Miller, and Jeffrey Bullock. Ernie Tolentino, PBT dancer, will conduct conditioning workshops for dancers and athletes.

Also of special interest to dancers and athletes will be the panel presentation "Accident Prevention for Athletes and Dancers: Modern Concepts in Training and Medicine," given by former Pittsburgh Steeler wide-receiver Lynn Swann and orthopedist Freddie Fu. Both Swann and Fu currently sit on the Board of Directors for PBT. The panel, which is free and open to the public, will take place on Tuesday, Mar. 9 at 8 p.m. in the Vaughan Lit Auditorium.

Students in costume design, dance history, and music theory will receive hands-on demonstrations form PBT designer Janet Groom, accompanist Joseph Kamm, and conductor/composer Michael Moricz.

In addition, choreographer Paul Abrahamson will be rehearsing his piece "When I Grow Up" with the Bucknell Dance Company. "When I Grow Up" was first premiered in the Bucknell Dance Company's fall dance concert and will receive its encore performance with the PBT in Weis next weekend.

PBT's residency results from years' worth of preparation between the Bucknell department of theatre and dance and PBT, particularly Stan Marshall, a '43 graduate of Bucknell and present member of the PBT Board of Directors. Marshall was looking to expand PBT's operations through Pennsylvania and came in contact with Danna Frangione, director of dance, when PBT performed here in '89.

In keeping with their public outreach idea, PBT will also conduct a lecture-demonstration for 1000 third and fourth graders in the Weis Center on Mar. 12. Designed to introduce younger audiences to the dance world, the event will be led by Patricia Wilde, artistic director for PBT, Janek Schergen, ballet master, and nine of the company dancers. An additional creative movement class led by Mary Miller, PBT company member, will be held in the Fieldhouse with fourth graders from the Kelly School in Lynntown.

"What we wanted was a project that had an outreach in the community," said Frangione. "We could have had them just come in for a single performance because they tour colleges all the time, but we wanted something larger in scope. We wanted to do it right."

Although many of the demonstrations taking place are advanced dance classes, the PBT curriculum will gear towards dancers of all abilities. All classes are free and open to the public.

"When they [PBT] come in, they come with the knowledge that they're [teaching] master classes," said Shellie Cash-Muller, associate professor of dance. A master class means not that the participants are all 'masters' of dance, but that the class is composed of dancers of all levels—from beginners to experts.

Learning from professional dancers provides experience hard to gain anywhere else, even at a school with a dance program as extensive as Bucknell's.

"The teachers that we are going to be having focus primarily on developing professional dancers," said Cash-Muller. "At the moment that is not our focus here at Bucknell since most dancers here are doing it extra-curricularly with plans of going into other careers. [The PBT residency] allows students to train from teachers with a different emphasis and focus which will be good for them."

Weis welcomes Broadway cast as part of AIDS benefit weekend

Bucknell welcomes the Broadway cast of Side by Side by Sondheim tomorrow night to the Weis Center. The group will present their musical at 8:30 p.m. as part of the AIDS benefit program, with all proceeds going to AIDS Resource Alliance, a nonprofit organization that serves the region's growing number of AIDS patients and their families. Tickets are $20 and are available through the Weis Center Box Office.

Side by Side by Sondheim traces the career of acclaimed composer and lyricist Stephen Sondheim. Now over 60, Sondheim is being honored at numerous gala events for his achievements in the performing arts, particularly in Broadway musicals.

Debuting as lyricist for Leonard Bernstein's West Side Story, Sondheim's career extends to his most recent hit, Into the Woods. Side by Side by Sondheim displays some of his most memorable songs from shows such as Gypsy, A Little Night Music, A Funny Thing Happened on the Way to the Forum, Company, and Follies. The cast for the show is composed of three Broadway singers, Kurt Peterson, Michele Ragusa, and Virginia Sandifur.

Peterson recently starred in the Canadian premiere of Company, and has also appeared as Tony in the Lincoln Center production of West Side Story and as Young Ben in the original Broadway production of Follies. Peterson originated and produced Sondheim—A Musical Tribute and is producer of this production of Side by Side by Sondheim.

Sandifur most recently starred on Broadway in The Sheik of Avenue B. She has also held starring roles in the Broadway productions of Follies, I Love My Wife, Company, and Smith. In addition she performs her own one-woman show and has appeared on the television shows The Equalizer and The David Frost Show.

Ragusa was also seen in The Sheik of Avenue B and has appeared in productions of West Side Story, Carousel, On Your Toes, and Sweeney Todd.

With the piano accompaniment of musical director Brad Garside, the trio performs a fitting tribute to one of Broadway's most valuable contributors, Stephen Sondheim, while making its own contribution to an honorable cause.

Following the show in Weis will be a separate concert featuring the Sirens, a five-woman, one-man band. Part of a performance titled "Anything Goes: An After-Hours Cabaret," at the Brynwood Banquet Center in Lewisburg, all proceeds from this concert will go towards the AIDS Resource of Williamsport. Tickets are $15 and will be available at the door.

The groups members are songwriter and keyboard player Mary Lou White, bassist and vocalist Carroll Rhodes, guitarist Lori Smith, drummer Paula Moore, vocalist, guitarist, trumpeter, and percussionist Jenny Thorsen, and saxophone player Doug McMinn. The group's flavoring of music spans from rock and roll to rhythm and blues.

Donating their services at the Brynwood Banquet Center will be members from Bucknell's Kappa Kappa Gamma sorority.

Bucknell avoids upset vs. Lehigh after becoming season champion

OVERTIME SCARER

On Wednesday night in Lewisburg, the men's basketball team narrowly escaped the upset of the season in the Patriot League, beating the Engineers of Lehigh by a score of 69-65 in overtime.

If the Orange and Blue (22-5) were looking past Lehigh toward the next round of the tournament, it was a grave mistake. The Engineers came out with a solid game plan designed to shorten the game and take away the Bison's greatest strength: the fast break. Their athletic disadvantage and lack of depth would not be exposed as in their previous two meetings, when the Bison ran them off the court. By using a four corners offense for the duration of the game, Lehigh (4-23) effectively slowed the game to a

BISON BURN THE CROSS

The Holy Cross basketball team encountered a Bison stampede on their crusade for the regular season title. The Breakin' Bison (13-1, 21-5) lived up to their name last Saturday as they ran past the Holy Cross Crusaders (12-2, 20-6) 112-99 for their ninth consecutive win and home-court advantage throughout the Patriot League Tournament.

The two teams went into last week's contest dead even. Both had a league record of 12-1 and an overall mark of 20-5, and both were riding multi-game winning streaks. Something had to give.

"March Madness" comes to Davis Gym

BY LARNIE J. BOOKER
Bucknellian Staff Writer

It's here. It's that special time of the year. No, not Christmas—that happened months ago. It's March and NCAA tournament time. It's a time in which talk of basketball is on the tongue of fans young and old, and it's a time to crown a new champion of all of college basketball.

It is also the time in which basketball fans become overwhelmed with a certain—madness, shall we call it. Fans buy tickets at such a feverish pace that they are sold out 2 1/2 hours after they go on sale. Students and professors skip class and miss tests just so that they can rant and rave like maniacs in heat. They paint their faces in the battle colors of their respective heroes and heroines. They wave flags and make banners in support of their battle-hungry warriors. These normally mild-mannered patrons will shout obscenities at the opposing team and the referees. These rambunctious spectators will even brave the fierce and snowy winter of the North to sleep outside of the home site of their team in order to secure a favorite seat.

Let Fordham go to the Atlantic 10

Last week the New York Daily News ran a series of articles addressing Fordham University's dissatisfaction with the Patriot League. It seems that alumni, students, and coaches can't live without scholarships and two or more games a year at Madison Square Garden. I say good riddance! Take your ball and go home.

The Rams (most notably head men's basketball coach Nick Macarchuk) have made no secret about their desire to get out and go to a "big time league." That league is the Atlantic 10, who has been courting the New York City market school since Penn State left for the Big 10. So leave already!

The Patriot League was designed to promote the student-athlete, not the athlete-student. Fordham thought its academic credibility would rise and that its sports would take care of themselves. Life without scholarships is not easy for a coach. Having to recruit STUDENTS who need to meet a certain admission's index (within a standard deviation or two) is not easy for a coach either.

The question is simply: What is the emphasis of your athletic department? Fordham and its fans appear (and act) as if it's degrading to play the likes of Lafayette and Bucknell, who both beat the almighty hoops team. It wants to play St. John's every week and has never stopped crying about being passed over by the Big East Conference in 1979. This leads me

"I want to leave the results of the meet posted on the wall until the building falls down! The team performed great; a solid 'A' performance!!"

That was Head Coach Art Gulden's reaction to Saturday's Patriot League Championship meet. The Lady Bison could do no wrong, as they placed at least one person in every event en route to the biggest drubbing in women's Patriot League history. Bucknell tallied up a whopping 205 points; the best second place Fordham could do was 114 points. How strong were the Bison? They placed two or more in the top six finishers in eleven events. They also scored more points than Lafayette, Lehigh, and Colgate combined! The Lady Bison ran, jumped, hurdled, and threw better than the rest of the conference to the delight of the partisan home crowd.

Outstanding men, staff, and officials leave coach smiling for days

BY CHRIS DROWNE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

It's been a long time since anyone has seen head track and field coach Art Gulden smile for an entire week. No, he's not that overbearing of a coach (i.e. Bobby Knight). He expects the best and near perfection out of his staff and student-athletes, and that's exactly what he got last Saturday at the Patriot League Indoor Track and Field Championships held here at Bucknell.

"Everything ran flawlessly. My staff was unbelievable. The physical plant and officials were superb. And I couldn't have asked any more out of my teams," said a glowing Gulden. That staff of Bill Hodge, Jo Ginanetello, and John Schwambach could not have done a better job preparing their runners, jumpers, and throwers. The physical plant personnel had the track (more on that later) and everything in the field house in perfect running order and ready to go early in the morning. The meet officials (more on this later) cranked out the results without the usual delays. It's not uncommon for final results to take over an hour to be compiled. Saturday, the participants waited just ten minutes between the completion of the final event and the presentation of the trophies.

Bucknell, Rider favorites to win ECWA title in Davis

BY MITCH BENTON
Bucknellian Staff Writer

In what should be a mirror image of last season's three-way dogfight for the East Coast Wrestling Association Championship, Bucknell, Rider and Central Connecticut State will battle for the 1993 title this weekend in Davis Gymnasium. The three schools have combined to win every East Coast Conference or ECWA tournament crown since the 1985 season, when Drexel edged Rider by two points.

By taking last year's championship, Central Connecticut ended a string of four consecutive Rider titles. A dramatic, riding-time victory in the heavyweight championship bout pushed the Blue Devils past Bucknell and into first with a total of 76.25 points. Kevin Marriners 2-1 victory over the Bison's Ben Myers '92 secured the school's first ever ECC or ECWA championship and dropped Bucknell to second with 71 points. Rider finished third with 63.25 points. The standings were rounded out by Drexel (57.25), Buffalo (43.5), Hofstra (9), and Brooklyn (1.5), which has since dropped out of the conference.

One of the best competitions of this year's tournament should come in the 177-pound weight class, where a pair of 1992's individual conference champions will probably square off in the finals. Central Connecticut's Mark Frushone will return to defend the 177-pound title he won last year with a 4-2 decision over Rider's Rich Evans. In and out of the nation's Top 10 throughout the year, Frushone has compiled a 23-4 overall record, including an 11-1 mark in dual bouts.

After breezing through the 190-pound bracket with two falls and an 11-3 major decision over Rider's Bill Tassogloy in the finals last year, the Bison's Bob Ferraro '94 was named the competition's Most Outstanding Wrestler. Ferraro began this season at 190 pounds and compiled a 12-2 mark. While the team was on a West Coast road trip, the Bison captain dropped down to 177 pounds, where he has won 13 consecutive matches. Ferraro's .926 winning percentage (25-2) throughout the year is the best on Bucknell's squad and includes a perfect 14-0 mark in dual bouts.

Also leading Bucknell in the championships will be another Bison captain, graduate student Mike Van Doren '92, competing in Davis Gym for the last time in his collegiate career. Van Doren should enter the competition as the top-ranked 150-pounder, after a 26-4 season that includes a perfect 5-0 mark in ECWA action. Van Doren's 26 wins, which include six falls, four technical falls and eight major decisions, have pushed his career mark to 80-32, just one win behind former Bison all-America Bryan Burns '91 for fourth place on the school's all-time victory list.

Other Bison that are likely to reach the tournament finals include 126 pound George Swann '93 and 167-pound Mike Rush '95. Swann has earned a 17-9 mark this season, including an 11-3 record in dual bouts and 4-1 in the ECWA. After beginning the season at 177 pounds, Rush has earned half of his 16 wins since moving down in weight with Ferraro on the California trip. Rush (16-13) has a 4-1 mark in conference action, with the lone loss coming to Frushone at 177.

Bucknell's Phil Elliott '93 will be looking to return to the NCAA Championships. The Bison captain made it last season as one of the three conference wildcard selections after finishing second to graduated Todd Hammerle of Buffalo. Elliott dropped the title bout, 10-8, in overtime. This season, he is 17-13, including five pins and an 8-5 mark in dual bouts. Other Bucknell starters should include 118-pound Clay Burkle '94, who took over the starting spot midway through the season, compiling a 7-13 record, and 158-pound Chuck Kresho '95, down Holy Cross's three-point game and forced 21 turnovers, including 13 steals and three blocked shots.

The Crusaders were shooting nearly 40 percent from three-point land going into Saturday's game, but by late afternoon, they had only hit two treys and were shooting a measly .154 on the day.

"We didn't let them shoot the threes like they did at their place," said Russell Peyton '93, "but the biggest thing was we played 35-40 minutes tonight."

The Bison did what they do best—they executed the running game—to break out to a 24-15 lead, breaking the Holy Cross press and scoring ten of their first 14 points on easy layups and dunks.

Bucknell slowly increased its lead over the next six minutes, reaching their biggest lead of the half, 39-27, on one of Brown's four dunks on the evening. Holy Cross battled back, however, pulling within seven by halftime of the officials' whistle-fest. Eight of the Crusaders' last 12 points were scored from the charity stripe as Peyton and Mike Walsh '93 were in foul trouble early with three personals each. A total of 27 fouls were called in the first half alone, with both teams in the bonus by the 9:42 mark.

Peyton, who holds the Patriot League steals record with 88 this season, only added three more to his total because he was playing with three personals for nearly three-quarters of the game.

"I couldn't pressure as much because of the refs—they were quick with the whistle tonight—but that didn't stop my offensive game. I still wanted to take it to 'em and execute on the transition and do other things for the team," said Peyton. He certainly did step up his offensive game, putting down 15 points and dishing off seven assists.

The second period opened with the Crusaders cutting the Bison lead to four points with a 9-4 mini-run, but Bucknell went on a 13-4 run of their own during the next two minutes, scoring every time down the court. The Orange and Blue took their largest lead of the game, 82-68, when Chris Simpson '94 hit a foul shot with 8:06 left to play.

The game wasn't over yet, however, as the pesky Crusaders stuck with the Breakin' Bison. Rob Feaster led Holy Cross to within 10 with 3:25 to go as players began to foul out. Simpson, who led all scorers with 26 points, was the first to go, picking up his fifth at the 2:09 mark on a questionable call. Feaster earned his seat on the Holy Cross bench two seconds later, causing the sellout crowd of 2,500 in Davis Gym to warm up their voices, singing a few bars of the Nylons' Kiss Him Goodbye. The fans would get to sing it three more times in the next two minutes, and the Holy Cross fans could have done it twice on their own as a total four Crusaders and two Bison fouled out of the game.

Yancy Smith — The Bucknellian

Paul Olkowski '93 and his parents Paul and Helena parade out to center court as the crowd acknowledges the center's fine career.

The Bison took advantage of the fouls, scoring 12 points from the line in the final two minutes, as they pulled away with a 112-99. Throughout the game, the Bison scored their points off of high-percentage shots as they shot 67 percent from the floor. It was only fitting that Patriot League Player of the Year and First-Team All-Patriot selection Mike Bright '93 ended the game and the regular season with the highest percentage shot of them all—a breakaway reverse slam.

How important is it for the Bison to have home-court advantage throughout the tournament? Consider the fact that Bucknell is 13-0 on their own hardwood this season and is 15-0 at home since losing to Fordham last February. Add to that the fact that over the last two seasons, the Bison are 24-1 in Davis Gymnasium, with Fordham being that only loss, and you can very well see that Bucknell plays well at home.

"The home court advantage is important at any place you play," said Raymond Brown '94, "but our crowd is more intense than any crowd I've ever seen for such a small arena. You're not going to go to too many places where the crowd gets into it as much as they did today. Fortunately we were able to play at home, and we'll play at home for the rest of the season until the NCAAs."

to believe that their emphasis is on winning and making money.

That emphasis doesn't fit into the Patriot League anymore than the Bronx does. The other schools in the Patriot League use athletics as a means for attracting dedicated STUDENT-athletes. Fordham hasn't reaped any of those such benefits since it left the Metro Atlantic Athletic Association.

Be honest with yourself. If you were being recruited to play say, soccer, would you rather go to the Bronx or Easton? In the past, Fordham was able to use scholarships to hide its inferior academic curriculum and cramped city campus.

Whether or not Fordham's alumni, students, and coaches can talk their Athletic Director and President into leaving, I hope, at the very least, that they've come to respect the philosophy and dedication of the Colgates and Bucknells of college athletics. If not, take your ball and go back home to the "big time leagues."

Senior swimmer is arguably Bucknell's most outstanding female athlete ever

BY JONATHAN BORDEAU
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Margaret Grunow '93 is no stranger to success, both in and out of the pool. Her humble beginnings in swimming gave no indication that she would enjoy the four-year career that she has just completed in the pool for Bucknell—a career that may go down in history as one of the most successful ever at this school.

After spending a few summers swimming in a casual summer league, Grunow was encouraged by coach Mark Newcombe to try out for her Greenwich High School (Connecticut) swim team. As a freshman, Grunow made the team, but then quit one day later.

"I was a big wimp," says Grunow, "but my mom forced me to go back to the pool. I think that was the only time she ever forced me to swim."

At the time Grunow was not interested in an intense program. She simply preferred to swim competitively in season, from August to November.

"I did not want to swim any more than I had to," confides Grunow. While at Greenwich, Grunow swam well for her team, gaining a greater interest in the sport as she neared graduation.

When it came time to apply for college, Bucknell emerged as a possible match for her academic and swimming interests. While swimming was not an overwhelming factor in her selection process, Grunow suspected that she may want to continue her career at the college level. In describing her search, Grunow said, "I looked for a college where I would not be staring at the bottom of a pool for four years."

Grunow decided that Bucknell was the school—and the swimming program—that she was looking for.

> "We are one of the strongest programs in the East and that can be attributed, in large part, to Margaret's preparation, motivation, and training."
> — Lynn Kachmarik
> Swimming Coach

Once on campus, she became reluctantly accustomed to swimming year-round. Her times "kept getting faster and faster." She started swimming with Bucknellian Jim Harvey '88. Grunow began swimming during the summer months, honing her skills and shaving seconds off of her times. She began to gain notoriety, rising from a steady performer for Bucknell to perennial superstar. In just a short time, Grunow began to attract attention around the league for her swimming exploits.

Since her freshman year, Grunow has excelled in the pool for the Bison. At the Patriot League Championships this season, she was just the second Bison swimmer to become a four-time champion after cruising to a win in the 100-yard freestyle in 51.23, which set a new Colgate pool record. Grunow defended her 50-yard freestyle title from a year ago with a time of 24.12 after qualifying first in the trials with a time of 23.88, which established a new Colgate pool record and met the NCAA consideration qualifying standard. She also defended her title in the 100-yard butterfly with a time of 56.02, which set both a new Colgate and Bucknell pool record. Grunow met the NCAA consideration qualifying standard in both the 100-yard butterfly and freestyle. Grunow could be selected to compete in the Division I NCAA Championships, making her the first Bucknell swimmer to achieve such a feat.

A senior co-captain for coach Lynn Kachmarik, Grunow earns high praise from one of her biggest fans.

"Margaret was a major factor in elevating our program to the level it is at now. We are one of the strongest programs in the East and that can be attributed, in large part to Margaret's preparation, motivation, and training."

Grunow's success at both the Patriot League Championships and this year's Eastern Championships did not come without hard work. Although she "did not want to see the bottom of a pool for four years," Grunow has done almost just that. She has spent summers training in New Jersey and Fort Lauderdale, in addition to her commitments for Bucknell swimming. Grunow's talent extends to her motivational skills.

"Not only is she an exceptional swimmer," commented Rose Maguire '96, "but she cares about how everyone else performs. She helped us with our mental focus and preparation. I think she was a better captain because of that."

After all of the training and hard work, Grunow cites her 1992 invitation to the Olympic Trials as her greatest swimming achievement. After failing to qualify many times before and in numerous events, Grunow was finally able to secure an invitation with her performance in the 50-meter freestyle.

"I was very excited when I qualified," says Grunow of her fondest pool memory.

She is also very proud of the development of her other events. In the events in which she is not as strong, she has managed to improve greatly upon her times in high school.

"Since coming to Bucknell, I am very proud of the versatility that I have developed," said Grunow.

Swimmer Margaret Grunow '93 has been no stranger to the highest platform on victory row throughout her illustrious career. She owns countless Bucknell and Patriot League records, and she has a strong chance to become the first swimmer in school history to compete in the Division I NCAA Championships.

It is this versatility that proved crucial to Bucknell's second-place finish at this season's championships.

Outside of the Freas-Rooke Pool, Grunow will graduate this spring with a bachelor of arts degree in history.

As for future plans, Grunow will take a year off in order to enroll in courses required for graduate school in physical therapy.

"I am very interested in physical therapy," states Grunow, "Next year, I will take some introductory courses and finish applications to some three-year program graduate schools."

As perhaps the greatest swimmer to jump off of the blocks at Bucknell, Grunow will indeed leave a lasting legacy of swimming accomplishments and records.

"Her records speak for themselves," says Coach Kachmarik. "But what is more impressive is what she does for the team out of the water. She was, in essence, our backbone. In twenty years of coaching at this level, I have more respect for Margaret than anyone I have ever come across."

The "Bison Retrospective" features will appear fairly regularly throughout the spring semester.

BISON RETROSPECTIVE 1973: Jim Valvano

Former Bucknell head men's basketball coach and later national champion at N.C. State is currently dying of bone cancer. This article first appeared in The Bucknellian on March 2, 1973.

BY BILL SAPORITO

Now that the last seconds of the basketball season have ticked their way into the past, "there is time" as the poet Elliot has written, "for countless visions and revisions.

No one knows this more than Bison mentor Jim Valvano.

Seated in an overstuffed chair, feet propped, he looked much more relaxed than the Jim Valvano you would normally see charging down court at a ref, screaming enthusiastically for his players or throwing towels around in disgust. But that too is behind him for awhile.

This season has provided some wildly exciting moments, but could you call it successful, did it realize its goals?

"I'm a big guy with setting goals," he began, "I do not believe in setting unattainable goals. When I came here, not knowing any of our talent or anything along those lines, I just set two goals which I thought were attainable yet pretty difficult goals. They were to have a winning season and make the MAC playoffs.

"Obviously if you look at what happened, you'd have to say we failed to reach our goals. That's just a black and white statement. There's more than that though," he added.

"In terms of what I think coaching is about, the philosophy of coaching and the value of athletics, I think it was an imminently successful experience not just for the players, but for me personally."

"There hasn't been a team I've coached, whether freshmen or small college or here, I haven't felt has made me a better person, has taught me something," he said.

What then, had the Bison varsity, the "oh-so-close" team, taught him.

"I told my team," Valvano said introspectively, "that maybe this year I've learned my biggest lesson from them; that, holy cow, there can be without a doubt, victory in defeat.

"You talk about the clichés, you're doing there is the tendency to get depressed and to feel things aren't going as well as they could be," Valvano said.

"These guys showed all the things I try to talk about. They showed me what the hell it's all about.

"I'm a big self image guy. What you think about yourself as a player and a coach is probably the single most important aspect of athletics. These people showed me that as long as you keep giving your best, 100 per cent, and all those clichés..." his voice trailed off momentarily.

"They lived them," he stated emphatically. "They came from nowhere, won five of their last six, and came within one game of doing something that's never been done before. They came that close and although we didn't reach our goal, it was one-hell-of-a-journey."

Winning is undoubtedly crucial to any game, but to Valvano, the player-coach relationship is just as important.

"It's the only discouraging aspect of my first year here," he pointed out. "It's personally disturbing because it's going to be decided by people who basically don't realize what our athletic program is all about."

"There seems to be a fear from the people up there on the hill that freshman eligibility is going to bring about 'big time' athletics and 'big time' pressure recruiting, and it's so far from the truth."

At 26, it is obvious that Jim Valvano is just at the start of his coaching career. It is just as evident Bucknell cannot be considered the pinnacle of the coaching challenge.

> "I told my team that maybe this year [1973] I've learned my biggest lesson from them; that, holy cow, there can be without a doubt, victory in defeat."
> — Jim Valvano
> Former Basketball Coach

"While I'm here," he related, "we're gonna accomplish certain things. We're gonna win the most games in the school's history in a single season, which is 17. We're gonna win the first conference championship. We're gonna be a perennial playoff team and we're gonna make an NIT tournament.

"Those are my overall goals," he related. "I think it's a five year plan: the Valvano Five Year Plan. It takes time to get something like that going."

The future of Bucknell basketball has brightened with Valvano at the helm. One can only look to the future with an optimism that, well, maybe the next time Coach Valvano warms up with the team, it won't be in Davis Gymnasium, but in Madison Square Garden.

"I want to be the best coach in the world," he says candidly, "there's no doubt about it. I want to be, but I only want it within a certain framework. And that framework has to be the relationship I have with my players."

"I could not stand to be a cop or whip'em to death. I want to have a good program, I want to be successful but I also want that player-coach relationship where the guys can come over to my house and we can 'BS,'" Valvano explained.

Valvano is the epitome of a new breed coach. He differs drastically from coach-gods of the Vince Lombardi mold.

But what do the players think of the tight player-coach relationship?

"He's an inspiration, an example to the players" Paul Biko began. "It has been a pleasure to have been able to play under him."

"He got the most you can get out of a player," adds Paul Kerr.

"I found that I put personal goals out of the way in favor of team goals. It helped me work much harder for him."

Pitfalls can beset the coach-as-friend leader if his personal relationships cause him to lose respect with the team at large.

"Valvano is able to open himself up as a friend, to take himself out of context as just a coach," Biko elaborated.

"I owe him a lot. When I got hurt in the middle of the season and was really ready to quit, we talked as friends and he brought me back up. But when he's on the court, he's a coach; he pulled us together."

Dan Correnti takes a slightly different view. "He's the most enthusiastic coach I've ever played under. But I feel there should be a professional distance between coach and players. I think players tend to question him more when they have such a personal relationship."

Valvano makes it clear that he is not an average coach and doesn't intend to be.

"We coaches are great salesmen," he says with a smile. "You know when you recruit as I have for the past five years it's, 'Hi, I'm Coach Valvano from x and x school: I could sell your pants of you.'"

"But that's such a sham, there's such a phoniness about it. I decided when I got to run my own show, they're going to see me as I am."

He emphasized, "We both can operate; this relationship can grow, I like to think, into a friendship. Whether I've been successful or not, I don't know."

As many people have noticed by virtue of his warm-up before the Gettysburg game and a now famous quote in Sports Illustrated, the Bison head coach is a colorful guy. He is not one to be stuffed by saying the same clichés into a mold all coaches are supposed to.

"The last home basketball game was just so unbelievable you just can't realize the response we've gotten from that. I've had alums call me from as far back as the class of 1919."

"I've had so many people say the excitement and enthusiasm was almost like..." He looked up, "Where am I?"

And where then, is the future of Bucknell basketball?

"One of my biggest kicks is loyalty," the coach said.

"I have a commitment to Bucknell right now. I want to bring successful basketball here. I think the students deserve it, I think the alumni deserve it. And I am confident that I will get it done."

Valvano sees one of his biggest obstacles as the freshmen eligibility rule.

Patriot League Hoops Tourney Final Fours

As the men's and women's fields dwindle, The Bucknellian's Sports Staff assesses Bucknell's chances at winning it all in 1993

All of Bucknell's possible remaining games will be played at 7:30 p.m.

Division II Ashland University in Ohio, was named to the Second-Team All-Patriot League roster. The shooting guard was second in the conference in scoring at 21.2 ppg, third in free throw percentage at 81.6%, and fifth in steals at 1.85 per game. Neale, along with Hasan Brown, Brennan Lothery, and Chris Nicholas, gives Colgate a strong four-man guard rotation.

One of the major keys for Bucknell is to keep the pace of the game on their terms. Undoubtedly Colgate's coach Jack Bruen knows about the success Lehigh had slowing the tempo down, but that is not really Colgate's style. With their quick guards, they have had success all year playing an up-tempo game. Lehigh had no such identity, so it was easier for them to adjust their game than it will be for Colgate.

Bucknell's full-court press, should they elect to utilize it, should be more effective tomorrow than it was on Wednesday. Hasan Brown of Colgate is not as quick as the Lehigh guards, nor does he handle the ball as well. A successful trap, as well as the ability to break Colgate's press, is the key to making the game a run-and-gun affair.

Bucknell also must rebound well. Colgate is statistically the top rebounding team in the league, so the Bison must control the boards in order to get their break started.

Should the Red Raiders elect to sit back in a zone, the Bison will have to convert from the outside. The motion offense they use against zones involves penetration from guards Russell Peyton '93 and Chris Simpson '94, and while the primary goal is to dish to Olkowski or Raymond Brown '94 along the baseline for a layup or dunk, the play often results in a kick-out to Mike Bright '93 or Matt Clark '93 for a three-point attempt. Clark has been red-hot from long range of late. Unfortunately for Clark, he has not played enough minutes this year or he would be leading the league in three-point field-goal percentage. The Bison likely would not even be playing Colgate had it not been for Clark's four huge treys against Lehigh in the quarterfinal.

In the other semifinal game tomorrow, Holy Cross hosts Fordham. Obviously both of those teams are rooting for Colgate, because should that happen the winner would host the Red Raiders in the final. Bucknell, now taking nothing for granted, will see to it that that scenario does not occur.

All-League Honors Announced

BY CHRIS DROWNE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Last Sunday, the Patriot League basketball coaches voted for their third annual All-League teams and individual honors. Before looking at the lists, try to name as many of the players as you can on your own. Bonus points if you can find the point guard on either of the men's teams.

For the second straight year, Bucknell has had two first-team performers and the Player of the Year. Mike Bright '93 and Chris Simpson '94 deservedly succeeded Bill Courtney '92 and Patrick King '92. Bright earned Player of the Year honors for being the leader on the first-place team. Head Coach Charlie Woollum, doing his finest job since 1988-89, garnered the Coach of the Year trophy.

Juliet McGee '93, captain of the Lady Bison, received first-team accolades for the second consecutive year. Point guard K.C. Vlah '96 finished second in the Rookie of the Year voting and was the other Bucknell woman honored.

Without further adieu, here are the lists.

Lady Bison battle top seed tonight at 7:30

BY JON TERRY
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The Bucknell Lady Bison have another game to play. Based on the trends of Patriot League tournament play throughout the history of the league, this was not expected. You see, road teams just do not win games in the tournament. It almost never happens. In fact, in the eight quarterfinal games, men and women included, only one visiting team came out victorious—the Lady Bison, thanks to their 50-46 win at Army on Tuesday.

Only twice in league history has a team wearing the dark jerseys won. Those were two women's games in 1991 where a five-seed beat a four-seed in the first round, and a three-seed knocked off a two-seed in the semi-finals.

The other thing Bucknell had going against it was its lack of success in the post-season. Two years ago they lost to Fordham, 103-75, and last year Lafayette edged them 64-58 in Bethlehem.

So now the task gets much tougher. In order to win their second tournament game ever and advance to the championship game on Monday, the Lady Bison must upset Holy Cross tonight. The Crusaders, 20-7 overall, 12-2 in the league, have beaten Bucknell twice this year, including an 80-50 thrashing in Worcester on Jan. 30.

In Lewisburg last weekend, the Lady Bison hung tough with Holy Cross, despite torrid outside shooting by the Crusaders. Joy Sandler GR kept Bucknell in the game by pouring in a season-high 22 points.

Holy Cross's strength is its enormous front line, as well as its depth. Norinne Powers, a co-Patriot League Player of the Year, Beth Godfrey, Carrie Ramenofsky, and Rookie-of-the-Year Keren Juda all are big and capable of taking over inside.

Bucknell's front line of Juliet McGee '93, Kelly Kempton '93, and Monica Nawarskas '94 will have to have their best games of the year to neutralize Holy Cross's big people. Bucknell's trio of forwards have combined for an average of just 16 points and 13.5 rebounds per game against Holy Cross this year. Kempton is already coming off her best game of the year. The senior, who did not enter the starting lineup until the second part of the league schedule, scored 14 points and snared 13 rebounds in the win over Army on Tuesday.

Holy Cross's depth is another reason why it cruised to the league title this season. The Crusaders start four seniors and one freshman, but their bench is loaded with under-

Bucknell basketball crowds go big time

With the success of the Breakin' Bison, the crowds inside (and sometimes outside) of Davis Gym have turned out in record numbers. The antiquated arena is practically bursting at its seams as it cries for further renovation or even demolition in favor of a more modern facility. Despite its inadequacies, the friendly confines have helped the team to produce a 123-21 record since 1982. Here are some scenes from win #122—Saturday's 112-99 victory.

" Baryshinikov of Football" to Speak at Bucknell

Lynn Swann, former wide receiver for the Pittsburgh Steelers, will speak on "Dance is Sport and Sports are Dance," March 9 at Bucknell.

Swann's appearance is part of a week-long Pittsburgh Ballet Theatre residency at Bucknell. He is a member of the board of trustees of the Pittsburgh Ballet.

The ballet's residency will include a session with dance soloist Ernie Tolentino for Bucknell athletes to help them increase their coordination, flexibility, and agility through ballet exercises. Tolentino, a former high school football player from El Paso, Texas, has worked with Steeler running back Dwight Stone and the Geneva College football team.

Swann, whose mother enrolled him in dance school when he was eight years old, played for the Steelers for nine years as they won four Super Bowls. He was the Most Valuable Player for Super Bowl X in 1976 and was named All-Pro in 1975.

Swann is now a broadcaster for ABC Sports, covering such events as Monday Night Football, the 1988 Winter Olympics, the Kentucky Derby, Preakness, and Belmont Stakes.

Hall-of-Fame Broadcaster Curt Gowdy called Swann "the Baryshinikov of football" during Super Bowl X.

Author Roy Blount, Jr. has said, "I always thought that what Swann did was a higher art form than what Baryshinikov is doing because I know that Swann is not as good a dancer as Baryshinikov, but I would like to see Baryshinikov dance while people are trying to separate his head from his body...and I'd like to see Baryshinikov catch a bullet pass while doing his stuff."

Swann recently was named to the College Football Hall of Fame. He played for the University of Southern California when the team was national champion in 1972.

The Pittsburgh Ballet's residency will conclude with a performance Mar. 13 at 8 p.m. at the Weis Center. Members of the Bucknell Dance Company will perform a piece with the ballet.

The Bucknell Association for the Arts funded the residency.

What's in a Name?

Reprinted from The Philadelphia Inquirer, Jan. 12, 1941 and sent to The Bucknellian by former Sports Editor Dr. Frederick Golden '41

Up until three decades ago, Bucknell teams had been given no sobriquet that stuck. They were called, at various times, "Timberwolves," "Wildcats," and other ferocious species appealing to the imaginations of sports writers.

In 1910, in order to clear up this confusion, Dr. William C. Bartol, then professor of mathematics at Bucknell, suggested that the nickname "Bisons" be officially adopted. The Bucknellian student weekly promptly endorsed Dr. Bartol's suggestion, and its editorial was reprinted, in part, by The Inquirer.

Since then, Bucknell teams have been called Bison(s) for very sound reasons, chiefly historical. Alliteration is also served. The "Thundering Herd" is, of course, a newspaper adaptation—it helps the boys add a touch of color to their leads. Now as to what inspired Dr. Bartol's suggestion:

Bucknell's campus at Lewisburg lies at the Eastern end of the broad Buffalo Valley, which was one of the last stomping grounds of the American buffalo, or bison, in this section of the country. Within a few miles of the campus can be found "Buffalo Creek," "Buffalo Crossroads" and "East Buffalo township."

Prior to 1800, the herd migrated from Pennsylvania to Georgia in the fall and wandered back in the spring, following a definite route which can still be traced. Dr. Lewis E. Theiss, professor emeritus at Bucknell, has located several old buffalo wallows not far from the Bisons' gridiron [now Mathewson Stadium].

Weather, JMU keep baseball hibernated

Pitchers and hitters showed the effects of only one outdoor practice before opener

BY JON TERRY
Bucknellian Staff Writer

As long as the Boys of Summer are still the Boys of Winter, unfortunately we are still going to have to talk about the weather as a major factor in success of the Bucknell baseball team.

Take last weekend, for example. The Bison were scheduled to play single games on Saturday and Sunday at James Madison, but thanks to the snowstorm down south, Saturday's game was cancelled. After watching the Bucknell-Holy Cross basketball game, the players were supposed to call the coaches at 10:30 p.m. Saturday night to find out if they had to get up with the rooster the next morning to drive to Virginia for the second game. When the guys called, they found out they were going to have to make up the previous day's game as part of a doubleheader.

What happens when a team of tired, bus-weary baseball players pile off a bus just in time to play a doubleheader against a good team? They lose 14-1 and 8-1, that's what.

"The circumstances were certainly difficult," said manager Gene Depew. "It's something we are going to have to work through, though. Most of our games are going to be up in the air early in the season."

In the first game of the twin bill, James Madison scored 11 runs in the first three innings, including six in the second. The big blow was a grand slam by first baseman Kevin Nehring. Starting pitcher Kurt Waldner '93 could not find the rhythm as he got pounded for seven runs in two innings of work. Waldner relies on a knuckle-curve as his off-speed pitch, but on this day he simply could not control it. In fact, he hit five James Madison batters. Rich Heller '94 and Jim Stevens '94 similarly lacked success on the hill, giving up a combined seven runs in three innings of work.

Mike Kearns '93 was the bright spot at the plate, going two for three and scoring the only run of the game. Matt Sniegocki '93 knocked him in with a single in the seventh inning.

The Dukes continued their early-inning destruction in the second game, knocking starter Denis Maguire '93 out after he gave up four runs in three innings. The Bison took their first lead of the year in the top of the first inning after Steve Gyimesi '93 crossed the plate after a James Madison error.

Starter Chris Slonaker and the Dukes' bullpen shut the Bison down the rest of the way, and catcher Jason Troilo provided the offense with two hits and an RBI. Scott Sutfin '94 (2 for 3) was Bucknell's only multiple hitter.

Hopefully for the Bison, this weekend's return to Virginia will be more profitable. The team will play at VMI on Friday, a double dip at Radford on Saturday, and a single game at Radford on Sunday. With the weather so unpredictable, it is tough for the team to develop any continuity. The James Madison games proved this.

"It is toughest for the pitchers," said Depew. "They were throwing off of a dirt mound for the first time in two weeks. The hitters also started slowly, but you have to remember that it was the first time we were facing pitchers who were trying to get us out."

Depew did come away from the weekend remembering a few bright spots.

"The hitters started getting more comfortable and more aggressive at the plate," he noted. Depew mentioned Sutfin and Bryan Koch '95 as hitters who made good contact. Depew was also encouraged by the scoreless inning thrown by Brian Walter '94 in the first game.

Bucknell's first home game is scheduled for Mar. 11 against Gettysburg—a contest featuring the Trout brothers. Larry '93 plays third base for the Bison, while his younger brother Eric is a catcher for Gettysburg. Based on the condition of the field, however, it may take a miracle to get the game in. The field was cleared of snow this week, but the last two days of sleet and rain have left the diamond underwater. It would take some serious sunshine early next week to dry out the field.

It won't be until the Bison travel to Florida over Spring Break when they will be able to get into a good routine and can play every day without having to guess about the weather.

who will replace usual starter Jason Prokopchak '94, despite his 2-8 record and 0-3 mark in dual bouts.

An injury to Tom Boyd '95 at 190 pounds has made his competing doubtful, so the Bison will be moving Matt DiGiacomo '95 down, his third weight class over the past two years. After the sophomore started his career at 177 pounds, DiGiacomo was moved up to heavyweight this season, where he was 12-16, winning three of his five conference bouts. Bucknell's new heavyweight will probably be Jeremy Patty '95, who moonlights as a linebacker on the Bison football team.

Another trouble spot for the Bison will come at 142 pounds. Usual starter Ron Wellman '95, who leads Bucknell with eight falls this season, is questionable after he injured his leg in the team's closing match, a 29-16 victory over Drexel.

In addition to Frushone, defending champion Central Connecticut will be led by two more seniors, Lance Banfi and Mike Kocsis. A conference runner-up in 1992, the 142-pound Kocsis has totaled an 18-3 record, including a team-high three pins. Banfi, who finished third at 134 pounds last season, is also 18-3 this year.

Rider will be paced by two-time conference champion, John Hangey. The fourth-ranked 190-pounder in the nation according to the Amateur Wrestling News, Hangey was the conference's 177-pound champ in 1990 and 1991. After sitting out last season, Hangey has returned to compile a 29-2 record this year, including a perfect 15-0 in dual bouts. Also outstanding for Rider has been former NCAA qualifier, 167-pound Dave Robin. Robin is now 20-6 on the season.

The tournament will produce 13 NCAA qualifiers, as each weight class champion will advance, along with three at-large qualifier. Competition begins this afternoon with quarterfinal bouts at 1 p.m. and semifinals tonight at 7 p.m. The consolations are scheduled for tomorrow morning at 11 a.m. and the finals are slated for 1:30 p.m.

Hats off to Bison fans:

TO THE EDITOR

Having attended many college basketball games over the last 40 some odd years, I think I can say there is probably no better home crowd than the one in Davis Gymnasium.

The Bucknell student body and crowd proved it again last Saturday.

I have seen both Bucknell-Holy Cross basketball games this season, and they both have been truly an example of what college basketball should be all about. The intense rivalry, the sportsmanship between teams, and the general tenor of the competition is a great showcase for Patriot League athletics.

I guess I could say that I wish there was less "bulls—" and less "Holy Cross S——", but there is plenty of precedence set on national television for both those slogans.

If all goes according to plan, there will be a repeat performance next Wednesday night to be nationally televised. I know the Bucknell crowd will again exhibit what college competitive athletics should be all about (and I hope maybe a little bit less of the BS and HCS).

My hat is off to the Bucknell community.

Men's and Women's Indoor Track & Field Teams

Every member of both the men's and women's indoor track & field teams has been selected as The Bucknellian's Athletes of the Week for their dominating performance at last weekend's Patriot League Championships. This is believed to be a Bucknellian record for honorees.

Multiple Bison scored in nearly every event to prove once again that superior depth and talent are a deadly combination that no other Patriot League team can come close to matching. Both squads successfully defended their titles and provided the home crowd with two of the three championships won last weekend. See the related track articles on page B1.

Lady Bison upset Army, face Cross

Bucknell goes on the road to pull off its first ever Patriot League tourney victory

BY MIKE MELESKY AND NEIL BARDACH
Bucknellian Staff Writers

Even in the relatively young Patriot League, making history is making history. And the Lady Bison did just that Tuesday night at West Point when they defeated Army, 50-46, in the opening round of the 1993 league tournament.

With the upset victory, Bucknell (11-16) advanced past the quarterfinal round in the tourney for the first time ever.

Last Saturday in its final game of the regular season, the Lady Bison went down to League champion Holy Cross, 77-65, in Lewisburg.

In front of 576 fans in NY versus the Cadets, the winning effort by the Lady Bison was led by Kelly Kempton '93, who led all players with 13 rebounds and 14 points, including six for six from the charity stripe. Kempton recorded her first-ever double-double in what was perhaps her best all-time performance on the hardwood.

The Orange and Blue were led to a 22-18 halftime lead behind Kempton's early efforts.

In the second stanza, Bucknell's chances of advancing to Worcester to again play Holy Cross seemed to be fading as the Cadets grabbed their only lead of the game, 37-36. Past that juncture, however, the visitors took control for good when Kempton scored to give the Bison a one-point edge with four and a half minutes remaining.

Also pitching in valuable efforts were Joy Sandler GR and Anne McGovern '93, who each garnered ten points on the evening. McGovern was two for five from three point land, and blocked one shot.

Juliet McGee '93 struggled from the floor, shooting only four of twelve for eight points. However, she continued to be a force on the boards, grabbing 12 rebounds on the night. McGee was named All-Patriot League First Team but, despite her tremendous season, she was overlooked for the MVP honors.

Also scoring eight for the Bison was K.C. Vlah '96. Vlah was a perfect four for four on free throws and did not sit on the bench once in the game, as she provided her usual hustle and ball-handling skills for the team. Vlah was named to the Patriot League All-Rookie Team, although some believed she could have received Rookie of the Year honors as well.

The key to the win over Army (12-15) was from the free throw line, with the team sinking 13 of 17 shots on the night, including all four attempted in the first half. Appropriately enough, Kempton finished off Army with a pair of critical shots from the line with 24 seconds left in the contest.

The regular season finale against the first-place Crusaders ended in a loss which apparently did not linger in Bucknell's mind for terribly long. The nine-point setback completed a season sweep for the Crusaders, but did not serve to dampen what was the team's best performance since the Bison went 16-12 in 1989.

Leading the Bison in scoring was Sandler, who notched 22 on the afternoon in a season-high scoring output. Lauren Wagner '96 scored eight points, including two three-point field goals.

The missing link for the Bison this day, meanwhile, was McGee's offensive firepower. The Orange and Blue's mainstay all year was off all night, sinking only four of 17 from the field and only managing five boards, although three came on the offensive end of the court.

Bucknell, as Army would do two days later against the Bison, suffered from the Crusaders' immaculate shooting from the foul line. Holy Cross blew out the lights, dropping in 22 of 24 opportunities from the stripe.

In addition, the cause of the Crusaders was certainly not hurt by excellent 70% accuracy from the kingdom of the trey-people (9-13).

The Orange and Blue actually outscored the eventual tourney top-seed in the second half, 35-34, but still never led in the match. Nevertheless, the Bison displayed vast improvement this past week when one considers that they were roughed up in the first meeting of the year up North, 80-50. In that contest, the Orange and Blue never quite got things rolling.

The third time will hopefully be the charm for Bucknell, though, as it will face off against the Crusaders (20-7) for the final time this season later tonight.

ing sophomore won the 55m dash (7.3), 200m dash (25.77), and the shot put (41'7 3/4"). Hinton established new meet records in the latter two events. Interestingly enough, Hinton did not get the opportunity to race against rival Tina Beth Pina of Lafayette, who had the fastest 55m time going into the meet. Pina tore her hamstring in the 55m trials and was unable to compete in the rest of the meet. Hence, Hinton easily walked away with the two sprinting titles. Hinton got help from teammates Dana Harbst '93 and Julie Diercks '93 in the 55m as they placed third and fifth, respectively.

As has been the case all season, the jumpers came through with big points. In the triple jump, a flu-ridden Kelly Peet '96 led the way with a first place jump of 36'5 1/2". Teammates Tanya Barnes '95, Jenn Thomas '94, and Mary Clare Thompson '95 placed third, fourth and fifth, respectively. The long jump again was orange and blue dominated with Norine Nadeau '96, Peet, and Thompson finishing second, third and fifth, respectively.

Dawn Ellery '94 continued her undefeated streak in Patriot League competition as she soared 5'4" to win the high jump. Ellery now garners five Patriot League High Jump titles in indoor and outdoor combined. She'll be searching for title #6 in May.

Bridget Dean '95 got her first Patriot League victory as she won the 500m in 1:18.2. Dean came from behind to nip Fordham's Karen McAuliffe at the line in an outstanding race. Dean barely missed a second win in the 55HH, as she placed second in 8.78.

Kristen Opdyke '93 also got her first indoor title as she won the 3,000m in 10:16. After finishing third in the 5,000m earlier, a determined Opdyke sprinted past Lehigh's Gretchen Repasky with three laps to go and held on for the hard-fought win.

Bucknell's distance women also had a great day. Kathy Wurster '94 took second in both the 1,000m (3:03), and the 1,500m (5:07). Gina Abraham '93 also did double duty with a fifth place in the 1,000m (3:05), and a third in the 1,500m (5:07). Becky Tobin '95 used a devastating kick to blow by two Fordham runners in the final 100m to place second (2:22) in the 800m.

Overall, it was a fantastic day for the Lady Bison, a true team effort by all. There was even a little fun after the meet as Coach Gulden got doused with a cooler full of ice water as part of the celebration. He still had a smile on his face, albeit a wet smile. Now as the trophy sits happily in the cabinet in the field house, one thought comes to mind: Only 8 more weeks until Outdoor Patriot League Championships. Can the women in orange and blue do it again?

crawl, many times milking the shot clock to under ten seconds before even setting up their offensive attack.

Said Russell Peyton '93, "They came out running a four corners offense with one man in the middle. They could go either way (with the ball), and you can't really defend it. You just have to hope the help comes over."

The excessive stalling was obviously disconcerting to the Bison throughout the game.

Said Peyton of Lehigh's new look offense, "It wasn't a surprise, knew if we executed in the second half, then we could still win it."

The second half started off slowly for the home team, as Lehigh scored the first four points of the half. However, the Bison responded with a 12-4 run that lasted 3:02, including a monster dunk by Bright at 15:50 to give the Bison the lead, 32-31. Simpson followed with a layup, forcing Lehigh to call a time out.

It looked as though the Bison might pull away at this point, as Simpson scored the next basket following the timeout. However, really. We figured they'd change something, maybe to a zone or a different offense (for this game), but we didn't expect them to start their offense with ten seconds left on the shot clock. [And] we were getting, good open shots. We just weren't hitting them."

This was especially true during the first half, when the Bison scored only 22 points, including only 3 from Patriot League MVP Mike Bright '93. In Bright's defense, he did everything he could, but the shot just didn't drop through the hoop. He managed only one three pointer at the end of the first half, and finished the game with 9 points, and more importantly, 10 rebounds. Chris Simpson '94 led the team in scoring with 18, including 12 crucial points in the second half. Simpson sank 3 of 4 from the line and hit one three-pointer as well.

Raymond Brown '94 paced the Bison in the first half with six points. He continued his good work after the intermission, finishing with 14 points for the game. The Bison entered the locker room in the uncomfortable position of trailing by two points.

"We've been down at the half before," remarked Peyton, "We Lehigh hung scored the six straight points to regain the lead, 39-38 with 10:09 remaining in regulation. The Bison trailed two more times, first when the Patriot League's leading scorer, Chuck Penn, buried a three with 2:19 remaining, but Matt Clark '93 responded with a three of his own. Clark had good night from behind the three point line, shooting 4 of 8 for all of his 12 points.

With the scored tied Peyton committed a foul with 1:19 left on the clock, and Lehigh's Rashawne Glenn dropped both ends of the one and one to give them the lead.

Simpson answered with a layup with 1:19 remaining, and when the Bison got the ball back, they had a chance to win it in regulation. Playing for the last shot, Peyton missed a baseline jumper with under ten seconds to go. Lehigh grabbed the rebound and called time out, but their inbound pass was intercepted at half court, running out the clock and forcing overtime.

The Bison played solidly in the extra period, and never trailed. Bright hit two clutch free throws to ice the game with seven seconds remaining. This gave the Bison the narrow win.

You might ask, where does this all occur? One would tend to immediately think of Duke, Michigan or Indiana. How about right here in the friendly confines of L-burg. You guessed it—Bucknell University, a small liberal arts college of roughly 3,400 students in the picturesque Susquehanna Valley, has been struck by March Madness.

Davis Gymnasium is the site where this epidemic has spread to epic proportions.

You might wonder how such a big-time illness would happen to surface in our tiny crevice of Central Pennsylvania. This monster that leaves its hapless victims ailing develops slowly until the fan simply goes crazy with basketball fever. It begins as a mild stream of perspiration in early December as the anticipation builds for another exciting season. This then evolves into a slight fever after the roof is nearly blown off Davis Gym following a thunderous dunk by Raymond Brown or Mike Bright.

This fever leads to a case of the chills after pick-pocket artist Russell Peyton leaves yet another victim empty-handed and heads the other way for the ez lay-up. The disease then begins to spread to your roommate, your best friend, your classmates, the townspeople, and even the president of the University.

You all then cram yourselves into an extremely undersized building (that's another story altogether) and yell at the top of your lungs. Reach the point of a near-heart attack as Matt Clark lets go of a trey. Jump off the edge of your seat as Chris Simpson drives to the hole and finishes off the play with a soft left-hand lay-up and gets the foul call. You are on the brink of insanity.

Solaida Mamsaang — The Bucknellian

The Davis Gym throng were less than gracious hosts to the visiting Crusaders, who trailed the final 30 minutes of the game which decided the Patriot League's regular season champion and tourney top seed.

You watch the hours of the day tick by lethargically, waiting for the next opportunity for the excitement-filled rendezvous. How does one go about curing this problem? Doctors and researchers have unfortunately not been able to develop a remedy that will ameliorate the stricken person's condition. There seems to be only one known method that will save the helpless victim from killing himself.

The only thing that will allow the sickness to go away or run its course is time. The only way that a person can loosen the death-grip which March Madness applies is to wait for mid-April. At that time, college basketball will have ended yet another season.

Students will then remove the paint from their faces, the basketballs from their heads, and return to their dorm rooms as well as the classrooms and their overall daily routines.

Professors will re-schedule tests and return to the blackboard to educate these scholars for the good of the future world. The birds will chirp again, and peace and serenity will return to Lewisburg and the rest of the country. All that will be left are the memories...Well, at least until next March rolls around.

classmen who not only play, but contribute in a big way. In addition to Juda, Lauren Maney, Laurie Carson, and Karen Lee all see significant playing time.

In fact, Holy Cross, who will press the Lady Bison for most of the game, will use between 9 and 11 players tonight. Ironically, one of the keys to the success of Bucknell in the latter portion of the year has been the play of Lisa Fink '93 off of the bench. Despite the fact that her point totals have dipped somewhat over the last few games, Fink has been a spark when she enters the game. Her ball-handling ability and speed enable the Lady Bison to pick up the tempo when she is in the game.

In the other semifinal game tonight, Lafayette hosts Fordham.

Bison used superior depth, balance, and patience to dominate the meet. Depth: Bucknell had over 25 different people score points. Balance: the Bison scored in every single event except the triple jump (their top entry got injured). Patience: being able to wait and train all winter for one meet and then let it all out. Enough credit can't be given to the best coaching staff in the Patriot League and the most dedicated group of student-athletes.

"This may be the sweetest championship I've ever won as a coach," said the coach who wins around three championships a year. "I've never given a team an A+ before, but I can't help it."

There are several other factors which Gulden points to for making last weekend one of the highlights of his distinguished coaching career. Getting back to the track being perfect, "several rival coaches spent untold hours bitching and moaning about the fact that you couldn't wear spikes on our track or that the runways were too slick," said Gulden. Actually, the times were better than those recorded at Lehigh, and several athletes recorded season-best results. Also, all of the other Patriot League teams were offered the opportunity to compete in our field house on several occasions. Each one declined this golden chance to practice on the track.

"They can have no complaints because they could have practiced here," said the still-smiling coach.

Perhaps the ultimate tribute to Bucknell's outstanding staff and team came from the admitted goals and strategies of their opponents. "We're looking for second place," could be heard coming from the mouths of Leopards and Engineers. Gulden answered that by saying, "If you ever hear me, any one on our staff, or anybody on our team say that, shoot me! We never concede anything. We go after it by getting the best out of our kids and letting them get the best out of themselves."

Last, but seemingly most important to Gulden, was the tremendous character and dominance his teams showed in front of his former mentor and boss. Gulden's former coach and later boss at Rutgers University was the meet referee.

"That was very special for me. Everybody associated with our team exuded the best possible atmosphere," added Gulden.

Other than using any clichés about a system, Gulden pointed to last spring's outdoor defeat to Army as a critical ingredient in his teams "taking themselves to the next level."

"That loss sent us some signals that we had to re-evaluate our goals and look higher," said Gulden. "Every team in our conference has improved, but we went levels above them."

You rarely hear the words "perfect," "wonderful," "thrilling," and "superb" come from Gulden's mouth after a meet. But it's not every weekend that you witness a program being taken to the next level.

INDIVIDUAL RESULTS FROM THE PATRIOT LEAGUE TRACK AND FIELD CHAMPIONSHIPS

In the throws, specifically the 35-lbs weight, Sam Bijelic '93, Jim Heizman '96, and Pete Gregory '93 placed third, fifth, and sixth, respectively. (The top six finishers in each event score team points) Erik Steiler '96, Bijelic, and Gregory all scored in the shot put.

The jumps yeilded some more points for the Bison as Brett Karcher '93, Eric Wertz '96, and Brian Dreschler '95 took first, second, and fifth, respectively, in the pole vault. In the high jump, John Plante '94 and Blaine Fawcett '93 took the first two spots, while Brian Preputnik '96 tied for fifth. Two Bison scored in the long jump. Ed Loges '96 captured second place and Dreschler fifth.

The distance races yielded more great results for Bucknell. In the 5,000-meter run, Mike Bronson '93 won and Chris Priestaf '95 finished third. The one-mile run saw Tom Eagleson '93 sneak into fifth. But, the Bison's best distance event was the 3,000-meter run. John Lewis '93, Judd Jarden '93, and Bronson took second through fourth places. Finally, Jim Farrer '93 snuck in for the final scoring position in the 1,000-meter run.

Bucknell sprinters faired very well also. Brad Bernardini '94 and Derek Hamilton '94 finished first and sixth, respectively, in the 55-meter dash. In the high hurdle version at that distance, Fawcett, Loges, and Adam Scarlatelli '94 all picked up points. Bernardini scored in the 200-meter dash.

Five Bison scored in the middle distance events. Jean Simon '94 finished fourth in the 400-meter dash. Brian Breslin '95 and Dave Slupe '93 finished second and fourth in the 800-meter run. The 500-meter run featured Rick Van Emburgh '95 and Kris Fischlein '95.

Finally, Bucknell's relay teams starred in the three races. The distance medley relay unit and 4X400-meter unit, both finished second. The 4X800-meter relay team finished third.

Bison end season with failed hopes

Raymond Brown '94 congratulates Holy Cross's Bill Walker after the Crusaders' 98-73 win over the Breakin' Bison in the Patriot League Championship game played in front of a packed house and a national television audience. Six students to give homeless a break

Volunteers take part in Habitat for Humanity

BY NEIL BARDACH
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Some members of the Bucknell community will spend their Spring Break lounging under the sun in some tropical setting, attempting to perfect their tan, possibly sipping on a cool, refreshing lemonade, soda, or perhaps a margarita.

Others will hit the slopes, attempting to find the best skiing possible for the month of March.

But, while most of us are having fun, enjoying our break from the rigorous daily life of a Bucknell student, six Bucknellians will be spending their time helping others. These people are members of Habitat for Humanity, an international organization with the goal of providing low income housing for those in need.

One of the members of the group, Amy Liebert '94, went on a similar trip last year, so she knows exactly what they are up against.

"A group of six of us are going up to New Haven, Connecticut over Spring Break," said Liebert. "We'll be spending the week with the local affiliate, and we will be helping them with whatever they need us to do, more than likely drywalling." Liebert added, "The work is mostly the rehabilitation of old houses, getting them up to proper living conditions."

The other five members of the group are Carrie Himes '94, Mike Urban '96, Jody Foss '96, Shannon George '96, and Julie Weber '95.

The group will stay with the local affiliate from Yale University. Liebert said, "Right now, I don't know if anyone other than the Yale affiliate will be there. Usually, there is more than one group with us."

The Bucknellians will be participating in an annual event run by Habitat for Humanity called the Collegiate Challenge. Liebert said, "Each year Habitat for Humanity holds a Collegiate Challenge. I went on the program last year, when we went to Charleston, South Carolina, to help their local affiliate."

Habitat for Humanity, according to Liebert, is "an international organization. It is Christian based, but most of the volunteers do not participate for religious reasons. The volunteers help build low income housing for those who need it. We don't think that present public housing is adequate."

Liebert added, "Habitat for Humanity is based primarily in the United States, but there are also affiliates in Africa, South America, and elsewhere throughout the world."

Urban, a freshman, began his volunteer work with Habitat for Humanity this year. He said, "I signed up for Habitat for Humanity at the Activities Fair at the beginning of the year." Mike hopes to be "giving something back to the society that has given us so much." Urban, like the other freshman in the group, is unsure exactly what he will be doing in Connecticut, but he is enthusiastic about the opportunity to help others.

Financial troubles discussed at forum

BY DENISE MAUTONE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Amid severe budgetary concerns, top administrators for the University held an open forum entitled "Direction Setting" to alert the campus community of the financial concerns which will plague Bucknell through the next few years.

Heather Jobson—The Bucknellian

At Monday's forum, President Gary Sojka voiced concerns over the future of the University.

The forum, held Monday in Vaughan Literature Auditorium, drew a crowd which consisted primarily of faculty and administrators. Issues such as faculty size and budgets for library and computer services were presented by a panel of four: President Gary Sojka, and three vice presidents—Larry Shinn, academic affairs, Barry Maxwell, administration, and Barbara Shailor, student services.

Sojka, opening the discussions, said, "The situation that exists at Bucknell today and in recent years is such that we have experienced rather dramatic endowment growth." Over the last eight years, endowment has grown from roughly $40 million to $130 million today.

Sojka praised some of the University's past achievements, such as proper budget balancing and remaining out of the "black" in terms of debt. But with this positive reflection, came the question: "With all of that, why would we be talking about restructuring?" The answer Sojka provided indicated the dire circumstance of the University's current financial position: "[it] is sufficiently serious that we wish to bring the issues to the entire campus community," he said.

Sojka elaborated, "We obviously feel that the trends that we project from this point forward are reason for concern, not a crisis, but reason for concern." The issues, predominantly financial, are "only indicators of the structure of the institution. My three colleagues will present various views," Sojka said.

Speaking next, Shinn, reflected on the rapid changes that are taking place technologically. "I suspect that I don't need to convince any of you sitting here today that we live in a highly technological world that is character-

Day care service to be addressed

BY DEB MANASSE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

As more women's careers necessitate their leaving young children in institutional care situations, Bucknell has been faced with the need to reassess its commitment to childcare for its employees.

Sunflower Day Care, a private childcare service currently located in rented space in Tustin Gym, has served many Bucknell parents since its creation in Sept. of 1978.

Several members of the campus community, however, feel that the center, which gives the children of Bucknell faculty and staff first priority in return for rental space and routine upkeep from Bucknell, is becoming increasingly inadequate in addressing the needs of Bucknell families.

In response to at least one of the concerns voiced in recent years, that of inadequate facilities, a proposal has been made that would move the center to the old farm house located across Route 15 near the Art Barn. The proposal is pending approval at the May Trustee meeting.

According to Vice President for Administration Barry Maxwell, the proposed move stems from the findings of the Committee to Review Childcare, organized during the 1990-91 school

Library is forced to cut periodical subscriptions

BY SARA K. WALKER
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Although the budget for periodicals in Ellen Clarke Bertrand Library has steadily increased over the years, a cut-back in the number of subscriptions is about to be implemented to compensate for an 18 percent price increase in serial subscriptions in the past year.

According to Tara Fulton, assistant director for collection development, the library's budget cannot keep up with this inflation. However, the announced cut has raised concern among some faculty, who fear that a valuable resource is being harmfully diminished.

The price increases are not solely affecting Bucknell; rather they have been on the rise for the past ten years, and have altered the amount of spending allotted for periodicals in several university libraries, says Fulton.

This is Bucknell's second round of periodical cancellations. The first one was made in 1991. Despite the cut, Fulton said that "Bucknell is still very well supported in terms of journals when looking at comparative institutions." Although Bucknell is in fact on its second project of cut backs, other universities are on their fourth or fifth, says Fulton.

Hans Veening, professor of chemistry and chair of the department, regrets the future decrease of periodicals. Although he understands that the prices of these journals have increased considerably, he believes that the administration is "cutting at the fabric of the institution when it cuts library journals."

Veening's concerns mirrored those of other faculty members when he described the library as the "heart of the university." He further mentioned that this has been the second cut in the past two years, and that if they continue "nothing will be left."

Fulton sympathized with complaints that valuable resources are being omitted from the library and

Motion to abolish URC highlights problems

BY ANDREW COHEN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Charges against the University Review Committee (URC) came to the floor of the Mar. 1 faculty meeting in the form of a motion by Jean Shackleford, professor of economics, to abolish the URC.

Shackleford, whose motion to abolish the body that reviews and has the final say on departmental tenure and retention decisions, said that the motion reflects her opinion that "I don't think the URC is doing the job that the faculty set out for it to do."

These recent URC reversals underscore a history of controversial decisions in which department recommendations have been overturned. Adrienne Birecree and Janet Seiz both former assistant professors of economics were denied retention by the URC after their retention was recommended by the economics department in December 1987. Both sued the University and settled out of court in 1989 on undisclosed terms.

Faculty discontent is currently centered around two recent decisions in which positive recommendations from the respective Departmental Review Committees (DRCs) have been overturned by the URC. Gordon Meyer, assistant professor of management, and Susan Smith-Baish, assistant professor of electrical engineering were both recommended by their respective departments for tenure; both recommendations were overturned by the URC.

"The fact that they [the URC] can come up with a different view when the DRC is closest, and that view holds, doesn't sit well with a lot of faculty," said Steve Becker, chair and associate professor of year.

Maxwell said that the committee was formed as several factors made it necessary to review the need for, and scope of, childcare facilities at Bucknell.

"There was a general recognition that state regulations on day care were changing and that would have an adverse impact on [Sunflower's] present facilities," said Maxwell. "But there was also the feeling that Sunflower provides a valuable service. It was essential for Bucknell to see the increasing need for employers to recognize that childcare facilities are increasingly important to our employees because of the increase in the number of mothers in the workplace."

After conducting a study, the Committee outlined three areas it felt needed to be addressed with regard to the current services at Sunflower and called for Bucknell to review its commitment to childcare.

"The Committee highlighted the need for a larger space and a study of access and affordability of the services," said Cathy Sweeny, director of personnel services and co-chair of the Committee to Review Childcare.

The results of a campus survey conducted by the Committee suggested that the Tustin Gym facility was a considerable liability for the center. "People were saying that they had chosen away from Sunflower because of the facility," said Harriet Pollack, professor of English and co-chair of Committee to Review Childcare. "They did not want their children in a space as dismal as that space."

As the mother of a three year-old who currently attends Sunflower, Pollack understands this concern. "It's a basement, it's windowless, it has ventilation problems, temperature is always a problem, it's crowded," said Pollack "In some ways it is past rehabilitation."

The University hopes that the move will alleviate such problems. "The new space will be better designed," said Maxwell. "It will have more outside light and better climate control."

"The farm house provided a location that was safe, that had green space, and that had adequate parking for dropping children off," said Sweeny. "We looked at a number of places but none of them had all of those elements."

The space Sunflower would occupy at the farm house would present many benefits, according to Pollack. The fact that the house is, as Pollack describes it, "on campus, but not exactly on campus" allows for convenience for Bucknell parents without the traffic and competition for space that would be involved with a purely on-campus location.

Susan Naughton—The Bucknellian

Caitlin Marshall and Renee Robinson are two of the children who spend their days playing at the Sunflower childcare facilities.

Pollack added that the location would also be ideal for students doing curricular work at the center, allowing them to work with the children without leaving campus.

Pollack also noted the possibility of future expansion and the availability of nature study as benefits not possible at the Tustin Gym site.

According to Pollack, however, in addition to the need for cosmetic and practical improvements to the center, the move to the farmhouse may be especially urgent in light of state regulations. "The regulations are still in flux," said Pollack. "Sunflower has a temporary waiver, but the regulations will eventually result in having to eliminate eleven children from the program. That could bankrupt Sunflower."

The possible decrease in the number of children Sunflower is able to accommodate highlights the issue of inadequate access to Sunflower's services.

"My daughter is three now and she has been at Sunflower since she was six months old," said Pollack. "I started her as an infant because if she didn't start then, I wouldn't have had child care. Who is in the baby room determines who gets space in the older groups. Demand is very, very high."

Although a move to the farm house would help to ameliorate Sunflower's space problem, the new facility would initially not allow for additional spaces to be incorporated into the program.

"We view this to be Phase I of addressing childcare needs on campus," said Sweeny. "Because of budget limits we are not able to increase the number of children who can attend right now."

Nonetheless, the farm house does have the potential for future expansion. "The farm house allows for the possibility of making an addition onto the building which would allow for more children to attend," said Sweeny.

Unfortunately, as the University faces increasing budget crunches, expense remains a constant factor. "It will end up being a cost issue," said Maxwell.

"We discussed the cost issue with the Trustees in November and proposed a budget of approximately $260,000 for renovations," said Maxwell. The University is currently conducting a feasibility study to determine whether adequate renovations can be achieved within that budget.

"We know there is a need," said Maxwell. "We believe we have a site that can meet those needs within a budget."

Despite such budget restrictions, those involved with the renovation plans remain optimistic about the possibilities for Sunflower's future. "Final approval has not been given but we continue to hope that we will be able to move ahead," said Sweeny.

Many Bucknell parents hope that Sweeny's optimism is not unfounded. "The reality is that we need this," said Pollack. "Sunflower has reached a crisis situation where either it is going to stay on campus or it will leave. If it leaves campus a lot of Bucknell parents are going to be affected."

stated that, "It is hard to see the loss of titles for everyone involved, but it is necessary to respond to the economic situation." Fulton also emphasized that there is no one department being affected more than another.

Michael Moohr, associate professor of economics and chair of the department, said that he would be more at ease with the cut backs if he was convinced that they are the only alternative. His request is that the administration put everything from the budget out on the table, and then decide where cuts should be made.

In brief, he "wants to look at the whole picture in order to be persuaded." The University needs to establish priorities, and Moohr does not feel that it has adequately done this.

Veening offered two potential solutions to this problem. He believes that "the administration should go all out and try to support the library" possibly through outside funding. Second, with regards to chemistry periodicals, Veening suggested that the American Chemistry Society put pressure on the publishing companies to reduce their prices.

All subscription cuts are determined by the University Library Community Advisory Committee, headed by Fulton as assistant director for collection development.

The committee which has struggled with the need to unilaterally cut subscriptions, is composed of faculty and students, whose duty it is to provide insights and advice about policies and what should be communicated to the University community, as described Fulton.

The advantage of having faculty members in the committee, according to Fulton, is that they remain aware of the situation and are not surprised when the changes take place. Their help is necessary because they are able to look at the periodicals within their department and prioritize these titles.

By doing this, the titles at the top of the list, which are the most crucial to that particular department will remain. On the other hand, the titles at the bottom of the priority list are at a greater risk of being limited, said Fulton.

The library committee, according to Fulton, is attempting to minimize problems by increasing ways to access information. Students can use the Interlibrary Loan service to borrow books and journals.

The degree to which the subscriptions will need to be scaled back will become more clear in the summer after further research and discussion, said Fulton.

ized by global, environmental, economic, and political forces that seem to change more rapidly than our ability to comprehend them."

Shinn continued, "What is said about the world economy can be said about educational institutions as well. Recognizing these current forces of change, Bucknell's strategic plan asks 'How can Bucknell educate students so that they can be life-long leaders in such a rapidly changing world?'"

Shinn spoke of the need for faculty and administrators to put students, rather than themselves, at the hub of the institution. In addition, Shinn named three pressing areas which he felt needed increases in expenditure: 1) the question of the addition of new faculty, and new needs for faculty development and salaries; 2) the library's acquisitions crisis; 3) the growth in the computing services in the learning process.

Faculty Dilemmas

"In a time of spiraling costs elsewhere in the institution that we can't control," Shinn said, "then why are we purposely increasing costs in an area that we can control, like the number of faculty. This leads to why then add 25 new faculty positions?"

Shinn related statistics from both current and past years. For example, student-faculty ratios which were 16:1 eight years ago have only dropped to 13.5:1. Shinn said, "This is the highest in our frame of reference group, and it sits right in the middle of our competition group for admissions. Why is this so relative a number? If we are trying to create a small learning environments where students get a personalized education, then the size of classes matters."

In addition he addressed the curricular demands placed on faculty. On an average, one faculty member instructs five classes in one year, a decrease from the previous six required of them. This alone, however, does not lower the student-faculty ratio sufficiently. Under the new Common Learning Agenda, foundation seminars must have approximately 50 sections by the Fall of 1993 translating into fewer students per section.

One positive aspect Shinn mentioned is the increase in the number of classes twenty-five students or fewer, and a decrease in classes containing close to thirty-five students and lectures of ninety students or larger.

Despite the changes in class size, the Engineering department, specifically, has only increased its number of faculty by two. EG100 and the new Five-Year Plan require much more staffing, according to Shinn. The department is reviewing methods of opting to replace many "cookbook" techniques for more creative approaches to laboratory. This boils down to an increase in faculty time, which boils down to the need for an increase in faculty.

Other pressures Shinn addressed involve faculty more directly. The University's goal is to hire at least twenty-five new faculty members, fourteen of which have already been hired. However, new faculty require additional salaries, amounting in an increase of $550,000 of the total operating budget. In addition to these costs, $150,000-$200,00 is spent yearly in the development of existing faculty.

"In order to do the things we think we have to do to accomplish our goals," Shinn said, "we rely on our $40-50 million campaign endowment." He also stressed the need to attract some of the very best scholars to teach students. In order to do this, Shinn said, "the salaries must be competitive."

Library Costs

Although the total library budget has almost doubled since 1983, expenditures still increase yearly. Approximately $1,431,440 is projected to be spent by the acquisitions department, or the purchase of materials. Another $479,000 is projected to be spent on books. The serials budget, which includes academic journals that faculty need to teach their students and do research has increased by 162% in the last ten years. However, the Bucknell Operating Budget's allotment of funding has decreased. Shinn reflected, "With all those rapid increases, we're still falling rapidly behind."

"Beyond the students and faculty, the library is the next most valuable resource on a college campus... it is important that the library's acquisitions budget continue to increase by a rate at least double, even triple the inflation rate into the foreseeable future. To do less would be to defer the maintenance of the central learning resources of Bucknell students and faculty."

Computers

"The key to our new world of informational delivery is to create an integrated network of microcomputers," said Shinn. While only 20 microcomputers existed on campus ten years ago, Bucknell now owns 912 microcomputers, with a new microcomputer lab to be added next fall. The current budget allotted for 1993/94 is $4,758,551. More students are immersing themselves in computing and, according to Shinn, are entering a world that expects an assortment of computer knowledge.

This new computer environment puts strain on the present Computer Services system, especially with the anticipation of conversion to a new network which will add 37,000 new programs. "The real challenge," said Shinn, "is to try to spend money for every opportunity for the future."

Operating Costs

Maxwell provided the statistics necessary in showing where revenue actually comes from. Nearly seventy percent of the budget comes from tuition, he said. "With the current trends in the marketplace," said Maxwell, "it will become increasingly more difficult to stray from tuition as the main source of revenue."

There have been gradual enrollment increases by at least five percent. Current enrollment totals 3265 on-campus students as of the spring of 1993. Within a five year period, the University would like to decrease enrollment to 3200. The University recognizes that with the average rate of growth in prices and inflation, it is becoming increasingly difficult for families to afford the costs of a higher education.

Bucknell currently has an $11 million deficit, with $75 million going right out of the budget to pay off debt. "The only way to effectively balance future budgets", concluded Maxwell is to 1) reduce overall costs, 2) reduce the rates of increase in costs, and 3) reallocate funds."

Admissions & Financial Aid

Shailor, speaking on matters of admissions and financial aid, emphasized that tuition is the driving force behind the University. Shailor said, "the revenue stream is largely dependent on students."

Within the last two years, the admissions department has noted an increase in the number of applications, by at least six percent. But, as students are filing more and more applications, the percentages of students accepting enrollment at Bucknell is steadily declining. According to Shailor, "Students and their parents are actively shopping for their college education. They are looking for the best financial aid packages available. As we all know, Bucknell is one of the poorest in offering financial aid. That is where we lose our edge. We instead give more loans and student work programs."

"The quality of our students has been declining, in addition," said Shailor. In 1988, 84% of enrolling first year students came from the top 1/5 of their class, with an average SAT score of 1196. These statistics have decreased to 76% from the top 1/5, and an average SAT score of 1154.

"We must increasingly ask ourselves, then," said Shailor, "who will apply in the future? Who can come to Bucknell—for that matter, who can afford it?" Finding students who can afford the present tuition costs of Bucknell will be difficult. "There are many students who are in pain because of difficulty with payments. The need for financial aid has especially increased over the last three years alone," said Shailor.

Amarante may retire from Public Safety

By Samantha Schivers

In a heavy Brooklyn accent—making sure to slur together Long Island, pronouncing the word 'Long' for about thirty seconds — Patrol Supervisor Michael Amarante recants rehearsed stories that after a hundred tellings are slick and clean. For added emphasis he throws down his pen just as he speaks of cornering the criminal—an irrevocable lie.

> "I respect the students, and they respect me."
> —Michael Amarante
> Public Safety Patrol Supervisor

"I've got a sense about these things," Amarante said. "I know criminals. I know how they act."

A former New York City Police Detective, Amarante is planning to retire from the Bucknell Public Safety. He originally cited July for his retirement, but has since suggested that he may not leave this summer.

"I don't know how this retiring stuff got started." He pulled down his glasses a little. "I haven't really decided just when I'm going to leave."

Amarante started working at Bucknell in 1975.

"I got tired of waking up at night and shooting blank guns in my sleep. Running and shooting, running and shooting. That's all it was." He picked up his pen and turned it around over his fingers a few times.

"I mean, I could have gone back to the force after my first year here, but I couldn't. The students. It's all for them."

Amarante pulls out a file containing yellowing strips of newspaper. "Here I am, " he said. Headlines naming burglars, robbers, rapists, and murderers accompany, for the most part, brief articles with the dates written conspicuously on the sides. "This is what I did and who I was for a good twenty years."

Amarante pulls out a sheet listing the current investigations on campus. A stolen sign. A missing cheerleading jacket. A stolen decal from a BMW. " This isn't exactly the kind of stuff I had in the city," he said. There I was dealing with the big time criminal, the mob—had to call in the FBI a few times. Yeah, I worked with them on a few cases."

Amarante said, "It was tough giving up the gun and shield to come here. But it all comes down to respect. I respect the students, and they respect me. That's just how it worked out."

Amarante moved from a population of nine million to a population of ten thousand. He doesn't carry a gun anymore.

"In the city, you do the same thing over and over again. It all builds up. Coming here was easy. I don't miss the old days at all. I saw the worst of everything and everybody. I don't miss the streets—I have nightmares about them," he said.

Former Police Detective, Michael Amarante is considering a July retirement after nearly two decades with Bucknell's Office of Public Safety.

Should Amarante decide to leave Bucknell this summer, his retirement will coincide with his sixty-fourth birthday.

Altman arrested after rowdy conduct at game

By Tara G. Gilligan
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Alec Altman '94 was arrested during Wednesday night's game after being expelled from Davis Gymnasium.

He faces charges for disorderly conduct, underage drinking, and possession of a fake driver's license (all summary offenses), according to Corporal Malcolm Herman, arresting officer from Lewisburg Police Department.

As the teams left the court at half-time Altman allegedly pushed Holy Cross's Rob Feaster and one of the team's managers. Public safety officers escorted him out of the gym, prohibiting him from returning that night. According to Herman, Altman allegedly "returned within minutes and refused to leave."

At that point, Herman was called to the scene.

Altman was unavailable for comment.

Maxwell said that the committee was formed as several factors made it necessary to review the need for, and scope of, childcare facilities at Bucknell.

"There was a general recognition that state regulations on day care were changing and that would have an adverse impact on [Sunflower's] present facilities," said Maxwell. "But there was also the feeling that Sunflower provides a valuable service. It was essential for Bucknell to see the increasing need for employers to recognize that childcare facilities are increasingly important to our employees because of the increase in the number of mothers in the workplace."

After conducting a study, the Committee outlined three areas it felt needed to be addressed with regard to the current services at Sunflower and called for Bucknell to review its commitment to childcare.

"The Committee highlighted the need for a larger space and a study of access and affordability of the services," said Cathy Sweeny, director of personnel services and co-chair of the Committee to Review Childcare.

The results of a campus survey conducted by the Committee suggested that the Tustin Gym facility was a considerable liability for the center. "People were saying that they had chosen away from Sunflower because of the facility," said Harriet Pollack, professor of English and co-chair of Committee to Review Childcare. "They did not want their children in a space as dismal as that space."

As the mother of a three year-old who currently attends Sunflower, Pollack understands this concern. "It's a basement, it's windowless, it has ventilation problems, temperature is always a problem, it's crowded," said Pollack "In some ways it is past rehabilitation."

The University hopes that the move will alleviate such problems. "The new space will be better designed," said Maxwell. "It will have more outside light and better climate control."

"The farm house provided a location that was safe, that had green space, and that had adequate parking for dropping children off," said Sweeny. "We looked at a number of places but none of them had all of those elements."

The space Sunflower would occupy at the farm house would present many benefits, according to Pollack. The fact that the house is, as Pollack describes it, "on campus, but not exactly on campus" allows for convenience for Bucknell parents without the traffic and competition for space that would be involved with a purely on-campus location.

Susan Naughton—The Bucknellian

Caitlin Marshall and Renee Robinson are two of the children who spend their days playing at the Sunflower childcare facilities.

Pollack added that the location would also be ideal for students doing curricular work at the center, allowing them to work with the children without leaving campus.

Pollack also noted the possibility of future expansion and the availability of nature study as benefits not possible at the Tustin Gym site.

According to Pollack, however, in addition to the need for cosmetic and practical improvements to the center, the move to the farmhouse may be especially urgent in light of state regulations. "The regulations are still in flux," said Pollack. "Sunflower has a temporary waiver, but the regulations will eventually result in having to eliminate eleven children from the program. That could bankrupt Sunflower."

The possible decrease in the number of children Sunflower is able to accommodate highlights the issue of inadequate access to Sunflower's services.

"My daughter is three now and she has been at Sunflower since she was six months old," said Pollack. "I started her as an infant because if she didn't start then, I wouldn't have had child care. Who is in the baby room determines who gets space in the older groups. Demand is very, very high."

Although a move to the farm house would help to ameliorate Sunflower's space problem, the new facility would initially not allow for additional spaces to be incorporated into the program.

"We view this to be Phase I of addressing childcare needs on campus," said Sweeny. "Because of budget limits we are not able to increase the number of children who can attend right now."

Nonetheless, the farm house does have the potential for future expansion. "The farm house allows for the possibility of making an addition onto the building which would allow for more children to attend," said Sweeny.

Unfortunately, as the University faces increasing budget crunches, expense remains a constant factor. "It will end up being a cost issue," said Maxwell.

"We discussed the cost issue with the Trustees in November and proposed a budget of approximately $260,000 for renovations," said Maxwell. The University is currently conducting a feasibility study to determine whether adequate renovations can be achieved within that budget.

"We know there is a need," said Maxwell. "We believe we have a site that can meet those needs within a budget."

Despite such budget restrictions, those involved with the renovation plans remain optimistic about the possibilities for Sunflower's future. "Final approval has not been given but we continue to hope that we will be able to move ahead," said Sweeny.

Many Bucknell parents hope that Sweeny's optimism is not unfounded. "The reality is that we need this," said Pollack. "Sunflower has reached a crisis situation where either it is going to stay on campus or it will leave. If it leaves campus a lot of Bucknell parents are going to be affected."

stated that, "It is hard to see the loss of titles for everyone involved, but it is necessary to respond to the economic situation." Fulton also emphasized that there is no one department being affected more than another.

Michael Moohr, associate professor of economics and chair of the department, said that he would be more at ease with the cut backs if he was convinced that they are the only alternative. His request is that the administration put everything from the budget out on the table, and then decide where cuts should be made.

In brief, he "wants to look at the whole picture in order to be persuaded." The University needs to establish priorities, and Moohr does not feel that it has adequately done this.

Veening offered two potential solutions to this problem. He believes that "the administration should go all out and try to support the library" possibly through outside funding. Second, with regards to chemistry periodicals, Veening suggested that the American Chemistry Society put pressure on the publishing companies to reduce their prices.

All subscription cuts are determined by the University Library Community Advisory Committee, headed by Fulton as assistant director for collection development.

The committee which has struggled with the need to unilaterally cut subscriptions, is composed of faculty and students, whose duty it is to provide insights and advice about policies and what should be communicated to the University community, as described Fulton.

The advantage of having faculty members in the committee, according to Fulton, is that they remain aware of the situation and are not surprised when the changes take place. Their help is necessary because they are able to look at the periodicals within their department and prioritize these titles.

By doing this, the titles at the top of the list, which are the most crucial to that particular department will remain. On the other hand, the titles at the bottom of the priority list are at a greater risk of being limited, said Fulton.

The library committee, according to Fulton, is attempting to minimize problems by increasing ways to access information. Students can use the Interlibrary Loan service to borrow books and journals.

The degree to which the subscriptions will need to be scaled back will become more clear in the summer after further research and discussion, said Fulton.

"I've got a sense about these things," Amarante said. "I know criminals. I know how they act."

A former New York City Police Detective, Amarante is planning to retire from the Bucknell Public Safety. He originally cited July for his retirement, but has since suggested that he may not leave this summer.

"I don't know how this retiring stuff got started." He pulled down his glasses a little. "I haven't really decided just when I'm going to leave."

Amarante started working at Bucknell in 1975.

"I got tired of waking up at night and shooting blank guns in my sleep. Running and shooting, running and shooting. That's all it was." He picked up his pen and turned it around over his fingers a few times.

"I mean, I could have gone back to the force after my first year here, but I couldn't. The students. It's all for them."

Amarante pulls out a file containing yellowing strips of newspaper. "Here I am, " he said. Headlines naming burglars, robbers, rapists, and murderers accompany, for the most part, brief articles with the dates written conspicuously on the sides. "This is what I did and who I was for a good twenty years."

Amarante pulls out a sheet listing the current investigations on campus. A stolen sign. A missing cheerleading jacket. A stolen decal from a BMW. " This isn't exactly the kind of stuff I had in the city," he said. There I was dealing with the big time criminal, the mob—had to call in the FBI a few times. Yeah, I worked with them on a few cases."

Amarante said, "It was tough giving up the gun and shield to come here. But it all comes down to respect. I respect the students, and they respect me. That's just how it worked out."

Amarante moved from a population of nine million to a population of ten thousand. He doesn't carry a gun anymore.

"In the city, you do the same thing over and over again. It all builds up. Coming here was easy. I don't miss the old days at all. I saw the worst of everything and everybody. I don't miss the streets—I have nightmares about them," he said.

Susan Naughton—The Bucknellian

Former Police Detective, Michael Amarante is considering a July retirement after nearly two decades with Bucknell's Office of Public Safety.

Should Amarante decide to leave Bucknell this summer, his retirement will coincide with his sixty-fourth birthday.

Editor's Note: Several members of the Bucknell community have announced their retirement. The Bucknellian will feature these individuals in articles spanning the next 6 issues.

Altman arrested after rowdy conduct at game

BY TARA G. GILLIGAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Alec Altman '94 was arrested during Wednesday night's game after being expelled from Davis Gymnasium.

He faces charges for disorderly conduct, underage drinking, and possession of a fake driver's license (all summary offenses), according to Corporal Malcolm Herman, arresting officer from Lewisburg Police Department.

As the teams left the court at half-time Altman allegedly pushed Holy Cross's Rob Feaster and one of the team's managers. Public safety officers escorted him out of the gym, prohibiting him from returning that night. According to Herman, Altman allegedly "returned within minutes and refused to leave."

At that point, Herman was called to the scene.

Altman was unavailable for comment.

physics. "There have been three or four cases with unanimous decisions [by the department] and the URC has overturned them."

Richard Fleming, chair and associate professor of philosophy, and in his third and final year on the URC, said that the charge of the URC demands that the possibility of overturning departmental decisions must exist. "The nature of the job is that sometimes criteria are not met, and you have to be willing to vote 'no'—otherwise the committee itself is without any meaning."

While Shackleford said that the motion is an expression of her dissatisfaction, she said she intends for it to "give the opportunity to the faculty to address a body that has a lot of influence on what happens to the faculty in the future."

The URC presents a true dilemma to faculty members. While "it is not questioned that there is some unhappiness about the present practices," said David Ray, professor of mathematics and chair of the faculty, no viable alternatives have yet been suggested. According to Ray, "It may very well be that there is a more effective and efficient way to have someone look over the shoulder of faculty review committees than the URC, but years of discussion have not revealed it."

Shackleford acknowledged that the motion in its current form, leaves a vacuum. She said she "would plan to introduce something so we wouldn't leave reviews in limbo." At present, Shackleford is soliciting input in an effort to develop alternative procedures for the second level review.

Larry Shinn, vice president for academic affairs and a standing member of the committee, urged caution and said that the motion was "premature. We have had a Middle States faculty committee working on, a variety of issues. The report seems to think the URC is working pretty well. We need to get that report to the faculty first."

However, among some faculty members, discontent over the URC warrants immediate attention rather than sitting on the problem. Becker said that he would support the motion even without amendment because he agrees with "the statement, the statement being that the present system is not entirely satisfactory. If I thought it would pass, I would have to think harder about it, but I would still vote for it. We'd just have a little governance problem."

There are several problems with the URC which suggest that many faculty would support at least changing the URC, or in extreme cases like Becker's, abolishing it without an alternative in place in the short term.

Accountability

Shackleford and Becker each cited accountability as the major concern with the URC. "When a committee makes a decision, no individuals are held accountable—everyone just says, 'Well, it was the committee's decision.'"

At the same time faculty are reluctant to put the decision in the hands of one person be it an academic dean, vice president, or president as "other institutions do to separate faculty and administrative judgments," said Shinn. Such a situation, according to Shinn, "creates an adversarial relationship between the faculty and administration."

Fleming also supported the committee concept. "I don't think a single person should make such a decision. It's very difficult to get a committee decision in some cases because of the many perspectives and voices on the committee. But the many perspectives and many voices are, to me, preferable to a single voice of a president or anyone else."

The demand that faculty be involved in the second level of review seems to preclude full accountability. "It is a tough choice," said Becker. "In the past the review was conducted by the council of deans. Then, at least if you didn't like the decision you knew who to complain to. But then, there were problems with faculty input."

Even in its current form, said Becker, the URC may in fact tend more toward the administration than the faculty. "Whatever history there is to the committee, the archivist to that tends to be the administrators because they are always there. It may be that they have more influence due to their continuing membership."

Time

URC members spend the fall semester making tenure and retention decisions. According to

David Ray, professor of mathematics, will deliberate over arguments over the URC at the Apr. 5 faculty meeting.

Fleming, in "no year has there been less than 35 files that required retention or tenure decisions. The work of the committee consists of reading all the material submitted in each file which usually consists of several file boxes in each case."

A candidate's file includes "articles, books, publications, conferences attended, course syllabi, student evaluations, exams, records of committee work or service, the departments review and the candidates response," said Fleming.

In addition to reading an enormous amount of material, the committee meetings are quite time consuming. "We will meet 10-15 times for three to six hours each meeting to discuss the files and to reach decisions," he said.

Faculty members teach a full course load while on the committee.

Even more than the time commitments, Fleming said that there is a large amount of psychological drain involved with being on the committee. "Given the importance of this material for people's lives, it is hard to leave this in the office. The workload is not just reading and discussing, it's the way it becomes a part of your life."

At the same time, Fleming said that the tenure and retention process is infinitely more difficult for those under review. "It's far more difficult to be on the other side—to have to put yourself forward for evaluation. One thing I always try to remember is what is was like to be the person being reviewed by my department and the URC."

The extreme time commitment is an issue agreed upon by both sides in the debate. "I think the workload of the URC is too time consuming and needs to be streamlined," said Shinn.

Crossing Disciplines

Since the URC is composed of four faculty from the different academic divisions within the University (humanities, social sciences, engineering, and natural sciences) and three administrators, for every case there will be URC members trying to interpret vast material from outside of their particular field. "Some departments recommend people whose dossier's weigh pounds. To read all that material, especially if it's not in your field, is a heroic task," said Ray.

This may explain the controversy with recent decisions overturning department recommendations. "How can there be such a dichotomy between what a department thinks and recommends and what another body recommends? Something is not right—either the URC or the department does not understand the other's standards," said Becker.

Each department has it's own set of criteria for teaching, scholarship, and service which may or may not agree with URC criteria and creates a problem with consistency, said Shackleford. For example, members of natural sciences and engineering may hold stricter conceptions of scholarship which favor publication above work in the field and the community, which are more frequently seen in the humanities and social sciences.

While a general criteria for the URC is desirable, recognizing the diversity among the particular disciplines is a major issue. According to Becker, "I think there are some problems due to differences in fields and individuals. As the committee changes, the views of what is scholarship and what is significant to the school may well change."

Evaluating faculty outside of a committee member's particular field makes his task more difficult said Fleming. "I rely heavily on the department's evaluation, on the candidate's presentation on committee members who know the material better than I do and on the outside evaluators [colleagues from other universities who are asked to comment on a candidate's scholarship]."

However, "One has to be careful about suggesting that URC people are unable to judge," said Fleming. "It is obviously the case that some members are more familiar with some aspects of scholarship than others, and that's why others in the field are asked to comment."

Alternatives

At present, alternatives to the URC are scant. Without a new system to consider, Shackleford's motion has little chance of passing, according to Becker. "Many people would be hesitant to vote for it without knowing what process would take its place."

There are three possible directions alternatives to the URC could take: 1) bring second level tenure and retention decisions under administrative control, 2) eliminate the second level of evaluation, 3) change the URC to reduce the aforementioned problems.

Taking second level decisions away from the faculty and into the hands of the administration would likely be opposed by all involved. Although Shinn thinks "that's the most likely direction we would move, I think that would be an unfortunate direction."

Eliminating the URC altogether likewise poses problems. The second level review is intended to serve as a check and to bring consistency to tenure and retention decisions. In addition, those who are denied tenure or retention by the department would not be able to appeal the decision to another body.

Reforming the URC is the most likely alternative. One possibility, according to Becker, is changing the dynamic between the URC and DRC to give more weight to the department. "The URC should have the burden of showing that the department [DRC] made a mistake."

Becker suggested two possibilities for such reform. Under the current system, a simple majority of four votes is required to overturn a department decision. "It might be that to overturn a department decision it should take five votes," said Becker. Another possibility is changing the language in the URC criteria to read that when it overturns a DRC recommendation the URC must be "sure beyond a reasonable doubt," said Becker.

The faculty will debate Shackleford's motion at the Apr. 5 faculty meeting.

Levine to teach learning

Dr. Melvin Levine will hold a lecture on the needs of learning disabled children at 8 p.m. on Mar. 16 in Vaughan Literature Auditorium. His lecture, "What We Are learning About Kids Who Are Learning" is $5 at the door.

On Mar. 17 in Larison Dining Hall, Levine will also conduct a workshop, "Attentional Functions/Dysfunctions: Their impact on Academic Productivity." The workshop is $30 for the five-hour workshop and registration begins at 8 a.m.

Red Cross teaches aid

The Union County Chapter of the American Red Cross will be conducting a standard first aid class on Saturday, Mar. 27 in the Union County Courthouse. The course includes adult CPR instruction as well as first aid for injuries such as fractures, burns, wounds, poisoning, stroke, and diabetic emergencies. Pre-registration is required by Mar. 19.

Smokers need a fresh start

The Student Health Service will host the American Cancer Society's Fresh Start Smoking Cessation Program on Apr. 2, 9, 23, and 30 from noon to 1 p.m. in the Elaine Langone Center scullery.

The programs are free to Bucknell students, faculty, and family and will offer suggestions for dealing with smoking dependency.

Call the Student Health Service at x1401 to pre-register for one of the dates.

Smithson entries due

Two prizes of imaginative writing, one for poetry and one for imaginative prose not restricted to fiction, will be awarded by the Julia Smithson Memorial fund. All regularly enrolled Bucknell students are eligible for competition. No more than six submissions of poetry or two submissions of prose are permitted. Entries are to be submitted to the English department secretary by Apr. 9. There will be no extension of this deadline.

The winning entries will be published in some appropriate way, possibly in Bucknell World or The Bucknellian. A modest monetary award will be given to the winning students.

Russians invade Yale

Five students from Moscow State University are attending Yale this semester as part of a student exchange program. The Russian students found many differences between the two educational experiences.

"You cannot choose your courses [at Moscow State]. You're just given your schedule," said Mikhail Deryabin. The students, who are used to taking ten classes each semester, had a difficult time picking just four or five. They also noticed differences in the grading systems of the two countries: at Moscow State, grades depend on a final oral exam, not on the cumulative work of the semester.

Bloomfield downs around

Bloomfield College now offers Introduction to Circus Arts as a four credit class to fulfill students' humanities and fine arts requirements. Bloomfield president John F. Noonan said the circus course was a big step toward understanding what it takes to succeed. "Basically, this course is about teaching people that they can do what seems at first to be impossible."

The circus course is one of the many innovative approaches that Bloomfield has tried in meeting the needs of its 2,000 students. John H. Towsen, associate professor of performing arts and the man who proposed the idea of the class to the school, said that state universities in Florida and Illinois also offered circus courses, but without the character-building objectives of the Bloomfield course.

Engineers help disabled

Case Western Reserve University is now in its second year of a program in which student engineers design special equipment to make life easier for handicapped people. The thirty-six members of the Case Engineering Support Group have designed such gadgets as an elbow brace for a girl with cerebral palsy that encourages her to flex her arm, and a platform made from milk crates that makes it easier for physical therapists to perform aquatic therapy on their patients.

Founded by Jack Daly, a 1990 Case Western engineering graduate, the group concentrates on developing products that are not available commercially due to prohibitive costs. The elbow brace, for example, cost $16 to produce; an engineering firm contacted by University Hospitals of Cleveland submitted an estimate of $80,000 for the same product.

"This is a perfect fit," said Daly of the relationship between the program and local hospitals. "Our students get real-world experience, and the hospitals get the help they need."

Meditating into a different state of being

BY COLLEEN RUSH
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Imagine waking up at 5:30 a.m., sitting completely still for long periods, eating bean curds for a month, and actually paying someone else for letting you do it. If it sounds like hell on earth, talk to the three Bucknellians who say that the experience was both enlightening and rewarding.

The students, Megan Callus '94, Dave Carleton '94, and Glen Williams '94, participated in a Residential Zen Training Program at the Zen Mountain Monastery in Mount Tremper, New York during January. Though Carleton was the only student to complete the month-long retreat, all three of the students believe they gained knowledge, insight, and experiences from the mediational practices they learned during the retreat.

The typical day at the monastery started at 5:30 a.m. Waking up this early in the morning was one problem Carleton and Williams faced.

"Anybody that knows me knows I can't get up at 5 a.m, but I did it for two weeks," said Williams. "We went to bed at 9 p.m., so that probably helped."

Participants in the retreat practiced zazen (Zen meditation) until 6:30 a.m., sitting for 25 minutes with a five minute break between meditations. Zazen entails sitting in one of several manners, with the hands in the "mudra" position. The mudra position is where the left hand is on the right palm, with the tips of the thumbs lightly touching. The types of sitting positions include an indian style (foot over foot), a Half Lotus (one foot on opposite leg), a Full Lotus (both feet on opposite legs), and a kneeling position sitting on a zafu, or, "meditational pillow."

"Sitting for half an hour for the first time was extremely painful," said Carleton, "because when you sit in one of the positions, the pressure builds up in your shoulders and lower back."

A meditator may choose to relieve the pressure by having one of the monks slap them several times on the shoulders with a long wooden paddle. Though the practice may seem a bit harsh, Carleton insisted, "It's not a punishment and it doesn't hurt. The first few times, I was scared, but after a while, it actually feels good."

After the morning meditation, participants eat breakfast and attend a morning service. Work practice follows the morning service. During this time, participants spend four hours taking care of the monastery grounds. The caretaking ranges from painting the monastery and gardening to sorting nails and sweeping the grounds.

Callus noted that one of the difficulties she had with the program was the work practice, though it had its positive side. "I had a problem with paying them so that I could work, but the practices taught me a great deal of patience and concentration," said Callus.

Williams cited a similar problem with work practice, saying, "The Buddhist experience is based on the community. When you're not meditating, you're working for the community, which doesn't bother me, but it got rather boring."

Lunch and personal time followed work practice. During personal time, participants could read, rest, meditate, or take part in any of the art or body practice classes. At night, the participants had dinner, meditated for another hour, and went to bed at around 9:30 p.m.

The key to the retreat was the meditation practice and learning how to concentrate. "Zazen is basically sitting in whatever position you can get yourself into and focusing on your breathing," said Carleton. "As you concentrate, thoughts run through your head and you're supposed to just let them go and concentrate on your breath again."

Because intense meditation is an unusual practice for most Westerners, the experience can cause strange and even enlightening experiences for a new meditator. Williams recalled his most unusual experience during meditation, saying, "It almost made me stay—but it didn't."

"I was sitting zazen in the zendo (meditational room) one time and I had an itch in my leg," said Williams. "They tell you that if you feel pain or any other sensation that is driving at you and won't go away to focus your mind so much on the pain that your mind goes past the pain and you actually become the pain. In my case, it was an itch, so I just started concentrating on it. The more I concentrated, the more I itched. Finally, I got the sensation that I was the itch. It wasn't a hallucinatory experience...it was more like a sensation experience, where you actually feel like the sensation."

Williams eventually got rid of the itch by imagining a wind taking away the itch. "Finally, I thought, or the itch thought, if it was windy, and I had an itch on my leg, it would go away," continued Williams. "All of a sudden, I started feeling this wind and hearing this wind [making wind noises]. I came out of the sensation, back into my body and the zendo, and I realized what had just happened. It was really weird!"

Both Callus and Williams left the retreat after two weeks, feeling that they had gathered the knowledge they had been seeking from the experience. "I learned what I needed to as far as meditation was concerned," said Callus.

In explaining why he left the retreat early, Williams said, "Two weeks was enough for me to learn what I wanted to learn. I figured that if I stayed any longer that I would have to have an understanding with myself that I wanted to practice Buddhism as a lay Buddhist."

Carleton, who stayed for the entire month, noted that the hardest part about the retreat was the third week of meditation. During this time, participants took part in a new, more intensive practice called sesshin, where talking was prohibited, meditations were twice as long, and meals were ritualized. Carleton noted that the period was a time for "a voyage into yourself."

All three of the students, though hardly knowledgable about the entire religion, left the monastary with a better personal insight and understanding. For Callus, the experience taught her about, "being more balanced, more calm, less anxious, and less judgmental."

Williams, a self-proclaimed agnostic with Christian ethics, added another side to his multi-faceted religious beliefs. "I just take whatever I want from other religions, and if I don't like something about a religion, I just throw it out because its my religion, my choice."

Carleton left with a better idea about concentration and meditation. "Buddhism is more practical because it teaches you that all the different thoughts that are going around in our heads are distracting us from our purpose. The point of Zen is to get you through all the distractions so that you see what you really are," Carleton said, "Nothing like that can happen in a month, but I have started to see where they're coming from."

Though Zen Buddhism is essentially a religious practice because it focuses on practical spiritual training, Carleton said that it was "more of a life experience than a religious experience."

Leane Hood—The Bucknellian

Meghan Callus '94, demonstrates one of the types of Zen meditation positions which she learned during her two weeks at the Zen Mountain Monastery in New York this past January. As a result of her instruction, Callus feels, "more balanced, calmer, less anxious, and less judgmental."

URC needs major revision

The University Review Committee (URC) is in trouble. Every few years controversial decisions are made which lead some faculty to question the efficiency, effectiveness, and most importantly, the equity of the URC. The faculty should take this opportunity to make major changes to the URC.

The second-level review process should not be taken lightly. There are serious problems with the URC, and while alternatives may be few and far between, they must be sought out. It is no small task, but it is within the realm of possibility for a faculty as bright and talented as ours.

Members of the URC easily spend twenty hours a week during the fall semester evaluating candidates' dossiers. Without the benefit of a lighter course load teaching suffers. The sheer time burden faced by URC members needs to be alleviated.

Differences across disciplines can dictate decisions, especially considering that the committee is split down the middle between science/engineering and liberal arts.

And most importantly, unanimous departmental decisions, made by people who know the individual in questions are overturned in favor of a process that mandates an "on paper" review of the candidate, and explicitly rejects any personal knowledge about a professor.

Why not split the committee into three subcommittees headed by the respective administrators? Each subcomittee would be responsible for one broad field: for example humanities, social sciences, and natural science and engineering. Insure that there is adequate representation from the candidate's field of study. And maybe even allow a representative of the department to sit in on meetings as a non-voting member, who will bring a new perspective to the URC.

This will reduce the time problem as well as the difficulty in spanning disciplines.

Hats off to Breakin' Bison

Ask not for whom the bell tolls, it tolls for thee. While Ernest Hemingway may not have had the Bucknell community in mind when he wrote these words, that is how most of the campus feels after Wednesday's Patriot League Championship loss to Holy Cross.

Amid our own sadness, however, we might think to honor our men's basketball team for what they did on the court, for the University, and for our hearts.

Every major college basketball team except one will lose its last game (except those in conferences without tournaments). Teams measure their success by when they lose. We lost earlier than we wanted to, but we should not forget one of the most successful seasons in years. Some might even say, "It's just a game." And while this has the ring of truth, there is something about our team that makes them more than just athletes playing a game.

It's funny how we refer to the basketball team as "We." This is a testament to the way the team touched us, and unified an often bickering campus into a community that shared a common bond.

We should be proud of our players, not just for their success on the court, but for the fact that they typify the ideals of the Patriot League. They're not only great athletes, but great people as well. We are lucky to be on a small campus because most of us have the opportunity to know people on the team. They are our classmates, our friends, and our heroes.

The team showed that it was human Wednesday night; however, humanity is their most endearing quality. We felt the same grief as Mike, Paul, Russell, Mike, Matt, Chris, and Ray; not Bright, Olkowski, Peyton, Clark, Walsh, Simpson, and Brown. Our players are more than just names, they are people to us.

Breakin' Bison 1993, you are a class act that will be hard to follow.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Chenes praised by Weis Center technical assistants

TO THE EDITOR:

Last week the Bucknell community suffered a loss of two very valuable employees. Steve and Chrissy Chene, technical directors of the Weis Center, resigned from their positions. Steve had been with the University for many years, starting in the Theatre Department. Chrissy was hired the year preceding the completion of the Weis Center to oversee its grand opening. Together they founded and built Technical Services into a staff of thirty Technical Assistants and a crew of forty, a marked increase from its initial staff of five.

The undersigned have known Steve and Chrissy anywhere from one semester up to almost four years. We are technical assistants at the Weis Center who worked very closely with the Chenes. Steve and Chrissy ran Technical Services in a way that ensured not only an excellent show technically, but also preserved a family atmosphere in the workplace. Many of us have put in long and hard hours which were made easier due to the respect the Chenes gave us. They made it enjoyable to work for Technical Services because they were very understanding of our needs as students.

A sign of how well Technical Services was run was the inundation of applications from students who wanted to work on the crew of Technical Services. The Chenes' reputation as employers and as co-workers was known by many applicants, and made the idea of a job with Technical Services very popular. To try and illustrate just how much they added to the Bucknell Community and to Lewisburg in an editorial letter is impossible. Without the Chenes, the Weis Center now functions due only to the time and training they gave the students who worked there and the dedication they inspired. Simply put, they were wonderful people to work with and we will miss them very much. All Bucknellians lost something last week when they resigned. We wish them the best of luck in the their future endeavors.

BHL's Life Week was all about "oppression"

TO THE EDITOR:

The members of Bucknellians for Human Life arrogantly declared last week "Life Week." Bucknell students were met with a plethora of propaganda, ranging from anti-choice pins, tee shirts, and ribbons proclaiming "Life Week" to various forms of "literature."

One of the most interesting things to be found at the BHL table in the ELC was a pamphlet describing the purpose of the group. They declare, "BHL upholds positions on life issues including abortion, euthanasia, warfare, and capital punishment." "Hmm," we said, "that's new...they used to just be interested in the restriction of women's access to abortions.... I guess that's progressive of them to take a stand on some related issues."

The issue of reproductive freedom is obviously not about rights, it is about the control of women.

But as we read through their explanations, we realized it was a hoax. Clearly, the "big issue," as always, is restriction of abortion rights (they devote the bulk of the page to this cause). They seem concerned about euthanasia enough to say they are opposed to it. But how strongly do they feel about war if all they can say is, "BHL believes warfare should be avoided if at all possible." Who wouldn't say they like to avoid war when possible? Their concern seems much less sincere with members of the group in ROTC (and many who supported the Gulf War—as if that couldn't possibly have been avoided!)

Finally, they say, "BHL serves to educate...on the issue of capital punishment" while taking no stand against capital punishment (one wonders how much the value of a human life decreases after birth!). Saying BHL upholds a position on capital punishment is like saying George Bush upholds a position on education, the environment, anything. Wasn't he anti-choice, too? Did he start any wars?

Aside from presenting their positions, BHL quotes Abraham Lincoln: "No one has the right to choose to do that which is wrong." Does BHL know Lincoln supported animal rights, too? If members of this group were truly respectful of life, they would see beyond anthropocentric, socially constructed definitions of "life" and fight for non-human animal rights. However, not surprisingly, they take no position here.

Another interesting find at the BHL table were the ribbons in remembrance of "children and women who have died as a result of safe, legal abortions." If BHL is so concerned with women's lives, they should realize that women have a thirteen times higher chance of dying from childbirth than from abortion.

We are continually overcome by the hypocrisy of anti-choice factions. Where were the "right to life" groups (such as BHL) before terminating pregnancies was legal? Abortions were just as common before Roe v. Wade, but when abortion was the leading cause of death among women in the United States there were no "right to life" organizations in existence. The issue of reproductive freedom is obviously not about rights, it is about the control of women.

Additionally, who could help but notice the gender split at the table throughout the week? Men consistently dominated the space behind the BHL tables. This is not surprising, seeing that these men have no wombs which they need to protect and have no chance of ever becoming pregnant.

The most extreme examples of patriarchal control in modern times were the totalitarian leaders Hitler and Stalin, who instituted harsh abortion laws and outlawed all women's rights. Women's subservience to men was a central part of their ideology.

The consistent ideology which leaders of the religious right and groups such as BHL espouse is not one of rights; it is about oppression. War, restriction of women's rights, restriction of Lesbian/Gay/Bisexual rights, capital punishment, opposition to social welfare proposals, anti-environmental legislation—the foundation of all of these stances is an effort to preserve the privilege of an oppressive minority.

In our opinion, BHL served the purpose opposite to the one that they probably intended—they remotivated the pro-choice majority on campus into thinking, talking, and acting on the issue of reproductive freedom. Abortion is an entirely voluntary choice, and until it is available on demand and without restrictions based on class, age, race, etc., pro-choice factions will continue to revolt for the rights we deserve.

Bison crowd lacked spirit

TO THE EDITOR:

I would like to comment on two phenomena which I encountered last Wednesday night at the Bucknell-Lehigh game. First, I want to address the incredibly poor attendance of students at the game. We all bitch and moan that there are not enough seats in Davis Gym, yet we can't even fill the existing seats for a Patriot League play-off game. I realize that it was a Wednesday night and some of you had work to do or had to watch Beverly Hills, 90210, but where were you this past Wednesday for the finals against Holy Cross? Our games are not just social events, they are a chance to show some school spirit. News Flash: If we had lost last week, you wouldn't have had a game to attend this week, and we almost did lose.

Secondly, I'm curious as to whether or not there is glue on the seats in Davis Gym (especially in the section of the bleachers behind the announcers). Bucknell and Lehigh were battling it out, and half of the crowd (mostly non-students) was sitting on their hands and not being very vocal. I even had someone tell me to sit down because she couldn't see. Well folks, if you want to SIT and watch the game quietly, STAY HOME!!!

Anyway, thanks to those of you who made it to the game and special thanks to those of you who actually cheered for our team.

Bison, thanks for a great four years of exciting hoops.

Congress soon to debate the Freedom Of Choice Act

Give women their long-overdue rights to reproductive freedom

BY AMANDA SWARR

The Freedom of Choice Act will give women in the United States rights long overdue and will end states' current power to restrict and legislate women's rights to abortion. Debilitating amendments proposed in many anti-choice states serve to restrict women from their constitutional right to reproductive freedom, based on the right to privacy, which includes "the right to be free from unwarranted governmental intrusion into matters so fundamentally affecting a person as the decision whether to bear or beget a child."

Several restrictive laws which have been proposed (and without the protections of the Freedom of Choice Act, more could follow) directly contradict the aforementioned right. These restrictive amendments would further add to the inequalities and injustices currently present in our society.

The Freedom of Choice Act will be difficult to pass, free from restrictive amendments, without the vocal support of the pro-choice majority.

For example, mandatory parental consent laws are simply anti-abortion laws aimed at teens, obstructing the exercise of young women's abortion rights. These restrictions (currently in place in Pennsylvania) do not exempt women with abusive, ill, absent, or fervently anti-choice parents; instead, they cause young women to put off abortion, prolonging the term of the fetus and increasing the danger for the woman.

Spousal notification, another restriction, defies a woman's right to individuality, defining her based on her relationship to a man who may or may not be the father of the fetus she is carrying. Realistically, it is not possible to legislate good family relations between women and parents or women and spouses.

Mandated delays, such as the proposed 24-hour waiting period, degrade women's intelligence. These restrictions assume that women take abortion lightly and that they do not care enough about the decision to terminate a pregnancy to consider all of their options. Abortion is a decision carefully weighed, as evidenced by the fact that less than 6% of unwed mothers choose to terminate their pregnancy.

Moreover, mandated delays are inherently classist. Since abortions are being offered in fewer areas in the United States, unemployed and low-income women would be forced to spend additional time and money on childcare, transportation, etc.

Finally, restrictions of information (such as the "gag rule" implemented by former President Bush) do not allow full options to be presented. Doctors, lawyers, and others have recognized this as a severe breach of First Amendment rights; never before the "gag rule" had the federal government controlled the sensitive patient-doctor relationship. This frightening restraint did not allow practitioners in Title X-funded clinics to even mention abortion as an option for women who were pregnant, severely limiting women from fully understanding the options granted to them under the law.

States' rights amendments, such as the ones mentioned above, would return women to the days when medically safe abortions were only available to women who were lucky enough to live in pro-choice states or who were wealthy enough to pay for travel to high-priced (and often dangerous) illegal abortionists.

The issue of States' rights has surrounded the Freedom of Choice Act since first proposed. Arguably, limiting all States' rights to place restrictions on abortions could disrupt the balance of state-federal power. Ironically, anti-choice factions (which now adamantly defend State sovereignty) consistently argue for a constitutional amendment banning abortions entirely.

The fight for women's rights to reproductive freedom is far from over. Recent gains for choice have mobilized the right while leaving the left obliviously complacent. The Freedom of Choice Act will be difficult to pass, free from restrictive amendments, without the vocal support of the pro-choice majority.

Action is needed to fight for justice on such issues as terminating Operation Rescue's blockage of abortion clinics and overturning federal criminal laws which consider abortion information obscene (and sending it through the mail illegal). Full reproductive freedom is a fundamental right which has yet to be gained. As Margaret Sanger said, "No woman can call herself free who does not own and control her own body."

Let States at least make restrictions on abortion

BY JOHN STITH
Bucknellian Columnist

The abortion debate isn't getting anywhere! Extremists on both sides keep making a lot of noise and getting a lot of attention. When is the United States going to compromise and move on?

This spring Congress plans to vote on the "Freedom Of Choice Act." This legislation is certainly no compromise. It will not help this nation's abortion dilemma, and if it's passed, the noisy extremists will continue to rage.

What is the Freedom Of Choice Act? It was introduced by the pro-choice side last summer, soon after the Supreme Court took a more moderate stand on the abortion issue.

It's time to insist that our Congress listens to the majority of the people, rather than jumping off the ultra-liberal edge.

Pro-choice supporters weren't too happy with the Supreme åCourt last summer, because the justices decided that Pennsylvania's restrictions on abortion were fine and didn't violate Roe v. Wade. Pro-life supporters weren't so happy either—the Reagan-appointed justices were supposed to get together and overturn Roe, and instead they upheld it.

The restrictions the Court upheld included a 24-hour waiting period, requirements of parental consent for minors (with exceptions), and abortion information requirements. These are laws that the majority of Americans support, as shown time and time again in national opinion polls. (Example: 75% support a mandatory 24-hour waiting period—Gallup, 1992.) So the Court took a moderate position between the two extremes.

But the pro-choice side wants to deny any states the right to pass abortion restrictions. The only place they could do this was the U.S. Congress, so they created the Freedom Of Choice Act.

This legislation would permit abortions at any time during pregnancy. Even abortions in the seventh, eighth, and ninth months could not be withheld if they were necessary for the mother's "health." It is up to the doctor to decide if not having an abortion will hurt the mother's "health." No fetus/child will be protected by this provision.

I believe that most Americans somehow wish to balance the needs of the mother with the needs of the fetus/child. Both have valid interests and are in a tough situation. But does this sound like balance and compromise to you? Is it a plan to move forward? Or does it just sound a bit extreme?

It's amazing that Congress would consider passing this act against the wills of most Americans, but Congress is on a post-election high and the pro-choice lobby currently has a lot of power.

And the main problem is that moderates aren't speaking up. If you've been complaining that the United States spends too much time shouting about abortion, isn't it time to stand up for a moderate position? The Supreme Court attempted to do so, by letting states enact some restrictions. But our Congress threatens to take that away.

So, moderates of the world, unite! Do all those annoying activist things like writing letters to Congress and talking it up with your associates. If you want to take the attention away from the extremists (like Operation Rescue on the pro-life side, and Fund For a Feminist Majority on the pro-choice side), do it! It's time to insist that our Congress listens to the majority of the people, rather than jumping off the ultra-liberal edge.

Kevorkian practices "medicide"

BY JOHN GODBOUT

In December, Governor John Engler of Michigan signed a bill temporarily banning doctor-assisted suicides for 15 months, allowing him time to assemble a team of experts to determine the legality of "medicide."

In response to this law, Michigan's self-anointed Grim Reaper, Jack Kevorkian (more commonly referred to as "Dr. Death" or "Jack the Dripper"), stepped up efforts to ease the suffering of as many patients as he could.

Acting more like a state trooper in need of filling his quota at the end of the month than a professional dedicated to healing people, Dr. Kevorkian accepted eight requests for his "last aid," prompting the Governor to make the ban effective immediately instead of the originally agreed upon date, March 30.

Unfortunately, Kevorkian's blatant disregard for law and life-preserving options will probably create a scenario in which Uncle Sam steps in and assumes the role of life-giver or life-taker.

Although this recent debacle has landed the issue of medicide on the front pages of virtually every national newspaper and magazine, it is not a new issue by any means.

Since the times of ancient Greece, doctors have wrestled with the moral issues related to "pulling the plug." There is a distinct difference though: Kevorkian is not pulling the plug, he is inserting it in the socket. He does the absolute least he can do in terms of counseling his patients, and then he hands them the keys to their own caskets. His job is killing, not easing pain.

Because Kevorkian has taken such delight in placing the tortuous death stories of his patients on evening news broadcasts for two years now, he has forced legal action on himself. And by declaring to the country that laws cannot stop him, he will inevitably force the state of Michigan (and others will follow) to punish any doctor who aids in the termination of a patient's life.

Doctors should focus on curing patients and easing the pain which may seem endless to a terminal patient, not propose death as a prescription for pain. But in rare cases when the patient, his doctor, and the patient's family decide termination is the best solution, it should be an available option.

This is the hardest decision a person could ever make, and is certainly none of the government's business, but it also shouldn't be the job of one doctor. Unfortunately, Kevorkian's blatant disregard for law and life-preserving options will probably create a scenario in which Uncle Sam steps in and assumes the role of life-giver or life-taker.

Jack Kevorkian shirks his duties as a healer when he does nothing but prescribe carbon monoxide; he is little more than a legalized killer.

At the same time, doctors are doing their patients a great disservice if they focus only on prolonging the lives of their patients, failing to recognize the intense pain that some terminal patients experience every day of their lives. Doctors should be trained in medical school to handle sensitive situations which may occasionally require euthanasia, but they should know that this is not a decision to be taken lightly.

It seems these days everything is a crisis which must be remedied immediately by the government; such is not the case here. If the government involves itself in this matter, we will all suffer. And that, unfortunately, will be Jack Kevorkian's lasting legacy.

Condom Week missed the point

BY TOM MALINICH

How many times during Condom Week was a condom thrust upon you? By Tuesday of that memorable week, I was thoroughly annoyed and ready for Condom Week to end. Basically, my opposition to this event stems from my own personal values and qualms with its funding.

I viewed Condom Week as a slap in the face to students who are still trying to hold traditional values dear to their heart. Although I am not opposed to contraceptive distribution, I am disgruntled with the extent to which this issue has grown. Why is it not enough to simply sell condoms on campus? Why did Bucknell find it necessary to not only give free condoms at the medical center, but to practically force condoms upon everybody walking through the LC?

...a slap in the face to students who are still trying to hold traditional values dear to their heart...

I asked this question to several friends, and the resounding response I received was that students would be less likely to use condoms. My rebuttal is that I think it is unfortunate that so many students have this lack of concern and responsibility. Why did Condom Week make no strenuous effort to change this attitude? The event definitely did not encourage anyone to question their own sexual practices in the hope of preventing harmful situations (both physically and emotionally). Instead, the spirit of Condom Week was more of a defeatist attitude: "Students are going to have sex anyway, so we might as well give out condoms in the hopes that they will use them." Come on, now! We are in college, not back home with Mom and Dad. We have new found freedom and independence. I hope that we also have new found responsibility for our actions!

The last point I would like to make on Condom Week concerns funding. I find tuition expensive enough; why should Bucknell spend even more money? Condoms are already available for sale on campus at the Bison, at the Bookstore, and in vending machines. Although the cost of free distribution would not be tremendous, it is still one more cost. It is one additional cost I would rather not have to bear, especially since it is being spent on a pursuit I strongly oppose.

Condom Week is yet another example of Bucknell trying to be more politically correct by placating another special interest group. Although contraceptive availability is an important issue to many on campus, Bucknell should keep in mind that not everyone is in favor of such sponsored events, and should strive for a reasonable compromise.

Have an opinion that will save the world? Why not put it in The Bucknellian first. Call John at x1520 to save the world, or just to get published.

Student evaluations of faculty are crucial

BY MEG WICKMAN

Many students think that faculty members have it pretty easy. I've heard my friends cite relatively few visible teaching hours, sabbatical leaves, life-long summer vacations, and an office of one's own as evidence of a charmed life up in the ivory tower.

However, the recent controversy over tenure decisions has served to remind us of the obvious: the perils and pitfalls of devoting one's life to academia are very real indeed. The arduous and time-consuming process of earning a Ph.D. (or equivalent degree) is only the beginning.

Many course evaluation forms don't address all the pertinent issues, and I've seen both students and professors treat them flippantly.

Bucknell is probably typical in demanding that instructors teach effectively, publish, and participate in University affairs if they wish to progress smoothly along the tenure track.

To students, the demand to publish may seem to be the hardest part of the bargain to fulfill. I am in no position to disagree. However, the fact of the matter is that the road to becoming a professor provides ample opportunities to conduct research and write academic papers. What potential professors don't learn is how to become an effective teacher.

Good teaching at the college level is the result of many things, but formal training in teaching is probably not one of them. Short of overhauling the entire system of higher education in the United States, the best way for professors to gain teaching expertise is through honest and constructive criticism from their students.

That's why end-of-semester evaluations are so crucial. Many course evaluation forms don't address all the pertinent issues, and I've seen both students and professors treat them flippantly. There needs to be one comprehensive evaluation form that is consistently used by every department of the University.

The ideal course evaluation form would be a conglomerate of many already in existence at Bucknell. Students want their professors to hear their answers to certain questions, including:

1) How does the instructor respond to questions from students? Are student comments treated with respect, even if they are way off-base? Or are students too intimidated to ask anything?

2) How does the instructor deal with students who are having trouble with the course material? Is the instructor willing to help students get at the root of the problem? Or does the instructor assume that the student is merely lazy: "There's no reason you shouldn't know this, so I'm not even going to discuss it."

3) How relevant are the course materials? Are they used as a basis for class discussion? Are students assigned material that is barely mentioned in class and bears little resemblance to the course objectives?

4) How are TA's utilized in class? Do they have a thorough understanding of the subject? Are they approachable?

Of course, not every question would be applicable to every course on campus. Not every course has TA's or labs. In some, discussion may not be appropriate. But I think it is a lesser evil to include some unnecessary questions than to leave some very pertinent issues unaddressed.

Student response should be a major aid to instructors. A common course evaluation form would help the Bucknell community clarify what it means by effective teaching.

Athletic Department: Nice Job

TO THE EDITOR:

Just recently, Bucknell faced a most formidable and unforeseen opponent—basketball ticket distribution under extremely high demand conditions. Let's put it this way: for the season finale versus Holy Cross and the first- and second-round tournament games against Lehigh and Colgate, the situation was handled. Just handled.

Now, the stage was set. Bucknell, the number-one seed in the Patriot League Tournament, was still alive. A near-loss to the Lehigh Engineers sent a wake-up call to the players, the students, and the administration alike.

No more complaints; it is time for a change of tone here. No more moans, groans, or screams would prevail, as only cheers were heard arising from the crowd of almost two hundred ticket-hungry students, staff, and members of the Lewisburg community Saturday night. Yes, the athletic department made one great decision. Whether it was rational or merely craze brought on by the full moon shining Bright over us like the Basketball God himself, no one will ever know. But much to the appeasement of those waiting in line since either before or immediately after the awaited and so much hoped for victory over Colgate, preliminary ticket numbers were to be given out that very sacred night. The tent dwellers were thrilled beyond recognition. Though all seemed prepared to stay the night, there would be no need for that to happen. After a meeting of the minds, including Rick Hartzell, Brad Tufts, Toby Lovecchio, and several security personnel, the plusses seemed to outweigh everything else imaginable. "We were the diehard fans, the ones who really wanted the tickets," and wanted to support our pride and glory on the court, as Hartzell so eloquently put it.

No doubt this would save the people waiting from voicing the many gripes concerning others "wandering" into the line during the wee hours of the morning. There is also no question that they have also saved the infirmary many hours of colds treatments, keeping Monday's probable class attendance up as well (much to the liking of the faculty, I'm sure).

Essentially, I would like to thank the Athletic Department for all that they have done. It has been as much a learning experience for them as it has been a thrill of a lifetime for us. We've set precedents that will only improve conditions for the many great Bucknell teams to come.

Thanks, and keep up the good work.

Pro-life groups work in many ways

TO THE EDITOR:

I am writing in response to Andrew Cohen's article, "Pro-life, pro-choice—both sides are wrong," which appeared in the Opinions section of the Mar. 5 Bucknellian. I agree with Cohen that the root cause of many abortions is the high number of unwanted pregnancies in the U.S. today. However, I disagree with his statement that the pro-life side has "totally ignored" this problem.

Cohen noted that there were posters around campus stating that 69% of all abortions were done for economic reasons, and called the pro-life movement to use their money to "stop abortions for real" by solving these economic needs. First, the posters stated that 89%, not 69%, were done for both economic and social reasons. This figure, from a report published by the Alan Guttmacher Institute, is indeed upsetting, especially considering the fact that the majority of Americans do not see such reasons as acceptable ones for obtaining abortions. Secondly, I would like to point out that many pro-life organizations DO help women with economic problems, so that abortion is not seen by the woman as the only choice she has. Crisis Pregnancy Centers nationwide, including one here in Lewisburg, offer women not only free counseling, but also clothing and furnishings for her and her child, and free housing to women who need it. On campus, as part of Life Week, Bucknellians for Human Life held a T-shirt sale to raise money for the Crisis Pregnancy Center in town, as well as a (very successful) collection of food, soap, shampoo, and other items for distribution to those in the area who are in need of such items.

Both nationally and locally, pro-life organizations are working to eliminate the number of abortions performed due to economic reasons. Thus, Cohen's assertion that pro-life organizations do nothing to address the root cause, and are therefore approaching the situation wrong, is unsubstantiated.

Pro-life organizations DO help women with economic problems, so that abortion is not seen by the woman as the only choice she has.

In addition, Cohen called for both sides to "forget their political differences and work toward something that both would be happy with—eliminating the need for abortion." He suggested we do so by making "ideological compromises." As stated earlier, the pro-life organizations are already moving toward eliminating the economic situations that make some abortions necessary. However, that 89% also included "social" reasons for abortion, which cannot be solved by money.

The need for abortion can only truly be eliminated when the general public realizes that the unborn is fully human from the moment of conception, and therefore deserves the right to life. At one time, people believed that they needed slaves for many reasons, but once they realized that all people were human regardless of skin color, this "need" for slaves was eliminated. The same will happen with abortion.

As a result, pro-life groups will continue to educate the public about the humanness of the unborn, as well as working toward eliminating economic needs for abortion. These two goals work hand in hand, and no compromise is necessary. In fact, to compromise either one would be contrary to the "pro-life" name. [Incidentally, Bucknellians for Human Life recognizes the pro-choice groups' wish to be called pro-choice, and we refer to them as such.] To compromise the assistance given to pregnant women with economic problems would be disrespectful of the life of those women. On the other hand, to compromise our goals of increasing public awareness of the humanness of the unborn child, and changing current laws denying the unborn child the right to life would be disrespectful of the life of the unborn. We can and do work toward these goals simultaneously, and in doing such the pro-life side is not "wrong." On the contrary, we are striving to help women and unborn children, while working to eliminate the need for pregnancies to be "unwanted."

WITH GUEST INTERVIEWERS CHRIS JONES, ANDREAS MATISSON, JIM SAUNDERS, AND GLEN WILLIAMS.

Hey jerky! Listen up. I've got a little story to tell you. I was hanging out with a wise man the other day. He's a man you may know, a kind of Bucknell legend if you will. He's been here for quite a long time. Six years to be exact (he can remember being here when Reagan was still in office). Anyone who has lived on Sixth street over the last four years knows the man I'm talking about. He's the jovial fellow who resides in the white house on the corner of Sixth and St. Catherine. You've probably seen him on his porch during the warmer months of the year. Yes, ladies and gentlemen, I'm talking about Mr. Phil Laffy. I was chewing the fat with him and a few friends the other day and figured it would be interesting to interview Phil and get his perspective on life here at Bucknell over the last five years. So sit back, turn on your reading lamp, and let uncle Phil spin a yarn...

Q: Phil, what's the biggest difference you've seen since you came to Bucknell?

A: Definitely the amount of partying you're able to do. Used to be in olden days that you could go out on a Tuesday night and do a circuit and get a beer at any house.

Q: Do you consider yourself "old school," and what does "old school" mean?

A: Like I said before, going to cool places and hanging out with cool people who didn't mind you hanging around and weren't uptight.

Q: What's the worst thing that's happened to change Bucknell?

A: I don't know, how about the Indigo Girls playing here on Earth Day instead of a few good bands.

Q: Don't you think the Indigo Girls are a much better band than, say... The Allman Brothers?

A: Ha, ha, ha, etc... sure, uh, I think they have more talent or... whatever.

Q: So you don't dig trendy stuff.

A: Well, no. You see... what the thing is, is that now it's trendy for people to be into the environment, which they should have been into all along anyway.

Q: So you think Bucknell is infested with bullshit crunchy people ?

A: It's like Bucknell being rated as one of the top ten Deadhead schools in the country by Vogue or some stupid magazine. I do see lots of plastic people, though. And I do see myself getting into a lot of trouble over this interview.

Q: So a Deadhead isn't just shredded jeans shorts and a t-shirt that looks like a tapestry?

A: Well, I do see these people at shows sometimes but...I wouldn't call them Deadheads.

Q: Do you have a strange fear of cows?

A: Well, it is a little known fact that cows are the utter proposterence (I don't know what it means either) of life.

Q: O.K. Phil, there are rumors that you have been seen downtown naked. Is this true?

A: Can I take the fifth on this one ? I'll just say there has been a precedent set.

Q: So it can happen again?

A: No comment.

Q: What do you think about them banning smoking all over campus?

A: Dude, what's up with that? "Give my lungs a break!" Give my ears a break! I don't smoke in class, so if you don't want to smell my smoke, go to class. No one's actually confronted me about it except in the Bison. And you know how ballistic those Bison freaks can be.

Q: Where's the best place to study on campus? Has it changed?

A: Well, it changed because I used to not study at all. I like my room, though. I can be interrupted by cool people and listen to tunes and smoke.

Q: Spring is near. When will you be putting in some quality porch time?

A: Ahhh... porch pre-season has already begun. I'm in the process of breaking it in.

Q: So you don't seem to like it here as much as when you were a freshman, ('87-'88).

A: Well, back when Reagan was in office you knew where you stood.

Q: You've seen three Presidents come and go.

A: Well that's a bit of a misnomer and I really can't rate any of them except that Bush was the worst. Three Presidents is a pretty impressive achievement in itself. Bush was a clown, "a thousand points of light." He was head of the CIA. He's as covert as all hell.

Q : How do you escape from the Bucknell bubble?

A: I can either go away and visit some cool graduated people from the "old school," or Simpsathons help.

Q : Simpsathons?

A: Sitting on the couch for twelve to sixteen hours watching Simpsons. I have four videocassettes worth. And the porch of course. I can sit there and have some Molsons.

Q: Yes, the spring is coming, and you have the best girl-watching apartment.

A: Yeah, it's the ultimate location for that. It's the first block people walk down from campus. And no one really goes down Seventh Street.

Q: So for that purpose, Sixth Street is definitely better than Seventh?

A : Oh, yeah, sometimes we even might say some things... but to my public, please don't be offended. Never be offended if you walk by and hear us calling. From me it's with the best intentions.

Q: So the Spring Porch Bourbon Clubs will be starting up soon.

A: Yes, open invites to everyone every night. You heard it here first, folks.

Q: What do you think about Chalk Talk?

A: I don't want to get into that. If they should be able to ban me from smoking, I should be able to ban Chalk Talk. It's because it gets into my subliminal mind whether I read it or not. I mean, some people walk with there noses in the air and never see it, but me, I just trudge uphill, and I see the shit going by everywhere I walk. Most of the time I don't read it, but it gets into my mind because I see the words no matter what I do. You say "Don't pollute my lungs." I say, "Don't pollute my brain."

Q: Just another example of uptight people with nothing to do?

A: Well... I don't know.

Q: Do you find refuge anywhere on this campus from uptight people?

A: Yeah, there a few good hiding places where cool people congregate. Certain fraternities even... well a certain fraternity. There were many cool fraternities, but some took a turn for the worse and well...

Q: When exactly did the "old school" die out and the "new school" begin?

A: After my freshman year. I'd say that's when things began to change. I mean, If you look at the guys who were juniors and seniors who I partied with my freshman year... they were just nuts. But my class was the downfall and my class was even the down fall of one entire fraternity and that's why I don't hang out there anymore.

Q: Do you think people should start reverting to the "old school?"

A: Definitely. I think people should lighten up. My advice to everyone is "lighten up." Be kind. Be yourself. Don't try to be anyone else because you'll only make yourself look stupid.

Q: What do you think about the throats who are out there working like there already in their nine to five jobs?

A: Oh... man, those 'throats bother me. It is their prerogative, but... uh... where was I going with this?

Q: You were explaining what you'd do to "throats."

A: I'D RING 'EM AROUND THE NECK, JERKY!!! I mean, don't worry, you're going to have a career and make lots of money, but I'm much happier with what I did here. I'm happy and that's what's most important. Be happy. You can go to Wall Street, be stockbroker, make a bunch of money and blow half your earnings up your nose. I'm just concerned with being happy and enjoying life. That's my motto. I know it sounds corny and it is cliché, but my advice is, "Don't worry, be happy."

Q: So you're definitely not into the high-stress "Go and get it" lifestyle?

A: That's exactly what the difference is between "new school" and "old school." People were just more relaxed and not so uptight.

Q: Well, they say your class was really smart and each Bucknell class following was not quite as intelligent.

A: Yeah, I guess I do see that trend. Sort of. A lot of people here are common sense stupid. And I knew a lot of guys who partied like freaks and didn't do too much work and still got good grades. And there's not much of that now.

Q: Maybe people aren't smart enough to party "old school" style.

A: That could be it.

Q: Do you see the social scene shifting to the down town?

A: Well, not really, or well, yes, I guess. There is only maybe one place uphill where I do party.

Q: Are the girls hotter these days?

A: They're about the same. Sure were nice at Club Beautiful. Too much hairspray. I make it a point never to approach a girl if I light a cigarette within ten feet of her and she blows up. It's like we were discussing before with the intelligence going down. You get more of that New Jersey thing with the makeup and the hairspray.

Q: So do still do think it is a fun place here on the overall?

A: Oh God... yeah, I still have a lot of friends here and I do a lot of partying and it beats the real world.

Q: Do you recommend the six-year plan to anybody?

A: I highly recommend it to anybody. I've learned a lot. School should be fifty percent social learning and fifty percent book learning. If you're a throat and you stay in Dana all day, you're missing out.

Q: What's the weirdest place you've woken up on campus?

A: I once woke up at these girls' house who lived next door wearing only my boxers on their couch. I woke up and had no idea how I got there. I must have sleepwalked there.

Q: I hear the Indigo Girls do a sweet cover of "Whipping Post."

A: I don't know, people will think I'm a jerk, and well, majority does rule, but I won't go to that show unless I'm different at that time or something...

A day in the life of a fraternity cook

BY DANALYN ADAMS
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The brothers of Delta Upsilon fraternity seem to be extremely happy. Could it be because Ruth Haines, a warmhearted and easy-going mother of seven and grandmother of fifteen, is their cook?

For the past twenty years, 57-year-old Haines has been titillating the palettes of the men of DU. Haines, a resident of Lewisburg, begins work around 7 a.m. and does not usually leave the fraternity house until 6:30 p.m. each evening. But even though the job is more time-consuming and difficult than the restaurant work she has done previously, she feels that "it is well worth the effort."

Haines loves her position at DU. "My life is dedicated to this house. They became my life." She regards the fraternity men as her second set of children. Her sense of humor shines whenever she jokes around with "the boys," as she calls them. She often acts as a mother-figure as well, "They need lots of TLC," said Haines, "especially if anyone falls ill."

Nothing but positive, warm remarks floated from the lips of the group of brothers who talked of Haines. From the brothers' perspective, she is just like a brother—she really keeps the house going. "She understands the traditions and is basically a beautiful, beautiful woman inside and out," according to one brother who wishes to remain anonymous.

Accepting constructive criticism from the men regarding the menu, she tries to adjust meals to suit the general preferences and tastes. She realizes that she cannot please everyone, but not one negative comment was to be heard about her cooking from anyone in the house during lunch.

Haines cooks breakfast, lunch, and dinner every Monday through Thursday, and even makes it over to the house to prepare Sunday brunch. When asked if there was a particular night when an extra special meal was cooked, she said, "All our meals are special." Haines further explained that she is beginning to plan the meals with a healthy angle in mind, emphasizing that chicken is the main staple in the DU house. However, she does not forget everyone's sweet tooth because her homemade chocolate chip cookies are a favorite among the men.

Haines maintains that all of her goals as the official DU cook have been fulfilled, and she especially enjoys her warm relationship with the brothers. Very often, she dines along with the brothers in the basement of DU fraternity. Unfailingly, her favorite event year after year has been the House Party weekend pig roast. She said that she "thoroughly enjoys helping out the brothers with the festivities." While adding much joy to DU, Haines is a woman satisfied with her job and quite content with her life.

Bucknell's Amnesty International group seeks to free political prisoners

BY KRISTINA SCHURR
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Amnesty International, the international organization founded in 1961, seeks to free political prisoners held captive by restrictive governments. Essential to the organization's goal of, "bringing about change by popular participation," are its local branches, many of which are located on many US high school and college campuses. Bucknell University sponsors one of these branches.

Since the organization's mission is the ultimate release of these political prisoners, those who want to aid the organization in achieving their goal write letters to the oppressive governments, asking for these persons' release. The idea behind the letter writing is that when these governments realize that persons outside of their own country learn of the kidnappings and imprisonments, they will feel threatened by outside interference and release the prisoners.

Amnesty International affects the activities of restrictive governments. Said Edmund Rhodes '95, member of the Amnesty International chapter at Bucknell, "Amnesty International has definitely been successful, if not with the release of political prisoners, then by forcing oppressive governments to change their politics."

The Bucknell chapter of Amnesty International seeks to make students aware of the freedoms which Americans have and many other persons do not. Said Alix Karl '95, "So often we take for granted that we have freedom of speech while others are imprisoned for it. But this goal is frustrating because we have a pretty apathetic campus. Amnesty International is, in itself, an eye-opener. Just stopping by at one of our meetings and writing a short letter makes a big difference." The Bucknell chapter has a membership of about 20 students, most of whom are sophomores. Membership, however, is open to anyone, with the intent of gathering a broader number of people in order to foster a greater awareness of these social issues. At this time, Bucknellians are writing to the Kuwaiti government to locate a political prisoner who has been missing for some time.

Shana Bomberger '95, who interned for six months at the Amnesty International Office in Washington, D.C., said, "Working with the organization made me realize the freedom of expression which we have in the US. People are picked up from their homes in other countries, kidnapped, and later disappear for something which we would call a minor offense."

Students involved in the organization have themselves benefited from their work. "I have an incredible feeling that I can make a difference to people who feel that nothing in life is possible anymore. I'll do whatever I can to give someone a chance and something to live for," said Rhodes.

Added Bomberger, "Just seeing some of the corruption in other governments opens you up with a new appreciation for how our country is run."

During the past two years, the Bucknell chapter of Amnesty International sponsored various campus-wide films, The Killing Fields and Cry Freedom, which illustrate the need for Amnesty International's existence. Several documentaries are planned for the remainder of the spring semester.

For more information about Amnesty International, or weekly meeting times, contact Alix Karl.

Countdown to spring break

Some helpful hints for the happy traveler to alleviate those traveling woes

BY KATE FINK
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Whether you're homebound, tropics bound, on the way to visit friends, or heading for the (ski) hills, the journey to your spring break destination is as much part of the trip as are the accommodations and company. Usually, these journeys are long and boring and, as often as not, they do not always go as planned. Have you ever run frantically out onto the runway to chase your plane down? Have you ever been forced to leave four pieces of your luggage behind because they would only check three bags? Have you ever stood, glum and raindrenched, at the side of the road, surrounded by luggage, flagging cars down because a tire exploded? Several testimonies have confirmed that unforeseen delays and hassles are not fun and eat into those precious sunning/skiing/television hours of the vacation. However, since only one week is allotted for springtime fun and frolic, it is crucial to transform these episodes into opportunities for amusement. Some tips:

Flying

•Make sure you read the gate number correctly (although when flying out of Harrisburg this will not pose a problem if you can count to five.) A3 and A8 can look very similar to someone with bad eyesight. A troop of rowdy college folks would not be appreciated aboard the wrong flight—especially en route to Sun City, Arizona, retiree capital of the United States. (Not to mention the agony of bounding off the plane, leis and flip-flops intact, into, say, Cleveland, Ohio). Do not joke about explosives when going through the x-ray area; the attendants will not display much of a sense of humor.

•If there is a delay due to mechanical difficulties of the aircraft, round up your mechanical engineering buddies and offer to help, while the rest of the crew stays at the gate and hustles the ticket agents for free flight vouchers. If push comes to shove, you can offer to accept gift certificates for in-flight drinks and airport bars/restaurants.

smarte-cartes for the 25 cent return. Or play tag on them (with points deducted for splattered civilian luggage). Make friends with the newsstand attendant and read all the magazines while downing a few snacks. Sing camp songs.

•While in-flight, if you forgot your walkman, sit next to a baby for the same effect of constant, blaring noise. Or, if you cannot sit for long periods of time, take an aisle seat next to a crabby old man who has to go to the bathroom every ten minutes. Strategically place all of your friends in aisle seats and play hand soccer down the aisle. Read the in-flight magazine to find out about that business tycoon that you have been meaning to look up. Sing camp songs. *Note: Be sure to grab as many honey roasted peanuts as possible from the cart when the flight attendant is not being attentive.

Driving

•Get in the car that works best and also has a CD player. Always make sure you pair up with someone who has compatible musical taste. Call shotgun. Don't bring any change so you don't have to pay the tolls. Bring in-the-ear headphones to use when your partner starts recounting his/her life story, but don't forget to nod and smile every so often.

•When the car breaks down, deny knowing anything about car mechanics so you can sit in the car while your friend pokes around under the hood and gets his/her hands dirty. If you must go for help, don't walk; flag down a BMW. While riding in the tow truck, DO NOT ask the driver about his/her job, HE/SHE WILL TELL YOU, EVERYTHING.

•Once on the road, make friends with other drivers. People can be very friendly because you don't have to talk. Keep in mind, however, that people tend to look better with sunglasses on. Bring lots of biodegradable explosive food, like grapes, so you can chuck them at your friends' cars. If you have to drive through the night, remember that stop signs and traffic lights are rendered obsolete after 2 a.m. Be sure to take advantage of the free refill mugs at fast food joints, but don't eat there—seek out the local diners to get the real flavor of the area and to see what you would be like if you grew up there.

Buses

•Do not take Greyhound-like buses anywhere. Nobody uses Dial.

•Using buses to commute once you have reached your destination, however, can be fun. It is interesting to watch couples interact, teenagers apply makeup, gangs survey their turf. People are either friendly because misery loves company, or they ignore you. *Bonus: you can usually get away without paying.

Even if you take all of these suggestions to heart, chances are you will still be unprepared. When traveling, you can never anticipate all of the twists and turns. It seems so straightforward, but unforeseen and bizarre occurrences inevitably lurk. As long as you anticipate, as well as absorb unanticipated phenomena, you will arrive at your destination not only intact, but a richer person. Have fun!

Spring is almost here, but don't pack away your boots just yet! We're in Lewisburg!

Part two: Temporary Dining Service Manager tells all

A friendly and informative lunch with Tim Tenon in the Caf reveals the inside skinny on the food that tends to make us fat

BY MARC HAIMES
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Braving hardship and heartburn, fearless culinary agent, Marc Haimes, infiltrates the caf to get the low down from temporary dining service manager, Tim Tenon.

As Tenon and I consumed our steak sandwiches, cheese fries, and dutchess soup (the first two items were outstanding, the soup was a bit lukewarm), the interview began.

"Just who is 'Pete?' I asked. And what's his relationship to 'Pasta?'"

Well, even this rather simple question dug up a meaty issue. Shockingly enough, THERE IS NO 'PETE.' His name was originally used for a pizza station at another university. "Pete's Arena Pizza" was the official title. Yet, not only was there no Pete or no pasta, but no Arena either. The students just liked the name because when they said it real fast it sounded like "Pizzarina" instead of "Pete's Arena." Neat, huh?

Perhaps Tim sensed my dissatisfaction with this response, because he continued the story with a twinkle in his eye. It seems that after the fictional Pete and his spurious arena had gained popularity, the Wood Corporation did receive a letter from a certain Mrs. Arena. And, wonders of wonders, she actually had a son named Peter. Well, Wood, being the benevolent people they are, promptly shipped Mrs. Arena half a dozen "Pete's Arena Pizza" tee shirts for young Peter to proudly wear for the remainder of his years.

Yes, it was a truly touching tale, but there were still more difficult questions to be asked—like the whole Galliker's Iced Tea issue. What was the scenario behind the enigmatic disappearance and reemergence of the official Bucknellian (non-alcoholic) Beverage?

The matter was really quite simple, Tenon explained. Wood had not reordered the tea, preferring to substitute it for a product distributed by another company. When it became apparent that a number of students had "noticed the difference" and consequently "expressed their concern," Gallikers was immediately put back in stock.

Joanna Conard—The Bucknellian

Jeff Valmore '96, awaits a custom-made deli sandwich at the newly managed Cafe.

Tenon preferred not to go into specific detail on exactly how this "concern" was "expressed," on the Make A Difference cards. When I pushed farther he became jokingly (I think) suspicious, inquiring as to my own relationship with the tea. On that note, I skipped my question about the origin of the false rumor that Galliker's had closed, and moved on.

Building up to the big question about Hank's yank, I pressed Tim for any information about "behind the scenes" changes that may have been needed after Wood took control.

And there were some interesting ones. According to Tenon, a large amount of food was immediately discarded during the first few days of the transition. Apparently, it had been the old management's policy to buy with the bargains, sometimes stockpiling up to a month's (or more) worth of food in advance. Wood Corporation was asked to act as advisors to Bucknell dining services. Some days later, he was called in to take over the position of manager. He assured me he had never met Hank Ross. And if he knew anything more than I did about the shifting of the throne, he certainly wasn't revealing it. As hard as it was for me to digest (so to speak) the fact that the current head of dining service was told next to nothing about the manner in which his company rose so quickly to power, there was little more information he would reveal. I took another bite of the exquisite steak sandwich, and woefully changed the subject.

As the difficult questions and respective portions diminished, eye contact increased. Tenon spoke modestly about his strong food service background and passionately about his interest in sports. It seems, Tenon has taken in athletic events, from football to professional wrestling, at sports arenas all over the country, while never forgetting to sample the fine, fine cuisine. Pizza (not necessarily Pete's) is his frequent snack of choice. I began to wonder how Tenon manages to stay so slim.

So, as I dipped my last french fry into the remaining cheese sauce, I mentioned that many Bucknellians are interested in obtaining healthier and less fattening forms of nourishment. Hence, the popularity of the stir fry and the frozen yogurt. What else could be done? Tenon paused a beat, looked at me, and asked me what type of changes I would want to see. No, he wasn't dodging the question. He was sincerely interested. And I told him. I wanted no-fat cheese slices for sandwiches, more of the Entenmann's no fat and no cholesterol cakes and cookies for the convenience store, and low-mayo tuna salad for the Bison. Tim took careful notes and then we strode back up to the dining area for some of that healthy ice cream.

While attempting to decipher which flavor was which, the realization hit me. Right now we all have a dining service manager who answers every one of his "suggestions," even the ones from smart-ass reporters, personally and seriously. We all have a food company who is going out of their way to try to keep its new customers happy. And we all have an appetite for change. So why not go with it? Be loud. Make the suggestions. Whether you demand a more accommodating variety of meal plans or a better selection in the Bison (to keep up with the changes in the caf), the choice is yours. Now is the time in our lives when it's easy as pie.

ARTS AND ENTERTAINMENT

Straying from a woman's course

BY NICOLE PANICO
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Remember the girl who hated wearing dresses? Who loved to play with the boys? Who was always the first girl picked for teams after all the boys were taken? Who used to get teased for being a "tomboy"? Bucknell welcomes Jane Curry, author, storyteller, and performer, in her solo performance Nice Girls Don't Sweat on Tuesday, Mar. 30, in the Langone Center Forum at 7:30 p.m.

The 75-minute monologue features Curry as the fictional character Sammy Kay Knight, her contemporary who shattered the "no sweat" image of her time by joining the Redheads professional women's basketball team, existing from the mid-1930's to the mid-1980's, telling stories about the experiences women have had with athletics throughout history.

Curry was born and raised in Speedway, Indiana. While growing up she played football in her neighborhood, baseball at recess, and basketball wherever she found a hoop and backboard available. She swam for the local swim team and continued to participate in sports throughout her high school and college careers.

Curry received her B.A. in English from Hanover College, and her M.A. and Ph.D. from the University of Michigan. She was formerly a coach for a high school tennis team and a grade school basketball team. Presently, she is an avid racquetball player and scuba diver.

For nine seasons, Curry has toured with the Minnesota Chautauqua as Samantha the storyteller in River Ramblings and in The Trouble Begins at Eight. Also, Curry performs nationally with two other solo shows she has written: Samantha "Rastles" the Woman Question and Just Say Know: Educating Females for the 21st Century.

Even though Curry played football, baseball, and basketball, she could not win the right to be considered an athlete because no one took girls' sports seriously at the time. She considered herself lucky to receive a "let her play; she throws like a boy" acceptance from the guys on her neighborhood teams. Still today, "there seems to be a feeling that if you're good at sports, you can't be a real woman," commented Curry.

"Boys aspire to be football heroes or rock stars, but there isn't that equivalent for girls," says Lynn Jaffee, program coordinator for Melpomene, a St. Paul-based non-profit research and educationa organization. Therefore, Curry is determined to change society's attitudes toward women and sports.

Curry hopes her performance will enliven athletic banquets as well as conferences and conventions nationwide. "With a sense of history and humor, [Curry captures]...the enduring themes of physical capacities, propriety, and femininity."

Jane Curry gives her one-woman performance entitled Nice Girls Don't Sweat in the Langone Center Forum on Mar. 30 at 7:30 p.m. The show will look at the course of women athletes throughout history. The performance is free and open to the public.

Cox introduces West to Fang art

Center Gallery's latest exhibit of Fang art was brought by Cox, a missionary, to the West

BY NICOLE COBBAN
Bucknellian Staff Member

When Louise and Newman Hall Dewis Cox brought home artifacts from their missionary trip in West Africa, nobody had even heard of the Fang tribes, much less considered them to be of any artistic importance. Today those artifacts are rare and collected museum pieces, prized for their primitive beauty and anthropological value.

Bucknell's Center Gallery is privileged to host an exhibit of Fang art as part of the African Experience semester, consisting of sculptures, fabric, and domestic items from the Cox family collection. The exhibit will run through March 19 and may be seen free of charge 11 a.m. to 4 p.m. weekdays and 1 to 4 p.m. on weekends.

The exhibit is currently on loan from the personal collection of Cox's granddaughters Katherine W. Wheatcroft, lecturer in English, and her sisters Joan W. Godwin of Trumansburg, NY, and Barbara W. Hall of Richmond, VA.

According to Wheatcroft, Newman Cox was born in Nova Scotia to a Scotch/Presbyterian background. He received a medical degree from Johns Hopkins University and married Louise Hegle.

In the Presbyterian tradition of "giving service," the practice of giving some type of charity service in the name of religion, Cox decided to become a medical missionary at one of the newly opened stations in West Africa at Batanga, Cameroon. Having been settled by Westerners in 1892, only four years before Cox arrived, Cameroon provided the doorway to unseen cultures. Wheatcroft parallels Cox's experience to the adventures described in Joseph Conrad's Heart of Darkness.

"It was brand new territory, except for traders," said Wheatcroft.

Cox spent four years practicing medicine there treating the natives and traders while his wife taught sewing at the mission school. For the Fang tribes, it was their first introduction to reading and writing, and for Cox, it was his first introduction to a world vastly different from his own.

When Cox and his wife returned home in 1900, they carried with them dozens of artifacts from every area of tribal life, with each piece carefully labeled and explained. Although Fang art was not valued at all during the early 1900's, Wheatcroft feels her grandfather had a hidden instinct about the souvenirs he brought back to the West.

"I think my grandfather knew," said Wheatcroft. "He carefully selected pieces that showed the magical initiation rites, the medical treatments, rituals, and domestic [life of the Fang]."

The collection's anthropological value is that the precise dates of all the pieces are known, a rare find before the turn of the century, and that many of the items were crafted especially for Cox and his wife.

"There are napkin rings and a letter opener, a stamp with his initials, and medical tools," said Wheatcroft. "Members of the tribe took Western ideas and used their handcrafting skills to make these objects; for example, there is a little stool intricately carved, and a walking stick that looks like a furled umbrella."

The collection's artistic value is readily visible in its exquisite beauty and craftsmanship. However, Wheatcroft jokes that many of the items in the exhibit were lying around in her family's home. "We didn't particularly recognize its value," she said. Some of the items, such as the ivory carved napkin rings, were even used by the family everyday.

Recently, Wheatcroft and her sisters decided to investigate the history of these items and discovered that their grandfather's collection was actually a major find. Since then, Wheatcroft and her sisters have had the collection appraised by an anthropologist from the Smithsonian Institution, and they are considering placing the collection in a museum where it can be protected and appreciated. They are insistent, however, on not breaking up the collection.

"If we did that we'd ruin it," said Wheatcroft. "I think its value is it's an untouched piece."

Viditz-Ward presents work on Sierra Leone

BY ARA METJIAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Continuing the tradition of a semester long celebration of the "African Experience," a focus on African cultures, the Center Gallery is offering the opportunity to view "Chiefly Gowns and Regalia of Sierra Leone." The exhibit, by Vera Viditz-Ward, professor of photography at Bloomsburg University, is supplemented by two lectures with the same title. Having given the first on Feb. 13 at the exhibit's opening, Viditz-Ward returns to campus on Mar. 16 to give the second slide presentation.

The presentation can be seen free of charge at 7 p.m. in the Elaine Langone Center Gallery Theatre. Viditz-Ward will be presenting color slides, as well as discussing the ritual significance and "the history of the textiles and regalia that the chiefs wear, and how it works within the culture," said Viditz-Ward. "Each of the ethnic groups have different objects that are very significant and known to the people of that group."

Viditz-Ward has been actively involved in the photography of the Sierra Leone's culture and heritage. Her exhibit contains thirty photographs of chiefs in their war, traditional, and ceremonial garb, and has been on display at the National Museum of African Art at the Smithsonian Institution in Washington, D.C.

This face of a Sierra Leone chief is just one of many captured by Vera Viditz-Ward's camera. A professor of photography at Bloomsburg University, Viditz-Ward has an exhibit in the Center Gallery on Sierra Leone and will be on campus to give a slide presentation about her work on Mar. 16.

Viditz-Ward first became interested in the culture of the Sierra Leone when she traveled there as a Peace Corps Volunteer to teach and photograph. However, Viditz-Ward said, "I did not encounter the chiefs until halfway through my tenure with the Peace Corps."

After becoming engrossed with what she saw, Viditz-Ward was able to return to Sierra Leone on a Fulbright-Hayes Research Grant. She arrived during the country's bicentennial celebration, and was invited by the National Planning Committee to submit her photographs.

Her fifty photographs of the country are now a permanent part of the Sierra Leone National Museum. President Joseph Saidu Momoh, as well as numerous paramount chiefs, attended the official opening of the exhibit in May of 1987. Viditz-Ward has spent almost two decades in the photographic documentation of the cultural traditions of Sierra Leone.

The "African Experience" is supported by the Pennsylvania Humanities Council, the Bucknell Association for the Arts, the Office of the Vice-President for Academic Affairs, and the University Lectureship Committee.

The Bucknell exhibit is complemented with textiles and regalia from Sierra Leone. The exhibit will be on display from Feb. 8 through Mar. 19. The Center Gallery's hours are from 11 a.m. to 4 p.m. weekdays and 1 to 4 p.m. on weekends.

Returning poet reads selected works

Madeline DeFrees, Bucknell's poet-in-residence, is scheduled to give a reading in Bucknell Hall on Mar. 30. An avid writer, DeFrees is the author of six poetry books.

BY NICOLE COBBAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The Bucknell campus should be familiar to Madeline DeFrees. As a poet-in-residence in 1988, DeFrees conducted workshops and readings with the Stadler Center for Poetry. She returns again this semester as a 1993 poet-in-residence to work with Stadler's Young Poets Seminar and to share with the campus a sample of her work. DeFrees will give a reading in Bucknell Hall on Tuesday, Mar. 30 at 8:15 p.m. The reading is free and open to the public.

DeFrees uses her poetry as a personal means of exploration. "Writing is for me both an instrument of discovery and a way of organizing and understanding experience," said DeFrees. "I get along best when I am writing every day...I often work on several poems at once, and if one of them fails to engage me, a totally different one may interpose itself. When I feel myself becoming involved, it is as recognizable as the motor turning over on a cold morning as I try to start my car."

A native of Ontario, Oregon, DeFrees spent most of her life in the Pacific Northwest. After high school, DeFrees entered the Sisters of the Holy Names of Jesus and Mary as Sister Mary Gilbert before receiving a B.A. degree from Marylhurst College and an M.A. from the University of Oregon. In 1973 she was released of her religious vows.

DeFrees has taught at the Holy Names College (now called Fort Wright College), Seattle University, Gonzaga University, Marylhurst, the University of Montant, and the University of Massachusetts at Amherst. While at Amherst, DeFrees directed the Master of Fine Arts program in creative writing. She retired from Amherst in 1985 and settled in Seattle to write full time.

DeFrees has authored several books, six in poetry and two in prose. Her latest, Possible Sibyls, was just released last year.

No stranger to poetry readings, DeFrees has read her works at more than 40 universities, schools, and poetry centers, as well as at the Library of Congress. She has received grants from the National Endowment for the Humanities and also from the Guggenheim Foundation, which she used to travel to the San Juan Islands, and spend three weeks in Greece and Crete.

The poet-in-residence program is supported by a grant from the Andrew W. Mellon Foundation.

A Visitor's Guide to the Lewisburg Cemetery

Not a sparrow falls...and my heart takes off into another country. The heaven or nothing writes a vapor trail over the river vault. The riddle Sheley hoped to crack that time with Jane Williams
when he talked of tipping the boat—"Now let us solve together the great mystery!"—and Jane got out to wade ashore.
The cryptic figures chiselled on stone by the body's weather. Your number is up, the saying goes, and the dice, like the gun in Russian roulette, already loaded.

Finding my way through the graves to the church and not the reverse, I come to the granite marked FEINOUR. And Yes,
I say, it's as good as any, a faint wind skewing black oaks on the hill overlooking the steeple. Moss and tendril already creeping into my legend: November 18, 19— 19— repeating digits, a tic
in the temple. In the space of a hyphen characters soften, the tool in my hand, a power drill running away with the motor,
carving the fatal numbers.

In this leaptide the paired 8's balance on their torsos, and needle-thing, the obelisks raise acronyms above the crowd.
Amid a clutch of verticals, I call that horizontal man the Sleeper of the Year.
His landlord neighbor runs lead pipe around a plot to keep the vagrant footsteps out. Cold light breaks through.
When a cardinal whistles
low in my ear and a skylark answers, I know this is all in the head I am out of here in the hectic west wind of the graveyard, wandering out-of-the-body.

Weis Center sets policy for selling Indigo Girls tickets

The Indigo Girls are slated to perform in Christy Mathewson-Memorial Stadium at 8:30 p.m. on Friday, Apr. 30. Advance tickets for Bucknell students and staff will be available only at the Weis Center Box Office. Two tickets per Bucknell ID can be purchased at $10 apiece; tickets for non-Bucknellians are $12. Seating in the stadium is unreserved and will be limited, and in order to insure that all Bucknellians have an equal opportunity to purchase tickets, ticket purchases will be limited initially to four tickets per customer. The Weis Center Box Office will open on a day when it is normally closed, Monday, Mar. 15, from 11:30 a.m. to 5:30 p.m., for the sale of Indigo Girl concert tickets only. After that special sale day, tickets can be purchased during normal Weis Center Box Office hours, Tuesday through Friday, 11:30 to 5:30. There will be no phone sale and no credit card sales for this event.

Hollywood prepares to honor its own

It's Oscar time once again—the most coveted prize in all of Tinsel-Town, and Hollywood is gearing up for March 29 when its annual tribute to the year's best and brightest in the film making industry will take place. Here is a look at the* Bucknellian *Arts and Entertainment editors' choices for who will walk away with the golden statues, and who will simply just walk away.

BY NICOLE COBBAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Best Picture: A Few Good Men

With Castlerock's first big budget film scoring points at the box office and a cast that includes the legendary Jack Nicholson, A Few Good Men looks to be the forerunner among a list of other nominees (such as Unforgiven and Howards End) that provide little competition. The Crying Game may come up with the upset, but Hollywood's latest golden child Rob Reiner needs some compensation for being the only director with a nominated film not to be in with the picks for director.

Best Actor: Al Pacino, Scent of a Woman

Pacino is a screen legend, and Hollywood is not so cruel that it would brand one of its hottest commodities as the first actor to ever receive eight nominations without winning. Also, while Scent of a Woman opened to mixed reviews, the critics were in agreement that Pacino's performance was unquestionably remarkable. Denzel Washington may have given Pacino reason to doubt with his masterful performance in Malcolm X, but Spike Lee is such an Oscar outcast, any award for the film is unlikely.

Best Actress: Mary McDonnell, Passion Fish

McDonnell is the most likely candidate to win with her strong lead in Passion Fish. Also, her competition, while talented, is less than equal fare in Hollywood's eyes. Susan Sarandon and Michelle Pfeiffer are too closely linked with mainstream film making, an Oscar no-no. Emma Thompson and Catherine Deneuve both star in foreign films, an historical disadvantage, particularly for Deneuve, whose film's soundtrack is in French.

Best Supporting Actor: Jack Nicholson, A Few Good Men

Without question Nicholson's role in A Few Good Men turned the movie from your average blockbuster to a piece of outstanding courtroom drama. Although the cast included other significant names, such as Tom Cruise, Demi Moore, and Kevin Bacon, Nicholson's got the clout, and beyond that, his performance proved he has the talent to justify his reputation.

Best Supporting Actress: Vanessa Redgrave, Howards End

Redgrave has the experience, as well as the talent and reputation to easily come off as this year's winner. Her performance in Howards End, although small, was stunning. She created some rare moments of life in an otherwise dull picture.

Best Director: Neil Jordan, The Crying Game

Neil Jordan came off as this year's independent breakthrough in a year of independent films. The Crying Game was surrounded by critic's praise. Jordan is also the only director to provide a strong contending film from among the other nominees, with the exception of Robert Altman for The Player. But the odds are in Jordan's favor, since Altman's film slashed the industry giving the awards.

Best Original Screenplay: Neil Jordan, The Crying Game

Again, Jordan's talent shone through in his writing, as well as his directing. The Crying Game had audiences in suspense, with a script that was unrevealed in previews or reviews. It was easily one of the best written scripts of the year and deserves any and all rewards.

BY NICOLE PANICO
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Best Picture: A Few Good Men

With a star-studded cast that includes Hollywood maverick Tom Cruise and Hollywood legend Jack Nicholson, this film is the most likely contender. The film is strong enough to break the traditional rule that blockbuster films like A Few Good Men remain nominees but never winners. Also, Castlerock deserves some credit for its baptismal entrance into big budget films, and A Few Good Men victory would satisfy both the public, and the newly established production company.

Best Actor: Al Pacino, Scent of a Woman

Pacino is already a legacy. Other nominees are less experienced, and less likely to walk away with the prize. Robert Downey, Jr., gave a good performance, but he's not really thought of as a man with huge talent, given past performances in films such as The Pick-Up Artist and Less Than Zero. Stephan Rae is a virtual newcomer to films, and Denzel Washington may suffer from director Spike Lee's lack of popularity within the filmmaking community.

Best Actress: Susan Sarandon, Lorenzo's Oil

The film was a controversial topic in Tinsel-Town this year, as was Thelma and Louise, Sarandon's last picture for which she was nominated. However, unlike Thelma and Louise, there is no co-star like Geena Davis to split the votes with, and Sarandon's talent should pull her through to Oscar gold.

Best Supporting Actor: Jack Nicholson, A Few Good Men

A Few Good Men was a powerful film, heightened by Nicholson's awesome portrayal of the navy colonel who issued a "code red" violation. Also, Nicholson is another Hollywood legacy, and combined with the attention A Few Good Men received publicly, Nicholson is the definite favorite.

Best Supporting Actress: Vanessa Redgrave, Howards End

Redgrave is widely recognized as a talented actress. This movie won critical acclaim, and the public should want it to win at least one of the major awards. Redgrave offers the film's strongest candidate, especially in a field of less experienced actresses.

Best Director: Martin Bresh, Scent of a Woman

This movie was a huge success publicly, as well as boasting one of Hollywood's most coveted actors as its star. The success of Bresh at the Golden Globe Awards is also another good indication that he will take the Oscar as well.

Best Original Screenplay: George Miller and Nick Enright, Lorenzo's Oil

Lorenzo's Oil was the hip new controversy. While years ago anything penned by Woody Allen would have run away with the award, the recent negative publicity around Allen will probably prevent him from reaching the status he once held in Hollywood. Lorenzo's Oil was a strong script, supported by excellent direction and excellent acting.

Oscar nominations

Best Picture: The Crying Game; A Few Good Men; Howards End; Scent of a Woman; Unforgiven

Best Actor: Robert Downey Jr., Chaplin; Clint Eastwood, Unforgiven; Al Pacino, Scent of a Woman; Stephen Rea, The Crying Game; Denzel Washington, Malcolm X

Best Actress: Catherine Deneuve, Indochine; Mary McDonnell, Passion Fish; Michelle Pfeiffer, Love Field; Susan Sarandon, Lorenzo's Oil; Emma Thompson, Howards End

Best Supporting Actor: Jaye Davidson, The Crying Game, Gene Hackman, Unforgiven; Jack Nicholson, A Few Good Men; Al Pacino, Glengarry Glen Ross; David Paymer, Mr. Saturday Night

Best Supporting Actress: Judy Davis, Husbands and Wives; Joan Plowright, Enchanted April; Vanessa Redgrave, Howards End; Miranda Richardson, Damage; Marisa Tomei, My Cousin Vinny

Best Director: Robert Altman, The Player; Martin Brest, Scent of a Woman; Clint Eastwood, Unforgiven; James Ivory, Howards End; Neil Jordan, The Crying Game

Best Original Screenplay: Woody Allen, Husbands and Wives; Neil Jordan, The Crying Game; George Miller and Nick Enright, Lorenzo's Oil; David Webb Peoples, Unforgiven; John Sayles, Passion Fish

The Oscars will be presented on Mar. 29 on ABC.

When I grow up, I want to be a ballerina...

The Pittsburgh Ballet Theatre company finishes a week-long residency in the performing arts with a concert in Weis tomorrow night.

BY KATIE DEBONVILLE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

It is 11 a.m. on Tuesday morning and Pittsburgh Ballet Theatre soloist Shari Holladay has just finished her first ever college lecture. The petite ballerina laughed when asked how the lecture went. "I let my husband give the lecture," said Holladay, a faculty member at the Pittsburgh Ballet Theatre School, referring to the director of the Pittsburgh Ballet Theatre School David Holladay, "although I joined in occasionally."

The Holladays spoke to an introductory theatre class about the use of dance in musical theatre. This area of the Pittsburgh Ballet Theatre's residency at Bucknell, like their dance classes, is off to a good start.

The week-long residency of the renowned dance company will close tomorrow night with an 8:30 p.m. performance in the Weis Center. Tickets for the concert are $20 ($10 with BUID) and available through the Weis Center Box Office.

The Pittsburgh Ballet Theatre dancers have been on tour this past week. Company members performing in tomorrow night's production arrived in Lewisburg on Wednesday. After a day of rest yesterday, the dancers began rehearsals for tomorrow night's performance.

The Weis Center performance will feature three pieces by the Pittsburgh Ballet; "Rossini Variations" by Bruce Wells, resident choreographer of the Pittsburgh Ballet Theatre, "Concerto Barocoo" choreographed by the late George Balanchine, and "Return to the Strange" by Jiri Kylian.

A fourth piece, Paul Abrahamson's "Country Western Ballet," will be performed by Bucknell Dance Company members. Having premiered in the fall dance concert, the piece will make its encore performance in the Pittsburgh Ballet Theatre concert. Abrahamson, a former member of the ballet company, has been in rehearsal for the past week, refining and correcting the piece for its second showing.

Holladay and other members of the Pittsburgh Ballet Theatre School have been on campus working with students in the departments of theatre and dance, and music.

Jeff Bullock, a member of Pittsburgh Ballet, held classes in jazz, and Mary Miller, another company member, held classes in modern dance. Holladay explained that while jazz dancing is typically done to pop music and focuses on isolated body part movement, modern dance basically conveys an "anything goes" attitude.

Holladay and Pittsburgh Ballet soloist Ernie Tolentino held classes in dance conditioning. Members of the Bucknell Breakin' Bison basketball team had the opportunity to work with Tolentino in a workshop on ballet and sports.

Brian Bloomquist and Laura Desiree performing in The River, choreographed by Alvin Ailey, with the Pittsburgh Ballet Theatre company. Having just finished a week of residencies, the troupe will perform tomorrow night in the Weis Center.

Also geared towards the athletic crowd was a lecture by Lynn Swann, former Pittsburgh Steeler, and Dr. Freddie Fu. Both Swann and Fu currently sit on the Pittsburgh Ballet Board of Directors.

"I've really enjoyed our residency so far," Holladay said. "I was very impressed with [assistant professor of dance] Shellie Cash-Muller's beginning ballet class. The students have only been studying ballet for just over a month, [but] they worked really well."

The residency of the Pittsburgh Ballet Theatre extends beyond the Bucknell campus. Holladay taught during the week at various dance studios in Lewisburg and the neighboring towns of Danville and Sunbury.

Alexander Nagiba leaps into action in George Balanchine's "The Prodigal Son". Balanchine is only one of four choreographers whose work the Pittsburgh Ballet Theatre will perform tonight.

Today, Pittsburgh Ballet Theatre teachers, led by Patricia Wilde, artistic director for the company, conducted a lecture demonstration for 1000 third and fourth graders, filling the Weis Center house. The class was geared towards introducing younger audiences to the dance world, and was supplemented by a third grade level brochure that complemented the activities.

"At the Pittsburgh Ballet Theatre school, I teach students between the ages of seven and nine—maybe a handful of them will become dancers," said Holladay, but added that, "I also teach a level three course, which has girls between the ages of ten and twelve who are just beginning to study pointe. It's exciting to watch them learn."

Holladay's own background is one which combines her love of ballet with musical talent. She began studying ballet at the age of seven and turned professional ten years later.

"One of my first major works was dancing the part of the cowgirl in [choreographer] Agnes de Mille's Rodeo." said Holladay. "I wasn't originally chosen for the part. Agnes de Mille was watching a rehearsal, and she didn't like the way the other, original cowgirl was playing the part. De Mille kicked the other girl out and chose me."

The experience of receiving a part such as the cowgirl was the one that Holladay describes as "one of those things you always want to happen to you." Since then, the ballerina has danced with Ballet Oklahoma, the Dallas Ballet, and Edward Villella and Dancers. Holladay has been with the Pittsburgh Ballet Theatre for the past four years.

Holladay's career originally seemed to be on the road to opera. She majored in vocal performance in Oklahoma City for three years. Because of her height, she wasn't sure how she would fare as a ballerina. "My husband convinced me that I had the talent to succeed, and I decided to stay with ballet," said Holladay.

Her musical talent plays an important role in her career as well. During the off-season of the Pittsburgh Ballet Theatre, Holladay takes to the stage in musical theatre. "My knowledge of music comes out in my dancing and it's always helpful," said Holladay. "I'm glad to have it there."

Comedic roles are the ones that Holladay enjoys performing the most because "you can hide behind a character." However, she has performed her share of lyrical roles as well, including Giselle and the Sugar Plum Fairy in Tschaikovsky's Nutcracker Suite.

Holladay's favorite role is that of Kate in John Cranko's Taming of the Shrew, which she performed in October. This ballet is a comedy that uses a full range of dancing, starting with "fast, wild jumping." As the character of Kate matures, her dancing becomes more lyrical and romantic. "An ideal situation for a ballerina is to explore a full range of dancing in one ballet," Holladay stated. Taming of the Shrew gave Holladay the opportunity to do just that.

The future for the Pittsburgh Ballet Theatre is a busy one. Next week Holladay will be performing Balanchine's "Serenade" in Pittsburgh while preparing to perform "Tarantella," another Balanchine piece, in April. Following the end of the Pittsburgh Ballet Theatre's season in April, the company will travel to Washington, D.C. to perform at Wolftrap, an outdoor theatre that has hosted many greats in the world of the arts. So, catch them while you can, in a dance concert of rare opportunity.

Sounds to sweep the winter away

The ever popular Aurelian Trio prepares for their next concert in Bucknell Hall

BY JASON SPIEGELMAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Ever since their first performance in Bucknell Hall in the fall of 1991, the popularity of the Aurelian Trio has steadily increased on campus. Their concerts have drawn audiences that have grown consistently larger with each performance, and their music has become sweeter each time they play. The group will play in Bucknell Hall tonight at 8 p.m. The concert is free and open to the public.

The trio, composed of cellist Kelly Mikkelsen, violinist Teresa Ling, and pianist Genevieve Lee, visiting assistant professor of music, was originally formed when the three met at the Point-Counterpoint Music Camp in Vermont. All were involved in performing and teaching at the camp when they started "hanging out together," according to Ling. During their time spent together in Vermont, the three women began playing music, teaching, and "eating Sun Chips" together.

After deciding to play as an ensemble, the group took its name from the award winning book The Bell Jar by Sylvia Plath. "I was reading the book when we were looking for a name and we decided to name the trio after [Plath's] mother, whose name was Aurelia," said Ling.

All of the members are established musicians outside of the ensemble performances. Mikkelsen received her undergraduate degree from the Eastman School of Music in Rochester, New York and went on to obtain an MFA from the University of Acron. She currently resides in South Dakota where she is a member of the Dakota Quartet and the principle cellist in the South Dakota Symphony.

Violinist Ling also lives in South Dakota where she plays with Mikkelsen in the Dakota Quartet. She also holds the position of Concertmaster in the South Dakota Symphony and teaches music at various institutions. Earning her undergraduate degree from the Yale School of Music, Ling received her masters from Eastman.

Currently residing in Lewisburg and working as a visiting assistant of music at Bucknell, Lee did her undergraduate work at the Peabody Conservatory before receiving her masters from Yale.

The group's first performance together was the 1991 premiere at Bucknell. Since then they have performed once a semester on campus, the last time to a fully packed Bucknell Hall. An equally impressive turnout is expected tonight.

The program for this evening's concert includes Trio Opus 1 #2 in G Major by Beethoven, Piano Trio by Ravel, and Trio by Martin Bresnick, a composer and professor at Yale University. Bresnick was the composer for part of the musical background used in the PBS series about poets such as Wallace Stevens and William Carlos Williams. Having just given a lecture about the relationship between his music and the poems of Stevens and Carlos yesterday, Bresnick will be present in the audience when the trio performs his work.

In addition to tonight's concert, the group is in residence with the department of music from Mar. 1 to Mar. 15.

The group's popularity has been steadily growing on campus, and many of those audience members are expected to return for the trio's upcoming concert tonight at 8 p.m. The concert is in Bucknell Hall, and is free and open to the public. Lee is currently a visiting assistant professor of music at Bucknell.

TRIVIA QUESTION:
This year's baseball team (0-6) is off to its worst start since the 1978 squad went 0-6. What (and when) is the most futile opening that a Bison baseball team has ever had to endure?

The answer can be found on page B6.

Improved Lady Bison start to earn respect of Patriot League

Bucknell bows out in league semi-finals

Tri-captain Lisa Fink '93, pictured here in an earlier season game, contributed to the team's improvement with her senior leadership.

Last Friday night the Lady Bison basketball team ended its season with a loss at Holy Cross in the Patriot League semifinals. This marked the third time this season that the Lady Bison fell to the Crusaders, but that can be attributed to the Cross's domination of the Patriot League more than anything else.

Juliet McGee '93 ended her prolific career at Bucknell, and she went out in style. McGee grabbed 20 points and seven rebounds before fouling out. Joy Sandler GR also put an exclamation point on her final season, scoring 16 points to go along with three assists and five steals before she fouled out as well. Also coming up big was Anne McGovern '93, who scored ten points in twenty minutes of play.

Wrestling places third, but sends three to NCAA tourney

BY MITCH BENTON
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The Bucknell wrestling squad closed out its 1992-93 season with a third place finish in the East Coast Wrestling Association Championships held last weekend in Davis Gymnasium. Led by the event's Most Outstanding Wrestler, 190-pound John Hangey, Rider College scored with three individual champions and captured the conference title for the fifth time in the past six years.

A late push by defending champion Central Connecticut State tied the teams at 65, but Rider victories in the 167 and 190-pound as well as the heavyweight title bouts gave the Broncs 74.5 points and the victory. Central Connecticut finished with two individual champions and 65 points, while the host Bison took three individual championships and finished in third with 61.75 points. The standings were rounded out by Hofstra, with 52.5 points, Drexel, with 26.5 points, and Buffalo, with 25.5 points.

The competition's top match-up was expected to come between Central Connecticut's Mark Frushone and Bucknell's Bob Ferraro '94, and the 177-pound final lived up to its billing. Ferraro reached the final bout after scoring consecutive pins in the quarter- and semifinals, while Frushone needed only a 16-7 semifinal win after receiving a bye in the first round. The two evenly-matched former conference champions needed two extra periods to resolve the match and decide the winner of the automatic bid to the NCAA tournament. Despite not earning an offensive point throughout the contest, Ferraro was able to prevail due to his opponent's mistakes. After three cautions to Frushone for early starts, Ferraro was awarded a point in addition to another point that was awarded for stalling. The penalties made the score 2-2 at the end of regulation. A scoreless two minute overtime period was immediately followed by a 30-second sudden death period in which Frushone was again called for a false start that gave Ferraro the 3-2 decision.

Joining Ferraro in the NCAA Championships, to be held at Iowa State on March 18-20, will be two more of the Bison captains, Mike Van Doren '92 and George Swann '93. Seeded number one entering the competition, Van Doren was barely tested in capturing his second 150-pound conference title. A first-round bye and a 10-1 major decision in the semifinals put Van Doren in the championship bout, where a 7-3 decision over Drexel's Rob Fieo gave the graduate student his third consecutive berth in the NCAAs.

A win by injury default and a 17-7 major decision put Swann in the 128-pound final, facing a rematch with Rider's Matt Finacchio, who had beaten Swann in the team's dual bout. The weight class's top seed, Finacchio used a fall and a technical fall to reach the final where he was upset by second-seeded Swann. The Bison senior mounted a late rally to top Finacchio by a 9-7 count, earning his first trip to the NCAA tournament.

The surprise of the tournament probably was Bucknell's Clay Burkle '94, who entered the tournament as the fifth seed in the five man weight class, but upset top seeded Matt DiStefano of Rider by a 4-3 score in the first round. Burkle the rode a 14-4 major decision into the finals where he was tied with Jason

I guess at this time we, as supposedly-objective Sports Editors, need to wipe the tears from our eyes and show a little sportsmanship. That's right, we would like to congratulate the Holy Cross team and fans on their Patriot League Tournament title. When their fans chanted near the end of the game, "We came, we saw, we kicked their butt," they weren't kidding.

The Crusaders simply took care of business in adverse conditions. They came into a rabid Davis Gym in front of a national television audience and executed their game-plan to perfection. They were able to score on us like we scored on Loyola. And their defense, wow. Feaster was on Mike Bright like stink on you know what.

But that's enough about the game, it was disgusting enough, we don't need to relive it. What we'd really like to recognize are the fans—from both teams. We can't imagine a more electric atmosphere for a sporting event, whether there are 2,500 or 25,000 people in the gym.

Congratulations to the Holy Cross fans for making it that way. These guys (and gals) chartered buses and made the six-hour journey from Worcester. If you are a player and you see that all of your classmates have come all that way to cheer you on, you can't help but get pumped up.

And they were classy, too. Sure they said bad things about Bucknell, but that's part of the game. We said bad stuff about them as well. At least they weren't

Bucknell succumbs to the Cross, misses NCAA dance

Crusaders end Bison streak, year

BY SCOTT GRISIN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Maybe it was a sign of things to come when the snow blew into Lewisburg Wednesday afternoon, just hours before the nationally televised Patriot League Tournament final between Bucknell (23-6) and Holy Cross (23-6).

Inside Davis Gym later that evening, the Holy Cross shots were falling even faster than the snow outside as the Crusaders shot 58 percent from the floor and 40 percent from beyond the arc en route to a 98-73 win.

The loss was the first for the Bison at home this season, and they were never really in this one. "I think the Bison, sometime between February and March, fell apart," said Russell Peyton '93.

The Crusaders controlled the tip and got on the board first with a twelve-foot jump-shot inside, and they knocked

This was it. The opportunity to show the entire nation, including those inhabiting the frozen tundra of Alaska and the tropical paradise of Hawaii, what Bucknell has to offer. On this particular evening we reached the same audience that watches the likes of Bobby Hurley and Duke, Calbert Cheaney and the Hoosiers of Indiana, or a certain group of five sophomores that wreak havoc at the University of Michigan.

The total sports network, ESPN, came to town to broadcast the Patriot League Championship game between the Holy Cross Crusaders and the Breakin' Bison of Bucknell. Bucknell is a small liberal arts college in the middle of nowhere. It's stu-

Mike Bright's steal and dunk propelled Bucknell and its euphoric crowd into the Patriot League final. Only 27 seconds remained on the clock when the defensive wizard made perhaps the most important play of his illustrious career. Colgate went for the win in closing seconds, but their three-pointer missed.

Cycling club shifts into gear

BUCKNELLIAN TEAM CORRESPONDENT

The Bucknell University Cycling Team kicked off its season last weekend in the Allentown Training Series circuit race. The team used this training race to prepare for the upcoming collegiate season which begins over spring break.

The race was contested on a half mile wind-swept loop. Riders pedaled down a fast hill, made two quick turns, and finished a lap with a short climb against a gusting wind. Speeds of over thirty miles per hour tested all riders' form and ability.

In the mens' A race, captain Chris Neumann '95 faced a strong field containing many top riders including three United States National Team riders. In the dynamic twenty-four mile race, Neumann stayed near the front of the pack to use his most powerful weapon, his sprint. By the last lap, the fifty-rider field at the start was reduced to thirty riders due to the quick pace. Neumann held strong and finished eighth in the field sprint.

In the mens' C race, Greg Tall '94, Art Clay '93, George Bicking '95, and Eric Fredericks '96 were quick to take control of the pace of the twelve mile circut race. With three laps left, the team coordinated its strategy; Clay was to pace Bicking to the front of the pack for the finish where Bicking sprinted to take third in the fifty rider field. He was followed by Tall in fifth, and Fredericks in fifteenth.

The team received its first look at some of its competition in the Eastern Collegiate Cycling Conference, including Penn State, Lafayette, and Lehigh.

Neumann commented after the day of racing, "Our ability to compete with higher caliber riders was a good indication that our hard training was paying off. I look forward to the team having a successful season."

Women's rugby blanks F&M

BUCKNELLIAN TEAM CORRESPONDANT

The Bucknell women's rugby team opened up their spring season with an explosive win over Franklin and Marshall. The final score of 27-0 does not even begin to reflect the shear domination the team showed on Saturday. Dawn Soisson '96, Captain of the Forwards, commented, "We came together well for our first game, from here on we will only improve. This 27-0 shutout is merely an omen for what the rest of the season will produce."

Upon arriving at Franklin and Marshall, the squad was met by a snow-covered field and chilling weather. But this was not far from the norm for Bucknell. For the past three weeks, the Bucknell women have been trudging through almost two feet of snow covering Swartz Field. Intermittently, however, the team did have the chance to practice within the warmer confines of Larison Dining Hall. But these suboptimal practice conditions did not stop Bucknell.

Once the initial hesitations were put aside, Bucknell's women unleashed an aggression and desire unmatched by Franklin and Marshall. The first score was made by team captain Kristie Robson '95. Jen Andrews '96, in an intense, battling effort, brought in the next score. Within 20 minutes of the opening game, Bucknell had gained control.

At one very rare moment in the game, the Franklin and Marshall team looked as if they would score on a break-away. But the phenomenal speed and endurance of Holly Fisher '96 brought the F&M player only disappointment in the tackling hands of a capture. In the second half, Fisher also used her speed to furnish the team with its third try of the game.

The forwards' motto "Bind low, hard, and tight" resulted in a relentless defeat of all of Franklin and Marshall's efforts in rucks and mauls. Their exceptional togetherness was a credit to all trys scored. The next two trys and one conversion kick were made by Robson.

Nezelek tries to make show with Seattle

After many frustrating years in the minors, 1987 grad gets invited to Seattle Mariners' spring training camp as part of 40-man roster

BY JON TERRY
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Irony at its best. That is the best way to describe the career of pitcher Andy Nezelek '87, who as we speak is in Arizona attempting to make the Seattle Mariners 25-man team that will travel north in early April.

Nezelek, you see, was a typical Bucknell student-athlete. He was a star both on the field and in the classroom. While most of his minor-league teammates over the last five years have either ignored their studies or foregone college completely, Nezelek received a mechanical engineering degree with a 3.2 grade point average.

In fact, after Nezelek was drafted by the Atlanta Braves organization after his junior year in 1986, he signed with the team and played that summer for one of Atlanta's rookie league teams in Pulaski, Va. However, that would be all the baseball he would play for another year. Nezelek, not wanting to forget about his academics, negotiated his contract so that he would be allowed to return to Bucknell to finish his senior year and get his degree.

"They [Atlanta] agreed to let me finish out my last year," Nezelek told the Sumter (S.C.) Item in 1987. "We agreed that on my spring break I would go down to spring training for 10 days. I then went back and finished up work on my degree."

But isn't every player's dream to sign a pro contract and get to the show as quickly as possible? Nezelek had two good reasons for his decision.

"I had three years of work put in, and I didn't want to lose it," he told the Item. "I didn't want to quit for a semester or two to play ball then not go back to school.

"I wanted something I could fall back on just in case baseball didn't work out for me. Plus, with my education out of the way, I can give all of my concentration to baseball."

Former Bucknell pitching phenom Andy Nezelek '87 is hoping to continue his recovery from rotator cuff surgery that forced him to sit out the entire 1991 season with the Atlanta Braves organization. Pictured here during his hey day as fireballing Bucknellian at the Bison's former stomping grounds.

> "I had three years of work put in, and I didn't want to lose it. I didn't want to quit for a semester or two to play ball and then not go back to school."
> — Andy Nezelek '87

Nezelek, who really had no intentions of playing baseball after Bucknell, was an Academic All-America nominee during his junior year. It was prior to that year, however, when he was first noticed by the scouts while pitching in the Northeast Collegiate Baseball League.

A year later the Braves signed him, and after he graduated from Bucknell, Nezelek began his ascent through the minors. Since his first spring training was abbreviated, he had a tougher time competing for innings with other pitchers on the staff because the coaches considered him behind. But the 6'6" hurler quickly impressed them with his ability to control three pitches—a fastball, curve, and the newest addition to his arsenal, the changeup.

Nezelek, now 27 years old, worked his way up to the AA and AAA levels in the last few years, but rotator cuff surgery set him back a year, and the Braves' development of outstanding young pitchers kept him in the minors. It is no embarrassment not to be able to beat out the likes of Tom Glavine, Steve Avery, Pete Smith, and John Smoltz on Atlanta's roster.

Last year at AA Greenville, Nezelek had perhaps his best year as a professional. In 46 games with that club (42 in relief) he compiled a 9-2 record with one save and a 2.26 ERA. Even more impressively, Nezelek fanned 114 batters while walking just 23 in 107.2 innings. He also pitched in the AA All-Star Game last year, as well as making two scoreless appearances for AAA Richmond.

The strength of the Braves pitching staff coupled with the expiration of his contract forced Nezelek to take another look at his career. He decided it would be best to try his luck in another organization, preferably one with a greater demand for pitchers. Enter the Seattle Mariners.

As a newcomer in the organization, Nezelek would have to have an exceptional spring not to start the season at AAA Calgary simply because the Mariners have so many pitchers in camp. However, with their history of pitching problems and injuries, there is a strong possibility that the team will be looking to Calgary for a pitcher some time in mid-season.

So all Bucknellians should keep their eyes on The Sporting News this summer to keep tabs on the Andy Nezelek. Could he be the next Christy Mathewson?

Here's a tip for all baseball card collectors:

Andy Nezelek's 1989 Donruss rookie card contains an error. His birthdate is listed as Oct. 24, 1985, which would make him just under four years old at the time the card was published. Look for this rare item.

Bison Retrospective: Christy Mathewson Sr. & Jr.

These articles ran together in the Nov. 18, 1983 edition of The Bucknellian and appear exactly how they were used ten years ago

BY CHRISTINE A. FRATTURO

Stories circulate the campus of couples who venture into the Seventh Street graveyard at night to visit Christy Mathewson's grave. Memorials to this famous alumnus exist all over campus. Everyone is familiar with the gate on the field before the football stadium and the now popular Christy's Gate entertainments. With the passing of time, fewer students can remember Christy Mathewson, Sr. and his achievements.

Renowned for his baseball achievements, his fame at Bucknell began on the football field. When trying out for the team, his small stature proved little match for the seasoned players. As trials progressed, however, his speed proved to be a powerful asset which outweighed any other physical drawbacks. Christy Mathewson excelled at Bucknell and continued to become a national figure.

Turn of the century football regulations awarded five points for a drop kick successfully propelling the ball between the goal posts. Mathewson spent hours on Loomis Field in addition to regular team workouts, practicing his kick. The efforts paid off during a game against the University of Pennsylvania in which he scored ten points for the team.

One of the youngest members in the class of 1902, Mathewson became a star fullback on the varsity football team, and a center for the basketball squad. He played sports year-round, competing in track events, and of course, baseball.

Born in Factoryville, PA, his baseball interests began early when he joined his first team at ten years old. At one season's game, the regular pitcher was away and his substitute fell ill. Mathewson recalled this occasion as his proudest day—he was chosen to pitch for the team. He attended Keystone Academy where he competed with the Academy Nine. The following season, the team elected him captain. In that same year, the coach from a neighboring town offered him a dollar per game to pitch, his first commission.

Before coming to Bucknell, "Matty" pitched as a substitute on the YMCA team, starting at $20 a month with room and board. He went on to play in the New England League with the Taunton Team, increasing his salary to $90 per month. His expenses, however, demanded more than his salary, and he left this position to attend Bucknell.

Mathewson excelled in areas outside of athletics. A Phi Gamma Delta, he was elected to the prestigious interfraternity group, Theta Delta Tau, an honor bestowed on only a few campus fraternity men. His interests ranged from playing for the freshman band to being elected as class historian. A Latin Philosophical student, he also studied forestry. His academic awards included induction into the Eupia Literary Society. During his junior year, Mathewson served as class president.

True to tradition, Mathewson proposed to a girl on campus. She rejected his proposal, however, and he eventually married her cousin, Jane Stoughton, another Bucknell girl. Later, in 1909, Christy Mathewson, Jr. was born; he also attended Bucknell.

In his senior year, Norfolk signed "Matty" to play with the Virginia League. In 1900, the New York Giants drafted him, but he was returned to Norfolk to become a more seasoned player. He reached his pitching stride in 1902 under Giants' coach John McGraw. With authority the next sixteen years marked pitching history. In 1905 he shut out the Philadelphia Athletics without one run in three straight games during the World Series. During his career in the major leagues, he pitched 372 winning games and defeated all previous records by pitching 425 innings. In Cincinnati, he continued his career, managing the Reds.

World War I began and Mathewson rejected the chance to avoid the draft and entered the service as captain of the gas and flame division in France. In Europe he received injuries from gas and returned home with infected lungs to recuperate at Saranac Lake, New York.

The doctor predicted only six months survival, but Matty surprised everyone by getting well and returning to baseball as president of the Boston Braves. During the spring training trip in 1925, however, he caught cold on route to Florida which resulted in his death in October, 1925.

"He played for all that was in him, he fought the good fight and the clean fight. He was the incarnation of those virtues with which we endow the ideal American," said a close friend, Bill McGeehan of The New York Times. Friends and the admirers remember his honesty, integrity and dedication. He refused to play on Sundays and turned down an offer to appear at a Broadway nightclub to be named after him.

"He was a good-looking, clean cut fellow," said a lady from Muncy who knew him when he was courting Jane's cousin. She recalls the afternoons he spent coaching boys in a nearby field before Little League began.

Though controversy exists as to whether he actually completed senior year and achieved a degree at Bucknell, Mathewson and his wife maintained a close association with Bucknell and the Lewisburg area. The memorial gateway standing before the stadium was erected in his honor, and presented to the National League of Professional Baseball Clubs. After his death, his wife donated money to help establish scholarships in Matthewson's name and traveled across the country appearing at various benefits and receptions in his place. She is buried alongside him in the Lewisburg Cemetery.

The Mathewson tradition lives on

BY CHRISTINE A. FRATTURO

In its annals of alumni, one finds another young man who attended Bucknell after his parents. Born in New York City in October, 1906 to Jane and Christy Mathewson, he graduated with a degree in electrical engineering in 1927. Though more associate the name with his famous father, Christy, Jr. also attended Bucknell.

Perhaps as strongly passionate about baseball as his father, Christy, Jr. did play baseball as a youngster. At a Scouts of Lewisburg track meet one summer, he competed in and won the baseball throw.

Beginning his post-graduation career as an employee at General Electric, he left the company to become an Army Cadet. Not long into the program, he received a discharge for physical disabilities and began a flying taxi service in the Adirondacks.

"Christy Mathewson, Jr. visited Bucknell last Saturday, when he landed his airplane on the field near the football stadium," reads a 1928 Bucknellian. He proved to be an alumnus to continue the Mathewson impact on Bucknell.

In 1929 he returned to the Air Corps despite his previous discharge, graduating from the Advanced Flying School to become a fully qualified pilot.

Amidst controversy surrounding United States support and development of their National Air Force, Mathewson was stationed in China. He instructed Chinese pilots at the Central Aviation School in Hangchow for the Chinese Republic. While there, he met Margaret Phillips of Philadelphia. They married in December, but two weeks later their plane, which Christy piloted, crashed in Shanghi, killing Margaret.

Resulting injuries and a leg amputation prevented Mathewson from continuing his air career. He did remain in the service, assuming non-flying duties with the Air Transport Command in Europe during World War II. In 1945, he married an English girl, Lola Finch.

Christy, Jr. died in Texas in August, 1950. He suffered burns from a gas explosion at his Helotes Ranch while installing an electric dishwasher. Young Christy is also buried in the Lewisburg cemetery.

The 1992–93 Winter Season ...

Despite the fact that our lovely state still has snow on the ground, the sports editors of semesters past, present, and future wish to put the cold season behind us with an official wrap-up to the 1992-93 winter sports season. We have compiled a list of events, quotes, and other such nonsense that we feel have made this winter a bit warmer for us as editors, for you as readers, and for the athletes as participants. So sit back and enjoy as we present the 1992-93 Winter Bucky Awards ...

The All–Bucky Team

Margaret Grunow '93
Women's Swimming

If this is a shock to you, go back into hibernation. Unless Jackie Joyner-Kersee transfers here, this swimmer will waltz off with her second straight Bucknellian Female Athlete of the Year award.

Michael Bright '93
Men's Basketball

The Patriot League's regular season MVP has transformed Davis Gym into a "Hoops Mosque" with his electrifying above-the-rim play.

Bob Ferraro '94
Wrestling

Son of Bucknell's head coach, Ferraro captured an ECWA championship and ticket to the NCAA Wrestling Championships this season.

Jay Gross '93
Men's Swimming

An annual Athlete of the Week selection after every Patriot League Swimming Championship, Gross left the rest of the league in his wake as he went on to win several events.

Steve Droste '93
Men's Swimming

Droste was a pleasant surprise at this year's Patriot League Swimming Championships as he too won nearly every event in which he was entered.

George Swann '93
Wrestling

Captain Swann made his final forey into the ECWA arena his finest as he won his weight class' title and advanced to the NCAA Wrestling Championships.

Chris Simpson '94
Men's Basketball

The shooting guard from Alexandria, VA elevated his game enough to earn First Team All-Patriot League honors.

Mike Van Doren GR
Wrestling

One of four captains on this year's wrestling squad, Van Doren culminated his storybook career with an ECWA championship and another berth in the NCAA Wrestling Championships.

Juliet McGee '93
Women's Basketball

The leader in scoring and rebounding at the conclusion of nearly every Lady Bison basketball game this winter, McGee was justly recognized as a member of the Patriot League's first team.

K.C. Vlah '96
Women's Basketball

The only freshman to make this winter's All-Bucky team, Vlah stepped right out of her Ohio high school league to assume the point guard duties for the Lady Bison and was named to the Patriot League's All-Rookie Team.

The Women's Indoor Track & Field Team

Every member of this winter's women's indoor track and field team deserves recognition following the team's sheer dominance at the Patriot League Indoor Championships. It showed no mercy and never let up in pounding it inferior league rivals.

The Men's Indoor Track & Field Team

To the man, this team not only accepted the challenge from Lehigh, but embarrassed the Engineers as well as the rest of the Patriot League in capturing this winter's title.

PERHAPS THE MOST QUOTABLE COACH IN BUCKNELL HISTORY FINALLY GETS HIS LONG AWAITED SPECIAL SECTION

"If you're a sports fan and are bored this Saturday, you must be dead."
— The head track and field coach about the day Bucknell hosted the Patriot League Indoor track and Field Championships as well as the men's basketball regular-season finale against Holy Cross.

"I want to leave the results of the meet posted on the wall until the building falls down! The team performed great—a solid 'A' perfermance."
— The colorful coach on his women's team's effort in winning the championship rather handily over the rest of the league.

"Several rival coaches spent untold hours bitching and moaning about the fact that you couldn't wear spikes on our track or that the runways were too slick. They can have no complaints because they were afforded the opportunity to practice here throughout the season."
— The apathetic leader prior to the league championship meet.

"This may be the sweetest championship I've ever won as a coach. I've never given a team an 'A+' before, but I can't help it this time."
— The doubly victorious mentor following Bucknell's men's and women's sweep of the Patriot League championships.

Special Awards

Coaching Staff of the Winter

It's a tie. (Yes all that means is that we couldn't decide between the two) Art Gulden and his assistants Bill Hodge, Jo Giannettino, Bob Schanmach prepared their track squads to not only defend their Patriot League titles, but blow away the would-be pretenders to the throne.

Basketball coaches Charlie Woollum, Thommy Thompson, Terry Conrad, and Carl Danzig all deserve a tremendous amount of credit for taking a team picked to finish third to a regular-season title.

Organization of the Winter

This is not a tie (sorry hoops team). Both the men's and women's indoor track and field teams proved that they have no peers in the Patriot League. They proved that by badly outscoring the other also-rans and placing in nearly every event. In fact it was so one-sided that we decided to reprint the final standings:

Women's		Men's
BUCKNELL	205	BUCKNELL	170.5
Fordham	114	Lehigh	108
Holy Cross	71	Lafayette	101
Lafayette	67	Colgate	88
Colgate	52	Fordham	84.5
Lehigh	49	Holy Cross	37

They Said It

"I was a big wimp, but my mom forced me to go back to the pool. I think that was the only time she ever forced me to swim."
— Margaret Grunow '93, perhaps the best swimmer to ever attend Bucknell University.

"If he does the things his senior year that I think he can, he will be the best three-man that we've had at this school."
— Head men's basketball coach Charlie Woollum on his senior tri-captain Mike Bright '93.

"Having attended many college basketball games over the last 40 some odd years, I think I can say there is probably no better home crowd than the one in Davis Gymnasium."
— Carl Ullrich, Executive Director of the Patriot League after the regular season title-clinching victory over Holy Cross Feb. 27.

"Our goals have always been to win the conference championship, place two All-Americas at the national championships, and earn a spot in the Top 20, instead of trying to get a ranking."
— Head wrestling coach Bob Ferraro, Sr. following his team's noticable absence from a deserving Top 20 spot after going 2-1 against ranked teams.

"I hope you guys remember this when the paper blasts my ass next week."
— Director of Athletics Rick Hartzell after announcing to the crowd of campers that he would pass out ticket priority numbers to those already in line.

"She's the greatest thing since cable television. She's a positive role model, always positive."
— Women's basketball tri-captain Juliet McGee '93 on her head coach Juliene Simpson.

... Editors' List of Odds and Ends

Disorganization of the Winter

The evacuation of U.S. troops from Vietnam was more efficient and predictable than basketball ticket policy. Our weekly trivia question should have asked our readers to guess how they would have to go about getting their tickets for the next home game. Not even room picks force students to become this "cutthroat" while waiting in line all day.

Hopefully this system will work more smoothly since some of the decision makers have had the opportunity to take in a few games live.

Best Game Nobody Saw

Most basketball fans only make their way down to Davis Gym for the men's games. For this reason several of you missed the lady Bison's dramatic upset win over defending Patriot League Champion Fordham Feb. 6. In their teams 64-58 victory, Juliet McGee '93, Lisa Fink '93, and Joy Sandler GR each scored in double figures. Only four different Rams managed to break into the scoring column.

Very Strong Back Award

This unique award goes to men's swimming standouts Jay Gross '93 and Steve Droste '93 for trying their best to carry the Bison on their backs during the Patriot League Championships at Colgate. The two shared the Outstanding Male Swimmer of the Meet award for not only winning numerous events, but for also setting several new Colgate pool records.

Blitzkreig of the Winter

After winning their first 14 games of the season in Davis Gym, the Breakin' Bison must have felt like parts of Europe during World War II as the Holy Cross Crusaders quickly dashed all hopes of an NCAA tournament berth. The northern invaders played nearly flawless basketball in winning 98-73 in front of a national television audience Wednesday.

One-Game Performance

Grab a ball and just shoot three pointers by yourself sometime. Note what time you start and then stop after you've hit nine. Now, surround yourself with Division I opponents and go up in Davis Gym in front of over 1,500 people. If you can do the same thing, plus score an additional six points, within the time it takes to play a single game then you can appreciate what Mike Bright '93 did to Loyola on Feb. 24. The captain hit nine out of 12 three-point attempts (he missed his first three) on his way to a career high 33 points. The nine three pointers set a Patriot League record.

Unfortunately, the runner-up is not a Bucknellian. Rather, some mention deservedly goes to Rider College's Derrick Suber '93. The remarkable shooting guard was unconscious as he exploded for 36 points against the Bison. However, Bucknell prevailed in the waning seconds.

"I Told You Twice!" Award

In the ECWA wrestling Championships, Bucknell's Bob Ferraro '94 was the beneficiary of perhaps the most unique wrestling decision. In the finals of his weight class, Ferraro's opponent had been cautioned twice for stalling and false starting. All of Ferraro's points in regulation came via penalty. The match went into overtime and was settled when, you guessed it, his opponent, after a polite warning from the referee, false started. The result, an ECWA title and berth in the NCAA Championships for Ferraro.

I Don't Recall that Color Being in My Crayola Box

Being all excited about making their national television debut, public address announcer Jon Terry '93, shot clock operator Kamran Sarshar '93, and scoreboard operator Dave Scott '93 rented tuxedos for the Patriot League Men's Basketball Championship game. The most pressing non-basketball question of the evening had to do with the color of their bow ties and cumberbunds: NECTAR! At least it wasn't coral or chartreuse.

American Express' "Don't leave home without it" award

Hands down, this award has to go to men's basketball backcourt mates Russell Peyton '93 and Chris Simpson '94 for leaving their uniforms in Lewisburg as the team bus drove to Easton for the Lafayette game. Peyton was busy finishing an engineering lab and had asked Simpson to grab his bag, but Simpson forgot both bags. Kevin Wenk '96 and Dave Steigerwald '96 graciously gave up their uniforms so that the absent-minded could play. Peyton wore Steigerwald's #33 while Simpson rekindled memories of his freshman season by wearing his old number, Wenk's #52. Both players went on to have solid games but refused to make the number changes permanent.

The Winter Semester's Most Valuable People

Perhaps the most unnoticed group, but without a doubt the most valuable to all of the coaches, athletes, and fans of Bucknell athletics this past winter (and probably every season), the physical plant professionals were the Most Valuable People. They worked tirelessly to get the field house ready for the Patriot League Indoor Track and Field Championships, the ECWA Wrestling Championships, and countless home basketball games, sometimes all in the same day. Congratulate these people on a job well done the next time you see them.

Fish Out of Water

One of the weaknesses of the women's swimming and diving team was its lack of quality divers. They were hurt even further when Debra Zapotocky '94 took her points overseas as she went abroad second semester and consequently missed the Patriot League Championships. In her last meet on Jan. 6, a 130-108 win over Delaware, she finished second in the three-meter event and fourth in the one-meter. Julie Kotarba '95 was left as the only experienced diver on the squad.

Schick "Close Shave" Award

Nobody who was in Davis Gym the night of the Patriot League quarterfinal could have convinced men's head basketball coach Charlie Woollum that Bucknell's victory was never in doubt. If you believed that yourself, you're a spoiled or biased fan who never heard of Chaminade beating Ralph Sampson's Virginia team.

Lehigh coach Dave Duke slowed the game down to a crawl by employing the pre-shot clock four corners offense. Bucknell, which couldn't get any transition buckets, never established any offensive rythym. As a result, the game extended into overtime, and the Bucknell faithful (most of whom never showed up) began to ask each other if they were dreaming. Truth of the matter is that the Bison were even lucky to have overtime. Matt Clark '93 stroked four clutch treys to rescue his squad from certain SportsCenter negative criticism. Mike Bright '93 finally put the game away with two free throws as only seven seconds remained on the clock.

George Swann '93

George Swann '93 has been selected as The Bucknellian's Athlete of the Week for his surprise victory in the ECWA Championships last weekend.

Swann, seeded second in the 128-pound weight class, came from behind to post a 9-7 upset over the top seed, Matt Finacchio of Rider, to earn his first berth in the NCAA Wrestling Championships.

The captain is majoring in electrical engineering.

Trivia Question Answer:

The 1978 Bucknell baseball team, which started out 0-6, finished with a 7-15 record. But this season's start is the worst start to a baseball season since the 1961 team began 0-8 en route a 1-10 season.

Laxmen to open season tomorrow

Bison travel to New Jersey to face the defending national champions in their first contest

BY DARREN S. MILLMAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

When Sid Jamieson's men's lacrosse team opens up the 1993 season at Princeton tomorrow, the Bison will have the unenviable task of trying to stage an upset more momentous than anything seen since David slew Goliath.

Well, perhaps that is a bit of an exaggeration but it certainly is no overstatement to classify the Princeton Tigers as the Goliaths of NCAA men's lacrosse. After the 1993 schedules were finalized, the Princeton game loomed ominously in Bucknell's future particularly after the Ivy Leaguers captured the Division I National Championship with a dramatic sudden-death victory over Syracuse last May.

As if to quiet any of those who doubted their resolve to retain their title this season, the Tigers invaded Johns Hopkins last weekend and returned home to New Jersey with a two-goal win over the perennial powerhouse Blue Jays.

The Bison must now confront this team which has all the momentum of a Mack truck careening down a steep mountain road with no brakes. Intimidating indeed, but midfielder Garrett Austin '94 showed no signs of fear, and perhaps even a twinge of optimism. "With a little bit of luck and a lot of patience, we think we can stay with them long enough to give them a run for their money," said Austin.

Should the Bison attempt to engage the Tigers in a run-and-gun track meet, they will most likely return to Lewisburg licking the wounds inflicted by the Princeton offense. If, however, the entire Bucknell team shares Austin's patience philosophy, the potential for a close game is not as remote as it might seem.

DEFENSE

In lacrosse, as in most team sports, when a team faces another of superior talent, the significance of the defensive unit is magnified several times. Fortunately for the Bison this is definitely the team's most experienced group. According to Austin, "The starting four defensive players look awesome right now. (Goalie) Colin Barker '94 is on top of his game, and (defenseman) Jeff Kangas '94 can defend against anyone in the country."

Kangas, a first team All-Patriot League selection last season, will be joined at close defense by veteran tri-captain Gabe Portoundo '93, and Sean Krieg '94. Matt Wojnovich '94 gives Jamieson a second talented goalie who has seen significant playing time over the last two seasons.

MIDFIELD

Although not the most experienced unit on the squad, the Bison are not short of talented offensive and defensive midfielders. Tri-captain Ricky Herrema '93 returns as the team's faceoff specialist, and will likely be called upon to play more minutes in Bucknell's set offense than in years past.

Other experienced players at the midfield position include Dan Snyder '93, Austin, Chris DiMenna '95, Graham Officer '95, and Chris Pemberton '95.

According to student-assistant coach Greg Brown '93, the loss of defensive midfielder and last season's Patriot League Player of the Year Mike Conway '92 has hit the team hardest of all. "Conway was a great player," commented Brown, "and it remains to be seen whether or not the void created by his graduation can be filled by Scott Jacobia ('94) and Hugh Donovan ('96)."

Baird McIlvain '95 and Dan Kelly '96 will wield short sticks but play primarily in defensive situations.

ATTACK

With the exception of tri-captain Todd Streelman '93, the attack unit will not feature anyone with significant game experience at that position. The unit will, however, be bolstered dramatically by the shift of Justin Zackey '94 from midfield to attack. Zackey is a proven scorer as seen by his 20 goals and 19 assists last season. In all likelihood, Zackey will prove to be an even more potent offensive weapon from his new position. Steven Lewis '95 and Gil Rotchford '96 look to round out the four-man rotation at this point in the season. Brown describes Rotchford as "one of the newcomers who will most definitely make an immediate impact."

Jeff Kangas '94 earned All-Patriot League honors last spring and heads up this year's strong defensive unit for the Bison.

GOALIES

For the second straight year, Colin Barker '94 and Matt Wojnovich '94 enter the season battling for the starting netminder position. Both have seen considerable experience since their 1991 freshman season and are likely to see considerable time again this year.

Barker started all 13 games last year and recorded 131 saves for a .555 save percentage. Wojnovich, meanwhile, came off the bench in nine games and posted a .507 save percentage.

"It continues to be a battle," Jamieson acknowledged. "Both of them have worked very hard in the off season."

The Bison open up their home schedule against the Air Force Academy on Saturday, Mar. 20 at 2 p.m. on the men's soccer/lacrosse field.

Bucknell nine stumble out of the blocks, fall to 0-6

Pitchers still not ready to move outside as opposing batters tee off to the tune of over ten runs a game; gloves and bats chilly too

BY JON TERRY
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The Bucknell baseball team continued its spring training last weekend in Virginia; however, unlike the major leagues, losses at this time of year count on your record. This is unfortunate for the Bison, who were beaten once by VMI and three times by Radford to drop the team's record to 0-6 on the young season.

Showing the effects of a practice schedule that was largely indoors thanks to the weather, last Friday Bucknell spotted VMI a 5-0 lead in the early innings before mounting a comeback that just fell short. VMI got a huge break in the fifth inning when it turned a double play on a sharp grounder up the middle on a hit-and-run play. Steve Gyimesi '93 hit a solo homer right after that. Bryan Koch '95 also homered later, but it wasn't enough as the Bison fell 5-4.

"We just ran out of innings on Friday," said manager Gene Depew. "We could have easily won that game. We played well enough to win."

On Saturday, the Bison were swept in a doubleheader at Radford, 11-6 and 6-4. In the opener, Bucknell took advantage of three Radford errors to jump out to a 6-0 lead after the first inning. The Highlanders quickly got back in the game, scoring six runs over the next three innings off of Jake Kazanjian '93 and Rich Heller '94. Radford then broke the tie with four runs in the fifth inning to pull out the win.

In the nightcap, third baseman Larry Trout '93 hit a two-run single to highlight a three-run fourth inning, and Denis Maguire '93 threw five strong innings as the Bison jumped out to a 4-0 lead. Scott Van Dalen '96 could not hold the lead, however, as he gave up two runs in the sixth and a game-winning three-run homer in the bottom of the seventh to Radford's Alex Vexmosky.

"The trip [to Florida] will give us an opportunity to play baseball every day over a six-day period. We'd like to establish some continuity and team togetherness."

— Gene Depew
Baseball Manager

After opening the game with two runs in the first inning, Sunday afternoon's affair quickly turned into a nightmare as Radford exploded for two runs in each of the first four innings, and then after the game was well out of reach they scored four runs in each of the last three innings on their way to the 20-2 rout. The Highlanders pounded out 21 hits off of four Bison pitchers. At least the team's six errors helped keep the staff's earned run average down a little bit.

"Radford started out very good, and we saw some excellent pitching," said Depew, who still has high hopes for his team despite the slow start. "We're still optimistic. We hope to get some more games in before we go to Florida and open up with Indiana."

The team's schedule remains very much in doubt as the team prepares for its Spring Break trip to the Sunshine State. Yesterday's home opener against Gettysburg was postponed due to snow. The team is also scheduled to play a doubleheader at Villanova tomorrow and a twin bill against C.W. Post at home on Sunday, but the forecast is for more snow.

The physical plant's grounds crew has done a remarkable job getting the field in game condition. They had to call out bulldozers two weeks ago to remove the foot or so of snow from the field, and they had the field ready to go for the Gettysburg game, but Wednesday's snow and rain spoiled their efforts. The team also made a wise move in acquiring a new tarp, which will help save the infield and mound.

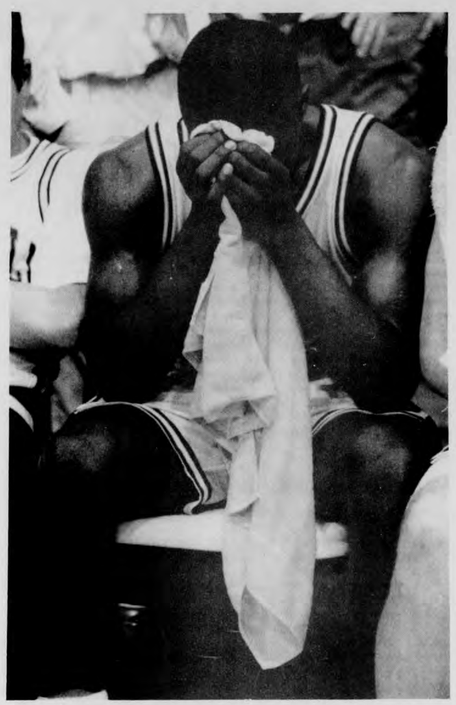
Catcher John Martini '94 works on his game during an indoor practice. The lack of outdoor practices has hurt the team a great deal.

Depew looks forward to the Florida trip as a chance to get in some consistent play, although the competition will be tough. Playing against the likes of Indiana, Iowa, Youngstown St., and Vermont, these Bucknellians will not be in Florida to lie in the sun, but rather to take care of some business.

"The trip will give us an opportunity to play baseball every day over a six-day period," said Depew. "We'd like to establish some continuity and team togetherness. It's already been a good experience because we had to do our own fundraising. I think the team will appreciate the chance to be down there more."

It will not get any easier for the Bison after Spring Break. The team will fly directly from Florida to New York where it will take on Army in a double dip on Mar. 27. The very next day the team returns home for two more games against Navy.

Spirit, Pain, and Disappointment...



The Patriot League title eluded the Bison for a second year in a row. Theories and excuses for the loss can be heard all around campus, but the fact remains that the Bison played with heart and enthusiasm this season. The team received continuous support from their fans as Davis Gym maintained a capacity crowd. It was a great year, but everything eventually comes to an end.

Clockwise from far left: Chris Simpson '94 attempts to hide his emotion; Bison fans fight for a few seconds in the spotlight; the team shows its patriotism moments before tipoff; Mike Bright '93 fights for the first posession of the game; in anguish, Bright watches the awards ceremony; the team seeks inspiration for the Patriot League final; Paul Olkowski '93 and Mike Walsh '93 reflect on what could have been.

down a three the next time down the court for an early 5-2 lead. A lay-in by Mike Bright '93 and a baseline jumper from Paul Olkowski '93 put the Bison on top, and after a couple of quick lead changes and a dunk by Raymond Brown '94, Bucknell was up 8-7 at the 17:26 mark of the first half—the last lead the Bison would see in the game.

After the half, the Bison quickly cut the lead back down to 13 with the help of Olkowski and Chris Simpson '94, but the Crusaders put up a blizzard of shots in the second half and buryied almost every one of them. Holy Cross shot over 62 percent in the second half while Bucknell couldn't buy a shot, shooting 34 percent (39 percent for the game). At one point, a hopeful Bucknell player put up a shot that went three-quarters of the way in, rolled around the inside of the rim, and then popped out into the hands of a Crusader.

Despite the weather, hope paid a brief visit to Davis Gym when Olkowski was fouled on a three-point attempt and hit all three shots from the line to kick off a little run for Bucknell. A pair of threes, a couple of steals, and a pair of layups by Peyton brought the Breakin' Bison within 15 .

The Crusaders then proceeded to rebuild their lead over the next six minutes, attaining their greatest margin of the evening, 91-64, with only three minutes to go.

The shots continued to rattle out for the Bison while Holy Cross continued to hit theirs, and they summed it all up by getting nothing but net on a three in the closing seconds of the game.

"If it was meant to be, it would have been," said Peyton. "Right now, we're sitting and waiting for an NIT bid so we can show that we're not what everybody saw on TV."

like Colgate's drunken throng of idiots who intentionally messed up national anthem singer Emily Hile and repeatedly threw objects (toilet paper, plastic guns) on the floor. Did you see when the Holy Cross mascot told his own fans to cool it when they were singing the anthem too loudly. Great job, Lorette.

We would also like to congratulate the Bucknell fans. Never before in the history of our school, and people who have been here a lot longer than us will confirm this, has so much school spirit and enthusiasm engulfed our campus, and you guys were a part of it. People were camped out in tents more than 24 hours before a game. Maybe that fan had it right on his sign, "Duke: the Bucknell of the South."

Dave Fries got more publicity in the last two weeks than any fan since Wild Bill Hagy or the guy with the rainbow hair (John 3:16). But Dave was just the most colorful; each one of you who was camped out after the Colgate game should give yourselves a round of applause.

So Holy Cross got to go home with our nets, a really big trophy, and Patriot League watches. But more importantly, they get to go to practice again this week and to play again. We have to cancel our hotel reservations in Provo.

We hope they know how jealous we are. We also hope they know we wish them luck. Bring back a tournament win for yourselves and our league. We'll see you at least twice again next year.

dent body of 3,400 J. Crew and L.L. Bean fashion plates is known to be conservative. Would these patrons of the number one seeded team in the Patriot League be able to exude the maniacal energy level that you'd normally see on ESPN? Would the Bison supporters be able to show the whole country that we can be just as wild as anyone? Put food in front of a starving man and he'll savagely devour it. Just consider Bucknell the starving man and ESPN the food.

For those people who weren't on hand to witness this spectacle or couldn't see because you were too short, here's an image for you to hold onto. First, there was a clash of colors. A few specks of purple and white were seen floating in the sea of blue and orange. Fans adorned themselves with blue and orange paraphernalia in hopes that this would bring NCAA tournament bid to Lewisburg. These usually docile creatures turned into screaming lunatics just as they entered the basketball arena. Everyone was just vying for the chance—the marginal chance... that slight glimpse of hope, that, that...that they might get on television.

Then, at approximately 7:20 p.m., the crowd reached its boiling point. You might ask what could have happened ten minutes before the tip-off to produce such a reaction. Well, I'll just simply give you a hint. LIGHTS, CAMERAS, ACTION. You guessed it—the cameras were rolling, and Davis Gymnasium was in the living rooms, bedrooms, dens, and bars of America. The partisan crowd roared in anticipation of the clash of these two Patriot League titans.

The bands blasted their trumpets and banged on their drums. Supporters, both of the Bison and of the Crusaders, stood and screamed for their respective teams until the final whistle. And then the final whistle blew, the ESPN sportscasters switched back to their headquarters. The crew packed up its cameras and silence once again fell upon Davis Gym. Yet for two hours, Lewisburg came to a halt, for the nation's spotlight just happened to fall upon us.

fulfill all of their expectations, it certainly was a season to remember.

One could sense that this team was better than expected after the Fordham Rams came to visit Davis Gym on Feb. 6. The visitors from the Bronx came in as heavy favorites, but left Lewisburg with a 64-58 loss. It became obvious that when the Bison performed up to their potential, they could compete with anyone in the league, and maybe, just maybe, that elusive first-ever win in the Patriot League tournament would follow this season.

That hope became a reality when the fifth-seeded Bison traveled up to West Point to face the tourney's fourth seed, Army and came away with a 50-46 victory. Although the season ended later that week for the ladies of Lewisburg, the team came away with a positive experience, knowing it took the league champs to knock them out of the tournament.

First team All-Patriot League member McGee was a mainstay in the pivot all season, and her contributions on and off the court have been well chronicled. While she suffered through a late-season shooting slump, she never stopped hustling and remained a force to be reckoned with all season long.

Sandler was outstanding all season long, as she rose to take on more of the scoring load as the year progressed.

This is not a team that has peaked. The club's record has improved each of the past two years since head coach Juliene Simpson took over following the 1990-91 campaign.

"I think that we elevated our level of play," said Sandler. "Juliene was able to tap into our young talent. It was a true testament to our rise in the league."

Wartinger of Hofstra at the end of regulation. Wartinger was then awarded an extra point for riding time, giving him the 8-7 victory.

The problems at those classes involved 134-pound Bison captain, Phil Elliott '93, not being able to make weight, while an injury to 142- pound Ron Wellman '95 hurt his ability to compete. Bucknell did earn some points from Wellman. The sophomore was able to outlast Rob Bashaw of Buffalo, who quit during the second period due to a elbow injury. Wellman then injury defaulted himself in the next two bouts to finish in fourth place.

While he still has three wrestlers competing this season, coach Ferraro likes his squads prospects for next year. "We only had two seniors in the lineup for the tournament, so we have a great group of wrestlers coming back. We've also had a tremendous year in recruiting, we'll be bringing in a lot of good guys."

As for the three members of this year's squad, Ferraro likes their chances for success in Iowa. "We are sending three quality wrestlers to the NCAAs. They all can win matches and place out there. I'm hoping for at least two All-Americas. That should probably give us enough points to finish in the Top 25 as a team"

Faculty to debate tenure committee

Shackleford moves to abolish URC

BY NEIL BARDACH
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Striving for what she calls "a system that has more accountability," Jean Shackleford, professor of economics, will file a motion to be debated at next Monday's faculty meeting, to abolish the University Review Committee (URC), the final tier in the process to evaluate professors' tenure status.

The system has of late come under heavy fire and the motion represents the most recent step in a debate between advocates and opponents of the URC.

The motion that Shackleford will propose is simple and to the point: "I move that we abolish the URC." The motion was actually filed at last month's faculty meeting, but it was deferred until the upcoming meeting in accordance with faculty procedures.

With no suggestion for a replacement system, Shackleford will simply move to abolish the URC and to encourage the faculty to explore an alternative approach to tenure and retention decisions.

"I would like the faculty to re-evaluate the current system. I would like [the faculty] to set up a new system. I think it would be more effective through a series of committees, some of which are standing committees, to come up with a plan for the faculty that could be proposed later in the year, not this school year, but later in the calendar year, hopefully sometime in the fall," said Shackleford.

Shackleford realizes that abolishment is a severe step, but she said, "I've seen this kind of committee go through the changing process, and I don't think the URC can really be amended satisfactorily."

Shackleford's motion will no doubt trigger strong debate from both sides of the issue. Larry Shinn, vice president for academic affairs, will oppose the motion. He said, "I think the motion is premature for several reasons. First, the academic sub-committee of the Middle States review has considered the strengths and weaknesses of the DRC (Departmental Review Committees) and URC system, and they do recommend that some ways be found to streamline and improve the current system."

Shinn says that the entire DRC/URC system, and not just the URC,

Snow and rain flood Susquehanna's banks

Fraternities' and residents' basements are soggy

BY SUSAN SMITH
Bucknellian Staff Writer

While Lewisburg Police Chief Donald Heiter expects "no evacuations," due to the flooding of the Susquehanna River and surrounding streams, low-lying roads have been closed and waterfront property created.

At 11 a.m. today the Susquehanna River had risen to 21.3 feet, according to Union County Emergency Services, soaking the basements SAE and SAM, as well as houses located on Front Street, Water Street, and Brown Street. Sections of these streets, North River Road by Slifer House, Route 405, the lower parking lot of the physical plant and the underpass by SAE have also been closed to traffic due to the high water levels.

Douglas Sturm, professor of religion and political science, removed the motors from his furnace and started to clear out the basement of his Water Street home yesterday after the river surpassed its 18-foot flood level.

Of the muddy lake in his backyard, Paul Ridder '93, a resident of SAM said, "It's amazing that all of this is the result of the snow and the rain. But, every summer water manages to flood the basement. We've just never been here to see it."

The flooding this spring, however, is higher than usual due to the heavy and unseasonably late snowfall which hit the area three weekends ago. According to Heiter, "What happens above us [in the mountains] is the problem." A native of Lewisburg, Heiter said that this flooding is comparable to the water damage of 1936 and 1975. "This is nothing compared to 1972," said Heiter.

Bizarre weather patterns have baffled and intrigued students and residents of Lewisburg over the past few weeks. With the melting of the "Blizzard of '93" came more water than could be contained within the banks of creeks and rivers in the area. Many streets and basements were claimed by the rising tides of the Susquehanna. Above, one of the many Lewisburg streets blocked off to traffic in the town's second weather emergency in the past month. The road, near Water Street (an appropriate name under current conditions), lies within the flood plain of the Susquehanna river. Right, members of the Sigma Alpha Mu fraternity enjoy the convenience of their recently converted waterfront property. Payne to propose attendance policy

BY MARIA GLOD AND TARA GILLIGAN
Bucknellian Staff Writers

In a memo sent to faculty Wednesday, professor of English, Michael Payne outlined a proposal he will present to the faculty at Monday's meeting which would add a section to the Student Handbook making it a violation of policy for advisors or coaches of extra-curricular activities to pressure students to miss classes in order to attend extra-curricular activities.

"It's not that anyone has done anything particularly wrong," he said. "But we don't have a clear understanding" of the attendance expectations.

According to Payne, "I think the pressure is in getting caught between the demands of the course and the demands of the extra-curricular program." The faculty's approval of the motion would mean that "any sort of external pressure on the student would be relieved," said Payne.

Payne said he was inspired to write the motion after several students approached him regarding conflicts between scheduled classes and Residential College activities. In response to their concerns, Payne wrote a letter to President Sojka in the spring of 1992 urging him to address the issue. Sojka forwarded the concern to the Committee on Athletics which has been unable to suggest a solution.

"I sympathize with some of the problems of the Committee on Athletics in dealing with this motion because it really is a problem about faculty expectations more than it is a problem for athletics specifically, he said."

Barbara Shailor, vice president of student services and member of the Committee on Athletics, sees the issue as "a broad one," and believes that this motion is sensitive to both the directors of extra-curricular programs and faculty members.

First-year student charged with spring break thefts

BY TARA GILLIGAN
Bucknellian Staff Writers

Jesse Baker '96 faces eleven charges after allegedly entering rooms in Larison and Vedder residence halls and stealing items including microwaves, pocket knives, compact discs, and money over Spring Break.

Yesterday Baker was charged with two counts of burglary (a first degree felony, four counts of criminal trespass (a third degree felony), two counts of theft of movable property (a misdemeanor), and three counts of criminal mischief (a summary offense) according to Officer Bill Neitz of the Lewisburg Police Deparment. These charges stem from two incidents: one in Larison Cottage and the other in Vedder Hall said Neitz.

The maximum penalty Baker could face on these charges is 78 years, according to Leo Armbruster, District Justice. However, said Armbruster, "Generally offenses merge for puposes of sentencing one event."

Baker is also under investigation for alleged thefts at Smith Hall. According to Vince DeCerchio, director of public safety, late last night Baker "admitted to two more burglaries in Smith Hall." Lewisburg Police Chief Donald Heiter said that "the investigation is continuing and that there will be additional charges pending."

According to reports from the Office of Public Safety, Baker allegedly crawled through partially opened windows in Larison Cottage and then in Vedder, stole the items, and carried them back to his room. The incidents occurred on Mar. 22; most of the students whose rooms Baker allegedly entered were away from campus for Spring Break.

Officer Neitz of the Lewisburg Police Department provided Public Safety with an account of the incidents, summarizing written and verbal statements from Baker. According to the account, Baker admitted to the alleged burglaries in Larison and Vedder, and stated that in the early morning of Mar. 22 he climbed through a window left slightly open in Larison. He allegedly took a microwave and several other items and, leaving through the door, returned with the stolen property to his room in Vedder.

According to the report of Baker's statement, he noticed that a window in Vedder had also been left partially open. Baker allegedly entered this room as well and took a microwave, a set of swiss army knives, and other items.

Man waives trial in library indecent exposure case

Jameson grateful for opportunity to make a change

BY ANDREW COHEN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

William Jameson waived his right to a preliminary hearing yesterday for charges of indecent exposure, open lewdness and disorderly conduct stemming from a Dec. 8 incident that occurred in the Bertrand Library. Jameson, of Williamsport PA., is alleged to have been on the third floor of the library "sitting on the floor...by a row of book shelves...[with] his penis sticking out of his zipper," according to a witness's account in the Affidavit of Probable Cause.

The purpose of yesterday's hearing "would only have been to determine if there is enough evidence to bring it to trial," said Leo Armbruster, District Justice. "He's waived that procedural safeguard; now he has the right to enter a plea or to enter any special diversionary programs through the District Attorney's office."

Jameson said that he is working to enter such a "diversionary" Accelerated Rehabilitation Disposition (ARD) program. "Through the work of my attorney and the arresting officers there was an agreement that I could enter an ARD program."

Jameson, who according to the Affidavit of Probable Cause admitted having "his penis exposed out of his zipper...[while] looking at pornographic material," said yesterday that "the incident for which I was arrested was a turning point in my life. I got help which I needed."

Jameson said that the incident constituted a "bottom" reached through thirty years of alcoholism. "I've already gone through voluntary alcoholic rehabilitation and I've gotten psychiatric care and I've continued counseling."

Under the ARD program, Jameson would be on probation, would have to continue counseling, and would pay for court costs said Armbruster.

If all parties accept the ARD recommendation and Jameson successfully completes the program, he will avoid facing the two misdemeanors—indecent exposure, second degree; and open lewdness, third degree—and one summary offense—disorderly conduct—which carry a maximum penalty of two years in prison and a $5,000 fine, according to Armbruster.

Jameson pleaded no contest to a charge of disorderly conduct stemming from an incident similar in nature at the Lewisburg swimming pool on July 18, 1991. According to the Affidavit of Probable Cause, there have been prior incidents in which Jameson was alleged to have been "following girls around in the library." No charges were filed.

Jameson said that his attitude about the charges is one of gratitude. "I'm grateful for all the help that everyone's been willing to extend; I'm grateful that I was able to enter a program which is going to mean that I can change my life; and I'm grateful for the recovery process."

University justifies remaining open during 'Blizzard of '93'

BY SARA K. WALKER
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The administrative decision not to close Bucknell after the snow storm on Saturday, Mar. 15 created a lot of discussion and many angry reactions. Students, disappointed to discover that classes would still take place on that Monday, also worried about the safety of professors and support staff who were forced to drive to work.

There have been various rumors as to why the University did not close, but according to Bob Naugle, director at Bucknell's physical plant, the decision was made for the students' well being.

The factors which led to the administration's decision, according to Maxwell, included the consideration that the students on campus required services provided by the university.

Closing the University would have meant closing the cafeteria, the Bison, the library, and other University services. Since the students were already here, they had to be accommodated, he said. According to Naugle, "The students were here and they had to be fed."

Also, the administration was reluctant to allow the students to lose a day of classes, especially during the week preceding spring break when the students have more work than usual.

While the administration and physical plant workers claimed to have had the students' best interest at heart, others expressed their concern

Freed prepares for retirement in May

BY DEB MANASSE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Many students think of the Registrar's Office as little more than the place that hassles them during class registration, harasses them for advisor signatures and sends them the heart-wrenching finals schedules that appear in their mailboxes each semester.

Bruce Freed, who will have served as registrar for 16 years upon his retirement this spring, however, says that he sees his role as one that allows him to develop unique ways to solve students' problems.

"We try to keep in mind ways to provide opportunities for students without abusing degree requirements," said Freed. "We help them consider all their options."

Freed began his career at Bucknell in 1960 as a professor of mathematics. He spent 17 years in the math department before making his move into the administrative side of the University.

"The decision to come to the registrar's office involved mixed emotions," said Freed. "I had come to know and have a good rapport with many students; nonetheless, this was a new opportunity and I was glad to take it on."

Freed said that although he misses the scholarly study and direct student contact involved with being a professor, his position as registrar still gives him some opportunity to work with students and faculty and challenges him to find ways to improve its services.

"We have been able to significantly expand our services without a staff increase," said Freed. " We have accomplished this through use of computer services."

According to Freed the Registrar's Office has implemented a number of computerized system to the office, including a degree audit system which automatically determines whether students have fulfilled degree requirements. In addition, the Registrar's office has made it possible for faculty members, academic dean's, etc. to access pertinent student information electronically.

Another new addition is the computerized scheduling of advisor/advisee schedules which, according to Freed has saved time for faculty members and students alike. "It has helped both sides of the desk and has been very well received," said Freed.

Freed has played an important role in the academic lives of students both in his role of professor and Registrar. Now, freed from his duties, he plans to use his retirement to spend time at his summer house in the country and enjoy a fall trip to Austria.

Susan Naughton—The Bucknellian

Bruce Freed, registrar, has worked at Bucknell for over three decades and will retire this spring. Speaking of his decision sixteen years ago to move from the mathematics department to the registrar's office, he said, "This was a new opportunity and I was glad to take it on."

needs to be evaluated. He said, "The motion before us would have us abandon half of that process before considering whether or not the whole process works, and if it doesn't, how it can be improved. Therefore, the issue of accountability stems in part as identifying particular persons whose position or vote needs to be known. For example, there is no more accountability in the DRC part of the review than in the URC part in terms of allocating specific positions or votes to particular participants of either committee. In other words, the whole system needs to be questioned, not just a part."

"The motion before us would have us abandon half of that process before considering whether or not the whole process works..."
—Larry Shinn, vice president for academic affairs

Shinn realizes that the entire review process is very sensitive to all parties involved. "From my point of view," he said, "none of us like to be reviewed. No review process of the faculty, administration or staff is without some tension."

As with any system, there are countless alternatives, many of which have strong merits and could be considered as a replacement system to the current URC/DRC review system. Shinn feels that one facet of the current system that cannot be improved upon by these otherwise viable alternatives is the level of stress and tension created by them.

"Of the alternatives to the current system of the DRC/URC that I know, there are both more layers and more tensions necessarily inherent in those systems," said Shinn. In other words, the more levels of evaluating that a faculty member must endure, the greater level of tension that he or she must also endure, a consequence that Shinn finds unacceptable.

"With these systems, there is more accountability, but there are more layers. Most of the systems entail more individual decision makers, which produces greater accountability on some levels while simultaneously creating more decision points and therefore more tension."

There never will be a system that is perfect, Shinn said. "I think we have a system that is imperfect, because human judgements are imperfect."

Richard Fleming, chair of the URC and associate professor of philosophy, said that until the motion was placed on the floor, he could not comment.

Eugenia Gerdes, dean of arts and sciences, and Thomas Rich, dean of engineering, both members of the URC, could not be reached for comment.

PUBLIC SAFETY LOG

Thursday, March 25
At approximately 9 a.m., the Administrative Services Department contacted Public Safety relative a series of thefts, from vending machines throughout campus. The appropriate company responsible for the machines were contacted, and investigation is continuing. Total property stolen valued between $3000.00 to $4000.00.

Friday, March 26
A University employee contacted officers and reported finding an unsecured and unclaimed bike in the car pool lot. Rightful owner may claim by proper identification at the Public Safety Office.

Sunday, March 28
Residents in Smith, Vedder, and Larison Cottage, reported to Public Safety of having their rooms broken into over Spring Break. Various items and appliances were removed from the rooms. Investigation is being conducted by Public Safety and Lewisburg Police Department.

Monday, March 29
A brother of Kappa Delta Rho reported the theft of his bike from the house, sometime between 3/17/93 and 3/21/93. The bike was not secured at the time of theft. Value unknown at this time.

Resident of the Bucknell West reported a missing backpack. He stated he left the backpack on the ground when loading his car on 3/20/93, to leave for spring break. The Backpack contained notebooks and a textbook.

At 11:15 a.m., a resident of Larison Hall reported to Public Safety that they had been the victim of harassing phone calls. Investigation is continuing.

Officers responded to the fieldhouse at 7:25 p.m., for a reported injured student. Student did sustain an ankle injury, and was transported by private vehicle to Evangelical Hospital Emergency Room to be treated.

Residents of Bucknell West reported a suspicious individual outside their Mod, at 12:46 a.m., this date. Officers responded to the area but were not able to locate the suspicious individual. Extra patrols are being maintained in the Mod area.

Baker allegedly sold the microwaves for $25 in Bloomsburg, according this same report.

The report went on to suggest that a friend of Baker's regretted that the incidents had occurred and, to make amends, he apparently intended to leave money orders of $50 in the appropriate rooms. But the doors to Larison and Vedder were locked and he allegedly had to break several windows to enter.

According to one Public Safety report, a student returned to his room after Spring Break and reported that his room had been broken into. On his bed was an envelope addressed "to resident." It contained a $50 money order and a note which read, "Sorry for inconvenience. This is for microwave." He reported a stolen microwave, swiss army knives, and a compact disc, taken from inside a CD player.

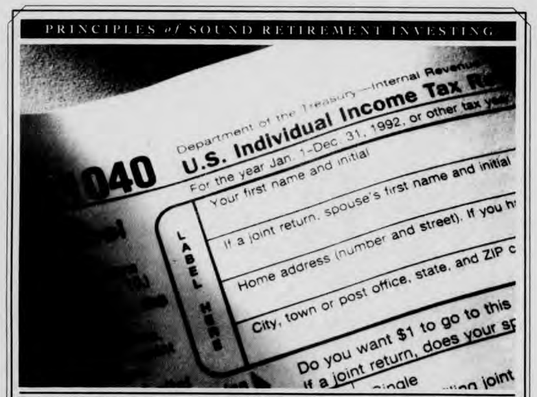
This report also revealed that one of the room's windows had been pried open, that the window sill and a tape case were stained with blood, and that screws had been removed from a trunk, though nothing was apparently stolen from it.

Another Public Safety report offered a similar scenario. A first-year woman reported finding an envelope containing a money order lying on her desk. A broken window apparently allowed access to the lock, according to the report. She, too, reported a stolen microwave. On her bed she found a Walkman which she did not own.

One other student reported finding "her plants, a sculpture, stereo speakers, and a lamp knocked over near the window. She also discovered the telephone cord missing," according to Public Safety. The phone cord, the only item stolen from this room, was discovered by another student whose room was also burglarized.

Another student, whose windows were broken, reported that nothing had been stolen from his room.

Baker was not available for comment.



UNFORTUNATELY, THIS IS WHERE PEOPLE ARE PUTTING TOO MANY RETIREMENT DOLLARS.

Every year, a lot of people make a huge mistake on their taxes. They don't take advantage of tax deferral and wind up sending Uncle Sam money they could be saving for retirement.

Fortunately, that's a mistake you can easily avoid with TIAA-CREF SRAs. SRAs not only ease your current tax-bite, they offer a remarkably easy way to build retirement income—especially for the "extras" that your regular pension and Social Security benefits may not cover. Because your contributions are made in before-tax dollars, you pay less taxes now. And since all earnings on your SRA are tax-deferred as well, the money you don't send to Washington works even harder for you. Down the road, that can make a dramatic difference in your quality of life.

What else makes SRAs so special? A range of allocation choices—from the guaranteed security of TIAA to the diversified investment accounts of CREF's variable annuity—all backed by the nation's number one retirement system.

Why write off the chance for a more rewarding retirement? Call today and learn more about how TIAA-CREF SRAs can help you enjoy many happy returns.

Benefit now from tax deferral. Call our SRA hotline 1 800-842-2733, ext. 8016.

Give Hand in Hand a hand

BISON (Bucknellians Involved in Serving Our Neighbors) Volunteers is sponsoring Hand in Hand, a one day event for nearly 200 mentally and physically handicapped people from the Lewisburg area, this Sunday, April 4 from 1 to 4 p.m. The program consists of games, entertainment and refreshments. Each handicapped person will be paired with a volunteer buddy from Bucknell as their escort for the day. So come out and make a difference by helping someone less fortunate than yourself.

New dean is appointed

Deborah Abowitz has been named the new Associate Dean of Faculty for 1993-1996. Abowitz was the 1990 recipient of the Lindback award as has served on the Faculty Development Committee, FACT, and also held the position of director of the FAS Program.

She will take her position when she returns from her leave at the University of Hawaii at Hilo and will assume the position of Associate Dean of Faculty on August 15, 1993.

Abowitz replaces Jackson Hill, who ends his term on June 15.

Learn stage combat skills

Michael Kamtman, Bucknell class of '77, will present a two-part stage combat workshop on Saturday, April 3 from 10 a.m to noon and 1 to 3 p.m. in Larison Dining Room.

Kamtman holds a master's degree from the University of Connecticut and is the co-author of "Teamwork with Shakespeare," a theatre piece for elementary school students. A member of Fights R Us, a New York-based stage combat performing company, Kamtman holds certification as an actor/combatant from the Society of American Fight Directors.

The workshop is open to the public, free of charge.

Develop your photo skills

The Kodak "Techniques of the Masters" videoconference will feature two photographers on April 8 in Instructional Media Services.

Featured will be renowned photographers Sebastiao Selgado and John Sexton.

Presentations by the photographers will be followed by a film on "The Birthplace of Photography."

The program will be held from 1-3 p.m. and the photographers will be on hand after the program to answer any questions.

Cincinnati faculty strike

Students returning to the University of Cincinnati after spring break were greeted by picket lines as the unionized professors at the University went on strike after a bargaining session failed to produce a new contract that both sides could agree with. This is the first teachers' strike at the school since a six-day walkout in 1979.

Classes are being taught by part-time faculty members and graduate assistants, said Greg Hand, a university spokesman.

The University is offering pay increases of two percent in the first year and four percent for the remaining two years of the three year package. The average salary of the 1,916 professors represented by the union is $51,000.

Students get easy 'A's

More than 500 first- and second-year French students at the University of Colorado received 'A's on their fall semester final exam as the result of a scheduling error between the French department and the women's basketball team.

Both groups had arranged to use the Coors Events Center—CU's 12,000 seat basketball arena—on the morning of Dec. 14. About an hour and a half into the test, the basketball team arrived for their scheduled practice. When the graduate student proctors and the coaches failed to reach a compromise, the proctors ended the exam and announced to the cheering students that they would receive 'A's for the uncompleted tests.

Government suspended

The student government at the University of Alabama has been suspended following the attack of candidate for student Government. A university spokesman said that Minda Riley '94 was hit in the face by a man and had a cross burned in her yard.

The acts are thought to be in connection with an underground Greek organization called The Machine.

University officials suspended the government "until such time as out students can be assured that the methods and procedures for a electing a Student Government Association are free, fair, and open."

Dates given disclaimer

The New York-based National Center for Men has been distributing a document known as the "Consensual Sex Contract" on college campuses around the nation. According to the director of the center, Mel Feit, the document is designed to protect a man from being falsely accused of date rape.

Prior to the start of an intimate relationship, both partners answer questions about the relationship. The contract features a disclaimer reading "Neither of us may claim to be the victim of sexual harassment or assault or rape as a result of the acts which are the subject of this agreement."

Tent party memo was a joke

BY TARA GILLIGAN AND JEFF BOULTER
Bucknellian Staff Writers

Yesterday was the day for odd jokes and bizarre senses of humor. One person's practical joke fooled more than a few gullible people.

Random seniors received in their mailboxes a memo, supposedly sent by Barbara Shailor, vice president for student services.

The memo informed students that at this year's tent party, a post-graduation celebration, no alcohol would be served, citing an overabundance of alcohol related infractions which occurred during and after last year's tent party.

"We will serve soft drinks and punch, as well as food, in place of the beer traditionally offered," the convincing fraud said.

The final paragraph of the prank memo invites seniors to direct comments and questions to Shailor or Melissa Macleod '93, but lists a false telephone number for her.

A large poster hung in the mailroom to inform students that the memo sent under Shailor's name was an April Fool's Joke. Shailor, herself, claimed to have had no part in the memo and said it must have been someone's idea of a clever joke.

The joke seems to have worked; The Bucknellian was flooded with phone calls by irate seniors.

In 1972, Hurricane Agnes pounded rain upon the region for five straight days causing $12.5 million in damage in Lewisburg. Only a small section of the downtown was spared from the flooding.

"In the first five hours I lost three people," said Heiter. One woman on 11th Street was killed when her basement walls collapsed around her. Another suffered a heart attack while being rescued from her South Sixth Street home. The borough's safety director, Gordon Hufnagle, whom the Sixth Street park is named after, drowned while trying to save the elderly woman.

About 700 people were evacuated from their homes in late June of 1972. Heiter said that many were reluctant to leave their homes and waited until the point of having to be rescued by boat. Townspeople who remember the 1972 flood have been much more cautious about heavy rainfalls since then.

Many safety precautions and laws have also been activated since the big flood of '72. Retaining walls have been built along the Bull Run Creek on Sixth Street, flood plain ordinances have been passed which limit building along the river's banks, and 155 more rain gauges have been installed on the Susquehanna River. Information about rises in the river are also now obtained via satellite versus reports from observers.

These precautions help to ensure that Lewisburg will be hit with only one "100-year flood" this century.

Bob Naugle, director of the physical plant, anticipates that the worst problems will be parking and hosing down the mud. As Sturm knows from his experience with the 1972 flood, however, the clean-up is not fun. The water can "create all kinds of havoc," for the mud contains micro-organisms which eventually eat away at the wood in houses.

Cleanup of the flood will not be able to begin until at least tomorrow, when the rain should cease. According to the Flood Forecast Service in State College, there will be "moderate adn heavy rain" throughout today and tonight, which should cause the river to swell to 23 feet before cresting. Snow will also continue to melt in the mountains causing more water run-off and overflow.

that faculty and staff had to drive in dangerous conditions. More than one member of Bucknell's support staff expressed anger at being made to work.

In retrospect, Mary Ellen Crowley '94 believes that the University "should have been closed for the convenience of the professors." She went on to explain that although it was fairly easy for the students to make it to class, professors were inhibited by the road closings and prevented from getting here. Consequently, many classes were canceled.

Heather Brice '93 agreed with Crowley, and said, "If the professors couldn't make it, then the University should have been closed." According to Brice the snow created a "hazardous situation and jeopardized the professors' safety."

The governor's declaration of a "state of emergency" left many students and professors stranded off campus, making the drive to Bucknell not only inconvenient, but also unlawful.

Maxwell explained that it was a "judgment based on several factors." The administration discussed the pros and cons of canceling classes on Sunday after the storm and decided that it would be more advantageous to remain open.

Despite the fact that other schools in the area had decided to close, Bucknell remained open. Maxwell justified this by explaining that those other schools were either just coming back from spring break or it had just begun. Since the surrounding highways were closed, those students could not be expected to be on campus.

Additionally, Maxwell and other administrators reasoned that driving conditions had improved on many of the roads and would improve even more by that Monday.

Maxwell also said that the University was able to remain open because "physical plant did a good job" clearing the walkways and roads on campus.

Maxwell anticipated that there would be professors and other members of the campus community unable to get to the campus. He felt, however, that it was important to "stay open to the that extent we were able."

Payne, in his memo to faculty, addresses Shailor's concern. "I understand that those responsible for extra-curricular programs are often frustrated by impromptu review sessions or extra classes perhaps thoughtlessly scheduled by faculty," he said. Payne hopes that an official policy, which addresses regularly scheduled classes, will "help sharpen expectations of students in this way as well."

According to Athletic Director and head of the Committee on Athletics, "we do everything we possibly can so students miss as little class time as possible."

However, "students have a split allegiance. They have an allegiance to academics and also an allegiance to their team," he said.

Hartzell fears the ramifications of a strict attendance policy. Should Payne's motion result in a mandatory attendance policy, "It would make it impossible to recruit student athletes at this level," said Hartzell.

Associate Director of Athletics Brad Tufts, said the approval of the motion would not be detrimental to sports programs. "I think the coaches are very understanding," said Tufts. Still, he understands the frustrations of coaches. "It is difficult to conduct practices when members are missing," he said. At other schools, Tufts pointed out, certain hours in the week are reserved for extra-curricular activities; no classes are held during these times. With the current scheduling system at Bucknell, however, conflicts inevitably occur.

In the past, some sororities fined members for missing their scheduled activities, and according to Payne, similar penalties should no longer be levied against students who miss events for academic purposes.

Preparing for his presentation of the motion, Payne compared Bucknell to other universities. Amherst, Bryn Mawr, Franklin and Marshall, and Swarthmore all offer a clearly stated attendance policy in their catalogues, according to Payne. Until 1982, Bucknell's catalogue contained a similar attendance policy which was removed when the catalogue was revised.

Payne's Proposal

At Monday's faculty meeting, Michael Payne, professor of English and chair of the department, will propose that the following policy be announced in the Student Handbook:

"Students are expected to attend the regularly scheduled meetings of the courses for which they are enrolled. No student who participates in an extra-curricular activity, team, or program can be penalized for missing an extra-curricular event, practice, or rehearsal when it is scheduled in conflict with the regularly scheduled meeting times of the student's courses."

Motion on class attendance is overdue

Professor Payne's motion to prevent retribution against students who miss extra-curricular activities for class will codify what should already be understood. The motion serves notice to sponsors, advisors and coaches as well as to student participants and team members that academics is indeed our primary reason for being at Bucknell.

The tone of Payne's motion is clear. It is the responsibility of advisors and coaches to do everything in their power to schedule events that do not conflict with classes. However, it is unrealistic to think that this will be possible all of the time, or even some of the time. When conflicts do arise, sponsors and coaches should, at the very least, be understanding of the students' commitment to education.

The balance should always tip toward the academic. To some this may seem a tautological conclusion at an institution such as Bucknell. Sponsors and coaches should already know that when a student chooses class over an event that the student should not be "benched" the next game, tournament, or concert. Unfortunately this is not always the case.

Sometimes retribution is more discrete. The advisors or coaches may not even realize that they are treating the student differently for missing activities. An amendment to the Student Handbook such as the one Payne has proposed may help the sponsors or coaches realize what they were unwittingly doing.

Students stand to benefit the most from Payne's motion. Participants in extra-curriculars will feel less pressure to miss class in favor of meetings, or practices. Students will have to take the initiative. If a student would choose to skip class anyway then the motion doesn't do a thing.

It is also true that some students take advantage of being involved in an extra-curricular activity and use it as an excuse for blowing off classes. Coaches and sponsors get a bad rap, but they are usually unaware of specific abuses. Such excuses will no longer make the grade since Payne's motion returns the responsibility for missing class to the student's hands.

The nature of the issue makes it impossible to establish absolute criteria and procedures for student grievances. What should you do if you are "benched" for going to class? What can you do? This is still a fuzzy area.

Going to an advisor or coach and quoting the Student Handbook may not be the best tactic to take if you think you've been "benched" for missing an activity. In fact, for many it would be too intimidating or embarrassing even to consider. A third party mediator might be an effective means of implementing this policy.

Professor Payne's motion can only strengthen the athletic program and every other extra-curricular activity. The educational mission of the university is the foundation of every extra-curricular activity—without such a curricular mission we would not be here to partake of the extra-curricular.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Where was the English department for lecture?

TO THE EDITOR:

With great concern I wish to note here the appalling lack of attendance by the Bucknell English Department at the lecture on the third wave of feminism, by Rebecca Walker on Tuesday night, Mar. 16. Because the department concerns itself with the teaching of literature and the teaching of literary theory, I find it amazing that I was able to recognize only one English Department faculty member (if there was another, or others, I apologize) at the lecture. Does the department suppose that the feminist theory it necessarily includes in its curriculum needs not concern itself with the third wave? Even if the members of the department have read about this movement, would they not care enough about the student body to hear the students' questions and concerns as they were posed to Ms. Walker? I think the glaring absence of department members must tell Bucknell students that the answer to these questions is a resounding "no." In fact, I think that students must assume that the department complacently teaches its current definitions of feminism without concern for the new direction feminism may be taking—a direction that includes instead of excludes a new generation of women who have experienced a variety of economic, racial, and educational backgrounds and who also have had the privilege to enjoy the benefits of earlier feminists' work for the empowerment of women. This generation of women needs a faculty which is willing to move on as they are to the next level of feminism which concerns itself with a larger picture… not a faculty which remains disinterested and within its own perimeters.

Does the department suppose that the feminist theory it necessarily includes in its curriculum needs not concern itself with the third wave?

If nothing else, certainly students can demand that the faculty members' obligations to keep abreast of new and relevant material include attending such student-sponsored lectures, lectures which so obviously address urgent student concerns that extend so deeply into the English classroom.

Test files are neither cheating nor illegal

TO THE EDITOR:

As a former member of the Bucknell community and a lifetime member of a fraternal organization, I feel that I have a duty to respond to one point in the article on cheating in the Feb. 26 edition of The Bucknellian—the reference to fraternity files.

First, having access to past exams is in no way cheating (unless used during the actual exam). If it were, every person who takes practice exams for the SAT, MCAT, GRE, LSAT, etc., would be a cheater. Of course, this is absurd. Use of old exams is simply a method of studying, and the keeping of such files is in no way "illegal."

Secondly, the use of "test files" is not restricted to fraternities and sororities, as the article implies. Exams from such files are frequently loaned out to people who are friends of some of the fraternity/sorority members. They usually xerox these exams so they can be returned to the files, then loan the copies out to their other friends. I have seen people I do not know studying with materials from my fraternity files. Additionally, individuals frequently keep their own personal files and loan out materials to friends who take the same classes in later semesters. Surely this would not be characterized as "illegal."

Thirdly, the existence of such files is common knowledge, not only at Bucknell, but also nationwide. Professors are quite aware of the use of files. Some recollect their exams to keep them from entering any files. Some distribute old exams themselves so everyone is guaranteed access to them. But, on the other hand, some professors do not care, and use the same exam questions year after year.

Lastly, I would like to say that I do not deny the fact that using old exams as a study aid will give some students an advantage over others. Nor am I saying that all students have equal access to these materials. My concern is to the fact that these practices were included in an article about cheating. Keeping of test files by a fraternity or sorority (or anyone) is not "illegal." Nor is the use of old exams in studying a method of cheating. If such a practice were cheating, so would be the practice of asking for help from someone who has taken the class already. I see very little difference between these two acts. Arguably, this labeling of cheating could be extended indefinitely, and anything other than attending class and taking notes could be considered cheating.

I also believe that The Bucknellian owes the entire Greek community an apology. The passage in the article, which has no factual basis, makes it appear that only Greek members have access to old exams, and that Greeks are a bunch of cheaters. Irresponsible statements like these help to foster the attitudes of the anti-Greek faction on campus.

BSG calls for student representation in tenure process

TO THE EDITOR:

I am writing to express concern about a piece of mail I received in response to a motion passed by the Bucknell Student Government. The motion called for uniform student representation on all Departmental Review Committees (DRCs). Each academic department has a Departmental Review Committee which reviews professors who are up for retention, tenure, or promotion. Their recommendations are then forwarded to the University Review Committee, which makes the final decision. (The BSG has passed a similar motion regarding the URC, calling for a student member on the committee.)

A copy of the DRC motion was sent to all departmental chairs, and the members of the President's Council. The only written response we have received was a copy of the DRC motion with an anonymous note attached. The note reads:

"Do you know what and how much you are to be taught and educated? Why don't you ask your Dad and Mom this!"

Needless to say, the person who wrote the note is of little courage and character, not because of the content, but due to the fact that he/she lacked the guts to sign it. I assume/hope that this is not the predominant view of the faculty, or the administration.

Students…can best judge how well they are being taught! The student perspective is unique… We do not teach, but are able to identify those who enable us to

In either case, this type of rhetoric is a sad reflection on the amount of respect accorded to students.

The Bucknell Student Government, with the passage of the DRC motion, was not stating that students can best judge the content of the actual information they receive, but rather, can best judge how well they are being taught! The student perspective is unique. It is not one of being "learned," but of being "learner." We do not teach, but are able to identify those who enable us to learn.

The BSG feels that the "student perspective" as learner is an essential piece in the puzzle of faculty evaluation. If the process of the URC and DRC reviews is to be truly thorough, effective, and just, there must be permanent student positions on all of these committees.

Additionally, there has been some speculation that the DRC and URC motions passed by the BSG were a reaction to the recent decisions of these committees. Let me assure the students, faculty, and administrators that it was merely a coincidence that the BSG motions came about after the controversial decisions. The BSG is not attempting to reverse any past decisions, but merely wants to take part in a process which fundamentally affects the academic atmosphere of this institution.

Let the jury decide the Rodney King trial

BY TOM MALINICH

In American history, I vaguely remember being taught that one was innocent until proven guilty. Does this ring any bells with anyone out there? Somehow, I get the feeling that citizens in Los Angeles and other parts of the nation conveniently forget this history lesson.

"L.A.: Waiting on a Razor's Edge" is the title of Newsweek's article about the Rodney King II trial (Mar. 29, 1993). Apparently, Los Angeles is preparing itself for the worst in case of another "not guilty" verdict. As one Los Angeles gang member so elegantly puts it, "If they don't convict those dudes [the four police officers] of beating that man [Rodney King], it's gonna happen again [another riot]. I know I'm gonna do everything I can to make it happen." Well, my friend, I think it is time for a refresher course on the United States Constitution.

Guilt is determined by the court system, not by a bunch of opinionated punks who show contempt for our Constitution.

Amendment five states that any person on trial shall not be "deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law." That means guilt is determined by the court system, not by a bunch of opinionated punks who show contempt for our Constitution. This amendment also forbids double jeopardy for those standing trial. Doesn't it seem ironic that these four police officers are on trial a second time, facing practically the same charges?

Amendment six guarantees a speedy trial. Is it just me, or does it seem that these two trials have dragged on excessively? Unfortunately, the media did not help matters any by covering the first trial and subsequent riot non-stop. As a result, finding an impartial jury for the second trial was next to impossible.

The last pertinent amendment is the seventh. This mandates a trial by jury, not a trial by Tom Brokaw or Dan Rather! Only twelve people (with two alternates) can serve on this jury. Please, let's leave the verdict up to these capable individuals and not the media!

This witch hunt against the police must stop, not just in Los Angeles, but nationwide. In my hometown of Rochester, NY, the news was saturated (over Spring Break) with a similar trial of five former police officers. When the verdict of not guilty was given, there was shock and disbelief among the minority leaders. Why? If we cannot accept the decision of the jury, we have got a real problem. This country's judicial system was based on providing the accused a fair trial by jury. Let us stop trying to intervene in order to assure a guilty verdict! Sit back and relax; let the system work!

Move past "teacher/scholar" model

BY CHARLES SACKREY
GUEST COLUMNIST

Recent University Review Committee reversals of departmental tenure votes on Susan Smith-Baish and Gordon Meyer should be reversed because they result from an indefensible, self-destructive tenure review system. This system, based on the search for "excellent teacher/scholars," guarantees that many—perhaps most—faculty members will not achieve their potential either in the classroom or in their research. The teacher/scholar model produces a great diversion from our duties as faculty, because we waste enormous time fighting with administrators, and among ourselves, over largely insoluble differences about "who's the best" among us: who teaches best, writes best, and best serves the community. This tawdry competition among the teachers of young adults is an appalling spectacle.

This lack of widely accepted views about what actually constitutes high-quality teaching and scholarship explains why the URC review process is consistently contentious and capricious.

Why do we faculty allow four of our own members to join with administrators as a URC, then jointly to clasp a gun, point it downward, and shoot everyone in the feet, year after year? And, what's the payoff? This year's benefits have included an explosion of anger and despair from two departments whose decisions were reversed, with aftershocks of confusion and resentment—to mention outward manifestations—on the part of many of the rest of us.

And, what is this teacher/scholar model that demands its yearly victims? In its terms, to be worthy, faculty members must achieve "excellence" in both the classroom and in their published scholarship. There are several eviscerating problems with the model, and its foundations cannot survive even modest critique. One such problem is that most faculty members do not have adequate time to do both jobs well. Though advocates of the model assume symbiosis between teaching and research, at schools like Bucknell, where faculty teach at least six courses per year, neither teaching nor scholarship can continually get the attention adequate to guarantee "excellence" in both. What better proves the point than the growing proportion of Bucknell's faculty seeking, and gaining, release time from students in order (typically) to pursue other matters?

Aware of the obvious, the most prestigious American universities turn over much undergraduate teaching to graduate students so the faculty, who only teach two or three courses per year, can focus attention on generating publications. Thus, by adopting a form of the "publish or perish" model, demanding faculty achieve "excellence" in "scholarship," Bucknell pitted them against competitors better situated to grapple for space in the limited pages of proper academic journals. Those who doubt claims about faculty time deficits should poll our untenured faculty—secretly, given the paranoia that comes with the model—and see for themselves.

A second problem with searching for the excellent "teacher/scholar" is that every dozen faculty members will have at least two dozen versions of what one of them is. While my colleague might see his or her large classes confirming pedagogical choices, I might see them as predictable responses to lax standards; and my exciting new reading list might confirm a colleague's suspicion that we have abandoned standards altogether. So it is, too, with definitions of scholarship. For tenure decisions, the URC seeks "objective" reviews of a candidate's writing by "outside" scholars in the field. But, this quest for objectivity is self-deluding. First of all, what is "fit" for publication in the various fields has been determined by the same kind of small in-crowd that determined the now much-debated "literary canon." Second, "scholarly activity" has come to mean mainly published material, in spite of mounting evidence that more and more academic writing is forced, done to achieve tenure or other kinds of academic status. Consequently, such writing is often characterized by a stunning irrelevance to the social weal (not to speak of the mind-numbing incoherence of most of it to outsiders). In my field, the prestigious journals mostly outpour quantitative esoterica, what economist Robert Pollin has described as "the use of mathematics to disguise vacuous ideas."

This lack of widely accepted views about what actually constitutes high-quality teaching and scholarship explains why the URC review process is consistently contentious and capricious, and so often sends our campus into contortions of wasted days and wasted nights. The best we faculty can do, given the need to confirm standards by periodically firing a few of our own colleagues, is to leave tenure decisions to departments, subject to an appeal process. Doing it this way will allow a mix of definitions of good teaching and scholarship; it will also cut the losses of a competitive game utterly against the grain of honest and dedicated teaching.

Regardless of what faculty evaluation model we choose, we faculty members must use our best talents at pedagogy, ever working to attract students to the world of books and ideas. Our students, bright and sometimes willing, are shaped by powerful social pressures, and they are pulled mightily in two directions. One direction is toward us, and to what we claim we stand for, learning and the life of the mind. The other direction is shaped by an off-campus job market with declining opportunities for many, and a busy on-campus social life that seems only barely tangential to students' course work. The pull in this other direction causes students to strain against us, many of them seeing our courses as mean barriers to unrelated ends, and believing that gains from social life at Bucknell will matter most to them after graduation. I believe it clear as a bell that we faculty currently have neither the time, clarity of purpose, sense of security, nor administrative support necessary to counter this student resistance.

I'm aware that our students' performance is crucially determined by factors over which we faculty have no control. Yet, when in conversation, colleagues agree with my view that students are not made to do their best work at Bucknell—and none have disagreed—I'm left to wonder if the students' lackluster work, when it occurs, is in part a mirror reflection of our confusion. Our fretful anxiety about measuring up, our endless monitoring of each other, our simmering resentments at administrators, our petty jealousies about each other's accomplishments—have all these kept us from doing our best as teachers, and as scholars?

I don't think I trust Tabitha Soren

BY JEFF STERN

I try to read, but whenever my brother spots me, he rushes into the room with a bowl of scalding cheese and a giant wooden ladle and turns on the TV via remote. We only get one channel. We get Music Television. Music Television is more than simply a "video jukebox." It is*the* forum for the latest in comedy, animation, and forms of art so cutting edge that they don't even have names yet.

Tantalized by the aroma of the cheese, I looked up and my eyes met Tabitha Soren's. She was reading some news about President Bill Clinton. Bill Clinton is the first "MTV President." He was on an MTV special called "Choose or Lose" in which he answered questions posed by today's youth, "The Grunge Generation" or "Generation X," as we are affectionately referred to by experts. The bright young people witnessed a healthy balance of political know-how and a never-before-seen working knowledge of rock music in Mr. Clinton. He was crowned only months later, thanks in no small part to "The Big M." I think Tabitha Soren is pretty, but I wouldn't want to kiss her. (I think Bill Clinton would like to kiss her and maybe he has.) She reminds me of the mannequin my mom has in her closet. Sometimes she leaves the mannequin in one place, and when she comes back, it's somewhere else.

I think Tabitha Soren runs MTV. She's what I picture the King of MTV looking like. She's the one who decides on all those cool public service messages that teach us to hate racism and love people for who they are and that one that informed us about the L. A. riots by making the people into newspaper cops beating a newspaper Rodney King and then it said, "Paper is recyclable, People aren't." Then it said "MTV" on the screen for about 3 seconds. So my brother and I sit there thinking: yeah, that was a bad thing that those cops did, we should work to make the world an easier place for everyone to live in and—wow, MTV is great, they care about the same things we do. Then they play the new Alice in Chains video and it's the new Buzz Clip. So now we're thinking: wait, first we jive about Rodney King and now you're telling us that you guys discovered Alice in Chains? Where do we sign up?

See, Tabitha's got it all planned out. She made us vote for Bill Clinton. She makes us like bands that MTV can get to play at their "Old People Sure are Stupid" parties by telling us that she discovered our favorite bands and soon our favorite bands are playing the parties too because Tabitha's so powerful now that they don't have a choice. Choose or Lose, but Choose MTV. That's what she says to them. Tabitha has made MTV so cool that no one who's young or old trying to be young can dislike it. No one seems to be confused that: MTV = Rock n' Roll, and Rock n' Roll = Rebellion Against Everything, Especially the Government, and The Government = Bill Clinton, and Bill Clinton = MTV. Somewhere in there, something is wrong. But me and my brother don't know what it is because Dan Cortese of MTV Sports just jumped off the Grand Canyon into Giants Stadium with a bungee cord and the new Soul Asylum video is coming up. We can't even tell the commercials from the shows and every so often we wonder if this is all right, but Liquid Television is so "out there" that MTV can't really be trying to unify our youth into a single mindset because this stuff is just way too weird ever to be mainstream.

I hate the fact that we have to go back so early in August because a lot of employers won't hire you. There seems no point in eliminating Jan Plan to gain three days in May.

HEIDI DAWSON '95
English/Political Science

I have no strong objections, because I usually go home to work over January, and I feel the Jan Plan program is a slight waste of time. The only drawback is that we should be getting out earlier in May.

MELANIE WIDMER '94

The Jan Plan was one of the few things that made Bucknell unique. They gave it up because of lack of interest instead of trying to build interest.

LEANE HOOD '96

I think it doesn't make sense in the fact that everything is a week earlier, except for Spring Break, and we only have one week less in January.

CURT CRANE '93

It won't affect me, but I think it's ridiculous to come back a week earlier to gain three days in spring, and to lose a month of productive work at school to be bored at home.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Life Week participant explains BHL stances

TO THE EDITOR:

In the Mar. 12 edition of The Bucknellian, Amanda Swarr and Joel Wainwright criticized Bucknellians for Human Life for its "Life Week." As a BHL member, I wish to reiterate the purpose of Life Week as well as address Amanda and Joel's specific criticisms.

The purpose of Life Week was to celebrate the sanctity of human life and educate everyone on life issues in our society: abortion, capital punishment, euthanasia, and war. In my opinion, human life (including the unborn child) is precious and should not be wantonly snuffed out as it is so often in today's society.

As Amanda and Joel have noted, BHL has decided to become more active in human life issues other than abortion. These issues have always been of interest to the group. I believe that in the future, BHL will educate others on these issues, and will work to put an end to destruction of life. However, Amanda and Joel don't seem to like our views on these issues.

With regards to war, we say, "War should be avoided, if at all possible." I think this position is perfectly acceptable. What should we say: "War is never justified"? I think that is unrealistic. As a member of ROTC, I don't relish the idea of killing, or the carnage of war, as some seem to think. Rather, I detest the situations which force us to engage in war. I do, however, see the necessity of war sometimes, and therefore cannot in good conscience be unilaterally opposed to it.

BHL has taken no definite stance on capital punishment because the group has come to no consensus on it. Some are opposed to it, as well as other killing, being consistent in their ethical principles of killing. Others, however, are for capital punishment, believing that the criminal has forfeited his "right-to-life" by infringing upon someone else's. However, this cannot be compared to the unborn child who has not infringed on his mother's life (usually), only her convenience, which is not an acceptable reason for forfeiting the unborn's "right-to-life."

In addition, BHL takes no stance on animal rights. Perhaps someone could tell me why Bucknellians for Human Life is obligated to. I certainly agree animals are alive and their abuse is wrong, but I don't understand why they are an issue for a Human life group. There are organizations of campus which are already involved in this, and I fully support them.

I would also like to show statistics contradictory to those which Amanda and Joel quoted about death from abortion vs. childbirth. Statistics taken from Mr. and Mrs. John Willke's Abortion say that maternal mortality is only 11 deaths/100,000 deliveries while abortion mortality is 40-50 deaths/100,000 abortions, not counting the 100,000 unborn babies killed. In addition, I find it difficult to believe that a woman will get an abortion simply because it is safer than childbirth. There must be other reasons. And while on the track of death from abortion, I don't believe that abortion was ever the leading cause of death among women in the United States.

Amanda and Joel also think that men are pro-life because "...they have no chance of becoming pregnant," and to "control women." As a male, I am concerned about life issues concerning men and women. Even though a woman's pregnancy does not affect me physically, I feel for her and also for the unborn child who cannot stand up for his or her own rights as a human being. I do not wish to control or oppress women in any way, but neither can I allow women to control or oppress the rights of the child growing inside her. Women, along with all of society, should have the right to "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness," but this does not allow people to infringe on other's identical rights. When a woman murders her child by abortion, she is taking rights from a human life, who has his own right to live.

BHL promoted Life Week to celebrate life and we do not wish to oppress people, including women. Our "food and stuff" drive was done for people in the area who need such items, and we donated money to the local Crisis Pregnancy Center. We, as a group, have a goal to stop all killing eventually, and this starts with issues such as abortion, as we believe that all human life is precious.

Association for the Arts helped bring ballet

TO THE EDITOR:

I eagerly read your Mar. 5 article filled with the accomplishments and rigorous schedules of the Pittsburgh Ballet Theatre anxious to see that credit was given to those who worked very hard over the last two years to bring this experience to the Bucknell campus. Correctly you spoke of the active involvement and encouragement of Bucknell alumnus Stan Marshall '43 and also of Danna Frangione and Shellie Cash-Muller. However, I must add that another driving factor behind this residency and performance was the Association for the Arts.

I was President of the Association for the Arts when the idea was hatched with Stan Marshall and the Dance Department to try to bring the PBT to campus. From those first meetings through the months of planning and arranging, Betsy Powers, Co-President of the Association for the Arts, was working vigorously. Not only did the Association for the Arts provide almost the entire funding for the residency and part of the funding for the Saturday performance, we were in on the planning and negotiating as things developed.

Hopefully there is now a better understanding as to what the Association for the Arts does for Bucknell. Our involvement in this Pittsburgh Ballet Theatre project is just one example of how we work by providing funding and organizational skills to curriculum-enhancing projects related to the Arts for the benefit of the entire Bucknell community. Our money comes from donations by alumni and friends to the Association for the Arts as a designated giving area of the Annual Fund. For more information, please contact me or Betsy Powers, Association for the Arts, Bucknell University.

SEAC to combat auto pollution

TO THE EDITOR:

Americans have built a culture that worships the automobile. It is an American fact of life that cars are the principle source of transportation. However, our culture does not consider the environmental damage cars cause. One-third of the U.S. greenhouse gas emissions come from cars and trucks, and at least 50 percent of all the toxic compounds that are released into the air originate from automobiles.

Obviously, we can not simply eradicate cars from our country; yet, we can discourage the use of gas guzzlers, automobiles that replace increased fuel economy with other superfluous items dubbed by the auto industry as "high-performance features." This is where SEAC and the Ticket America program come in.

Ticket America is a program starting April 7 designed to raise public awareness of the environmental and economic costs of gas-guzzling automobiles. The student environmental activists in the SEAC chapter at Bucknell, in conjunction with Ticket America, will begin a week of activities to bring awareness to our campus. Activities will include a table in the Langone Center, and an important meeting on Monday, April 5 at 9:00 at Walls Lounge. The events will culminate in a town-wide event on Wednesday. If you want to learn more, please feel free to come to the SEAC meeting on Monday, talk to us at the table, or give me a call (x5074).

This is our chance to begin a grassroots movement here on campus and beyond as well as work towards a better tomorrow.

Mass media is making too many decisions for us and society

BY CHRISTINA TISA
Bucknellian Columnist

The media is a very dangerous thing. It influences society to think and act a certain way, molds images of what is (and what should never be), dictates fads and trends, and shapes public opinion. This isn't so bad, in and of itself, except that most Americans only subscribe to one form of mass communication. One point of view is adopted, and only one source forms ideology. Many people would call this brainwashing. I would.

The liberal media is in its heyday with Clinton. For example, The New York Times printed a huge article last month proclaiming that President Clinton had introduced a package that would reduce the federal deficit by 500 billion dollars. The article was front page—you couldn't miss it. The next day, as I was scouring the pages for an economics journal entry, I discovered an article on page 15. I almost missed it. It was a piece written to qualify the 500 billion dollar figure, explaining that the 500 billion was actually the gross figure. The net reduction: 325 billion dollars. I turned back to the front page and found the little blurb that would direct the judicious reader to page 15 where he or she could partake of the truth, if they had the energy to flip all those pages.

The articles that we read every day have to be read with a discerning eye. It is necessary to read scores of periodicals and journals to get the real story. Admittedly, most of us have a difficult enough time keeping up with the hundreds of pages that need to be read nightly for classes without reading papers and magazines with more than a sparing glance. The result? Somali tribal leaders are "warlords," Guatemalan fighters are guerrillas, and Ronald Reagan and George Bush created the deficit. The media decides who the good guys and the bad guys are. We (Americans) jump all over the Chinese communist government for violating human rights and our government has signed barely a handful of human rights treaties that have crossed the hands of the United Nations. But does Joe Average who works hard in our service economy for a small buck know that? No, because the media doesn't make that an issue.

Who decides who is and who is not beautiful? The media has subscribed to the notion that all men and women should look like Mr. and Mrs. America. Why is it that the image of a perfectly beautiful woman is tall and graceful, with silky hair, perfect skin, and a voluptuous body when only a small percentage of all women globally that fit into such a category? Why are so many young women suffering from eating disorders, and why are cosmetic surgeons prospering? Everyone wants to be accepted, and will do almost anything to fit into the mold of perfection. Karen Carpenter died for beauty; Carol Alt suffered from an eating disorder; Princess Diana is a recovering bulimic; Elizabeth Taylor, Oprah Winfrey, and Delta Burke all fasted on liquid diets; Cher has reconstructed her face, and women are suffering side effects from silicone breast implants. It is truly a poor commentary for our society. Instead of trying to look like our Barbie dolls, we should all strive to achieve our highest level of health and physical well-being.

We should reject the notion that the solution is not clear. We all need to read the newspapers with a biased eye, pick out the authors interjections, and ignore them. We need to form our own opinions based on knowledge, study, and careful consideration. We need to stop letting the media dictate beauty. We need to put the media in its place; it is society that should lead the media—not the other way around.

In fact, Bucknell's version of the teacher/scholar model, like its truly banal merit review system, like its needlessly hierarchical structure of power, are all habits of thought and practice borrowed from the military and from the more unenlightened corporations. They are all rooted in threats and intimidation and in the revolting notion that we faculty must be prodded like cattle to do with integrity what we want to do anyway. How could such a model serve teaching, where love and trust need be the foundation stones?

Weekend brings E.S.P. and hee-hee-hee's

Need a good laugh? Come to the Bison this weekend to revel in the comedy of Keith Robinson, or hear Ronny Romm reveal your friend's deepest, darkest secrets in Larison Dining Hall. Robinson (left) has been a feature performer for the MTV Half-Hour Comedy Hour, Evening at the Improv, and Showtime at the Apollo. Robinson will perform tonight at 9 p.m. in the Bison. Tomorrow night, Ronny Romm demonstrates his E.S.P. abilities and hypnotic power at 8 p.m. in Larison Dining Hall. Romm claims that his sixth sense has somehow been strengthened to compensate for a speech impediment he had in his early years.
Both performances are sponsored by the Bucknell Activities council.

African artists give performance and residency on their culture

(L to R) Ignatio Chiyaka, Zanji Njovu, and Seth Reichgott will perform Under African Skies at 3 p.m. next Friday in the Tustin Studio Theatre. A celebration of African culture, the group displays an array of talents in music, theatre, and dance.

BY NICOLE COBBAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

What's the best way to soak up the rich cultural heritage of Africa: A) listen to a tape of African music; B) watch a PBS special on African dance; C) read a book of African literature; D) attend the performance of Under African Skies. If you picked D), then you guessed right. Zambian actor-dancer Brian Njovu and Zimbabwean musician-storyteller Ignatio Chiyaka present the fabric of African tales through drumming, dance, storytelling, and song at 8 p.m. next Friday, Apr. 9 in the Tustin Studio Theatre. The performance is free and open to the public, although seating is limited.

Directed by Bloomsburg Theatre Ensemble member David Moreland and James Goode, the show enacts stories from many tribes with fables of the animal kingdom, legends of family life, and mythological encounters. The project was created by a collaborative team composed of four Bloomsburg Theatre Ensemble actors and four African artists, funded by a Special Projects grant from the National Endowment for the Arts and a grant from the Rockefeller Foundation.

Working closely with Zambian performing arts scholar Dr. Mapopa Mtonga, the show has been on tour since Feb. 8 playing to over 40,000 audience members.

In addition to the performance, Chiyaka and Njovu will be in residency at Bucknell Apr. 5-9, offering workshops on dance, drumming, and narrative drama. The Multicultural Center will also be hosting an open reception at 6 p.m. on Thurs., Apr. 8 in the Terrace Room. For a complete residency schedule, contact Danna Frangione in the Department of theatre and dance.

Receptive to all kinds of interaction with students, Chiyaka and Njovu, who go by the nicknames "Iggy" and "Zanji," will be escorted around campus, armed with their drums, by Bloomsburg Theatre Ensemble members.

"Expect some lively sound," said Danna Frangione, associate professor of dance. "They are by all accounts energetic and charming. It should be fun."

Both Chiyaka and Njovu have worked with students before. Chiyaka is currently teaching members of the US Peace Corps in Harare the language of Shona, and has worked as a language teacher at the Ranche House College in Harare. A participant in numerous other cultural workshops as a performer, dancer, and storyteller, he is a dancer with the Batanai Dance Company.

Njovu recently completed work as a community liaison manager on an AIDS project, working with street kids and theatre groups in AIDS education using drama, music, dance, and storytelling. He has conducted workshops and classes for children in African music, dance, and drumming in school at African Centre in London and helped coordinate neighborhood workshops for children at the Chikwakwa Theatre in Lusaka.

The residency is sponsored by the Association for the Arts and the Pennsylvania Humanities Council.

We've come a long way, Bucknell

BY ALEXANDRA STEFANOVIC

Does the thought of a strict policy against interaction with the opposite sex, chaperones, and curfews give you the chills? For those Bucknellians living in the mid 1800's, this was a way of life. Everyone in by 9 p.m. and up by 6 a.m. for calisthenics. If you think this is bad, the rules applying to women at the University at Lewisburg were even more unbelievable.

Women were completely alienated from the campus in 1852 because trustees felt it would be to their benefit if they were taught in separate buildings "a safe half-mile from the college campus." The purchase of the Casey mansion in downtown Lewisburg fulfilled this rationale. A few years later, the women were moved to Larison Hall, forming the "Female Institute."

With the move to Larison, the Female Institute expanded and attracted more women to the University. The institute's conformity with the times placed stringent rules on women. Even though women were now located on campus, all intermingling with the gentlemen was considered taboo. Windows on the lower halves of the first floor were painted white so that a young lady could not even catch a quick glimpse of a passing man. Men were allowed to make formal calls on a Friday night, but they often had to endure the scornful eye of the teachers who prowled the sitting parlor. And what about a casual stroll during the day? These seemingly harmless walks were permitted only if the women received approval from the principal and was accompanied by a chaperone.

Katherine Larison, who is much deserving of the residence hall named in her honor, made great progress in establishing women's rights at Bucknell.

One woman who deserves recognition for the success of the Female Institute is Katherine Brown Larison, A.M. She was a student at the Institute and graduated at the top of her class in 1869. Later, Larison returned to the University as a professor and spearheaded the Lewisburg Alumnae Club, the Young Women's Christian Association, and helped women move toward greater equality. She was one of the first women at this time to hold such a leadership position. In recognition of her success, Larison was awarded the honorary degree of Master of Arts.

Much time passed before the University at Lewisburg became coeducational. The big move came in 1883, a triumphant day for women, but a headache for the faculty, who had to deal with outbursts and opposition from universities along the East Coast. To many, this was unheard of and deemed a mortal sin. There were even suggestions that women and men's desks face opposite directions to avoid possible distractions.

Now women and men sit in classes together. Even so, everyone who thought, "Hooray, equality!" was mistaken. The University Catalogue states that women [illegible] included from taking some college courses because they were still considered part of the Female Institute. There was a separate section for women titled "Collegiate Courses." If a woman wanted to take courses in either the Classical or Scientific fields, they had to obtain special approval.

The election of Miss Eviline J. Stanton in the summer of 1897 as "dean of the college women" helped end the discrimination between the classes women and men were allowed to take. Miss Stanton was the first woman to be officially recognized as a part of the Bucknell administration. She became an inspiration and role model for all women at Bucknell and ignited their desire to change with the times.

Women at Bucknell followed Stanton's lead by demanding participation in athletics. Going to class, cheering at football and croquet games, and daily calisthenics in Larison Hall were not satisfying enough. They wanted their own varsity sports teams. In 1896, with the introduction of the first women's basketball team, Bucknell was on its way toward increasing the role of women on campus.

The mid-1800's were a tough struggle for women. Precedents needed to be set, and female enrollment had to increase. The New Cottage for Women was constructed in 1905 (now Harris Hall), sparking the increase in the female population on campus that was necessary to continue breaking down the hostili[illegible] the 1900's.

This is the first article in a series of three about the history of women at Bucknell. Part II will cover women at Bucknell between 1900 and 1950.

Don't be a dip

BY BRETT QUEENER '92
DARTMOUTH GRADUATE

I've been trying to kill myself for some time now, but if it hadn't been for a routine dental checkup I might never have known it.

While driving to the dentist's office, I felt the way most patients do—guilty about not flossing much lately and ready for some minor repairs. I hadn't prepared myself for a long silent drive home in which I had to come to terms with my own survival. The dentist told me I was developing mouth cancer. All the brushing and flossing in the world would not help me now. Unless I stopped dipping, he said, I would lose my gums, my teeth, and eventually my life.

Dipping: that disgusting habit of putting a little pinch between your lip and gums. Smokeless tobacco is one of the most addictive legal, over-the-counter drugs available. Hard-guy frat boys and jocks here at Dartmouth are proud of the little worn circles their tobacco canisters create in their rear jeans' pockets. I was. I put that first dip in because I promised a friend I'd try it. Soon after, I started dipping three to four times a week as a substitute for alcohol during parties. The rush was quick and the hangover nonexistent. By the time I realized my habit was self-destructive, I was powerless to stop. Last year I dipped a tin of tobacco every two days. I put a dip in when I woke up. I put a dip in during class. The only time I remained dip-free was when I was eating and working out. It didn't matter that every time I brushed my teeth my gums bled. It didn't matter that I usually couldn't get to sleep until four in the morning. It didn't matter that the only way I could study or concentrate on tests was to use smokeless tobacco. All I knew was that I needed it to function. Without it, I was uptight and irritable. The irony of my addiction is that I developed it while at Dartmouth, an institute of higher learning. While visiting other top schools, I've noticed users there as well. Why is this? A fellow user told me that his dipping serves to reject a lot of the perfect middle-America backgrounds so many of us come from. Dipping as a release from all those pressures to succeed works very well in a competitive environment such as Dartmouth, he said. For him, smokeless-tobacco use goes hand-in-hand with Dartmouth. When he isn't at school, facing the academic and social rigors that constitute student life, he doesn't dip. It used to be that way for me. But now my body constantly needs that emotional and physical release I get from dipping.

A recent report in the Journal of School Health speculates that people who use smokeless tobacco tend to be quitters, loners, and underachievers. But when I look around at those who use dip here, I see students who perform well. An academic star and addict told me his grades would suffer if he were forced to give up dip. Scientists would agree with him. A recent National Institute of Health study on smokeless tobacco concludes, "Tobacco withdrawal produces increased irritability and decrement in several basic cognitive functions. These disruptive effects begin within hours of the last dose....Thus the associated cognitive impairments could have adverse effects on academic and job performance."

Habitual dippers see adverse effects of a different kind. They are 42 times more likely to develop oral cancer than non-users. Once malignancy develops, close to 50 percent die—the highest fatality rate for any cancer. If you recover from the cancer and don't require a gum graft (a lovely procedure in which doctors scrape skin off the roof of your mouth to fill up the hole left by the gouged-out growth), get ready for a long history of dental and gum troubles. The damage is irreversible. If that danger weren't enough, dipping also causes elevations of blood pressure, heart rate, and certain blood lipids. Today, my once perfect mouth is a shambles. I can't sit down and write this piece for more than 15 minutes at a time, because my mind wanders and my body thirsts for that instant nicotine high.

I am no savior, no reformed addict who has seen the light and feels obligated to share it with all those blind sheep out there. Because, you see, I have failed. I haven't quit. To function semi-normally, I have started chain-smoking filterless cigarettes. I am getting a prescription for nicotine gum, which is not an optimal solution at all. And I still dip, having switched to my lower gums to avoid contact with my upper ones where my cancer developed.

And I have worse news: use of dip appears to be increasing around campus, especially among the younger classes. Area merchants say they sell more than 1,500 tins a week, and that the number is increasing. Dip has become the en vogue thing for female athletes and outdoorsy individuals. Over Green Key Weekend, several alums told me they had continued their habit. The implications are scary and unbelievably sad.

A bit of Russian wisdom to ponder

Russian TA gives insight into our culture through a comparison with his own

BY RYAN WICK

What is the last thing you would expect to hear a Russian say? Up until a few days ago, "I hate vodka" would have been high on my list, but not after speaking with Sergey Avramenko, Bucknell's newest Russian teacher. He has a degree in World Literature from Moscow University and has lived and taught all over the world. "We prefer wine," he said emphatically.

How strange it must be for someone to suddenly immerse himself in another culture. Having only been here for six months, what strikes Avramenko as odd or even incoherent may very well never have occurred to us. Sometimes outsiders see more clearly than those on the inside.

"America is the country of our dreams," he said. "Ask anyone in Russia. Of course you have problems—You can compare with our problems. America is a paradise. You have no lines in a store. Of course it's very strange for me—You can buy everything."

Twenty years ago, Avramenko's father was a teacher of Russian in India. Madhu Malik, Associate Professor of Russian at Bucknell, was one of his students. When Malik visited Russia last year she invited Avramenko to come to Bucknell. The department was looking for a teaching assistant, a position that is normally filled by students who want extra practice with the language. Malik describes Avramenko as "a good deal."

She said, "We had no idea that we could get someone with his qualifications given what we offer in return. I think our students are very fortunate," Avramenko considers himself fortunate as well, even though he holds the Russian equivalent of a Ph. D.

Being in America is an "absolutely different life" for the 31-year-old professor, especially at Bucknell. "Like you say, this is the Bucknell bubble. All the people live absolutely separately—They're not so close as in Russia. I don't know why, maybe because they're rich. Students are like my daughters—little girls—but I like them. It's not so interesting—It's terrible, simply terrible. I compare myself when I studied in Moscow University with Bucknell students. You see, it's very strange to me. We had 12 subjects in one semester, four months, twelve exams. We never had a break."

Joanna Conard—The Bucknellian

Sergey Avramenko, a Russian teacher from Moscow University, graces Bucknell students with his fascinating cultural perspectives and insight.

The Russian school year consists of two full four-month semesters with only one week of vacation in between.

The style of education at a liberal arts college is something entirely foreign to a Russian. "From my first year at Moscow [University] I knew exactly about my future profession—Yes, of course!—When I ask my students about their future profession, they don't know. Bucknell students can study chemistry, geography, music, and Russian language. The world belongs to professionals—I can't understand it."

Avramenko is shocked that students can take art and music: "This is hobby, something you do in the evening." Such an observation illustrates the differing attitudes within the two countries about how education is pursued. A member of the English department once gave his summation of American value system by saying, "Americans pay the most for their education, and then try the hardest not to get it."

Avramenko added, "Maybe its normal for Americans. Please trust me, I don't want to change anything in this system. I just have my observations."

When asked how he decided on a profession, Avramenko said that he believes that people tend to repeat the destiny of their parents. He has done so, as his father is a professor of literature at Moscow University.

For Avramenko, America is a rich country without a soul. When his students tell him that there is indeed a culture in America, he agrees but states that it is very, very young. "You have a very good economy, but you haven't a culture," he explains. When people respond to such an accusation with tales of the rich heritage of cowboys of the American west, he says, "this is not culture." And he says of the abundance of American flags, especially in people's homes, as a way of expressing that that they are American, "Yes, yes, you must be proud of it, but you don't need to show it."

One might expect this quiet intellectual to be appalled by television, the mindless passtime of a society so bombarded with advertisements and mutant parajournalism that people are not even sure when they click to an infomercial. Far from being appalled, however, Avramenko makes perfect use of television, "This is my friend, teacher. In Russia, we have only four channels. I like American movies. I watch T.V. with a dictionary... I study slang. You must use slang or nobody will understand you. It is hard, slangs change after one month."

Avramenko made what he calls a "big mistake" when he spoke with his all-female conversational Russian class about the place of women in modern society. "It was terrible, it seems they hate me [laughs]. I described a woman's place in Russia. It's a tradition. The woman is the mother—keep children, cook, stand in lines—And the task of man [is] to make money."

Contact with people who are willing, like Avramenko, to share and to discuss their culture with others is beneficial to everyone involved. It requires people to evaluate their way of life, to discover its strengths and weaknesses, so that it becomes possible for people to find a way for one to live most effectively within the context of others.

Beating the system at Bucknell

BY KRISTEN M. KUSEK

Hopefully you've seen the Disney classic Aladdin by now. Allowing oneself the hour and a half pleasure of nuzzling into the pillows of those childhood Disney days is a welcome comfort for any stressed Bucknellian. Remember the lyric "Gotta eat to live, gotta steal to eat..." sung by Aladdin? Well, fellow Bucknellians, you no longer have to pay $3.50 to witness Aladdin in shop-lifting action. The Bucknell Bubble is home to quite a few "Gotta-steal-to-eat-Aladdins" of its own, only the mischief done does not always deal with food.

Perhaps the most amusing response to the question of how to beat the system at Bucknell was from a junior who said with a "Grinch who stole Christmas" grin, "Well, I think the most fun I ever had at beating the system was last year's tent party. Even though we stood out in the pouring rain all night, it was definitely worth the satisfaction of beating Bucknell." The student explained the tactics she and an accomplice employed in order to obtain the wristbands necessary to bypass security on the mud-slopping way to the beer haven beneath the tent. In summary, she and her friend posed as high school students at Evangelical Hospital who supposedly had a health project. In order to "enhance" the appearance of the project, the students asked for the use of doctor props, such as rubber gloves, tonsel sticks, and...wristbands. When this segment of the mission was successfully executed, the step was to slice the bands open with a knife and to color the insides with a red marker, which apparently led to an imposter pink wristband very similar to those issued strictly by Bucknell's security team. The student further explained that she even made a profit on this deal. That particular night, she was offered $3 by a well-on-his-way male student to let him in front of her in the beer line. Considering the financial input of $1.25 for the red pen, the student accepted the offer with a $1.75 profit.

Another student cited the Bison as another vulnerable target for mischief. We have all probably witnessed (or partaken in) the old hide-the-cream-cheese routine in order to save that extra quarter or two. A new twist to the Bison scam was explained by another student. The student claims to habitually fill a large coffee cup with soup rather than coffee. When the Bison worker dutifully asks, "Is that coffee?", the student coolly responds, "Yeah" and gets away with paying a cheaper price for a more expensive item.

The same student, while relaying this stealth move, was ripping off a dryer in a laundry room, shorting it two quarters of the required three.

The triumphant schemer added, "Well, even all the (a reputable major at Bucknell) use their professor's copy privileges to do all of their copying, be it (the aforementioned major) or not! For $20,000+, we deserve a few extra copies and some free soup."

Some of the common responses to how to beat the system at Bucknell included sneaking into Bostwick through the back door and sticking tape on the end of a vendor card in order to retrieve sodas without deducting money from the card.

When the topic of beating Bucknell's academic system arose, the responses were weighted with a serious tone. One student replied, "Bucknell does not emphasize academic morality, so people have no qualms about going to the files [in order to retrieve previous exams, lab reports, etc]. The student added, "This was an unpleasant surprise for me."

Another student commented with a smirk, "Come on, cheat sheets are how I got through Geology class...and all of high school too."

Bucknell is home to quite a few Aladdins of its own, all finding mischievous ways to survive financially, socially or academically on a competitive college campus. If only we could each have a personal genie of our own, and a baby monkey friend always by our side. Still, the true Disney fantasy world only exists in the movie theater.

Blood, sweat, and cheers for ballet residency

Living up to the tradition that the show must go on, the Pittsburgh Ballet Theatre ended a week-long residency with a performance in the Weis Center on Mar. 13, the night of one of the worst blizzards this century. To the amazement of the group, hundreds of students turned out for the concert, enticed by the outreach program the company had already held within the community. On Mar. 22, the PBS program "Watch This" aired a fifteen-minute special on the Pittsburgh Ballet residency, including interviews with Danna Frangione, associate professor of dance, and a fourth-grade lecture/demonstration the group conducted with the Kelly Public Schools in the Weis Center. A companion piece is in the making for a longer program called "America Dancing," also to be aired on PBS channel 33 and PBS affiliates. Here's a look at the most memorable events of the Pittsburgh Ballet Residency—events that motivated students to brave the elements to catch a final glance of what there is to strive for. Photos by Brian Sipes

Men's lax opens 1-2, faces Cross

DARREN S. MILLMAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

While much of the campus community fled the confines of Bucknell in favor of more exotic spring break locales, the men's lacrosse team remained in Lewisburg awaiting a brief reprieve from Mother Nature's late winter wrath. With the Princeton and Penn games already postponed on account of the weather, it began to appear as if the season would never get underway.

But, alack and alas, the snow did finally melt, and the Bison laxmen (1-2) opened up the 1993 season at home against the Air Force Academy on Mar. 20. Perhaps a bit weary from their trip across the country, the Falcons came out flat and were bombed 16-6 by an eager and excited Bucknell squad.

The Bison offensive onslaught featured points from an astounding 13 different players. Tri-captain Todd Streelman '93 led all scorers with five points (two goals, three assists), while Justin Zackey '94 and Chris Pemberton '95 added four points of their own.

The solid defensive effort was led by the goaltending of Colin Barker '94 (13 saves) and Matt Wojnovich '94 (four saves).

After the convincing grounding of the Air Force Academy, the Bison confidently traveled to West Point on Mar. 27 to confront an Army team ranked eighth in the nation. That confidence did not last long as the highly touted Cadets blitzkrieged the Bison from the onset, jumping out to a 7-0 lead after the first period of play. The Bison fell behind 9-0 before a missile from the stick of Dan Snyder '93 hit its target early in the second period.

While the offense attempted to rally, the defense was bombarded with 49 Army shots. Bucknell was simply unable to stall the Cadet assault and fell by the final score of 14-4. Army has yet to lose a league game in the history of Patriot League competition.

Perhaps more damaging to the Bison season than the loss to Army was the loss of tri-captain and defensive mainstay Gabe Portuondo '93 for the entire year after he suffered a dislocated toe in the first quarter.

Midfielder Ricky Herrema '93 picks up a ground ball during one of last season's games. The tri-captain is Bucknell's face-off specialist.

Head coach Sid Jamieson described Portuondo as "an excellent leader who the younger players could look up to, in addition to being an outstanding defenseman. The loss of Gabe leaves us fairly thin at the defense position."

On Wednesday, the Bison were hosted by another top-twenty team—the Delaware Blue Hens. According to Zackey, "A major team goal has been to break into the top twenty, and the Delaware game was seen as a necessary win in order to achieve that goal."

Focused on the task at hand, Bucknell came out strong against the Blue Hens, trading goals with the home team. At the end of the first quarter the Bison were only down 2-1, and had renewed confidence that they could make this a close game. In the ensuing quarters, however, Bucknell failed to gain any advantage, and the game slowly began to slip away. Although the final score was 13-6 in favor of the Blue Hens, Jamieson stated that the game was more competitive than the score might indicate.

"The difference in the Delaware game was extra-man and man-down situations. We went 0-6 in extra-man situations, and you've just got to do better than that."

The offense was paced once again by Zackey and Streelman, who each finished with two goals and an assist.

Assessing the Bison thus far, Zackey commented, "We have a lot of potential, and the teams we have lost to have been good teams, but we still have a long way to go to reach our potential."

After the 16-goal barrage against Air Force the Bison offense has seen its point total drop significantly.

According to Jamieson, "We really miss our little sniper Kevin Roth ['92] on the crease because we just haven't been able to finish plays like we did last season."

Softball rolls off seven in a row after dropping first two

BY CHRIS DROWNE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

"I'm pleased with where we are right now, but we could be a lot better," said softball coach Terri Grieb. It's hard to be a lot better then 7-2, but when you consider the fact that the team only had one outdoor practice going into its opening doubleheader, you could see where Grieb believes her team could be 9-0 at this point.

Having had only that one outdoor practice, the Lady Bison opened their season down in Florida with seven games over break. Barry College, who entered the game with a 20-4 record, showed the benefits of good weather in taking game one 5-2. Allison Love '95 spent the afternoon chipping off the rust (several walks and wild pitches) before absorbing her first loss of the season.

"We weren't ready, and they were more in sync," admitted Grieb. By the nightcap, Bucknell was much sharper but still fell 2-1. Heidi Dawson '95 scattered seven hits and got little offensive support in her first outing of the season.

"If we played them at the end of the Florida trip, we'd have beaten them," stated Grieb.

Offensive support hasn't been a problem for the Lady Bison since, as they've reeled off seven straight wins. They swept St. Thomas 6-4 and 6-0. Dawson and Love each evened their records at 1-1 in helping the team get to .500.

Bucknell plated nine in each of its two games against the Florida Institute of Technology. Dawson won the first, 9-6, and Love the second, 9-7. Outfielders Lisa Fink '93 and Jill Spatzer '93 led the offense. In the final game of the trip, Niki Gruning '96 notched her first collegiate win with a 10-0 shutout of Mancalester.

Heading North sporting a 5-2 record, Bucknell had to face an undefeated St. Francis (PA) squad with only one additional day of outdoor practice. In years past, this doubleheader has been a given two wins for the Lady Bison. Despite the lofty 4-0 start by the Red Flash, the Bucknell players still weren't taking their intra-state opponents very seriously.

Trailing 3-2 in the home half of the fifth inning, Spatzer broke the game open with a bases-loaded blast to centerfield that scored Jen Yuengling '93, Devaney Kerr '94, and Ellen Gabriel '93. Spatzer was thrown out at the plate when she tried to stretch her triple into an inside-the-park homer. Gabriel added two insurance runs for Bucknell with her single in the bottom of the

The 1990's have seen the unsettling trend of players dictating who will coach their team, rather than the traditional way of a coach choosing his players. Trying to explain this could turn into a term paper. So, I'm going to focus on the most recent case in point — the United States Davis Cup team.

After the U.S. captured last year's world championship, ESPN tennis commentator Cliff Drysdale said, "It would take a monumental upset to keep the U.S. from winning at least three of the next four championships." Nobody blinked an eye at this prediction. After all, six of the top 11 ranked players in the world (#1 Jim Courier, #2 Pete Sampras, #7 Andre Agassi, #8 Ivan Lendl, #9 Michael Chang, and #11 Mal Washington, not to mention our doubles teams) are American. Why then did we lose miserably to Australia? Simple. None of those players made the trip Down Under. Instead, #30 Brad Gilbert and #49 David Wheaton absorbed the opening round defeat. There isn't a major tour event to enter or prepare for until at least next month. So, why then didn't they compete for the stars and stripes?

Again, simple (or at least common in the 1990's). They don't like their coach [referred to as captain in Davis Cup]. Tom Gorman, who captained last year's champs, has never been popular with the majority of the top players. John McEnroe is the man the players want captaining their team.

Struggling Bison Nine split twinbill with Navy

BY JON TERRY
Bucknellian Staff Writer

As the master of wit, Casey Stengel once said, "Baseball is ninety percent pitching, and the other half is mental." The Bucknell baseball squad is learning this lesson the hard way.

The 3-13 Bison have allowed just one run on nine hits in their three wins this year, but unfortunately the pitching and defense have been generally horrendous in the other thirteen contests.

Tuesday's doubleheader split against Navy showed both the weaknesses and the potential of this team. In the opener, the team's first home game of the year, Jake Kazanjian '93 pitched seven gutty innings, but dropped a 6-2 decision thanks to a lack of support behind him. The team committed four errors, including two in Navy's five-run third inning, and made two huge baserunning blunders later on to prevent a comeback.

Down 5-2 in the fifth, Bryan Koch '95 led off with a walk and Anthony Tobia '95 pinch-ran for him. Kyle Morris '95, up next, hit a double-play ball to short, but the second baseman could not handle the toss. Tobia tried to take the extra base, but was thrown out at third on a close play. Moments later Matt Sniegocki '93 drilled one up the gap in left-center, but it went for naught as Morris was thrown out at the plate on a brilliant relay throw from Navy shortstop Todd Butler. It took perfect execution on Navy's part to kill the rally, but had the Bison been a bit more conservative they would have had at worst runners on second and third with nobody out, instead of two outs and one man on.

Kazanjian (0-1), who for the third straight time pitched well but got nothing to show for it, allowed only six hits and one walk while fanning five.

Koch and Sniegocki led the offense with two hits apiece. Sniegocki showed signs of coming out of a season-long slump with two doubles. The centerfielder had started the year with just four hits in 38 at-bats.

Kurt Waldner '93 was the story in the nightcap. Engaged in a fierce pitcher's duel with Midshipman Ken Dolan, Waldner used a three-run fifth-inning rally to pull out a 4-0 win. Waldner (2-3) looked very impressive in going all seven innings, giving up just five hits while walking none. His most serious threat came in the very first inning when Navy had runners reach second and third with two outs, but Waldner worked out of the jam.

In the Bucknell's productive fifth frame, Scott Sutfin '94, who is hitting a cool .342 this year, provided the deciding blow. With the bases loaded and two outs, the shortstop delivered a single in the hole between third and short, and after Navy's leftfielder misplayed the ball, all three runners had come home. The Bison added some insurance in the sixth when Koch reached on an error and later came around to score on a wild pitch.

"Our story all year has been either terrible pitching—and I am as much to blame for that as anybody—or no offense or defense," said Waldner, commenting on his team's 8.54 ERA, .236 batting average, and .937 fielding percentage. "In the first game [against Navy], Jake pitched well, but got no defense. In my game, it was nice to get everyone on the same page and put all three together in one game."

During spring break, the Bison embarked on an eight-game trip to Fort Myers, FL, and while the competition was tough, the team went just 2-6 on the excursion. Both of the team's wins came against Central Connecticut, and both featured masterful pitching performances. In the first game of the trip Waldner tossed a two-hitter and Koch and co-Captain Larry Trout '93 combined for five hits and three RBI's as the Bison prevailed, 6-1.

The only other win on the trip also came against Central Connecticut three games later. In that contest David Scranton '95 pitched a two-hit 7-0 shutout. In a game in which Manager Gene Depew played most of his younger players, Bucknell got seven hits, all of them by Pete Gorski '96, Tom Chiacchio '95, and Charlie Griak '96.

The rest of the trip, however, did not go nearly as well. The Bison held leads in six of the eight games, but only won two of them. Against Indiana, Kazanjian pitched six strong innings and left the game with a 2-1 lead, but the bullpen could not hold the lead and the Hoosiers won, 3-2.

The next day Bucknell led another Big Ten opponent, Iowa, 5-3 after five and a half innings, but Dennis Maguire '93 and Rob Glus '95, suffering from poor defense behind them, could not hold the lead, and the Hawkeyes prevailed, 12-5.

Perhaps the most demoralizing loss was on Mar. 23, when the Bison jumped out to a 10-4 lead against Youngstown St., but wound up on the wrong side of a 13-10 decision. In a game in which co-Captain Mike Kearns '93 (double, triple, three RBI), Koch (two-for-two, two runs scored), Morris (two

Bucknell regains Presidents' Cup lead

Bucknell University captured the men's and women's indoor Track and Field championships and posted place finishes in both women's Swimming and Diving and men's Basketball to forge out in front in the 1992-93 Patriot League Presidents' Cup race. The Bison concluded the winter athletic campaign with a cumulative point total of 64.0 points, while Colgate University, the leader after the fall season, finished in the runner-up position with 57.5 points.

The Presidents' Cup is awarded annually to the institution which accumulates the highest point total over the course of the academic-athletic year. Points are awarded based upon tournament finishes by each institution, or, if there is no post-season tournament in a particular sport, then points are awarded based upon the final regular season standings. Institutions which do not sponsor certain League sports do not receive any points in the tally for those sports.

The League office is responsible for the tabulation of standings, and publicly announces them three times a year; in December, March, and May.

Lafayette College captured third place finishes in men's indoor Track & Field, men's Swimming & Diving, and women's Basketball and is presently in the third place position with 55.5 points, while crosstown rival Lehigh University is in the fourth spot with 54.5 points on the strength of second place finishes in both men's Swimming & Diving and Men's Indoor Track & Field. The United States Military Academy (42.4 points—champion in men's Swimming & Diving), the College of the Holy Cross (41.0 points—championships in both men's and women's Basketball), Fordham University (40.0 points), and the United States Naval Academy (22.0 points—champion in women's Swimming & Diving) round out the eight League institutions.

Linksters fare well at Loyola Tourney

Bison go south to co-captain's home course for first tournament as well as dinner

BY JONATHAN BORDEAU
Bucknellian Staff Writer

After an encouraging fall season on the links, the Bucknell golf team is looking to continue their success with the 1993 spring campaign.

Returning for the Bison are low-scorer and co-captain Doug Dollenberg '94, co-captain Dave Fries '93, Paul Gregory '95, Jeff Graph '96, Paul Schaffer '95, and Jimmy Offria '96. Coach Tommy Thompson likes what he has seen thus far from his golfers. "We took seven players south on our trip to Pinehurst. The guys got a lot of good practice in and I think it served them well in the Loyola Tourney."

The Bison headed south to Hunt Valley, MD on Monday for a two day tournament at the Hunt Valley Golf Club. After forgoing the season-opener at Navy due to an unplayable course, the squad looked for a successful showing at the Loyola College Golf Invitational.

After the first day, Bucknell battled for a fifth place finish out of the eighteen teams competing. "I was impressed with our showing during the first day," commented Coach Thompson, "Doug [Dollenberg] had a good round, shooting a 79."

Things, however, got worse for the Bison as the wind presented problems on the second day of the tournament. Dollenberg shot a highly uncharacteristic 91. "Doug wasn't able to consistently keep the ball on the fairway. The wind made the course play very long," commented Thompson.

Bucknell finished with a team total of 648 (318-330), good enough for tenth out of the field of eighteen. Penn State won the tournament, followed by George Mason and William & Mary. Among the teams that Bucknell topped were host Loyola, Rutgers, LaSalle, and Patriot League-foe Lehigh. The final leader board was stacked at the top, as the Bison were only six strokes out of fifth place.

"It was a strong tournament, there were a lot of good teams at Loyola," commented Thompson. "Penn State, Rutgers, Temple—they're all very good teams."

Individually at Loyola, Fries was the team's low scorer with a two-day total of 158 (77-81). Gregory shot consistently with two 81's for a two-day total of 162. Behind Fries and Gregory were Graph with a 164 (81-83), Schaffer with a 166 (81-85), and Dollenberg with a 170 (79-91).

After receiving word that Army's course will be unplayable for this weekend's scheduled match, the Bison will look forward to a quad match at home against Lafayette, Rider, and Swarthmore. The quad tournament, scheduled for next Tuesday (course conditions permitting) will be a good opportunity for some of the younger players to score well. "We only took seven players south, so some of the younger guys were responsible for getting out on their own and getting some practice," said Thompson. The seven-player per team, five-score format of the tournament will give players like Offria and Drew Smith '95 valuable tournament experience.

After an encouraging fall, highlighted by Doug Dollenberg's consistently stellar play and appearance at the Eastern Championships, the team looks to place in at least the top half at the important Patriot League Tournament. The service academies, Army and Navy, are seen as pre-tournament favorites. After placing fifth at last year's tournament, the team hopes to have a strong enough showing at the league tournament to qualify for the Eastern Intercollegiate Invitational at the end of the season.

The team will have a number of opportunities in this short spring season to juggle the lineup and "move up the ladder" in the Patriot League.

Cycling completes first race

BUCKNELLIAN TEAM CORRESPONDENT

The Bucknell Cycling team opened up its collegiate racing season with an impressive showing at the Slippery Rock University Stage Race. This stage race consisted of a Saturday criterium and individual time trial and a Sunday road race.

The men's 'C' team dominated the criterium and time trial by finishing 1-2-3 and taking a clean sweep of the medals in both races. Early in the criterium George Bicking '95 pursued, caught and blew away a breakaway SUNY- Binghamton rider to win the race by thirty seconds. In the ensuing field sprint, Greg Tall '93 and Eric Fredericks '96 copped the silver and bronze respectively with powerful sprints. Art Clay '93 placed in the top ten, contributing to the team's point total.

The men's C time trial pitted Bison time trial specialist Clay against the clock. Even after flatting in the final stretch, Clay won the race by over 15 seconds. Bicking, Tall, Fredericks, and Jim Ruiz '95 also had impressive races and ended up grabbing the rest of the medals.

In the Sunday men's 'C' road race, the Bison lost two riders in a bloody crash. Under the direction of Bicking and Clay, the remaining riders managed to regroup on the last lap. Despite the difficulties, the pair exploded away from the field in the final 200m to add another gold and silver to the Bison medal count. Ruiz, who blocked off other riders in the sprint took the sixth place points.

In the men's and women's A criteriums Chris Neumann '95 and Lee Lefkowitz '93 continued the Bison dominance. The two Bison rode most of the race trying to urge an unwilling seven man break to catch a single breakaway rider, but were unable to do so. In the end the two showed their sprinting prowess by taking third and fourth respectively. Nikki Yajko '95 faced the tough test of riding against a number of national caliber women 'A' racers. The first year rider held her own as she placed a surprising ninth and contributed several points to the Bison team effort.

In the A 10-km time trials Lefkowitz clocked in with an incredible average speed of 25.5 mph. His time was good enough to take the bronze medal in the elite field. Neumann, who calls himself "just an average time trialist" placed fifth and may have underestimated his time trialing abilities. In the women's time trials, Yajko bettered her best average speed and placed 10th overall.

The highlight of the men's A series came on Sunday, when the Neumann-Lefkowitz tandem demonstrated to the field how to ride a textbook style road race. After sitting in with the field for a few miles, the pair initiated a seven man break that quickly turned into an insurmountable four-minute lead over the field. In the end, Neumann was paced into ideal sprinting position by Lefkowitz. Neumann then powered his way past the lone professional racer in the field to take the victory. Lefkowitz, legs still burning from his effective lead out sprinted to a well-earned bronze. The Bison picked up more points from the women's race as the steadfast Yajko paced herself to an 11th place finish.

Crew competes in Augusta

BY JACQUELYN SHRIVER

After an intense week of spring training on the Savannah River, the men and women of Bucknell Crew competed in the Tenth Annual Augusta Invitational Regatta in Augusta, GA. This event is one of the more prestigious regattas of the early spring racing season. Indeed, crews from as far away as Japan competed in this year's race. Bucknell entered four novice and six varsity boats in the regatta. Following a week of little else but a cycle of "row - eat - sleep," they competed against crews from such schools as Duke, Princeton, Rutgers, and Dartmouth.

The novice men's four destroyed everyone in their qualifying heat by many lengths of open water, and went on to earn a silver medal in the finals. From bow to stern they were Dan Tarditi '96, Gabe Holmes '96, Todd Bishop '96, Alex Bly '96, and coxswain Helen Bayes '96. The novice men's eight also qualified for the medal round, in which they placed fifth.

Not to be outdone by the men, the novice women's four, with stroke Holly Smith '96, Christine Strunk '96, Kristin Zaccheo '96, Lara Sobol '96, and coxswain Amy McGee '96, won a silver medal in the finals. The novice women's eight were not quite as successful, but nonetheless placed a commendable sixth overall. The varsity lightweight women's four faced tough competition in both the qualifying heat and the final. Even so, coxswain Erin Burns '93 and rowers Katy Miller '95, Robin Black '95, Jennifer Elder '95, and Jenn Criss '94 walked away with a bronze medal.

Both the varsity lightweight eight and varsity heavyweight four in the men's division placed second in their respective heats, yet were still fast enough to secure a lane in the medal rounds. Here, the lightweights were defeated by tough challengers from Harvard, Dartmouth, and Princeton. Similarly, the heavy four lost their final as well. Although both boats placed a respectable fourth overall, rowers and coxswains from each boat felt that their performances were not indicative of their abilities, and that they could have rowed much better.

The varsity open women's four and the varsity lightweight men's "A" four placed second in their respective heats as well. Despite their strong performances, both boats barely missed qualifying for finals. The varsity lightweight men's "B" four competed as well, placing fourth in their heat.

While the varsity lightweight men's eight travels to sunny San Diego, CA, the rest of the crew will compete against Ithaca College and Patriot League rival Colgate University next weekend on Cayuga Lake in Ithaca, NY.

Kurt Waldner '93

Baseball pitching ace Kurt Waldner '93 has been selected Athlete of the Week for his five-hit shutout of Patriot League rival Navy this past Tuesday afternoon. It was only Bucknell's third win of the season against 13 losses, but most importantly it evened its Patriot League record at 1-1.

A math teacher to be, Waldner struck out two and didn't surrender a single walk in earning his second win of the year. Earlier this season he pitched a two-hitter against Central Connecticut State for his and the team's first victory of 1993.

The Camp Hill, Pa. native got to the park late for game one of the doubleheader after finishing a computer lab with teammates Denis Maguire '93 and Eric Myer '95. But, Waldner did not show any ill effects because he still had sufficient time to get loose for game two.

Bucknell dropped its home opener 6-2 to the Midshipmen.

Trivia Answer

Robert Keegan '44 was the last Bucknellian to appear in the major leagues. He pitched for the Chicago White Sox from 1953 to 1958. His best season was 1954 when he went 16-9.

A preview of baseball's Junior Circuit

BY JON TERRY
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The 1993 baseball season is virtually upon us, and we have a lot to talk about. Many big name players have changed teams. Many have stayed put. The National League has two new teams to beat up on. Marge is gone, but George is back. We still don't really have a commissioner, and while teams say they are trying to cut down their payrolls, salaries continue to skyrocket. So without further ado, let's take a look at this year's teams in each division, in my fearless predicted order of finish.

A.L. East

Last year, the Baltimore Orioles were a young team who just did not have the experience to hold off Toronto and Milwaukee down the stretch. This year the Jays and Brewers have declined, leaving the O's ready to capture the flag. The strength of the team is pitching. Veteran Rick Sutcliffe will again anchor an otherwise youthful, talent-rich starting staff that will also include phenoms Mike Mussina, Arthur Rhodes, and Ben McDonald. Fernando Valenzuela has come out of his adobe and thrown 14 scoreless innings this spring and may have a chance to be th fifth starter. The addition of a pair of Harolds—Baines and Reynolds—to the offense should also help. For the Orioles to win this year, Cal Ripken and Glenn Davis will have to find their old strokes, while the younger guys like Brady Anderson, Mike Devereaux, and Chris Hoiles will have to keep up their early promise.

If you were to take the players that are now gone from the Toronto Blue Jays 1992 World Championship team and make them their own team, you would probably win a lot of games this year. Gone are outfielders Dave Winfield, Candy Maldonado, and Derek Bell; infielders Manny Lee, Kelly Gruber, and Rance Mulliniks; and pitchers David Cone, Dave Steib, Jimmy Key, David Wells, Tom Henke, and Bob MacDonald. Are the acquisitions of Paul Molitor, Dave Stewart, Dick Schofield, Darnell Coles, and Darrin Jackson enough to compensate for all of that? Maybe it won't matter because the Jays still have an awful lot of talent left behind, but right now it is hard to believe that they can repeat their dominance of a year ago.

Maybe the most improved team in the division is the New York Yankees. The additions of pitchers Jim Abbott and Jimmy Key to the rotation will bolster an up-and-coming staff that also features Melido Perez, Bob Wickman, and Sam Militello. Wade Boggs gives the Yankees their first legitimate third baseman since Graig Nettles left (Mike Blowers does not count), and Paul O'Neill gives them some more left-handed power. Now that Bernie and Gerald Williams should be in the lineup every day, this team has a pleasant mix of pitching, speed, and power.

The Boston Red Sox will once again be a slow, station-to-station club that will have two solid pitchers and a collection of used parts. Roger Clemens and Frank Viola anchor the staff, while newcomers Jeff Russell, Jose Melendez, and Scott Bankhead will vastly improve their bullpen. Andre Dawson, who will be 39 this year, can still hit, in fact he could very well win the MVP award as he takes aim at the Green Monster. Dawson and Ivan Calderon should add power to a team that last year did not have a guy hit more than 15 home runs.

The Milwaukee Brewers played inspired baseball last year, but they lost a significant portion of the heart and soul of that inspiration. The most important loss was Paul Molitor, who, along with Robin Yount, is one of the best players to ever put on a Brewers uniform. Also gone is 16-game winner Chris Bosio, scrappy infielders Scott Fletcher and Bill Spiers, and reliever Dan Plesac. Jaime Navarro, Cal Eldred, and Bill Wegman were all solid starters last year, but they will have to be better this year. It did not take sophomore Manager Phil Garner long to establish himself as a proponent of the stolen base, as the Brewers led the majors with 256 swipes last year. Rookie of the Year Pat Listach, who stole 54 of those bases, will try to avoid the second-year jinx, and youngsters Greg Vaughn, Kevin Reimer and John Jaha will provide the power. Outfielder Darryl Hamilton is a rising star, and another big year from him would help.

The Cleveland Indians are a hard team to get a read on. It is tough to judge how a tragic spring will affect a team that finally got to the brink of respectability last year. Will they be like the 1989 Colorado Buffaloes of the 1991 Detroit Lions—teams that suffered tragic losses, but rallied together and overachieved? Who knows, but one fact still remains—this team has absolutely no pitching. Aside from their ace, Charles Nagy, the Tribe will rely on retreads Jose Mesa, Mike Bielecki, and Scott Scudder in their rotation. This week they attempted to bolster their staff by picking up Mark Clark from St. Louis, but at great expense—they had to give up Mark Whiten. The offense is bolstered by talented youngsters like Carlos Baerga, Paul Sorrento, Thomas Howard, Kenny Lofton, and Albert Belle. The deaths of Steve Olin and Tim Crews certainly were tragic, but the reality is that the loss of two quality pitchers is going to hurt this team significantly.

The Detroit Tigers led the league in runs scored last year. They also finished sixth. They will probably score a lot of runs again this year, but they will not move up in the standings. How can a team that finished 12 games under .500 and 13th in the American League in attendance justify improving themselves by acquiring only Mike Moore and giving Kirk Gibson, who sat out almost the entire year last year, another chance. Granted, Gibson has been spectacular this spring, but those gimpy knees can't possibly hold up all year. To make things worse, normally never-say-die manager Sparky Anderson is finally showing signs of getting burned out. So where is the logical place for a team full of designated hitters and bad pitchers to finish? You guessed it, the basement.

A.L. West

Now that the collective blood pressures of the Minnesota Twins organization are coming back down to normal after the team almost lost its prized cherub Kirby Puckett, it can get down to the business of recapturing the A.L. West crown once again. They also have another hometown hero back—Dave Winfield, who attended the University of Minnesota, is 41, but he can still mash a baseball. Interestingly enough, the three most underrated players in the league all play for the Twins—Shane Mack, Chuck Knoblauch, and Brian Harper. Playing in the Metrodome, this team will have no trouble scoring runs. The ace of the pitching staff is now Kevin Tapani, with Scott Erickson, Willie Banks, and maybe Mike Trombley rounding out a youthful, hard-throwing rotation. This team has all of the qualities—speed, power, pitching, depth, a great manager—to go all the way in 1993.

The Kansas City Royals will prove this year that pitching and defense is what wins games. With David Cone and Kevin Appier leading a strong rotation and Jeff Montgomery the closer in a good bullpen, the pitching part should be taken care of. The new double-play combination of Jose Lind and Greg Gagne is the best defensive middle infield in the game. Brian McRae and Felix Jose can go get 'em in the outfield, so the only question mark will be the hitting. George Brett is going to give it one more shot, so he, Wally Joyner, and Jose will make up the middle of the order. McRae will have to get back to his rookie form in the leadoff spot, and Kevin McReynolds will have to wake up his sluggish bat. If all goes as planned, though, Manager Hal McRae shouldn't need many runs.

The Oakland Athletics lost many valuable players thanks to free agency, but they were also able to keep enough talent so that the best manager in the game, Tony LaRussa, can get them back into contention once again. The A's resigned Mark McGwire, Dennis Eckersley, Ruben Sierra, and most importantly, some will say, catcher Terry Steinbach. Ron Darling, Bobby Witt, and Storm Davis are back in the rotation, which was weakened by the loss of Dave Stewart and Mike Moore. LaRussa always has a knack for getting the most out of role players such as Jerry Browne, Mike Bordick, and Lance Blankenship. This year he will try to do the same with Troy Neel and Eric Fox. Don't be surprised if he is successful once again.

The Chicago White Sox underachieved for the second straight year in 1992. This team had enough talent to win the division in each of the last two years, but now it might be too late. This division, the best in baseball, has caught up to them, and while there is no reason to think they can't win it this year, they will have to play well from wire to wire. Frank Thomas, George Beil, and Robin Ventura form a potent middle of the lineup, and the return from injuries of Bo Jackson and Ozzie Guillen, as well as the addition of Ellis Burks, will improve the offense. The pitching will be the key to this team. Jack McDowell has become one of the best pitchers in baseball, but after him there are some question marks. Will Dave Steib recover from elbow surgery? Will Alex Fernandez and Kirk McCaskill ever live up to their expectations? Can youngsters Wilson Alvarez and Ramon Garcia finally step into the rotation and contribute? The bullpen will be good again, but the answers to these questions will determine if this team will be a contender or a pretender.

The Texas Rangers will be the most exciting team in baseball to watch this year. Balls will be flying all over Arlington Stadium this year. With sluggers like Jose Canseco, Juan Gonzalez, Rafael Palmeiro, Julio Franco, Dean Palmer, and Ivan Rodriguez in their lineup, the Rangers will score a ton of runs. Their problem is that they might just give up two tons. Last year's All-Star Game starter Kevin Brown has battled injuries this spring, therefore veterans Craig Lefferts and Charlie

GRUNOW, GROSS INVITED TO COMPETE AT NATIONALS

The top swimmer from both the men's and women's squads have been invited to compete in the United States Senior Nationals in Nashville, TN. This prestigeous event began yesterday and will run through Sunday at the Tracy Caukin's Swimming Center. Margaret Grunow '93 and Jay Gross '93 will compete in the same three events: the 50 and 100-yard freestyles as well as the 100-yard butterfly. The captains each earned Outstanding Swimmer honors at the Patriot League Championships this past winter. Grunow, who holds six individual school records and was part of four relay records, was also named to the All-East Swimming and Diving Team.

"WHITEY" HONORED

Bucknell standout scholar/athlete David "Whitey" Berardinelli is one of three finalists for the Walter Byers Scholarship, awarded annually by the NCAA. Berardinelli interviewed in St. Louis with the scholarship committee on Mar. 27. The Byers Scholarship, which was established in 1988 to recognize the contributions of the former NCAA executive director, is a $10,000 scholarship award. Award recipients are required to have at least a 3.5 grade point average, show evidence of superior character and leadership, and demonstrate that participation in athletics has been a positive influence on personal and intellectual development.

Berardinelli, a two-time First-Team Academic All-America, is a history/political science double major with a 3.8 cumulative grade point average. Off the field, Berardinelli has already received an NCAA Post-Graduate Scholarship for next year and was one of two Division I-AA winners of the National Football Foundation and College Hall of Fame Scholar-Athlete Award.

NEZELEK GETS SENT DOWN

Former Bucknell pitcher Andy Nezelek is still one step away from making his major league debut as the hard-throwing righthander. He was optioned to AAA Calgary recently and will begin the 1993 season there. A former Atlanta Braves farmhand who signed as a free agent with Seattle this winter, Nezelek was named to the Mariners' 40-man roster before being optioned to the AAA level.

A 1987 graduate, Nezelek originally signed with the Braves' organization after the 1986 season and had been in the Braves' system through last year. He pitched primarily for AA Greenville last year, and went 9-2 with a 2.26 ERA there before receiving a late promotion to Richmond. A 6-foot-6 reliever with outstanding control, Nezelek worked 107 and two-thirds innings at Greenville, walking just 23 while striking out 114.

Nezelek had been considered one of the top young prospects in the Braves' organization before experiencing shoulder problems. He spent most of the 1990 season at AAA Richmond, but was hampered by a rotator cuff injury. He then underwent shoulder surgery and missed the entire 1991 season.

BISON RETROSPECTIVE '84: Ken Langone

This article originally appeared in the April 27, 1984 edition of The Bucknellian and was written by Fred Nowicki.

In the Ironman World Triathlon Championship, he pounded 2.4 miles in the surf, rode 112 miles on his bicycle, and to top it all off, hammered a 26.2 mile run. No small feat.

I got to know Kenny Langone '83 best during his final semester here at Bucknell (September through December '82). He had been training that summer, and the rigor which carried over into the fall of '82 was indicative of the complete dedication required for something as physically and mentally demanding as the Ironman. Kenny also spent part of the summer of '83 training here in Lewisburg. At the time, I asked him, "Why Lewisburg?" He told me, "Because it's quiet here, the air is clean, and I don't have to contend with Long Island traffic when riding or running."

The Ironman took place on Oct. 22, 1983, in Hawaii, and Ken took 16th place overall, coming out of the race with an impressive time of 10 hours, 24 minutes. He was the first "rookie" to cross the finish line. In a recent interview with The Winged Foot, the magazine of the New York Athletic Club, Ken was asked if he was happy with his performance. He responded, "Of course, I think I had the capability to run a sub-10-hour Ironman, but I also could have blown up had I pushed the race.

"You can look at the glass as half full or half empty. I look at it as more than half full," he said.

Kenny's competitive successes elsewhere, all led toward his ultimate goal, the Ironman. Last year ('83), he participated in triathlons on both coasts, including races in Santa Monica, Maryland, and the Mighty Hamptons event on Long Island. His most successful race was in the Boston area early last summer. Kenny won the race by a margin of 28 minutes. Not bad for a beginner.

I heard from Kenny on the Cape after his Boston endeavor. He called me from a gas station in Chatham, NJ, where a tire had popped off the axle of his car and left him in a ditch. Despite the circumstances, Kenny was ecstatic over his Boston performance and felt more certain than ever of his possibilities in Hawaii.

For Kenny, the decision to compete full-time was not an easy one. Upon graduation, he was faced with a tough personal choice. His options were a comfortable, if not slightly hectic, job on Wall Street, or a long and grueling training period for the Ironman. When he chose to compete, Ken hoped, maybe even knew, that the great deal of dedication and frustration would be worth the personal rewards.

Kenny trains 8 to 10 hours each day. His typical week includes about 300 miles on the bike, 35,000 yards in the pool, and a solid 70 miles of running. As a professional athlete, he receives sponsorship from Eastern Airlines for transportation to and from events, Adidas for equipment, and Vigorelli for his cycling clothes.

Despite minor injuries to his knee, shoulder, and calf, Ken manages to maintain his training schedule and generally positive attitude. He's looking forward to the 1984 Ironman, crazy as it is.

Liebrandt will have to anchor the staff. Kevin Kennedy, in his first full year at the helm, will have the luxury of Tom Henke as his closer, assuming he can get to him with a lead.

The Seattle Mariners finally had a winning record for the first time in club history in 1991, but they regressed, losing 98 games last year. Look for this year's squad, under the guidance of Lou Piniella, to get back to respectability this year. The pitching should be good with the addition of Chris Bosio and the return of Randy Johnson, Dave Fleming, and Erik Hanson. Norm Charlton will vastly improve the bullpen. The problem is going to be scoring runs. Edgar Martinez and Ken Griffey, Jr. are two of the best hitters in the game, but they are only supported by Jay Buhner and Tino Martinez. Piniella, who has already made a statement by shipping Bret Boone back to the minors, would be a miracle worker to get this team to the top of this strong division.

The California Angels have finally figured out how to rebuild the proper way. They used to go out and sign glitzy, high-priced free agents while they watched their minor league organization dry up before their very eyes. Now they are finally trading these big-money guys for bright young talent. A lot of that future talent will be in the lineup this year. J.T. Snow, Tim Salmon, and Damion Easley will show their stuff at the top of the lineup. Young pitchers like Russ Springer, Jerry Nielsen, and Scott Lewis should all get a chance to start this year, while Joe Grahe will take over as the closer. If Chili Davis and Kelly Gruber can have decent years, maybe this team can creep ahead of Seattle. At least the Angels have better uniforms this year.

sixth. Dawson never allowed St. Francis a big inning. The Red Flash could only manage single runs in four separate innings, and win number six went into the books 8-4.

The back end of the doubleheader was much more dramatic, as the Lady Bison came from behind in the bottom of the seventh to escape with a 4-3 victory. St. Francis again couldn't put together the multiple-run inning. But this time, they prevented Bucknell from doing the same. Fink's runs in the first and sixth provided the only offense until the seventh.

Pitching ace Heidi Dawson '95 delivers a strike en route to an 8-4 victory over St. Francis (PA) last Wednesday at the mods. She has won her last three decisions and faces Delaware tomorrow.

Trailing 3-2 as they took their final at-bats, the Lady Bison used their bench to bail them out of the hole. One-time starter Carol Gesler '93, who replaced starter Casey Pina '96 in the fourth, sparked the comeback by reaching on an error with one out. Shortstop Kelly Corr '95 drove home Gesler with the tying run as she singled on the very next at-bat. Pinch-hitter Gruning sacrificed Corr to second, setting the stage for Yuengling. With two outs, the catcher singled home Corr for the game-winner. Love picked up her third win of the year and the Lady Bison their seventh in a row.

When asked about the doubleheader, Grieb replied, "We took them too lightly and played sloppy. Nobody threw well. There were too many walks. But we are starting to get into a flow."

In an attempt to sustain that flow, Grieb said that she will be looking to solidify her starting lineup by making it as permanent as possible. The pitching rotation is set with Dawson, Love, and Gruning handling those chores. The other half of the battery will remain Yuengling, but Grieb did admit that she, "needed to get Casey Hollister ['96] some innings."

At first, Heather Hoehn '94 has began to emerge from a slump, but could be pushed by B.J. Schlosser '96 when she gets healthy. The hot corner will probably see a change back to Gesler. Corr seems set at short, but her pivot partner at second isn't set yet. Kerry McDonnell '96 has started five games but will be pushed by Wendi Fritz '94, who may move over from short. The outfield of Kerr, Fink, and Spatzer is as solid as any in the Patriot League and isn't likely to change.

This weekend had the potential of being a Rand McNally nightmare. The team was supposed to travel to Delaware for a doubleheader tomorrow and then go up to Holy Cross for a doubleheader Sunday. Mercifully, the trip to Worchester is being changed to Sunday, Apr. 25.

That still leaves a tough Blue Hen squad for tomorrow afternoon.

"We may be too overconfident going into these games because we swept them last year," worried Grieb. "We can't take them lightly because they're good."

But so are the Lady Bison, who are expected to contend for the Patriot League Championship this spring. Colgate, Lehigh, and Army are also seen as potential winners. The Red Raiders will continue to be hurt the worst by poor weather and might not have enough time to get ready. Army has a couple of key injuries that will likely leave them with holes to fill for the rest of the season. Rival Lehigh has everybody back from last year and is playing well right now.

Statistics are usually deceiving, but not with this team. It is hitting over .300 while holding opponents to a little over two earned runs a game. Most importantly, the players boast a seven-game winning streak as they try to live up to the lofty expectations of their coach and themselves.

hits, two runs, two RBI), and John Martine '94 (two RBI) shined at the plate, the pitching staff could not provide the support.

The weary Bison closed out the trip with losses to Mankato St. (13-3), Northeast Illinois (4-1), and Vermont (12-1). Despite the disappointments on the field, the Florida trip had many good points. First of all, the team hung in there against the tough competition, filling them with confidence. "Our outlook on the trip is positive," said Trout. "We played some good teams, and we think we are ready for the conference games."

Another up note about the trip was that the team gained unity. "Being in Florida was a lot of fun," said Trout. "It was a great experience, and it brought us together as a team."

Yesterday's game at Bloomsburg was washed out, and the team will be lucky to get in this weekend's important Patriot League games at Lafayette on Saturday and at Lehigh on Sunday.

"This weekend is big for us," commented Trout. "It could set the tone for the rest of the year."

These two doubleheaders will be the first four of nine scheduled road games. The team will not return home until Apr. 17 when they will play two against Fordham and begin a ten-game homestand.

Jake Kazanjian '93, seen here during one of last year's home games, dropped a 6-2 decision to Navy in Bucknell's home opener last Tuesday afternoon at the mods. Despite throwing fairly well so far this season, Kazanjian is still looking for his first win of the year. He led the staff in victories last season with six.

This isn't their team, thank you. It's the USTA's and American tennis fan's team. The players have voiced their opinions on Gorman, and they want McEnroe. Johnny Mac holds almost all of America's Davis Cup records and is a player and fan favorite.

There's no doubt in my mind that McEnroe will bring home several cups. To be honest with you, my dog should be able to coach a Courier, Agassi, Pugh/Grab team to victory, unless they don't like dogs.

I want somebody's head on a platter. So whom should I blame? The players? Yes, but not exclusively—that would be too easy. (Gilbert and Wheaton can't be blamed for not being good, and there are conflicting reports as to who made the call on Washington). Tom Gorman should feel somewhat responsible for not making peace with the players and, on a harsher note, for not stepping down when he had the opportunity. I blame the USTA most of all. It's their job to do what's best for American tennis. That means doing what it takes to win a Davis Cup. They should have settled the rift between Gorman and the selfish players long ago.

The true victims of this whole mess are the American tennis fans. The Davis Cup, like the Olympics, is something that should deserve primary respect and attention, but no longer does. If you're going to represent the red, white, and blue, do it right. Shame on all of you spoiled brats.

Zackey agrees that the Bison need to improve their offensive output.

"The offense has been stagnant," said Zackey, "but that is partly because we are a fairly inexperienced team, and we are still getting used to playing with one another."

The Bucknell offense should get plenty of opportunities to increase its goal production tomorrow at 2 p.m. when the Bison play host to an overmatched Holy Cross team.

Following that, Bucknell will travel to Towson State to face the nationally ranked Tigers on Wednesday. Next they'll return home for a two-game homestand against two Buckeye state teams: Butler and Ohio State.

Yeakel addresses community members

BY SARA K. WALKER
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Susuan Naughton—The Bucknellian

Lynn Yeakel, democratic candidate in November's race for Pennsylvania's U.S. Senate seat, spoke of the obstacles facing women in politics. Newspapers commonly focused on her clothing and hair, more than on her political agenda, she said.

Lynn Yeakel, the Democratic nominee in the Pennsylvania Senate race last November, addressed students and faculty members at a luncheon held in Hunt Formal on Wednesday.

Early in her speech, Yeakel spoke about the race in which she lost to two-term incumbent Republican Arlen Specter. When Yeakel entered the race for Pennsylvania's U.S. Senate seat in the beginning of February 1992, she had only a one percent name recognition. She did, however, go on to win the Democratic primary on Apr. 28, creating the rare situation in which a woman, never having run for an office, was up against someone who not only already held the position, but had run more than twelve times in the past twenty five years.

Although Specter won the race, it was close with Specter receiving 49 percent of the votes and Yeakel receiving 47 percent. A third party candidate obtained the remaining four percent of the votes.

During Yeakel's first-time visit to Bucknell, she discussed her experience as a female running for a political office. Her decision to run for the Pennsylvania Senate was, as she described, the result of "several months of research and soul searching."

Her decision to run was also the result of built-up frustration regarding the misrepresentation and unequal treatment of women in our country. Having dedicated more than twenty years of her life to public service, Yeakel has helped to raise money for abuse shelters, job training, health care, and housing.

Other organizations on which Yeakel has served include the Citizens' Coalition for Energy Efficiency, National Committee for Responsive Philanthropy. She has co-chaired the Citizens' Assembly of the Greater Philadelphia Urban Affairs Coalition.

As a direct result of her concern for the treatment of women, Yeakel served as the founding board member of an organization known as Women's Way in '76. This is the first and largest women's funding federation in the nation, providing services for women and their families. Yeakel is currently the president of Women's Way USA, a national coalition of women's funds in 15 states.

One issue Yeakel raised during the luncheon was the media's treatment of women in general, and specifically the treatment of her as a female candidate. According to Yeakel, the media mainly focused on her age and appearance, including what clothes and jewelry she was wearing and the style of her hair. Yeakel noted the double standard held by the media in general and pointed out that they ignored the appearance of Specter. The media, according to Yeakel, trivializes and minimizes the role of women in society.

Yeakel believes that this double standard is inherent in society. Both female and male reporters subconsciously focus on a woman's physical appearance more than her political standpoint. This issue, Yeakel stressed, needs to be addressed in order to put an end to it.

A 1963 graduate of Randolph-Macon Women's College, Yeakel commended the existence and goals of Bucknell's Women's Resource Center, a co-sponsor of the event. Yeakel applauded the fact that so many students, both here and on other college campuses, are paying attention to, and caring about the future of this nation.

Yeakel shares many of the same concerns and goals as the Women's Resource Center, such as ending the violence against women and gender discrimination. For Yeakel, this means promoting public awareness of domestic violence and rape. Yeakel said, it is "good that there is a place like the Women's Resource Center on campus, and that so many women are taking advantage of it."

Yeakel was inspired to enter the race for Senator of Pennsylvania to promote the empower-

COI announces policy on January residence

BY DEB MANASSE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Andrea Halpern, associate professor of psychology and chair of the Committee on Instruction (COI), presented a recommendation from the COI at Monday's faculty meeting which outlined the January Residence Policy to be put into effect during the next academic year.

According to information distributed by Halpern, the residence policy recommendations are designed "to allow access to residence halls only by students with bona fide reasons for January residence," and "to ensure that students in residence are occupied in their activities for a substantial number of hours."

Under this plan, the session between the fall and spring semesters will be divided into three time periods. The "Earlier" period will consist of the days between the post-holiday break and the beginning of the "Later" period, which will be comprised of the last full week before classes begin. The final session will be an "Open" session which will begin the Saturday prior to enrollment.

According to the proposal, criteria for residence during the early period will be "quite strict, and confined to students engaging in closely supervised, time-intensive activities that cannot be done at other times."

Students seeking approval to remain here during this time will have to submit a proposal to a committee on January residence, and will be expected to make a time commitment of at least 35 hours per week.

The residence proposal gives as examples of students with "bona fide" reasons for Earlier period residence, those doing honors studies or research projects, athletes involved in winter varsity sports teams with scheduled events during that period, international students not returning home, and student employees working at least 35 hours per week.

Students permitted during the Later period would include spring varsity athletes who must practice early, and those students involved in planning groups for Residental Colleges, training programs for writing tutors and peer educators, or intensive committee work for the University or BSG.

According to Halpern, students not conforming to the specifications for January residence will not be permitted into their on-campus housing.

Although students living in privately-owned fraternity houses or in-town apartments will not be directly affected by the January residence regulations, Halpern noted that it is the hope of the COI that these students will voluntarily abide by the January restrictions.

Halpern said that the logistics of implementing this policy have not yet been worked out, noting that the assistant dean for housing will develop a system for administering January residence policies.

Computer Services' passwords offend users

BY MARIA GLOD
Bucknellian Staff Writer

As a result of recent complaints concerning the offensive nature of some logon passwords distributed to students and faculty, Bucknell Computer Services (BCS) has changed the procedure for generating passwords.

According to Ralph Droms, co-director of Computer Services, the program used to produce these inappropriate passwords randomly chose two small words from extensive word lists and joined them with a single letter. The system produced passwords such as "jewHpuke," "naziKdoe," and "chugBgin."

According to Gene Spencer, co-director of Computer Services, the system that generated these passwords was instituted several years ago as the result of an attempted break-in.

"The break-in attempt used a program that looked for words in the dictionary and there actually was some limited success," said Spencer.

The system of generating passwords was changed "to a more elaborate process that involved joining two smaller words to make a combination that is much more difficult to reproduce," said Spencer.

According to Droms, however, the process of randomly picking words can generate phrases which are inappropriate. "You can find some words that taken by themselves may be innocuous and together in one order are still innocuous but in another order they may be offensive," said Spencer.

According to Spencer, although some offensive words were removed from the lists the file still contained some words that were "very offensive."

In response to the complaints, BCS has implemented a new procedure for the generation of passwords. While the new process involving a random generation of characters should be secure from off-campus break-in attempts, the new passwords also hold some additional risks.

According to Spencer, the new passwords will be more difficult to remember, making it more likely that students and faculty will write the passwords down. This tendency will increase the security risk since the chance that the passwords will be found by unauthorized users will be greater.

"We live on a campus where there are very bright and innovative people who may attempt to break in for the challenge," said Spencer. Students may also be tempted to break-in to professors' accounts," he added.

The logon passwords generated by the old system will still work; logons will be changed only upon the request of the user. "It would be destructive to the educational process to change everyone's password now," said Spencer.

BCS issued a formal apology this week in two campus newsletters, What's Happening and Notes and Notices.

Early retirement issue ignites faculty debate

BY TARA GILLIGAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Jean Auro—The Bucknellian

James Baish, associate professor of mechanical engineering, chairs the Faculty and Academic Personnel Committee.

The Faculty and Academic Personnel Comittee's presentation of its suggestions for changes in the retirement policy spurred emotional debate at Monday's faculty meeting; several members of the faculty disapproved of the proposal to form an ad hoc committee to review individual cases of early retirement and expressed anger at not being formally presented with the proposal earlier.

The issue first arose last year when Ellis Harley, associate vice president for finance, led the Retirement Review Committee, a small ad hoc committee composed of several faculty members and administrators, in developing a set of recommendations for ammending the University's retirement policy.

The review committee made its recommendations to the president's staff last year, and the Faculty and Academic Personnel Committee presented its reaction to the Harley proposal at Monday's meeting.

Overshadowing all discussions on an early retirement policy is recent legislation which makes it illegal to establish mandatory retirement ages.

The final proposal will replace the current system of early retirement provisions. Until June 30, 1993 tenured, full professors who retire at the age of 62 receive 40 per-

Judge William M. Hoeveler '47, who presided over the jury trial of former Panamanian president Manuel Noriega a year ago in Miami, will be the guest speaker for this year's commencement.

Hoeveler has been a federal judge in the U.S. District Court in Miami, Fl. for the last 16 years.

The Bucknell alumus was selected by a commencement committee including President Gary Sojka, Vice-President of Student Services Barbara Shailor, and senior class officers Brad Houston, Matt Thomas, and Chris Cigarran.

"I think his experience as a judge, particularly in the Noriega trial, makes him an individual who would have a lot to say about law and society and other issues important to the U.S. right now," said Shailor.

After graduating from Bucknell with a bachelor of the arts degree, Hoeveler obtained a degree in law from Harvard Law School in 1950 and then moved on to work at a private legal firm in Philadelphia.

Hoeveler rounded out 26 years of private practice in Miami as a partner in the law firm of Knight, Peters, Hoeveler, Pickle, Niemoeller, and Flynn. Then, in 1977, he was named to his current position on the Federal Bench after being approved by the Senate and former

Students fined $600 for criminal mischief

BY NEIL BARDACH
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Christopher McCarthy '95 and Michael A. Kavanaugh '95 were found guilty of two summary offenses of criminal mischief yesterday in the Lewisburg Magistrate Court. Judge Leo S. Armbruster presided over the hearing.

The two men were charged on Mar. 2 after they discharged fire extinguishers into several rooms in the Larison and Vedder residence halls.

McCarthy and Kavanagh, roommates in Swartz residence hall, initially faced two charges of institutional vandalism (second misdemeanor), one count of criminal conspiracy (second misdemeanor), two counts of disorderly conduct (summary offenses), and three counts of harassment, as well as the two counts of criminal mischief. However, after negotiations, the other charges were dropped.

McCarthy and Kavanagh were given the maximum $600 fine, but will not be required to serve the 90 day jail sentence.

The two were placed on probation for 180 days, during which time they cannot commit any offense other than a minor traffic violation.

Also, because they had been drinking the night of the incident, the two areprohibited from consuming alcoholic beverages during the probationary period.

They will also be required to pay $74 in court costs.

Armbruster warned McCarthy and Kavanaugh that any violation of their probation could result in a reinstatement of the 90-day prison sentence.

McCarthy and Kavanagh agreed to pay for the damages that were caused in the rooms in the residence halls.

Neither man could be reached for comment.

ment of women within society. The daughter of a congressman who served for 22 years, she lived in Washington D.C. from the age of five and has worked on Capitol Hill. Yeakel said she was never "afraid of Washington."

Several other factors also served as a backdrop for Yeakel's political career. Yeakel described one college experience during which two women colleagues were put in jail for one month after participating in a sit-in. The event served as Yeakel's first encounter with the Civil Rights Movement.

Also while she was in college, John F. Kennedy ran for the presidency of the United States Yeakel was inspired by Kennedy and the way in which "his leadership lifted people from their individual turf." Motivated by this inspiration, Yeakel founded a democratic group on campus.

"The best way to predict the future is to create it."
—Lynn Yeakel, politician

Yeakel's experience as a founding board member of Women's Way served as another experience which helped form the foundation and the motivation to run for office.

It was during this time that Yeakel experienced the difficulty of meeting community needs, and working without what she described as "adequate resources to reach the people in power."

The powerlessness and frustration which she experienced led her to the decision that more women, such as herself, need to be at the other end of the decision-making process.

Yeakel credits her ability to win 47 percent of the votes during the election despite her previous one percent name recognition to all of this past experience. As she described, "The politics of experience really do count." Yeakel stated that everything in life serves as experience and credentials for future achievements.

Stressing the importance of women's involvement, Yeakel stated that there are too many times that women discount their experiences as unimportant. This is unfortunate, according to Yeakel, who believes that the only way to learn is through action.

Yeakel discussed the endless possibilities available to women when unified by common goal and purpose. 1992 was coined as the "Year of the Woman" and was characterized by women willing to take chances and progress forward. According to Yeakel, it is important to follow the example of these women and others who have come before them.

The representation of women's involvement has increased over the years. As Yeakel pointed out, nearly 10 percent of Congress is composed of women, and 6 percent of the Senate is composed of women. This increase in involvement is necessary in order to rearrange national priorities, she said.

In working towards what Yeakel referred to as "a more just, humane and peaceful world" she stressed the importance of working together for things which concern both men and women. According to Yeakel, "The best way to predict the future is to create it." It is for this reason and others that Yeakel intends to run for office again in the future.

Statistics help track sexual assaults

BY MARIA GLOD AND DEB MANASSE
Bucknellian Staff Writers

The words sexual assault, rape, and harassment often evoke images of strangers jumping from behind bushes or out of dark allies. It is difficult to imagine such crimes happening on our sheltered, rural campus.

Unfortunately, incidents involving crimes of a sexual nature do occur at Bucknell.

"If a particular area of campus seems to be the site of a lot of harassment or assault we can develop programming for that house or residence hall."
—Janice Butler
director, Women's Resource Center

In an effort to find out just how prevelent such incidents are, the Task Force on Sexual Assault has suggested that statistics be kept recording reported cases of assault and harassment .

According to Janice Butler, director of the Women's Resource Center, "It is important to have record-keeping and documentation of these incidents so we can allocate resources to address specific problems."

Although there is a wide range of resources available for victims of sexual assault or harassment, support agencies such as The Womens' Resource Center, Psychological Services, Public Safety and Residential Life could target specific problem areas with the aid of statistical information.

However, there is no device in place that would compile and centralize information on sexual crimes.Statistics on the frequency and nature of assault and harassment would provide valuable information which could be used to tailor a response to the problem.

"If a particular area of campus seems to be the site of a lot of harassment or assault we can develop programming for that house or residence hall," said Butler.

Butler also stressed that because "a lot of men who are committing acts of violence against women have more than one victim," even an incident which the victim sees as "not serious enough to bring charges" may become very important in light of a later, more serious crime. In such cases, documentation may show patterns of behavior said Butler.

The Task Force on Sexual Assault drafted an information and referral report which would allow victims to anonymously record the nature of the incident.

According to Butler, the function of this form would be twofold, allowing for the gathering of statistical information and ensuring that the victim is adequately informed of his or her options.

"I think it is a great idea," said Kari Messing, associate director of residential life. "When I'm making the referral it is helpful as a checklist, as a device to make sure the victim is getting the appropriate information."

"Once we've verified that an incident did occur I think we absolutely should carry the statistics. Otherwise we are portraying a false picture of the number of incidents and the type of incidents that we have on and around campus," said Vincent DeCerchio, director of Public Safety.

The form is currently being considered by the Office of Student Life. "I think it would be good for us to get a better handle on what's happening, what is alleged or what is a proven case," said Barbara Shailor, vice president for Student Services.

"The question is how to get reliable and and accurate information," she said.

"I think we should carry statistics once we've verified that an act did occur," said DeCerchio. DeCerchio suggested that the incident could be verified by one the referral agencies.

Sexual assault reported last weekend

One female student has asked the University to procede with internal charges following an alleged sexual asssault which she reports as having occured late last Saturday night. No details of the incident have been released, but the incident is under investigation with both the Lewisburg Police Department and the Office of Public Safety. The victim has not decided whether to press criminal charges.

New future for Old Bison under debate

BY SHANNON SKOPAK
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The Old Bison Allocation Committee met last Thursday to begin the decision-making process regarding the renovation of office space that is available for student organizations in the Old Bison.

The initial step in this procedure is the issuing of a questionnaire to all campus organization leaders. The form was sent out on Monday, Apr. 5 and will be used to survey information to assist in determining which organizations require the available work space.

The office space in the Old Bison is offered equally to every student group on campus. Once the proposals requesting office space have been submitted, the Old Bison Allocation Committee will evaluate all the information and conclude on which organizations will put the work area to its maximum use to benefit the Bucknell community.

Once the proposals have been submitted to Mitch Goldman, Assistant Director of Student Activities, by the Apr. 20 due date, these requests will be reviewed immediately. The space in the Old Bison will not be available to student organizations until the fall, but all plans will be completed by May 1.

If any student has suggestions or proposals to be made to the Old Bison Allocation Committee, forms are available in the OSA office or through Mitch Goldman.

Tenon to serve top role for Dining Services

BY NANCY NORBECK
Bucknellian Staff Writer

After a two-and-a-half month search for a new director of Dining Services, the University has chosen Tim Tenon to remain at Bucknell permanently.

According to Ellis Harley, associate Vice President for Finance, the Wood Company, the independent catering company hired this year by the University, recommended three candidates, including Tenon, who were all interviewed by and met with the Dining Advisory Committee.

Solaida Mamsaang—The Bucknellian
Tim Tenon, recently appointed director of Dining Services

Of the three "very fine candidates," said Harley, Tenon was chosen, largely because he has worked at Bucknell as Interim Director. "The staff and University had already gotten to know him and had been working with him during the search period, which was a big selling point," Harley said.

Tenon plans to work with students and the University to put together a plan for making changes in Dining Services, though he says those changes are not directly related to his new status. "We are working to make Dining Services better, in the Terrace Room, the Bison, and the Butteries, as well as Bostwick. It's a total campus effort," he said.

He will be working with the Dining Advisory Committee to talk about the direction the department should be taking.

Among those potential changes are new meal plan options, in an attempt to make the plans more flexible for students. Tenon may send out a survey in order to get a better sense of what students want from the Dining Service. "We are looking to both student and faculty ideas for guidance, but our main focus is on the students," Tenon said.

Tenon is originally from Meadville, PA. He has worked most recently at Lehigh University, and prior to that at such places as Gallaudet University in Washington, DC, The University of Bridgeport in Connecticut, the Empire State Plaza in Albany, NY, and Vermont Technical College. He and his family will be moving to Lewisburg this summer.

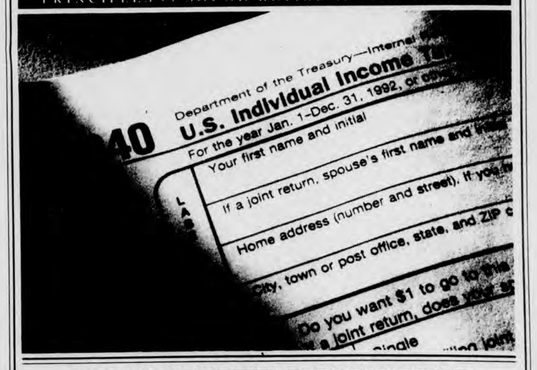
PRINCIPLES of SOUND RETIREMENT INVESTING.



UNFORTUNATELY, THIS IS WHERE PEOPLE ARE PUTTING TOO MANY RETIREMENT DOLLARS.

Every year, a lot of people make a huge mistake on their taxes. They don't take advantage of tax deferral and wind up sending Uncle Sam money they could be saving for retirement.

Fortunately, that's a mistake you can easily avoid with TIAA-CREF SRAs. SRAs not only ease your current tax-bite, they offer a remarkably easy way to build retirement income—especially for the "extras" that your regular pension and Social Security benefits may not cover. Because your contributions are made in before-tax dollars, you pay less taxes now. And since all earnings on your SRA are tax-deferred as well, the money you don't send to Washington works even harder for you. Down the road, that can make a dramatic difference in your quality of life.

What else makes SRAs so special? A range of allocation choices—from the guaranteed security of TIAA to the diversified investment accounts of CREF's variable annuity—all backed by the nation's number one retirement system.

Why write off the chance for a more rewarding retirement? Call today and learn more about how TIAA-CREF SRAs can help you enjoy many happy returns.

Benefit now from tax deferral. Call our SRA hotline 1 800-842-2733, ext. 8016.

Where are students in residence policy?

Remember back in grade school when nobody got to go outside for recess just because one kid hit the teacher with a spitball? The recommendations from the Committee on Instruction for the January Residence Policy returns us to the days of such elementary school punishments.

Like the proposal to abolish the January Program that preceded it, this plan punishes those students making a sincere attempt to constructively utilize the period between semesters. The library the gym the computer center and the Career Development Center will all remain open only for the benefit of those students who can prove they are being productive for a minimum of thirty-five hours per week.

For months on end we heard that the abolishment of the Jan Plan was necessary because of low levels of student and faculty participation and commitment. We were told that people would now be free to enter the job market weeks earlier, giving them a jump on the employment scene. We heard that four weeks wasn't enough time to get a job at home and how the elimination of the program would allow underclass students to work a month longer at their summer job.

We heard tales of students spending too much time partying over January, not using their break constructively. It would seem that as the faculty has attempted to construct an alternate plan for January, it has lost sight of problems they sought to correct. As policies to accommodate the loss of the Jan Plan have been formulated, the ease with which industrious students can utilize the time between semesters has steadily decreased. Students who cannot "officially" occupy 35 "constructive" hours per week on campus will now be prohibited from constructively occupying any hours on campus.

The break is too short to get an off-campus job, and as students' families and friends go off to work or school, Bucknellians will find themselves at home in front of the TV. If those students were on campus, there would be an array of options and resources available to them.

If they were not run off campus, those very seniors whose early May graduation was going to give them such an edge, could use the Career Development Center to look for employment. They would have the opportunity to use the computer center to produce resumes and cover letters.

Extra-curricular activities do not stop when classes end. Although it may not require a full thirty-five hours per week, many student organizations would benefit from the kind of attention their members could devote to them while they are not pressured by the stress of a full course load.

It seems ironic that the faculty seems suddenly to have lost sight of the learning that happens out side the classroom. The Student Handbook cites the importance of "out-of-class activities and social interaction" that will help students "broaden their perspective, reassess their values and behavior, develop new skills, and become an independent adult."

Aren't students in an academic institution such as Bucknell capable of finding enriching ways to spend their time without being policed? Despite what many of the faculty seem to believe, many students actually come to college to learn. Some of them even read, write, and get involved because they want to, not because they have to.

The kind of assumption that a plan like this makes, that we have to force students off the campus in order to keep them from abusing themselves and the campus, only serves to reinforce and foster the attitude that college is a place to get grades and not knowledge and experience.

Is it fair to students who live on-campus that their peers who live off-campus or in privately-owned fraternity houses will enjoy full use of these opportunities while they are penalized for living in university housing?

The residence halls will remain open and heated, the cafeteria will still serve meals, and the library will be staffed for those "bona fide" students whose thirty-five hour schedules have been approved. All things considered, is the University really saving a considerable enough amount of money to justify the lost opportunity for students? The time and money spent changing locks and checking up to make sure that unauthorized students do not infiltrate campus is not time and money well spent.

As many a third grade teacher has learned, keeping a whole class inside does not keep the one bad apple from being rotten. In this case, the faculty may find that, without access to campus resources, students may find themselves with little else to do but throw spitballs.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

How "pro-life" is a movement that kills?

TO THE EDITOR:

On Mar. 10, 1993, Dr. David Gunn stepped out of a clinic and was shot in the back by an anti-abortion demonstrator. Dr. Gunn was one of a decreasing number of health providers who offer abortion as an option for pregnant women. Because of the lack of abortion practitioners in his area, Dr. Gunn worked six days of the week in three different states.

The response to this murder by the primary anti-abortion interest groups was very telling. Randall Terry, founder of the anti-reproductive freedom group "Operation Rescue," did not speak against the murder; in fact, he condoned the action, saying: "We've found the weak link and it's the doctors." A member of "Rescue America" stated that "quite a number of babies will be saved." In fact, anti-choice factions have recently initiated a "No Place to Hide" campaign, which stalks abortion practitioners at home and terrorizes their families. Note that these are not fringe groups—they are part of the mainstream of the anti-choice movement. Following the murder of Dr. Gunn, several "pro-life" groups immediately began raising funds—not for Dr. Gunn's family, but for the killer's upcoming court fees.

When we recently discussed the murder of Dr. Gunn with two men (neither of whom support abortion rights), one of them said, "If you think about it, if every pro-lifer went out and killed one abortionist, abortions would be stopped. Doctors are the weak link!" Stunned, the other man responded, "How pro-life does that make us, though?"

Indeed, how "pro-life" is this movement? According to The New York Times, members of the "pro-life" movement have "bombed or set fire to more than 100 clinics over the past 15 years, invaded more than 300, and vandalized more than 400." Despite the hundreds of cases of arson, constant personal harassment, clinic blockades, murder, and other forms of violence perpetrated by members of the movement, many people refuse to see the connection between the right-wing ideology and the violent nature of the anti-choice movement.

In an article in The Bucknellian last month, one man wondered why "pro-life" advocates and pro-choice supporters don't call each other what they want to be called. The reality clarified by Dr. Gunn's murder responds: it doesn't make sense to call a movement which uses violence as a means to promote its cause "pro-life." Perhaps "pro-oppression" would be more accurate.

It doesn't make sense to call a movement which uses violence as a means to promote its cause "pro-life."

There is no compromise to be reached—women need to have full control of their bodies. Any restrictions placed on women's reproductive freedom violates the fundamental rights of women as human beings. The confines placed on women and their bodies range from overt means (such as restrictive legislation and ignoring the potential of RU 486) to more subtle, and often more dangerous ones (such as only teaching the medical procedure to perform abortions at approximately 100 medical schools in the United States and lack of education about all types and options of sexuality).

The proven goal of "pro-life" factions is to deny and deprive women of the basic right to choose the option of abortion. These groups have continually proven that they will go to any length—including murder. They realize that they can no longer curb reproductive freedom legally, so they are resorting to increasingly violent (and illegal) means. The terrorist tactics of "pro-life" groups are working; according to the Planned Parenthood Federation of America, 83 percent of the nation's counties currently have no medical facilities which perform abortions.

We, as members of the pro-choice majority, are outraged. Legal action needs to be taken: the immediate passage of the Freedom of Choice Act without restrictions and the passage of the Freedom of Access to Clinics Act, which would make the blockage of abortion clinics a federal crime.

April Fools joker finishes the story

TO THE EDITOR:

It was a typical day. I was lounging in front of the television switching between Oprah and a bad rerun of Who's the Boss?, considering taking a nap when my roommate called from the kitchen saying I had a phone call.

A phone call? Being an apathetic senior who basically has no campus involvement, job, or other extra-curriculars, I am not used to receiving phone calls during weekly business hours. Assuming it was MasterCard or American Express trying to "sell" me another credit card, I shuffled toward the phone and muttered a hello into the receiver.

"Cortney?" a woman's voice questioned on the other end.

"Yes," I replied, as a hollow feeling began to creep into my stomach.

"This is Barbara Shailor." I knew the feeling was warranted. "Do you know why I'm calling?" she asked.

Mumbling that I had some idea concerning the nature of the call, she continued by saying that I had definitely pulled an "interesting" prank this April Fool's Day, but I had been discovered.

For those of you who are unaware of my little April Fool's Day joke, I mass mailed 800 copies of a letter to the senior class stating that the administration had decided to make Tent Party dry, due to a number of vandalous acts that had occurred in previous years. I signed Ms. Shailor's name to the letter, and said that she would be open to any comments or questions concerning this matter. I also created the position of Tent Party Committee Chairwoman and nominated Melissa MacLeod. I included her phone number in the letter and said that she too would be open for comments.

The joke went over extremely well, as Ms. Shailor, Melissa, and President Sojka all received numerous phone calls, many of which included profanity. Unfortunately one thing did go wrong—I got caught. Of course someday I will look back on this incident and realize getting caught saved me from a life of crime, deceit, and whatever else I may have been headed toward.

Someday I will look back on this incident and realize getting caught saved me from a life of crime, deceit, and whatever else I may have been headed toward.

In any case, Ms. Shailor decided not to press any charges concerning the forgery, yet she wanted me to make a public apology for any inconvenience I may have caused. She also said I am not allowed to make any more mass mailings.

Thus, I first want to apologize to Ms. Shailor, who has had a good sense of humor throughout this incident.

Second, I must apologize to Melissa MacLeod and her apartment mates who had to listen to and reassure all the individuals who were shaking from withdrawal at the thought of a dry Tent Party.

Third, I will apologize to those who were experiencing this withdrawal. I would not wish that on anybody, and the thought of a non-alcoholic Tent Party would scare me as much as anyone.

I could continue and apologize to all the environmentalists who have criticized my waste of paper, and to the beer distributor who worried about potential lost sales. Yet, even I have limits to my humility. /

Finally, I must tell everyone that I have committed a very serious offense and in no way should it ever be emulated again. Mail fraud and forgery are federal crimes, and can be punished to the full extent of the law.

I want to conclude by reiterating that the letter was only a joke. There will be alcohol at Tent Party. There is no reason to worry.

Oh, by the way, did you hear that they canceled House Party?

OPINIONS

Treat Koresh like the murderer he is

BY ROSS FEINGOLD

Problems which are not nipped in the bud have a nasty habit of quickly evolving into much larger dilemmas. Such is the case in the Waco, Texas standoff between David Koresh, his followers, and an array of law enforcement agencies holed up outside of the Branch Davidian compound, now an armed fortress.

Before the attempted arrest of Koresh at the end of February, his cult had been allowed to operate with what seemed like impunity. Even though allegations such as child abuse, polygamy, and kidnapping had been made, the Branch Davidians, with Koresh at the helm claiming to be Jesus Christ, went on without interference, accumulating weapons for some upcoming battle. That is until the Federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, and Firearms finally decided that enough was enough and went in head first but with its eyes covered.

Without a doubt, the ATF embarrassed itself by leaking information about the pending action to a Koresh-sympathetic reporter. Even worse, it embarrassed itself by being grossly outgunned by a group of amateurs. Four agents had to pay for these mistakes with their lives. But the ultimate embarrassment is in the weak-kneed response by every agency involved, for Koresh has made fools of them all as he goes into his sixth week of resistance.

Following the botched attack, a small army of FBI agents, National Guard, ATF agents, state law enforcement agents, and numerous others surrounded the compound. But with a small army of TV cameras watching, the military force has sat idle, costing the taxpayer many millions of dollars, and giving Koresh millions of dollars in free publicity. In an unfortunate but significant event, the criminal goes unpunished. Criminal force is not met with the force of justice, as it should be. And thus, the problem continues.

A speedy response and counterattack (for the National Guard and law enforcement agencies surely must be adequately trained for such operations) would have saved much money, time, and embarrassment. Without a doubt, most Americans would not care if Koresh were to die in an assault, or for that matter if his followers were to go down in what to them would be a blaze of glory. The man is a common criminal, and a murderer, and deserves the fate of similar trash, not the reprieve that he seems to have earned.

So the law stands like chastised children outside, while Koresh preaches from the inside. In fact, the law has begun to cater to Koresh, by turning down the blaring music that is meant to harass the compound when the Davidians observe their Saturday Sabbath. Is it any wonder that some ask if the inmates are running the asylum?

Blizzard hazards mandated shut-down

BY NANCY NORBECK
Bucknellian Columnist

Unless you have been clinically brain dead for the past several weeks, you remember the recent heavy snowfall in the Lewisburg area. You may also recall that the entire state of Pennsylvania closed.

Except for Bucknell.

Watching the cancellations roll across the television screen on Sunday, March 14, it seemed almost inconceivable that Bucknell was not listed as closed. The University closed for less snow than this back in December, and it stayed open during the "Blizzard of '93" or, as the National Weather Service was calling it, the Blizzard of the Century, the storm that dumped more snow on the East Coast than has been seen since 1888?

As a senior at this university, I had been under the impression that the term "Bucknell Bubble" referred to the students and not to the administration. Can it be that our "fearless leaders" are also incapable of seeing past the boundaries of the 300 acres? Do they think that Bucknell is impervious to Mother Nature, and that two feet of snow is just a dusting that all employees should be able to safely traverse in the all-holy name of keeping the school open? Do they think that Governor Casey's declaration of a "State of Emergency" meant everything in the state but Bucknell? (If our "frame-of-reference" schools are important enough that we got rid of the Jan Plan to be like them, why did we have to be different and stay open after the storm? According to the local CBS affiliate, even the Gate of Heaven was closed on Monday!)

To make matters even worse, it seems that the University decided to remain open for "financial reasons." Apparently the payroll confusion resulting from the December closing was too difficult for the University to handle, and it decided, at that point, that there would be no more snow days. Did anyone bother to consider the fact that driving on snow, especially in a State of Emergency when many roads are closed anyway, is not an especially safe proposition? Not everyone who works at Bucknell lives in Lewisburg, and even those who did were faced with difficult and dangerous driving conditions if they were to get to work on Monday. Did the University stop to consider the effects of an accident caused by snow while trying to get to work? Did they consider the amount of money they could have spent if someone had been seriously hurt and required extensive medical attention?

In March 26th's Notes and Notices, pages 2 and 3, an (unnamed) angry University employee notes that "[it is] absurd that administrators on campus profess to have our best interests at heart—HOGWASH." Barry Maxwell responded by saying that the decision to stay open had a lot to do with the students on campus. Mr. Maxwell seems to think that we really wanted to trek all the way across campus through deep snow just to get to class. Mr. Maxwell doesn't seem to have spoken to members of the student body lately. Most of the students I know were extremely unhappy with the decision, and much of their discontent had to do with the lack of consideration given to those people who had to try to drive to work in such adverse conditions.

Maxwell also states that "Physical Plant crews had done a superb job of cleaning the campus roads, walks, and parking lots." One starts to wonder if he even saw the campus that Monday. Only one path was cleared across the academic quad, from the corner near Swartz Hall to the corner near Marts. Never mind that the most used walkway on the quad is the one that leads directly from Marts/Vaughan Lit. to Coleman Hall, and that many students were trying to walk through two feet of snow to get to class, and others were trying to follow in their footsteps. Even the uphill path to the Langone Center was not cleared until Tuesday. The small path from Coleman to the side of Dent Drive was not clear at all, and no paths going down the hill in front of Freas Hall had been cleared. Students who wished to cross that area had to walk through the four-to-five foot piles of snow left at the sides of the road by snowplows.

Mr. Maxwell makes the admirable point that essential services (such as Dining Services) do need to be provided for students on campus. But his words do not make up for the fact that those people who did make it to campus (or never left) to ensure that Dining Services and Public Safety were still running probably were not rewarded with extra pay for their efforts, and those who were homebound through no fault of their own probably were not paid at all for those days, unless they took a personal day.

Maxwell then states that "in the future, we will consider the issue more carefully from all perspectives before reaching a decision." Yes, it would be nice if the University would look up from its pocketbook once in a while and notice that there are living, breathing people out there who provide it with all that money. He continues by saying, "In particular, if the Governor declares a state of emergency because of snow conditions, we will give serious consideration to closing the University." How thoughtful.

It's nice to know that the University is looking out for its financial stability. But if Bucknell cannot afford to close the school for one day in order to protect the safety of its employees, it is time for the administration to take a good hard look at their policies, budgets, and the ways they relate to employee safety. It's all numbers in columns until someone loses a life.

Can college happiness be found in a high GPA?

BY JASON SPIEGELMAN
Bucknellian Columnist

The Bucknell policy regarding "Dean's List" is this: if you have a cumulative GPA of 3.5 or better, then you are treated like royalty and placed on the list of those elite who are cherished enough by the administration to be called Dean's List material. Has anyone ever taken the time to ask what this really means? How did some dean way back in the history of Bucknell choose 3.5 as the cut-off point between distinction and despair? Who really has the right to tell me that I should not be honored just because some anal professor gave me an "A-" instead of the "A," thus plunging my course grade down a whopping .33 points, and pulling me from a cumulative 3.5 to a 3.49 (math notwithstanding)?

For those who have felt the incredible disappointment of falling JUST short of this wonderful honor, take heart. There is at least one person on the campus of Bucknell who doesn't feel that grades and GPAs are quite as important as they are made out to be by, well, EVERYONE!

Do you all remember the application process that you went through to become a distinguished member of the Bucknell community? Did it seem like the SAT score, academic performance in high school, and GPA were the only things that really mattered to the admissions committee? Thankfully, I would doubt that that is really the case, since there is a wide spattering of extracurricular activities and interests here on campus, but sadly enough, this is exactly the case at other schools.

If we look at any Ivy League school—the cream of the crop (or is it "the cream of the crap"?)—then common sense tells us that the numbers surely eliminate many fine students from having the opportunity to attend these "fine" institutions of higher learning. Let's face it, you can't get thirty thousand applications for six thousand open positions and expect to read each one looking for an outstanding quality.

Even though I detest the number system that is currently employed by the American educational system, I realize it has some worth. However, so much stress is placed on getting a 3.8 GPA and straight A's that the true experience of college is almost lost. What is college really good for? Getting a job and making tons of bread? Sure, good answer. Drinking yourself silly until you graduate by the hair of your belly button? Okay, I'll even go for that one. Hooking up? The poll is still out there.

People, the true experience of college, or of anything else for that matter, is to learn about yourself. It doesn't matter if some professor tells you that you got a B instead of a B+! That is trivial and unimportant. Who cares what kind of grades you can get if it isn't really you who is getting them? Sure, sure, I know that graduate schools depend on the grades and QPAs and MCATs and LSATs and every other __ATs out there, and I recognize that this is a problem, but we can't be getting so upset about grades that we forget what is really important: happiness, health, flowers, sunsets, friends, malted milk balls, bananas that are just ripe enough, and Mountain Dew. (I was tempted to say "love," but it was just too sappy).

There is a wonderful book that I think everyone on campus should buy. It is called 14,000 Things To Be Happy About. If you try to read it cover to cover, you will pull your hair out and become a monk, but if you read a few of the items each day, then maybe you will get things into perspective a little quicker.

I was walking to the Weis Center the other day, and I stopped on top of Freas Hall and looked out over the chapel at one of nature's most awesome spectacles, the sunset. For that one moment, I was at true peace with everything. All of the worries momentarily disappeared, and I felt true happiness. If you have time this coming week, try stopping by Freas Hall around 7:00 some evening. If that is just too inconvenient, then try getting up around 5:30 a.m. and looking the other direction. Either way, if we let ourselves forget all of the burdens that tie up our thoughts and weigh on our hearts, then maybe we can all be just a little bit happier.

RETIREMENT

cent of their salary for six years, with the option to have the sum paid to them in three years, and contributions to their retirement funds, according to Richard Henry, professor of physics and opponent of the Harley plan.

According to Harley, who was absent from Monday's meeting, the University must be careful to comply with the Age Discrimination Employment Act.

The proposal which his committee produced last year recommends, in the section dealing with early retirement, that the University consider negotiating retirement plans on a case-by-case basis for tenured, full professors who need to retire early for personal reasons.

The Faculty and Academic Personnel Committee, chaired by James Baish, associate professor of mechanical engineering, is recommending that the University establish specifications for early retirement benefits, rather than deal with the matter on a case-by-case basis, according to Harley.

Concerned that individual faculty members will be faced with arguing against the University for retirement benefits, Henry raised his objections to Harley's proposal and urged the faculty to register its disapproval of private arrangements. Henry's motion was seconded and unanimously passed by the faculty.

Henry, who chaired the Faculty and Academic Personnel Committee several years ago, said he proposed the motion to "light a fire" and force others to properly consider the issue.

He and at least six other faculty members have joined forces to create an informal committee; Henry said that he hopes that the committee, composed of individuals who have been involved in the retirement review process in past years, will be able to suggest a plan for providing incentives within the existing legal restrictions. Other schools, he argues, have legal incentive programs, and Henry said the committee will consider other universities' systems.

But Harley said that any proposal involving specifications for early retirement compensation would constitute age discrimination.

He also said that faculty members should not expect an entitlement for retiring before the target date, currently set at 65. "I don't think it's necessary to have an early retirement plan for everyone," he said.

Other members of the faculty present at Monday's meeting raised objections similar to Henry's. Dennis Baumwoll, professor of English, said that at this point in the debate, "we are still left in limbo."

Baumwoll said he is "distressed by the idea that what was in place before is over and there isn't anything new," and he suggested that the current retirement system remain until the faculty approves a new one.

Larry Shinn, vice president for academic affairs, stressed, however, that the current retirement program is illegal and must therefore be abandoned.

Barry Maxwell, vice president for administration, told the faculty that the issue would have to be presented to the Board of Trustees this May.

Other members of the faculty complained that they had not been told about the Harley proposal, and for this reason, Stephen Becker, chair and associate professor of physics, suggested that the faculty be given until May to review it.

Maxwell countered the complaint by saying that while the proposal had not been publicized to the whole faculty, it had been sent to the committee and a copy of it was on reserve in the library.

Charles Longley, chair and professor of political science, offered a motion that the faculty table the motion and reconvene next week. His motion passed.

The faculty will reconvene next week to continue discussion on the retirement issue and to consider two motions concerning the University Review Committee and the attendance policy.

Open doors for admissions

Saturday, Apr. 17 will kick off the annual Admissions Open House. Prospective students for the class of 1997 will be present to view the campus and its facilities.

Approximately 1,500 student and families are expected to participate in the weekend activities which include panel discussions on the Greek system, international study, and athletics. Academic departments will also hold informational sessions for prospective students, and an activities fair will allow on-campus organizations to recruit new members.

All students attending have received letters of acceptance for entry in the 1993-94 academic year.

Sojka is clear on 'greening'

Gary Sojka, University president and co-chair of the Greening of Bucknell Committee, said at a recent meeting of the group that the "blizzard of paper...is clearly wasteful, environmentally irresponsible, and increasingly annoying."

The committe asked Kristen Skarie, director of student activities, to chair a subcommittee on paper waste.

Jim Rice, assistant vice president for development and academic affairs and a member of the greening committee, said that at times he has received six notices of a single event. Avoiding duplication "would have to be a weaning process," Rice noted, adding that mailings could never be completely eliminated.

Brown is to speak on Africa

Dr. Noel J. Brown, Special Representative of the Executive Director, United Nations Environment Programme (UNEP), North America, will be giving a lecture on Tuesday, Apr. 13 at 8 p.m. in the Rooke Chemistry Auditorium entitled "Continent in Peril: Africa and the challenge of Sustainable Development."

Dr. Brown has lectured extensively around the world, serves on a number of boards, and has a number of publications to his credit. He was especially active in the preparations leading up to the Earth Summit in Jun., 1992 where he represented UNEP.

Currently Dr. Brown is promoting a "Youth Agenda 21," a global textbook prepared by youth themselves; it is hoped that the text will be widely distributed, thereby providing young people and students with direct access to the outcome of the Earth Summit and facilitating their participation in the transition to world conservation.

Troublemaker is now trustee

On April 19, 1969, Tom Jones, a 19-year-old senior, led the 34 hour armed takeover of Willard Straight Hall, Cornell's student union. Today, Thomas W. Jones is president and chief operating officer of TIAA-CREF, the world's largest private pension fund, and is expected to be elected to the Cornell board of trustees on May 29.

Surprisingly enough, Jones is supported by James A. Perkins, the president of Cornell who was forced to resign a month after the takeover, and Dale R. Corson, who was provost during the takeover and, became president that summer. Corson stated that Jones' present achievements "outweigh" his past behavior.

Yale elects new dean

Yale University has elected Richard Brodhead as the new Dean of Yale College. He will assume his position on July 1st and will replace the acting Dean Donald Engelman.

It is expected that he will continue his trend as a student-oriented faculty member with an emphasis on undergraduates. Brodhead's plans are to serve as Dean for five years and then resume to his present position of chairman.

UVA bans romances

The University of Virginia is considering following in the footsteps of several universities that have, in recent years, adopted policies that forbid relationships between faculty and students in their classes. But UVA plans to go one step further, barring all relationships, and even "overtures," between faculty members and undergraduates.

"Every woman teacher can point to two or three people in her department who are notorious for hitting on students," said Dr. Ann J. Lane, university director of women's studies. "This is academia's dirty little secret."

Softball wins thriller over Delaware, sweeps Towson

BY CHRIS DROWNE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

What does every coach say after a dramatic win? Time's up. How about, "That was the most incredible game of the year. It's a shame somebody had to lose it."

Even though head coach Terri Grieb did open with the old clichés, she proceeded to rattle off several turning points in Bucknell's fourteen-inning thriller over Delaware last Saturday.

Trailing 5-2 after five innings, the Bison tallied two runs in the sixth and two more in the seventh to take a 6-5 lead. Four-year starter Jen Yuengling '93, who continued her torrid hitting with four hits on the day, scored ahead of Carol Gesler '93 in the sixth. Shortstop Kelly Corr '95 doubled home the tying run and scored the potential winning run on a wild pitch in the seventh.

That potential win was put on hold as the Fighting Blue Hens scratched for a run off Alison Love '95 in the bottom half of the seventh to send the game into bonus cantos. Love entered the game in relief of Niki Gruning '96, who struggled in giving up five runs in three and two-thirds.

Both teams continued to frustrate themselves for the next six innings by stranding several baserunners. Finally, after nearly freezing to death in the windy, sub-arctic atmosphere, Corr and Wendi Fitz '94 decided to put everyone out of their misery by potentially (there's that word again) ending the game. Corr led off the top of the fourteenth (remember—a regular game is only seven innings) with a double (her fourth hit of the game). Fitz, who entered the game in the seventh, plated Corr with a double.

Love and company, refusing to let such an exciting game end with a one-two-three fourteenth, allowed the hosts a runner to reach third before they recorded an out.

Normally a seriously dangerous situation, Love settled down and got the next three batters to pop-up and end the contest. The Patriot League Pitcher of the Week for the second straight week, Love yielded only one run (unearned) in over ten innings.

"This was a definite character and confidence builder," said Grieb.

That confidence carried over into Wednesday's home sweep of Towson State. Heidi Dawson '95 cruised to her fourth straight victory as she shutout the Tigers 4-0. Gesler was the lone Bison with multiple hits and Fitz drove in two runs to pace the offense.

The nightcap featured another solid pitching performance from Love who allowed two runs (both unearned) in going the distance.

Centerfielder Lisa Fink '93 drove in two and went two for three in raising her team-best batting average to an even .500. Five different people scored Bucknell's five runs as Grieb was able to juggle the line-up in winning 5-2.

Boasting an impressive 10-2 mark (if you remember, they started out 0-2) entering the "second season," the Bison are definitely on a roll.

"I break the season up into three parts: the pre-conference games, the conference tournament," explained Grieb. "We're 0-0 now as we enter the second season."

Starting this afternoon when the Bison face perennial Patriot League power Army, Bucknell has an important four-game weekend.

The young Knights dropped a pair to Lehigh earlier, but are still considered the "top dog." Taking a bus from West Point to the Bronx on Saturday, Bucknell will square off against the Rams, a team they split with last season.

"Our pitching has been solid, and we now have bats everywhere in the line-up," said a pleased Grieb. "Kelly Corr has been one of the biggest differences, and the top of the order [Yuengling, Gesler, Fink] has been getting it done."

With their team batting average still over .300 (good enough for top 20 in the nation) along with the Dawson, Love, Gruning pitching staff, the Bison are "where they want to be."

"As long as we play like a team, we have to be one of the heavy favorites to win this league," ended Grieb.

Baseball sails past Navy to move into first place

BY JON TERRY
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Slowly but surely, the Bucknell baseball team is waking up from its winter slumber, and it could not have come at a better time.

Sparked by the stellar pitching of seniors Kurt Waldner and Jake Kazanjian, the Bison have won six of their last nine games to run their season record to 8-16. More importantly, the team is now 5-3 in the Patriot League, good enough for first place in the Southern Division.

Yesterday in Annapolis, MD, the bats heated up with the weather as the Bison trounced Navy in a doubleheader 10-5 and 10-3. In the opener, Waldner, who just last weekend no-hit Lafayette, ran his record to 4-3 on the year. The big righthander extended his scoreless streak to 17 2/3 innings before allowing a run against Navy. The Bucknell record is 22 straight innings, set by the immortal Warren Bumpus in 1975.

Bryan Koch '95 drove in three runs for the Bison, and Scott Sutfin '94 and Larry Trout '93 knocked in two apiece.

In the nightcap, Kazanjian (1-2) picked up his first win of the year. A victim of poor support all year, the fiery righthander benefited from a potent offensive attack yesterday. Leftfielder Dwight Steward '95 had two hits and four runs batted in, three of them on a bases-loaded double. Mike Kearns '93 plated three runners himself, and Trout also threw in two hits. With the game tied 3-3, the Bison took advantage of some shoddy Navy defense, scoring three unearned runs in the fifth inning and four more unearned runs in the seventh to seal the win.

Before yesterday, the team's offense had been anemic at best. Averaging just over three runs per game, the club's batting average was a paltry .228. Maybe some of this can be attributed to the cold weather, but the fact remains that the bats will need to stay hot if the team hopes to remain atop the division.

Last Saturday, Bucknell split a pair with Lafayette. The doubleheader was originally scheduled to be played in Easton, but the wet weather, combined with Lafayette's lack of a tarp, caused the game to be moved to Lewisburg. The first game was highlighted by Waldner's aforementioned no-hitter. Waldner, who allowed just four baserunners,

Commentary

While most American League fans are celebrating the 20th anniversary of the designated hitter, sports writers are mourning the 20th anniversary of the story of a lifetime.

Just prior to the opening of spring training camp in 1973, New York Yankee pitchers Fritz Peterson and Mike Kekich approached a sports writer (forgive me for not remembering his name, I was three years old at the time) with one of the most unique stories in sports history. This sports writer was such a close friend of Peterson's, that the marginal lefty (see his stats later in the column) felt compelled to offer him the exclusive. I know, what's the story already?

Kekich and Peterson were both married with children and a dog. At the end of spring training they would still be married with children and a dog, but divorce court wouldn't even touch a script of what happened in between. Peterson divorced his wife. Kekich divorced his wife. Both men immediately remarried as Mrs. Kekich became the new Mrs. Peterson and Mrs. Peterson became the new Mrs. Kekich. All of the children stayed with their mothers. Even man's best friends traded masters. In other words, the two southpaws swapped families. The unnamed sports writer said that he "wouldn't touch this with a ten-foot pole." Is there a writer, not just of sports, in this country, today

Women's lacrosse seeks first win vs. Holy Cross

BUCKNELLIAN TEAM CORRESPONDENT

Strains of Twisted Sister's "We're Not Gonna Take It" blasted out of the field house last Sat., Apr. 3 as the Bucknell women's lacrosse team prepared for their fifth game of the season. Their opponent was the two-time Patriot League champion, Lafayette. Though both teams were 0-4, the Leopards were favored because of their past record in the Patriot League. True to form, the visitors prevailed, 16-10.

Co-captain Jen Hayes '93, pictured here in a past game, is optimistic that the Lady Bison can top the Holy Cross Crusaders despite their slow start. The two teams will square off tomorrow.

The Lady Bison have had a rocky start this season. They spent the whole month of February playing in the confines of the fieldhouse because of this year's increased snow fall. Now, they are finally out on the field. After four losses and a rough three-game week, the Bucknell team was ready to prove to Lafayette, and the rest of the Patriot League, that they were out to play hard. Head coach Heather Lewis stressed the need for the team to play for themselves and for the "respect" of their opponents. "We have to get our heads in the game and play with more confidence," said Paula Blinbry '96.

It was obvious from the start that the Bison were more mentally into the game than they had been in the past. Tracy Meerwarth '96 put in the first goal of the game early in the first half and got the game started on a positive note for Bucknell. The offensive team, though young, has been improving with every game and managed to control the ball more effectively against Lafayette than in their past games this season. Of a total 25 shots, Bucknell put in 10, with Meerwarth '96, Freeman '95, Owens '95, and Young '95 each scoring twice, and Way '94 and Kangas '95 each scoring once. It is clear that the Bison offense is not a "one woman show." Everyone out there is equally capable of scoring.

On the defensive end of the field the Bison have a bit more experience with both Jen Hayes '93 and Allison Arth '93 (the teams only seniors) joining a defensive

Waldner tosses second no-hitter in Bison history

BY BO SMOLKA
Special to the Bucknellian

Bucknell senior pitcher Kurt Waldner did what the immortal Christy Mathewson never did—he tossed a no-hitter for Bucknell, as the Bison blanked Lafayette, 2-0, in the first game of a Patriot League doubleheader here last Saturday.

Waldner, a native of Camp Hill, PA, walked three and struck out six to even his record at 3-3. In throwing the no-hitter, Waldner became just the second player in Bucknell history to accomplish the feat. The only other no-hitter in school history came on May 5, 1956, when Don Richards beat Franklin and Marshall. It is the first no-hitter at any level of baseball for Waldner, who has been a starter for the Bison since his freshman season.

Mathewson, the former New York Giants great and Hall of Famer, attended Bucknell from 1898-1900, but never threw a no-hitter for the Bison. Mathewson won 373 games in a major league career that spanned from 1900-16.

The National League winners are ...

BY JON TERRY
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Wild and wacky is the only way to describe the state of the National League in 1993. After only one week, the madness has begun. Can you believe that on Monday the expansion Florida Marlins won while the powerhouse Braves were within one out of being no-hit? The Dodgers' best reliever is already hurt. The Expos' sparkplug has the chicken pox. Slick-fielding shortstop Tony Fernandez proved that bad defense is contagious by making two errors in a game for the Mets. What else will happen in the N.L. this year? Let's take a look.

N.L. East

I'm going to take a lot of heat for this one, but the Pittsburgh Pirates once again will challenge for the division title. Despite getting beat by Francisco "One Who Herds Goats" Cabrera in the playoffs last year, and then losing Barry Bonds and Doug Drabek to free agency, the Pirates will still be in decent shape in what is the weakest division in baseball. The Bucs have a good portion of their nucleus back from last year, and they have filled the holes with good young talent. Third baseman Kevin Young hit .314 with 70 RBI and 18 steals at AAA Buffalo last year. Carlos Garcia (.303, 13 HR, 70 RBI, 21 steals for Buffalo) takes over for Jose Lind at second base. Speedy Al Martin (.305, 20 HR, 20 steals in AAA) will play left. Pitchers Randy Tomlin and Tim Wakefield will be counted on to pitch 230 innings each this year, and look for Denny Neagle to move into the rotation this year as well. The bullpen has been Pittsburgh's weak spot for three years now, and it will be so again this year—unless Stan Belinda can finally harness his raw talent and stop blowing saves. With the Michelangelo of managers, Jim Leyland, at the helm again, this upstart bunch will begin to resemble those St. Louis teams of the 1980's that looked mediocre on paper, but always seemed to get the job done.

Has there ever been a more unpredictable team than the New York Mets? These guys have the talent to win the division by 15 games, but with all the egos and the distractions of the Big Apple, they also have the potential to finish down with the Marlins. The big key for the Mets is comebacks. Bret Saberhagen is healthy, has a new contract, and a calendar with an odd year on it, so he should be back to all-star form. But there are other question marks. Can Doc Gooden, who pitched a shutout on opening day, bounce back from arm troubles? Can closer John Franco do the same? Howard Johnson hit only .223 with seven homers last season before an injury shut him down for the year in August, but the centerfield experiment is over; he is healthy again, and he should have a terrific year. Vince Coleman is yet another unknown. He was back to old form last year, hitting .275 and stealing plenty of bases, but his annual hamstring pull cut his season to 71 games. If he can stay healthy, and with the speedy Ryan Thompson taking over in center, the Mets will be a better team. Their defense up the middle will be much improved with Fernandez and Jeff Kent in the lineup, although early indications say that they will still have trouble catching the ball.

The St. Louis Cardinals, as usual, will be in the hunt in 1993. The strengths of this team are solid pitching, speed and defense. If you have followed baseball for any length of time, you know that this mix means a lot of wins. The Redbirds have one of the best young outfields in the game with Ray Lankford, Bernard Gilkey, Brian Jordan, and now Mark Whiten. Lankford had his breakthrough season last year (.286, 20 HR, 86 RBI, 42 steals) and will likely hit cleanup for Joe Torre this year. Bob Tewksbury went 16-5 with a 2.16 ERA and only 20 walks in 233 innings last year, and he should have won the Cy Young Award. He is complemented in the rotation by lefties Donovan Osbourne and Rheal Cormier, and righthander Omar Oliveras. If Joe Magrane can regain his old form after arm surgery, the Cards will be in great shape. Now, who's going to hit? Lankford is the star, Gregg Jeffries and Todd Zeile will be looking for some consistency at the corners, and maybe Ozzie Canseco will add some pop if he ever gets to play. The sleeper in the lot may be Geronimo Pena who looks like he can really hit.

The Montreal Expos are a team very similar to the Cardinals, but with a little less depth. Their outfield of Marquis Grissom, Larry Walker, and Moises Alou is just as young, fast, and talented as the Cardinals', but they have an inexperienced infield. Deshields, out with the chicken pox for now, will anchor the infield that will also include unknowns Sean Berry at third, Wil Cordero at short, and either washed-up Jack Clark or Greg Colbrunn at first. However, the Expos' starting staff drops off considerably after Dennis Martinez and Ken Hill. Kent Bottenfield looks like he has some potential, and he pitched well in a September call-up last year. Chris Nabholz and Mike Gardiner round out the rotation. John Wetteland (37 saves) was a surprise in 1992, but he smashed a toe in spring training and won't be back for a couple of weeks. Until then, Mel Rojas, who went 7-1 with a 1.43 ERA last year, will be the closer.

The last time the Philadelphia Phillies won their first two games of the year was 1980, when, gasp, they won the World Series. Don't be fooled, though. This team is only fair. They have a nice lineup (they were second in the league in runs scored last year) that includes robust John Kruk, emerging stars Darren Daulton and Dave Hollins, and Lenny Dykstra. As for the newcomers, Pete Incaviglia will add more power, while Milt Thompson and Jim Eisenreich will add speed and defense to the outfield. The starting pitchers will have a lot of pressure on them again this year, because if they don't pitch a complete game, they might lose. That is because the Phillies have one of the worst bullpens in the league. Nevertheless, there is some talent on the staff. Terry Mulholland has established himself as the ace, and Curt Shilling could be an all-star. Free-agent pickup Danny Jackson will also help, and youngsters Ben Rivera and Tommy Greene have a ton of potential.

Can you remember when the last time the strength of the Chicago Cubs was pitching and their weakness was hitting? Well, that is the case this year. Holy Cow! The Cubs have added Jose Guzman, who came within one out of a no-hitter on opening day, Greg Hibbard, Randy Myers, and Dan Plesac to give the staff depth and balance. Mike Morgan has rejuvenated his career to the point where he was a serious Cy Young candidate last year. Unfortunately for frustrated Cub fans, games won't be as exciting this year as usual. The old, bad Cub teams used to lose games 8-7; this year's edition will lose a lot of 3-2 games. That's because their offense features no power and no speed, and no help appears to be on the way. Andre Dawson and Jerome Walton are gone, and Ryne Sandberg missed almost all of spring training with a broken wrist. An outfield of Willie Wilson, Candy Maldonado, and Sammy Sosa is one of the weaker ones in the division. Mark Grace had yet another fine season last year, but he doesn't really hit for power. In fact, Sandberg and Maldonado are the only two guys on the team who recorded double-digits in homers last year.

The Florida Marlins became the first team in the history of baseball to break training camp and head south. The team then excited their fans by winning their first game, but it won't take long for the expansion blues to set in. Actually, this team won't be completely awful. The men of teal do have a decent blend of speed, power, and pitching. They have an all-star catcher in Benito Santiago and an all-star closer in Bryan Harvey. Santiago, Orestes Destrade, Junior Felix, and Jeff Conine all have some power. Walt Weiss and Brett Barberie are excellent up the middle on defense. Chuck Carr and Greg Briley add speed and defense to the outfield.

Two late-spring additions have made the pitching staff respectable. They traded for lefty Chris Hammond from the Reds, and he will step in and be the number-two starter behind Charlie Hough, who I think played against my great-grandfather in the minors. The Marlins also swiped Luis Aquino from the Royals. If former All-Star Game starter Jack Armstrong can ever get his head on straight, the pitching won't be so bad. The Marlins will be a scrappy, hustling bunch, but after the novelty wears off, fans will once again realize that this team is a foundation for the future, not for now.

N.L. West

The Atlanta Braves are a popular choice to win the division again. They'll do it, but it won't be as easy as you think. Everybody knows about the starting staff that features four potential Cy Young winners—Tom Glavine, Greg Maddux, John Smoltz, and Steve Avery. Throw in their fifth starter Pete Smith, who was 7-0 last year, and this staff does, indeed, have the potential to be one of the best ever. The bullpen features a lot of good arms, but Bobby Cox needs to find someone to be the definite closer. Mike Stanton, Kent Mercker, Steve Bedrosian and Jay Howell are all possibilities. The Braves problem is that their lineup, while very much above average, has the potential to stop hitting for a while. Terry Pendleton is the team's best hitter, while Dave Justice, Ron Gant, and Brian Hunter all have sufficient power. Oh yes, there's also Deion Sanders, who will try to prove that last season was no fluke—at least until football season rolls around. The Braves are also loaded with talent in the minors, so they should not be stopped by major injuries. Braves fans will be expecting nothing less than a World Championship, and if the pressure doesn't get to them, they won't be disappointed.

The reason the Braves will have a harder time winning the division this year is because the rest of the N.L. West is catching up to them. Most notably, the Cincinnati Reds will challenge for the title. New manager Tony Perez is the kind of guy the players can get along with. More importantly, this team is loaded with talent. They have the best lineup in the division with Kevin Mitchell joining Barry Larkin, Chris Sabo, Roberto Kelly, Reggie Sanders, Bip Roberts, and Randy Milligan, who will fill in for the injured Hal Morris until his separated shoulder heals. The Reds starting staff of Jose Rijo, Tim Belcher, John Smiley, and Tom Browning is second only to Atlanta's. Rob Dibble is still a presence in the bullpen, and new pickups Greg Cadaret and Jeff Reardon will add depth. If the Reds' new uniforms are any indication of their progress, it is going to be a great year in Cincinnati.

Only in the N.L. West would the Houston Astros' starting rotation of Doug Drabek, Greg Swindell, Pete Harnisch, and Mark Portugal not be considered the best in the division. It is still pretty darn good though. Doug Jones had a great year in relief last year, and the rest of the bullpen is adequate. The Astros' lineup has plenty of speed and defense but little power, as usual. Steve Finley, Luis Gonzales, and Eric Anthony make up a very good outfield. Jeff Bagwell is a future all-star, and Craig Biggio and Ken Caminiti also help make up a solid infield. In this loaded division, Houston will likely approach 90 wins this year, but it won't be nearly good enough.

Add an upstart manager and the best player in baseball to a team, and they can't help but improve. The San Francisco Giants will prove that this year. Dusty Baker takes over a team that lost 90 games last year and came within an eyelash of moving to Florida. All of a sudden they sign Barry Bonds, and hope is in the windy Candlestick air once again. Bonds will look great in the middle of the order with Will Clark and Matt Williams. Willie McGee, along with a Darren Lewis/Dave Martinez platoon rounds out a decent outfield. Robby Thompson has some sock at second, and Royce Clayton has shown flashes of brilliance at short. The

BISON RETROSPECTIVE 1978: Commentary

The sports editors thought it might be interesting to go back and see what the campus' general attitude towards sports was fifteen years ago. This Opinions piece originally appeared in the Sept. 22, 1978* Bucknellian.

BY RICHARD WERTHER

Pity the poor Bucknell freshmen. There is just so much to learn. Coping with the new workload, fighting through the lines at the cafeteria, negotiating their new freedom away from home, and meeting so many new faces. It's enough to boggle the mind.

For those who were fans or players in high school there is hardly time to get acquainted with the Bucknell sports scene. What exactly is the status of fun and games at our peaceful central Pennsylvanian home?

Well, for one thing, there has been a tremendous renaissance in the area of participation in sports, spurred on greatly by the new field house. Suddenly, playing racquetball is the chic thing to do.

But on the highest level of competition, the intercollegiate level, where most of us are mere fans, the scene is about as quiet as Market Street at 12 midnight. Words like silent and especially, apathetic, come to mind.

The uninitiated will soon learn the facts — one does not show spirit and support their school teams at Bucknell. We will have none of this silly rah-rah stuff here.

About the quickest way to reveal one's identity as a freshman, other than wearing an '82 shirt, would be to get caught cheering at a football game.

What is the reason for this phenomenon? Simple, say most people—it is that the teams are sub-par. While Bucknell does have winning traditions in sports like cross-country, swimming, and water polo, the big money sports teams such as

Track teams count down until Patriot League meet

Bucknell hosts Colgate, Moravian, Lycoming, and Bloomsburg tomorrow afternoon at 1:30 in Christy Mathewson Stadium

Time and distance have always been essential to track and field performers. However, they're thinking in terms of minutes, seconds, feet, and inches. The coaches are thinking in terms of days, as in 22 days until the Patriot League Championships. The trick is making sure both groups impress one another before the big meet.

"We all understand that we can't afford to waste any time," said head coach Art Gulden. "There aren't a lot of meets to get ready, but we've essentially been getting ready since September."

Confident and pleased as he reflected upon last weekend's results of the Colonial Relays and Bucknell Spring Track Classic, Gulden still seemed to have some of that smile that's been on his face since they won the Patriot League Indoor Track and Field Championships in February. While the other teams in the league "go full board in competition week after week," the Bison have been able to enjoy a much deserved break, but still remain sharp.

"Most of the people did the work they needed to over break," stated the coach who refused to say "all people". "We got off to a really good start and competed well."

The entire focus of every track and field season is league championships. And, uncharacteristically, the Bison are not the defending champions or favorites. Both military academies possess outstandingly deep and talented squads. "The academies opened our eyes and forced us to aim our sights higher," admitted Gulden. "They present a new challenge, but we've never backed down from a challenge. In fact, we look forward to one because you don't want to win every meet by 100 points."

To meet that challenge, Bucknell will have to take it to the next level, something Gulden believes the team is ready to show him signs of this weekend. The Bison host Colgate, Moravian, Bloomsburg, and Lycoming in Christy Mathewson Memorial Stadium tomorrow. Rain or shine, the running events will go off at 1:30. "It's our last scheduled meet at home before hosting the big meet," pointed out Gulden.

Time, whether measured it in seconds, minutes, or days, is running out for all of the teams, not just the Bison, to get ready for the championships.

"Running never ends, they just seem to change the name every once in a while!" This statement holds true as the newly crowned Patriot League indoor track champions are hard at work in search of their second Patriot League outdoor track title. The battle for the coveted crown should be intense as Army and Navy will also be in the hunt. Neither showed up for the Indoor Championships, as they competed in the Hepatagonal Championships with the Ivy League teams that same weekend.

Can the Lady Bison do it two seasons in a row? Coach Gulden is tentatively optimistic. "It should be a great meet with 3 or 4 teams battling it out in May. We have a great shot at the title." The meet will be held May 1 at Bucknell. Last year, Bucknell lost by 60 points to Army, but if you take away the discus, hammer, and javelin (Bucknell had only one person entered in those events and no points were scored), the meet is extremely close.

For the start of the outdoor season, the team headed south to the College of William and Mary for the Colonial Relays in an effort to avoid chilly Lewisburg. The Orange and Blue looked sharp, featuring ECAC qualifiers, personal bests, and medals to show for their efforts.

As has been the case many times this year, the team was lead by the talented and versatile Norine Nadeau '96. Nadeau, who has already shown that she can jump, hurdle, and run, did something different and came up with the same amount of success. Nadeau, throwing the javelin for the first time this year, threw a personal best of 139' 101/2". Her throw was good enough for second place and qualified her for the ECAC championships. Nadeau did double duty as she ran a leg (61.7) on the 4 x 400m relay that ran 4:02, which is the fastest time of the year. Also on that relay was Beth Muehl '94 (60.7), Sharon Shilling '95 (59.9), and Bridget Dean '95 (59.7).

The streakin' Bison faired well in other events also. The quartet of Julie Diercks '93, Dana Harbst '93, Dean, and Tameka Hinton '95 placed fifth in the highly explosive 4 x 100m relay, in 49.31, just missing the ECAC qualifying time of 49.04. Dean was quite busy (and successful) down in Williamsburg, VA, as she also placed seventh in the 400m hurdles in a personal best time of 64.91. Dean was joined in the 400m hurdles by Muehl, who made an awesome debut by running 67.13. This time puts Muehl on the Bucknell's all-time list.

The long distance crew also had something to brag about as the distance medley relay finished second to James Madison University in 12:18.4. The relay consisted of Kathy Wurster '94 (3:43 for 1200m), Shilling (59.7 for 400m), Becky Tobin '95 (2:23 for 800m) and Gina Abraham '93 (5:06 for 1600m). This time also places them on the all-time list.

Overall, it was a good start to what should be an exciting season. But there is a lot more work to be done. This Saturday, the Lady Bison are home against Colgate, Moravian, and Bloomsburg. This scoring meet should be an excellent test of the Bison's balance and depth.

Cycling team preps for nationals in May

BUCKNELLIAN TEAM CORRESPONDENT

The Bucknell Cycling Team traveled to West Point last weekend to compete in the Army Stage Classic, one of the key races needed to qualify for the National Collegiate Cycling Championships. This year, MIT will be hosting Nationals on May 22-23 in Cambridge, Massachusetts. Of the 75 teams and 1,000 racers in the eastern conference, only five teams and five individuals will qualify. The Bucknell team is vying to be one of those five teams.

In the spirit of a national championship qualifying event, the Army Spring Classic provided grueling courses, stiff competition, and less than ideal weather conditions. The weekend kicked off with a road race on the infamous Bear Mountain Road Course, which features three miles of climbing per 14 mile lap, as well as a hair-raising 60 MPH descent. In the Women's B race, Nikki Yajko '95 raced to an impressive 7th place finish. For the two lap Men's B race, the Bison were led by Greg Tall '93, Tim Peterson '93 and George Bicking '95 against a strong field of 100 racers. Luck ran out for the Bison as Peterson hurt his back on the first climb and was forced to abandon the race. The ominous streak continued as Tall flatted with one kilometer to go and Bicking crashed on the second climb. Fortunately, Bicking was able to get up and regain the leaders to contest the sprint where he finished an impressive 15th. The Men's A race featured 125 competitors including several nationally ranked racers and members of Pro-Am teams. The Bison, led by Lee Lefkowitz '93 and Chris Neumann '95, had no problem staying with the leaders despite the brisk pace that left less than fifty racers in the lead pack. After 42 miles of racing, the final sprint began at 40 MPH where the Bison found themselves in the middle of a violent free-for-all reminiscent of a boxing match that saw two high speed wrecks, one involving a rider catapulted at 40 MPH into a pile of rocks. After all the dust had settled, Neumann and Lefkowitz were 19th and 22nd, respectively.

The next day began with a gruesome 1.7 mile individual race against the clock that gained 750 vertical feet. At press time, the results of the time trial were not available.

Following the time trial, the final race of the Army Stage Classic was a fast multilap race on a 0.9 mile loop around the Dining Hall and Fieldhouse. The course featured one very steep climb, a fast, twisty downhill section and a long, winding straight-away leading back to the climb. In the Men's B event, Tall and Bicking rode prominently at the front of the lead group. Their ideal positioning allowed Tall to gain valuable points awarded to leaders of designated laps. Again, crashes were a factor as both Bicking and Tall were involved in collisions that seriously hindered their performance.

The Men's A race saw a dizzying 30 lap tour of the course completed in just over one hour. The Bison were led by Chris Neumann, who finished first in the field sprint for 10th overall.

Next week the Bison will travel to Cornell. So far, Penn State, Univ. of Mass., and Cornell have established themselves as contenders for a berth at the national championships. The other two slots are still wide open and the Bison will work to regain the dominance they displayed last week, when they carried home one-third of all the medals awarded.

Youthful tennis squad double faults twice last week at Colgate, Delaware

BY JON TERRY
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The Bucknell men's tennis team slipped into sixth place in the Patriot League after dropping matches to Delaware and league foe Colgate.

The Red Raiders remain a half game ahead of the Bison in the conference standings after last Saturday's rather easy win in Hamilton, NY. Colgate won by a match score of 8-1, sweeping the six singles events and taking two of three doubles matches. Bucknell's only victory came as the doubles team of co-captain and number-one player Chris Stenstrom '94 and number-two player Mark McGuire '95 pulled out an 8-6 win in an eight-game pro set.

In a match that was played indoors due to the chilly weather, Colgate's singles players really had no problems in the best two-of-three set format, as only Stenstrom was able to win more than four games in any set.

On Wednesday, the Bison were beaten 6-3 at Delaware, as once again the singles players were unable to score for the team. McGuire was the only Bison to win a singles match, as he defeated Mark Buell 6-4, 6-4. Stenstrom, a native of Switzerland, and co-captain Chris Rimpel '93, the team's only senior, were able to win sets, but could not pull out victories.

On the bright side for Bucknell, two doubles teams pulled out wins. Stenstrom and McGuire won a hard-fought match, 7-5, 7-5 and are now 4-1 on the year. Rimpel and Peter Conn '95 also were victorious, 7-5, 4-6, 6-4.

First-year head coach Bob Hammerlee has inherited a very young team from former coach Craig Reynolds. The team features one senior, one junior, four sophomores, and three freshmen. The team is now 2-3 on the year, with victories coming against UMBC and Hobart.

Next up for the Bison is this afternoon's trip to Easton to play first-place Lafayette. On Monday, the team will be at home for a non-conference affair against Towson St.

Justin Zackey '94

Men's lacrosse attackman Justin Zackey '94 has been selected as The Bucknellian's Athlete of the Week for his spectacular performance in his team's last two contest.

In last Saturday's 15-5 victory over Holy Cross, Zackey scored five goals and registered one assist for a total of six points. Proving that it was no fluke, he repeated his performance with five goals and one assist against the 11th ranked Towson State Tigers on last Wednesday.

The Huntingdon Valley, Pa. native is making a smooth transition from his midfield position of a year ago when he tallied 39 points.

Hot tip of the week: the next time you're in Vegas or Atlantic City, pay one of the local sports bookies a visit and drop some coin on the Bucknell men's lacrosse team. Over the last several seasons, the Bison have performed almost precisely as one might have predicted they would—game after game after game.

The dictum goes something like this: Against the weaker teams, Bucknell wins big. When pitted against teams in the lower half of the top twenty, the Bison are generally competitive, but can never seem to achieve the upset victory. And finally, when matched up with the nation's elite, the Blue and Orange have not been able to keep a game close for longer than a quarter or two.

This past week saw the Bison take the field against one of weaker teams in NCAA Division I lacrosse on Saturday, and one of the country's premier programs on Wednesday. Once again, the games played out as if they had been scripted with the above guidelines in mind.

First for the good news. After draining losses to Army and Delaware on the road, Bucknell was visited by the Crusaders from Holy Cross who have the unenviable distinction of being the doormats of the Patriot League. Appropriately, the Bison walked all over the Crusaders en route to a 15-5 victory.

There was never any doubt that the Bison were the superior team in this contest, as the offense exploded for 10 first-half goals, while allowing their opponents only three. While the goal-scoring barrage slowed a bit in the second half, Bucknell's defense continued to stifle the Crusader attack, relinquishing only two more goals in the third and fourth quarters.

Playmaker Gil Rotchford '96 gave Bison fans a taste of what they can look forward to in the future, ripping four goals and dishing off an additional two assists. Justin Zackey '94 contributed six points of his own to Bucknell's cause, notching five goals and an assist. Not to be left out of the action, All-Patriot League defenseman Jeff Kangas '94 got in the scoring column after passing off an assist to a Bison teammate.

Despite the 15-goal output, midfielder Garrett Austin '94 was not completely satisfied. "We're having trouble getting in sync offensively," says Austin. "We're getting the goals, but not the way we originally intended."

On Wednesday, Bucknell paid a visit to the 11th ranked Tigers of Towson State in a non-conference match-up. A yearly nemesis of the Bison, Towson continued its domination over Bucknell, blowing out Sid Jamieson's squad 7-0 in the first quarter of play.

> "This weekend is really important for us. We need to come out and play really well in order to get the team morale up for the remainder of the season."
> — Jeff Kangas '94

"We went down there a little intimidated, and we opened up with a horrible first quarter, and an all around bad first half," remarked Kangas.

Despite being behind 12-3 at the half, the Bison rallied in the final 30 minutes, scoring five goals to their opponents seven.

Zackey had a hand in nearly every Bucknell goal, tallying five goals and one assist in the 19-8 Bison loss. Zackey's effort was overshadowed by Towson's Joe Genovese who recorded five goals and four assists.

According to Austin, "We're getting great individual performances. What we need to do now is put four quarters together as a team."

Bison lacrosse fans can look forward to seeing their team in action at home this weekend against a pair of mid-western teams, Butler and Ohio State. The Butler game will be at noon on Saturday, and Bucknell will clash with the Buckeyes on Sunday at noon.

"This weekend is really important for us," explains Kangas. "We need to come out and play really well in order to get the team morale up for the remainder of the season."

Looking ahead to next Wednesday, the Bison will be traveling to Penn for what Austin calls "the grudge match of the year." Bucknell came out strong against the Quakers in the originally scheduled March 17 contest, only to have the game postponed due to snow showers. The Penn game can be viewed as a must-win for the Bison if they are to have any hope of breaking into the top twenty this season.

Incidentally, the current line at Bally's Vegas reads as follows: Butler +12 at Bucknell; Ohio State +9 at Bucknell; and Bucknell +3 at Penn. Bison fans hope their team can prove the odds-makers wrong on Wednesday.

Fries' 74 leads Bison to match win

Bucknell golf team drives off with a 41–stroke victory in its first home contest of 1993

BY JONATHAN BORDEAU
Bucknellian Staff Writer

After starting the spring season with an encouraging showing at the Loyola Intercollegiate Golf Invitational, the Bison golfers returned to the links across Route 15 on Tuesday in a quad match with Lafayette, Rider, and Swarthmore.

Two of Bucknell's seven tournaments this year had been canceled due to poor course conditions. The greenskeepers, however, worked miracles and prepared the course for a Bison rampage on Tuesday.

"We did very well," reflected Coach Tommy Thompson on the Bison's commanding success in the match. The Bison tore up the course with a team score of 387 strokes, the lowest Coach Thompson has seen in the past five or six years. Lafayette and Rider tied for second with a distant team score of 428 strokes, while Swarthmore brought up the rear with a team total of 480. "I am very happy with the team play," commented co-captain Dave Fries '93, "We had five scores in the seventies, which is the best we have done in a long time."

Fries led the Bison with a four over par 74, earning him first place in the field of 24 golfers. "I think that Tuesday had to be my best round of golf at Bucknell in the four years that I have been here," said Fries.

Rounding out the scoring for the Bison were Doug Smith '95 with a score of 77, Mike Hartman '95 with a 78, good enough for third overall; Paul Gregory '95 and Jimmy Offria '96 with a pair of 79's; co-captain Doug Dollenberg '94 with an 80; and Jeff Graph '95 with an 83.

Coach Thompson commented on the Bison's best effort thus far: "We were thankful to get back on the course and see some action. I am pleased with the consistency that the guys are showing; we have eight guys who are all shooting well and consistently. We have a lot of depth and balance, Dave [Fries] is the only senior on the team; most of the guys are freshmen and sophomores."

The Bison left yesterday headed for the Rutgers University Golf Course to compete with a 21 team field in a two-day competition which should give Bucknell some good experience for the all-important Patriot League Tournament at Navy on April 17th and 18th. At Rutgers, Bucknell will face powerhouses like Princeton, Georgetown, Rhode Island, and Temple. The Bison will also be able to see how they perform against league foes Lehigh and Colgate. The tournament will mark the first time that the Bison golfers have competed at Rutgers.

After the Rutgers tournament, the Bison will return to Lewisburg and prepare for the league tournament. "So many guys are competing for the last two spots, so that should help the team a lot," said Fries. "Ten guys are battling for five or six spots. With the amount of pressure that everyone puts on themselves and on their teammates in order to win a spot, we will be able to bring a better caliber golf team to the course."

On Thursday of next week, the Bison will hone their skills at the Lock Haven Invitational Tournament. After the league competition, Bucknell may play in some tournaments that were forced to reschedule to later dates due to poor course conditions.

OLKOWSKI, KLAWON NAMED SCHOLAR–ATHLETE

Bucknell men's basketball player Paul Olkowski and women's swimmer Jeanne Klawon have earned the Patriot League Scholar-Athlete Award in their respective sports, the league office announced. Klawon shared her award with Heather Davies of the U. S. Naval Academy. In order to be eligible for the Scholar-Athlete Award, a student-athlete must possess a cumulative grade-point average of 3.2 and must be a starter or key reserve on his or her team. The winner in each sport is then chosen by a panel consisting of the eight Patriot League sports information directors as well as the league's executive director.

Olkowski started every game for Bucknell this year, averaging 8.7 points and 5.5 rebounds per game as the Bison finished 23-6 and won the Patriot League regular-season title. The starting center in all 90 games Bucknell played over the past three years, Olkowski tied a Bucknell record by playing in 118 career games. He scored in double figures 10 times this year, and led Bucknell in rebounding seven times. A studio art major with a cumulative grade-point average of 3.3, Olkowski received national attention for his artwork this year, as his painting depicting head coach Charlie Woolum and the five seniors adorned the cover of the Bucknell media guide. Olkowski also has done artwork for other campus organizations, and is a graphic artist for the University Messenger, a campus publication. Olkowski hopes to travel to Europe next year to study art and play basketball professionally.

The award for Klawon speaks both for her academic achievement and her athletic improvement. A sophomore who didn't even make Bucknell's 17-person roster for the Patriot League championships as a freshman, Klawon this year scored in three individual events and swam on four record-setting relay teams at the Patriot League Championships, helping Bucknell to a second-place finish. At that meet, Klawon finished second in the 100-yard freestyle (53.42), third in the 50-yard freestyle (24.54) and sixth in the 100-yard butterfly (1:01:62). Klawon now ranks among Bucknell's top ten all-time performers in all three of those events. She also swam on the school record-setting relays in the 200- and 400-yard freestyle and the 200- and 400-yard medley. A geology major with a cumulative grade-point average of 3.7, Klawon has been named to the Dean's List three straight semesters.

LOVE HONORED AGAIN

Allison Love, righthanded pitcher for Bucknell's softball team, has been named Patriot League Pitcher of the Week for the second straight week after posting a 2-0 record last week.

The sophomore yielded just one run in 10 1/3 innings in a rare relief appearance to lead the Bison over Delaware 7-6, in 14 innings, which was the second longest game in school history. Love had picked up a 4-3 win earlier in the week, throwing a complete game four-hitter against St. Francis (PA).

In 17 1/3 innings of work last week, Love compiled an earned-run average of 0.81 and had ten strikeouts against nine hits. Love, who is leading the league with a record of 4-1, also leads the league in strikeouts with 34, and her average of 6.9 strikeouts per seven innings ranks 20th in the nation.

The Bison are now 10-2 on the season and won ten straight games, the second longest winning in Bucknell history.

GROSS, GRUNOW SWIM WELL AT NATIONALS

Bucknell senior swimmers Jay Gross and Margaret Grunow both turned in very strong performances at the U.S. Senior National Swimming Championships, held at the Tracy Caulkins Swimming Center in Nashville, TN, this past weekend.

Gross, a co-captain of the men's team this year, placed seventh in the championship of the 50-meter freestyle with a time of 23.43. Grunow, a co-captain of the women's team and the finest women's swimmer in Bucknell's history, won the consolation final of the 100-meter butterfly in 1:03.32.

Gross also competed in the 100-meter freestyle and the 100-meter butterfly, while Grunow competed in the 50-meter and 100-meter freestyle, but they did not place in those events.

was helped out by Trout's perfectly executed squeeze bunt in the fifth inning and Koch's RBI double in the same inning. Bucknell won the game 2-0.

The Leopards took the nightcap, 4-2. Kazanjian went all the way in that one, and despite pitching well, he let a 2-2 tie slip away when he allowed a pair of runs to score in the fourth inning. An RBI-triple by Kearns highlighted Bucknell's two-run third.

On Sunday, the Bison settled for another split, this time at Lehigh. Denis Maguire '93 (1-3) pitched six strong innings to pick up the 5-2 win. Sutfin, hitting .346 going into yesterday's games, collected two more hits and scored two runs in this game. Matt Sniegocki '93 also had two hits and two RBI. The Bison took advantage of three Lehigh errors as they scored twice in the fourth and fifth innings.

In the second game, David Scranton '95 (1-1) went all the way, giving up only single runs in the second and fourth frames. Unfortunately for Scranton, the Bison were held to two hits, and he lost the game 2-1. All of the Bucknell offense came in the first inning when Sutfin doubled and Steve Gyimesi knocked him in with a single.

On Tuesday, Bucknell left the Patriot League to play two at Penn State. Again, the results were the same—another split. Bucknell took the opener 6-2, as Rob Glus '95, who is also a quarterback on the football team, tossed six strong innings, striking out three while walking four. Brian Walter '94 closed out the win by retiring three straight Penn State batters.

With the game tied at one, Bucknell exploded for five runs in the top of the fifth off of three Nittany Lion pitchers. The runs scored on RBI singles from Kearns, Koch, and Walter, and a two-run double by Charlie Griak '96. Koch was the star of the day, going four-for-six in the twin bill.

Just as in Bethlehem, Bucknell wasted an excellent pitching performance in the nightcap, falling 3-1. Kyle Morris '95 (0-2) was the victim of lack of support this time around. Morris gave up eight hits and three walks while fanning three. Bucknell took the lead in the second inning when Koch came around to score after doubling, but Penn State quickly tied it up in the bottom of the inning. They then scored twice more off of Morris in the sixth to pick up their ninth win of the year against 12 losses.

Jack Kazanjian '93 (1-2) delivers a strike during the Lafayette game last Saturday at the mods.

Bucknell is in good shape right now as far as the schedule goes. After taking Easter weekend off, it will play a non-league game at St. Bonaventure on Tuesday before opening up a stretch that will include eight of ten games at home. That stretch will feature doubleheaders against four Patriot League foes. The next home game will be Sat., Apr. 17 against defending-champion Fordham, who is in the other division. Holy Cross, also in the North Division, will be in town the following day. At some point, the team will also have to make up a rained-out doubleheader at Army. These interdivisional battles are important because, while there are only two games against each of these teams, they count in the division standings. With three wins against Navy and one each against Lafayette and Lehigh, Bucknell will look to build on this past week's progress and carry it on to the Division title.

who wouldn't jump all over that story? Geraldo would spend a week on this and the networks would bid for the movie rights. Peterson finished 1973 with an 8-15 record and was traded the following season. Kekich (39-51 lifetime) was traded in June of '73 for the immortal Lowell Palmer.

As I said before, I was just three when perhaps the most exciting part of the Yankees' season occurred. But, the tale has become a part of fabled Yankee folklore. Like any other piece of folklore that borders on fiction, I'm sure some of the tale has been changed.

Not only have the rules of baseball changed since the 1972 season, but so have sports reporters.

weakness of the Giants is their rotation. Ace Bill Swift overachieved last year, and his supporting cast of Bud Black, Trevor Wilson, and John Burkett is only so-so. The Giants will certainly be a better team, but there is no way in the world that they will compete with the big boys.

Now we are at the point where this division becomes weak. The Los Angeles Dodgers should be able to avoid the cellar this year, but only because of expansion and the fact that the Padres are broke. Last year, everyone was excited about the reunion of Daryl Strawberry and Eric Davis—until they hit .237 and .228, respectively, that is. The two are supposedly healthy this year, but after the serious nature of their injuries, it is hard to believe they will ever have all-star years again. That pretty much leaves Tim Wallach, Eric Karros, and Cory Snyder to drive in runs. Pretty pathetic, huh? Their bullpen is even worse, especially now that Todd Worrell is hurt again. The Dodgers' defense competed with the Mets' for the worst record in baseball last year, and it is only slightly better this year. Mike Piazza is a Rookie of the Year candidate behind the plate, and Jody Reed will help solidify the defense at second. The only possible strength here is starting pitching. Orel Hershiser and Ramon Martinez should bounce back from off years, and Pedro Astacio, Tom Candiotti, and Kevin Gross can also win some games.

The name of the San Diego Padres' 1993 highlight film will be "How the Mighty have Fallen." The Padres decided to pinch pennies in the off-season, and it resulted in the loss of Tony Fernandez, Benito Santiago, Mike Maddux, Randy Myers, and Jose Melendez. The upside is that this team can still hit. Their potent middle of the lineup once again features Tony Gwynn, Gary Sheffield, and Fred McGriff. Newcomers Phil Plantier and Derek Bell will also help. Now come the weaknesses. Up the middle this team is pretty awful. With Tim Teufel or Jeff Gardner at second and Kurt Stillwell or Craig Shipley at short, they are weak offensively and defensively. Also, other than Andy Benes and Bruce Hurst, this team has absolutely no pitching. In fact, I would rather have the Marlins' staff than the Padres'.

This brings us to the other expansion team, the Colorado Rockies. Besides having Chico Resch in goal, there just is not much talent here. The Rockies expect over four million fans this year, and they might have a few homers to cheer for, but that is about it. Andres Galarraga, Dante Bichette, Charlie Hayes, and Jerald Clark all have some pop, and Eric Young and Alex Cole provide speed at the top of the order. David Nied was the top pick in the expansion draft, and he had a fantastic spring. The rest of the rotation is pretty much a collection of junk. Bruce Ruffin is the number-two starter, and his ERA was almost 7.00 last year. Butch Henry, Andy Ashby, and Bryn Smith will also vie for innings. Their bullpen has some potential with former Brewer Darren Holmes, Jeff Parrett, and Steve Reed. About the only team the Rockies will be competing with this year is the Marlins, and the fact that they play in a much tougher division will ensure Colorado of the top pick in next year's amateur draft.

In this loaded division, Houston will likely approach 90 wins this year, but it won't be nearly good enough.

team with only one first year student—Laura Hagan. The defensive experience in active play has helped the Bison to acclimate first-time goalie Wendy Schwieger '95 to her new position without much anxiety. "The team has been very supportive, and I truly believe that we all have a lot of talent," commented Schwieger. She had 16 saves from the 32 Lafayette shots on Saturday.

Bucknell goes into their next game on Fri., Apr. 9 against Holy Cross with a renewed confidence in themselves and their ability. Their 0-5 record does not show what these women are capable of doing. Holy Cross, with a 0-3 record, was beaten by last year's Bucknell team, and co-captain Jen Hayes '93 believes that, "if we play to win we will be able to beat Holy Cross." This Bucknell team wants respect, and they are definitely not going to settle for anything less.

Philip Roth swings back into Operation

BY NICOLE COBBAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The Philip Roth Residence in creative writing goes into effect next semester, a program designed to provide promising writers an opportunity to write for four months at Bucknell with free room and board, a studio, a modest stipend, and no other obligations. Bucknell's most prominent author alumnus, Roth assists in making the final selection for residents, giving other young writers the chance to develop their own careers.

Roth grew up in Newark, NJ, the son of a middle-class office manager. Graduating from Weequahic High School, a predominately Jewish school, Roth attended Rutgers University for one year. Unhappy with living at home, Roth wanted to transfer out of Newark to, as Roth said, "protect a hardworking, self-sacrificing father and a devoted but determined son from a battle that they were equally ill-equipped to fight."

During Christmas vacation his freshman year Roth befriended a neighbor, Marty Castlebaum, who attended Bucknell University. Castlebaum's apparent transformation into what Roth considered "adult society," the maturity he seemed to have gained, and the self-confidence he'd found, was what attracted Roth to the campus.

Roth interviewed at Bucknell in March, 1951. He was immediately attracted to the campus, as well as the cozy little town of Lewisburg.

"In all, it was an outlandish little college town...suited for the coziest, most commonplace dreams of order," wrote Roth in his autobiography. "Lewisburg emanated an unpretentious civility that we could trust, rather than an air of privilege by which we might have been intimidated."

In his sophomore year, Roth transferred to Bucknell, never returning to live in Newark, but always holding on to his urban, Jewish background.

"I was just a resident here [in Newark] for a couple of decades," said Roth. "But from the evidence, I don't seem to have gotten over it...My subjects are shaped by my experiences...It's not unusual for a novelist's origins to have a role in what he writes."

His novels and stories testify to this fact, offering prolific insight to life in Jewish Newark. However, adds Roth, that is not to say a non-Jew would be unable to understand or enjoy his work as well.

"You know the saying, 'You don't have to be Jewish to enjoy Levy's rye bread?' Well, the defense rests its case," said Roth.

As a sophomore transfer, Roth took Bucknell by storm. He rushed Sigma Alpha Mu, and was witness to one of the first non-traditional fraternity formal when his fraternity hosted the Sammy Sand Blast.

Roth resigned from the fraternity the following year and instead devoted himself to Et Cetera, a literary magazine which he had helped to start the year before as editor.

Roth's introduction to the English department at Bucknell confirmed his desire to write. He befriended Bob and Charlotte Maurer, English professors, and Jack and Joan Wheatcroft, another English-department couple, spending hours talking with the couples about everything from e.e. cummings to growing up in New Jersey.

"I began to read the great books. I was taken by them and I wanted to emulate [the authors who wrote them]," said Roth. However, Roth admits that his initial attempts left much to be desired.

Philip Roth '54 sits in Bucknell Hall, home of the Stadler Center for Poetry and soon-to-be site of the Philip Roth Writing Residency. One of Bucknell's most renowned alumni authors, Roth's newest book Operation Shylock was recently published to critical acclaim.

BY L.S. KLEPP
Entertainment Weekly

Philip Roth's new novel, Operation Shylock (Simon & Schuster, $23), contains a preface explaining that everything in the book is true and a "Note to the Reader" at the end explaining that everything in the book is false. So you may wonder whether the narrator, who is called Philip Roth, is Philip Roth, and whether Philip Roth actually encountered a brazen look-alike impostor calling himself Philip Roth in Jerusalem in 1988, and whether Philip Roth got non-fictionally entangled with the Israeli secret service and also with pseudo-Roth's lubricious girlfriend, bringing her to shrill transports of ecstasy before tiptoeing quietly out of the room, leaving Roth arguing with Roth, Roth waxing wroth with Roth.

Is it the real turtle soup or only the mock? Readers of Deception, The Counterlife, etc., will be familiar with the spectacle of Roth chasing his own ambiguous, autobiographical tail. For what it's worth, the book has caught its niggling identity crisis from Roth's own chronic case. The question of identity runs, or runs amok, through the novel but several certifiably real characters and a gallery of cranks as well.

The cranks, each identified by a pet obsession that comes wrapped in a harangue, give the novel a shove of momentum every time it gets bogged down in the author's self-absorption. Roth has a sure and scathing instinct for possessed, wayward voices. There's pseudo-Roth, who's pitching the theory that Jews would be better off in the Diaspora, even in East Central Europe, home of the Holocaust, than in imperiled Israel. Roth the narrator compulsively parodies all this in a funny monologue on assimilation and Irving Berlin, and his pas de deux with his mocking and adoring double begins to resemble the famous mirror sequence in the Marx brothers' Duck Soup.

There's also a mischievous and bewitching old man who blames everything on his fellow Jews for blaming everything on one another; a rare-book dealer obsessed with Shakespeare's Shylock; the buxom girlfriend, a "recovering anti-Semite"; and a bitter Palestinian professor who professes to love Diaspora Jews like his old friend Philip and to hate Israeli Jews, his "jailers," who are turning the country into a dull, soulless "Jewish Belgium."

Most of the harangues, in other words, take manic aim at Roth's "pervasive, engulfing, wearying

To travel. . . or not?

Dear Parking Ticket Person,

I would like to respond to the nice notes you left on my car windshield on Monday, March 29, and Tuesday, March 30. According to the notes I stand accused of a NO STUDENT PARK VIOLATION and the infamous BACKING INTO A PARKING SPACE WITH INTENT TO KILL VIOLATION and am to pay a total fine of $50. I admit that my car (an Acura) was parked in the Weis lot, backed in, so you could not read the tag without walking all the way around the car. Unfortunately, that is how it will have to remain for at least a few more days. Now let me tell you why. (Here comes the fun part, you might want to find a comfortable chair and a cup of coffee.)

On March 28 at 11 a.m., four fearless Bucknellians (myself included) crammed into my car in Durham, NC, to head off to a rainy wonderland of manicured fescue and neverending good hair days that we call Bucknell. The music was pumping, the gas tank was full, the oil was checked—hell, we even had windshield wiper fluid. Sure it was cramped, but we were darn near THRILLED TO BEAT THE BAND at the prospect of rolling into Lewisburg in eight or nine hours. We stopped to get gas and burgers in Charlottesville. But had that been the highlight of the trip you would not have needed to give me any parking tickets, as I would not be writing this and I would not have met an 18-year-old tow truck driver named Doug who looked like his name should be Buddy. But I'm getting ahead of myself.

It was Saturday morning March 20 at 9:30 a.m. While sitting in Dunkin' Donuts listening to old people try out their best pick-up lines, two young women from Bucknell were preparing to embark on what would be the most unforgettable roadtrip of their lives...

We dreaded the long 30-hour trip, but the prospect of going skiing in Colorado was more exciting than the entrapment of the Bucknell Bubble during spring break. We were anxious to reach our destination, but did not know that our trip would be such an adventure. The CB was turned on and we were on Route 80, which would end up being the longest road of our lives. Both of our fathers had given us CBs to take along on our trip for safety purposes, but we had other intentions. We knew that by listening to the CB, we would easily be able to find out where all the "bears" were waiting with their "polaroids" (police officers with radar detectors). We had been on the road for only about one minute when we came upon a fleet of about ten semi-trucks, all talking back and forth to one another. As we slowly passed each one of them in our little green Ford Escort, many of drivers leaned out their windows to get a closer look at us. There was an obvious break in their conversation and then we heard "Woo-wee! Check out those cuties down there! Well they're gigglin' away so they must have heard what we said!" While Jenn tried to keep the car on the road and we regained our composure, we thought over our response.

Art that you never leave home without

BY COLLEEN RUSH
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Oh the times, they are a-changing. Once upon a time, the only people who dared to bear a tattoo were big, burly men who liked the idea of having a large anchor with the word "Mama" scrawled on it across their chests, cursing sailors, and bad girls. The sudden increase in the popularity of tattoos has defied all stereotypes and "rules" for who gets tattoos and who doesn't.

Ruth Tarr, a tattoo artist at Totem Tattoos in Shamokin, attributes the rise in popularity to several factors. The revolution in tattoo style, said Tarr, is a big reason. Tattooing evolved after the 70's from wide outlines and basic colors to a "fine art," said Tarr. Advances in technology enabled the art of tattooing to become more refined, with thinner, more detailed designs, and a wide variety of colors.

Tarr also cited that trend-setting Hollywood celebrities flashing various parts of their anatomy to flaunt their tattoos as a reason for the new popularity. Almost anyone that watches television or reads entertainment magazines has seen at least one of Cher's numerous works of art stenciled into some area of her body.

Susan Naughton—The Bucknellian

Imagine trying to sleep at night with a panther in close range!

Joanna Conard—The Bucknellian

Go crazy and pick your favorite friend! Winnie the Pooh is just one example of the creative out-of-the-ordinary tattoos possible.

The rise in popularity has led to what Tarr calls a tattoo "subculture." The subculture, Tarr said, is made up of both tattoo enthusiasts and world-class artists who chose skin as their medium of expression. Totem Tattoos will host guest tattooist Paul Booth, one of the up and coming celebrity tattoo artists from May 17-22. Booth, an award-winning tattooist, specializes in gloomy, nightmarish tattoo designs that make Night of the Living Dead characters look innocent.

The process of tattooing, though some recipients might disagree, is relatively painless. Picking a design is the first, and perhaps the most time-consuming part of the process. Once the design is chosen, a stencil is made of the design and transferred with ink to the area where the tattoo is to be placed. Because transfer ink is not permanent, the initial application gives the individual an idea about what the tattoo will look like, and a chance to back out of the committment.

Once the transfer is applied, the tattooist outlines the transfer with needles by "injecting" insoluble ink particles below the surface of the skin. Each tattoo requires thousands of "pricks" by the inked needles into the second layer of skin.

Health risks are a common concern for most first-time tattoo recipients. Tarr said professional tattooing is a clean, well-monitored process. Because the needles they use are not hollow, like hypodermic needles, the exposure to blood is

Carrot Top brings his unique brand of humor to the Bison

Ingredients:

Start with:
1 Full head of wild, bright red-orange hair
1 Wardrobe of extremely colorful mismatched clothes
1 Magnetic personality

Mix with:
1 Outrageous imagination
3 Tons of energy
1 Truckload of charisma
4 Trunks of side-splitting, knee-slapping, tear-producing material

Place on center stage and let cook on high for 45 minutes to an hour, then allow to simmer one-to-one with the audience. Keep in mind that Carrot Top may be served over and over because the recipe never goes stale. Millions with ferocious comedy appetites have enjoyed this comedic delicacy many times. Incidentally, this creation is best served in large portions to many people at a time.

This recipe has turned out to be a winner for a guy born Scott Thompson 47 years ago in Cocoa, FL. Thompson, better known as Carrot Top, has taken both the Campus Entertainer of the Year and Comedy trophies in the 1993 Campus Entertainment Awards.

After responding to a dare to enter an amateur comedy contest in college, this red-headed sensation found comic fuel in the laughter of others. Since then, his zany personality and stage antics have been growing in intensity. His show now consists of four travel trunks that overflow with bits and pieces of everyday life that he transforms into ingenious observations and inventions. He introduces each item to his audience, employing a twist of the absurd. And in rapid-fire succession, he delivers his unique, but accurate observations in a circus-like atmosphere.

Carrot Top, the comedian with charm, the entertainer with humor, the performer voted entertainer of the year by the National Association for Campus Activities appears in the Vghan Lit Auditorium next Tuesday, April 13, at 8:30 p.m.

After packing clubs and wowing audiences for three years, Carrot Top has graduated to television. He has appeared on Fox's Comic Strip Live, A&E's Evening at the Improv, Star Search, and MTV's Half-hour Comedy Hour and Spring Break Special.

During his non-stop college and club tour and television appearances last year, Carrot Top showcased at the NACA National Convention in Dallas. By the time all the cooperative buying forms were in, he had set an all-time record for the most forms submitted on an individual attraction during a convention.

Taking the stage, the house, and the country by storm, Carrot Top is converting average, normal citizens into devoted Carrot Head fans. You could be next!

"I can't tell you how many 'Carrot Top' T-shirts were worn the following day!" wrote Ellie Stutzman of Ursinus College (PA) after he appeared there. "The campus is still raving about the performance nearly a week after the fact...."

Said Michael West of Belmont Abbey College, "His performance...was one that directors of student activities lie awake at night praying for: an enthusiastic, energetic 100-yard dash of hilarious comedy that kept the audience in pain from laughing so hard, so often."

As for the future, Carrot Top hopes for more TV appearances, a sitcom, movie roles, and participation in Comic Relief. He also wants to make a difference when it comes to the environment, homelessness, and cruelty to animals. And finally, he wants a seat in Congress. No, he doesn't want to get elected, he just needs one of their seats for a prop!

Ingredients to Green Jello: (back) Pinata Head, Cowgod, Joe Subpoppy; (front) Rock-n-Roll Pumpkin, Marshall "Duh" Staxx.

BY MIKE LETTS
Bucknellian Staff Writer

"The moral of the story is that bands with no talent can easily amuse idiots with a stupid puppet show," claims Green Jello, the world's first "all video" band. (The group will only release videotapes.) And I have to applaud their honesty because Cereal Killer, their debut "videotape," is utter garbage. The bastard child of the age of television infatuation and addiction-riddled youngsters, one would wonder if in fact these guys were really "glued" to their TVs as kids.

The title track "Cereal Killer" is a perverted tale of corporate war as Toocan-Son-of Sam attacks his rival cereal mascots, killing the Silly Rabbit, the Lucky Charm's Leprechaun, and Snap, Crackle, and Pop respectively. That should give you a hint as to what frequency these guys are tuned into. Other tunes, or pardon me, videos such as "The Adventures of Shitman" and a perverse version of "The Three Little Pigs" tell of attacking innocent persons sitting on the can and ghetto laden piglets in an equally pathetic manner.

And in an annoyingly self-esteemless way, Green Jello tries to justify their lack of intelligence and talent by screaming "we suck" after every video. Yes you do, you clever dogs, you. A sad, below-the-belt money-making attempt, Green Jello only insults your intelligence by trying to make you think that any band that acts so brainless and senseless must be artistically brillant. They can't even make fun of the Seattle music scene well.

The final track, a cover of the Sex Pistols' "Anarchy in the UK," is mangled and twisted into a Flintstone fan's dream. The original chorus "I want to be...anarchy" is re-written in Green Jello fashion—"I want to be...Fred Flintstone."

Only one good thing can come of Green Jello—I don't have to have to hunt these guys down before I have to have a conversations with their brainless fans in the UC.

The blasphemy is enough to raise Sid Vicious from the dead so he can kill all the members of Green Jello himself. This is one video that should stay in the fridge just a few minutes longer.

minimal. The needles are cleaned and dipped into individual ink pots throughout the process, so the ink is not sucked into the needle and injected into the skin.

The increasing popularity of tattoos has crossed both gender and age boundaries. Tarr recalled giving a tattoo to a woman in her sixties who had never had a tattoo before.

Students at Bucknell are certainly not exempt from this new trend of body art. With reasons ranging from bonding with friends to making a personal statement, students on campus are getting tattoos.

One student, sporting a half moon with a garland of flowers on her ankle, said she got the tattoo "to bond with friends and to have a symbol of the goddess on me."

A new member of the tattoo community said that three weeks ago she got the purple and green flower with the pedals spelling "love" and the stem spelling "live" as "a form of expression." Noting that she "used to be conservative," the individual said that the tattoo symbolized her "change in views."

Susan Naughton—The Bucknellian

A flower for all occasions: You'll never leave home without it.

Joanna Conard—The Bucknellian

Is it real? Advanced technology has given tattoos a sharp, detailed look. Reptiles such as snakes and lizards are quite common for tattoos.

Certain members of the swim team had the blue and orange Bucknell "B" tattooed to their waistline area for a "bonding experience." The tattoo has become somewhat of a tradition among team members, although not all swimmers have the tattoo. The tradition started in 1991, and since then, a different group of swim team members have travelled to State College every year to join the ranks of the tattooed. The interviewed members also insisted that getting the tattoo was a "personal choice" and those who do not have a tattoo are not any less of a member.

With a panther on his upper arm, another student explained that he had "always wanted a tattoo," but didn't have the opportunity to get one until he came to Bucknell.

Some might question the motive, but the green tree frog tattoo that appears to be crawling from the ankle up the student's leg is more of a statement than a form of art. The statement, the student said, is that people "should not take life too seriously." Confident of her point, the student added, "I think it's funny. I'm still the same person, with or without it."

Because the process is permanent and the only way to remove a tattoo is by an expensive, painful, Pulsed-laser treatment that could lead to scarring, deciding to get a tattoo is a serious commitment. None of the students regretted getting the tattoo or plan to have it removed later in life.

The student with the flower explained her rationale for keeping the tattoo, saying, "They [my kids] might think it's cool to have a mom with a tattoo." She added that when she is old, her friends will be old too, and they will "understand what our generation was about, and why I got the tattoo."

The student with the tree frog said that her favorite part about having the tattoo is when people try to peel it off because they don't think it is real.

"When they figure it out, they always ask 'What are you going to do when you get old?' like I haven't thought about it until they asked!"

Whatever the design, whatever the reason, getting a tattoo involves more than having the money and the desire for one. Amateur tattooing, with hot needles, knives, or other non-hygenic paraphenalia, is a dangerous and risky practice. All tattoos should be done by licensed professionals and cleaned regularly after the initial procedure to prevent infection.

With a sound that combines classical music with a rock and roll attitude, played to a guitar and violin, Robert Spates (left) and Peter Fields create a unique sound on stage. Having successfully toured France in 1990, where their length of stay was doubled due to their increasing popularity, Whiskey Tango returned to Europe in 1991 for a televised performance. Writer works up a storm

Leslea Newman, writer and activist, will give a series of event Apr. 12-13 dealing with her work as a writer and life as a Jewish women's activist.

BY NICOLE COBBAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Media attention has recently focused on writer Leslea Newman. Her book Heather Has Two Mommies was the center of the controversy over teaching homosexuality in the classroom just months ago. The renowed author and activist joins the Bucknell community next week, April 12-13, to conduct a series of discussions, workshops, and readings centered around women's issues.

On Monday, April 12, Newman will give a workshop titled "Somebody to Love." Designed to help women learn to accept their bodies and foster positive body images through writing exercises, "Somebody to Love" will take place at 4 p.m. in the Elaine Langone Center Walls Lounge.

The workshop is based on her book Somebody to Love: A Guide to Loving the Body You Have, a self-help book that contains both writing exercises and an anthology of women's writing on issues about food, eating, and their bodies.

In one exercise, readers are asked to imagine their mothers eating a meal, and write a detailed account of that meal and their mothers' emotions toward it. Another has readers writing a monologue from the point of view of a part of their body they dislike. The exercises are sometimes shocking, sometimes revealing, but, according to critics, ultimately helpful.

"[Newman's] sensibility combined with the potency and insight of the exercises makes Somebody to Love very useful and very, very important," said Robin Berstein of The Jewish Weekly News. "This book will change many women's lives."

At 7 p.m. on Monday, Newman will give selected readings from her 12 novels. Her works range in style from poetry, short fiction, novels, anthologies, to self-help guides, reflecting themes of Jewish heritage, feminist values, and sexual identity.

On Tuesday, April 13, Newman will give a presentation on children's literature for the EN109C Children's Literature class. Newman will discuss issues of inclusivity of homosexual lifestyles in school curriculums as well as some of her own work, Heather Has Two Mommies, and Gloria Goes to Gay Pride, which have been at the center of debates concerning the appropriate content for school curriculums and library holdings. The class will meet at 9:30 a.m. in the Elaine Langone Center Walls Lounge.

The controversy over Newman's works stems mainly from the issues they address. Supportive of non-traditional families, Heather Has Two Mommies portrays a lesbian couple who decide to have a child, Heather, who realizes one day at school that her family isn't like everyone else's. Heather receives reassurance from her teacher who tells her that "the most important thing about a family is that all the people in it love each other."

Gloria Goes to Gay Pride tells the story of a girl and her two mothers as they take part in Gay Pride Day by marching in a parade, greeting friends, and buying each other presents. To Gloria, Gay Pride Day holds the rank of being one of her favorite holidays, along with Mother's Day and Chanukah.

Tuesday afternoon Newman will hold a "Writers at Work" discussion on her approach to writing and strategies for using writing as a learning tool. Her talk will take place at 3 p.m. in the Elaine Langone Center, room 219.

A pioneer of women's literature, Newman offers a point of view not commonly heard. Her experience and opinions offer insite to her life as a Jewish women's activist and author.

The programs are co-sponsored by the Pennsylvania Humanities Council, the Student Lectureship Committee, the Race/Gender Resource Center, Hillel, the Gay, Lesbian, and Bisexual Concerns Office, FLAG&B, the Writing Center, and the Women's Resource Center.

"In those first undergraduate stories I managed to extract from Salinger a very cloying come-on and from the young Capote his gossamer vulnerability, and to imitate badly my Titan, Thomas Wolfe, at the extremes of self-pitying self-importance," wrote Roth. "Those stories were as naive as a student's can be."

Roth persisted, however, and continued writing for Et Cetera on a consistant basis. He also developed a close working relationship with Mildred Martin, an English professor who taught the rigorous senior seminar for English majors. The class would meet for three hours every Thursday, with students discussing or debating literary topics.

After graduating in 1954, Roth went on to receive his MA from the University of Chicago where he later taught English literature classes.

Roth published his first novel, Goodbye, Columbus, in 1959 to tremendous literary acclaim. Earning the National Book Award for fiction, Goodbye, Columbus was later made into an Oscar-winning movie.

Since then, Roth has published numerous novels, including Patrimony, published in 1991, and an autobiography published in 1988. The recipient of many awards, Roth won a Guggenheim Fellowship in 1959, was a Princeton Fellow on 1962, a Rockefeller Fellow in 1966, and was listed as one of the 100 outstanding members of the "Take Over Generation" by Life Magazine. In 1971 Bucknell awarded him the Distinguished Alumni Award and they made him an honorary doctor of literature in 1978.

Recognized as one of the leading contemporary American writers, Roth's latest novel, Operation Shylock, has received literary and critical praise as one of Roth's most powerful and intricate novels.

"[The] magic is amply displayed in Operation Shylock which, under the mysterious intensity of its inspirations, is painstakingly written as it is elaborately developed," wrote John Updike for The New Yorker. "Relentlessly honest, Roth recruits raw nerves, perhaps, because they make the fiercest soldiers in the battle of truth."

Roth is married to renowned Shakespearean actress Claire Bloom who conducted a workshop and performed a one-woman show last semester at Bucknell.

"My views have been formed not because of one organization, but because women here are more outspoken. They stand up for their rights," said Bartlett.

"Speakers and proper marketing venues are effective," said Wachter.

When Feminism is discussed in a context where men are present, the question of whether men can ever be Feminists, and/or should call themselves Feminists often arises. One view holds that men can be Feminists because they have enough contact with women (i.e. mothers, sisters etc.), and they should respect and aid in women's fights for their fundamental rights. On the other hand, many Feminists believe men cannot be Feminists because they will never experience the sort of oppression that is the basis of Feminist understanding.

One reaction by men to Feminism has been the creation of various "men's movements." These come from a variety of contexts and represent different interests. There are men's groups to reclaim sensitivity, which has been dulled and denied by socialization; some men choose to be celibate, to reduce acts of sexual violence against women; there are groups of men who work to educate people about violence against women; and there are men who oppose the movement through a variety of tactics.

College is a setting in which men often define masculinity for themselves. As men at Bucknell, we have an opportunity to explore what this means from a Feminist perspective in an academic atmosphere. Because Feminism is one of the important movements happening in the world today, and because it affects all of us (either consciously or subconsciously), men should give Feminism the merit it deserves.

Step. A relatively commonplace word with a relatively simple meaning in the context of everyday life, but for the brothers of Kappa Alpha Psi, the word entails a complex and rhythmic dance, part of a long-standing legacy of black fraternities and sororities and deeply rooted in African tradition.

Six brothers from Bucknell Xi Kappa chapter of Kappa Alpha Psi Fraternity, Inc., in addition to a step team from Penn State's Kappa Rho Chapter of Sigma Gamma Rho Sorority, Inc., performed in Davis Gym on Saturday, Apr. 3 in the second annual Bucknell Invitational Step Competition, a philanthropic event to benefit the NAACP and the United Negro College Fund.

Larnie Booker '93, a member of Bucknell's six-man team, was participating in his fourth show since his initiation and Step Show debut in the spring of 1991.

"Stepping is unique to Bucknell in that most have not experienced it," said Booker, speaking of the art's roots in African tribal dances and its meaning to those involved in it. "it's a chance for us to display some of our traditions and talents to the rest of the campus."

The Xi Kappa Chapter step team is lead by Stepmaster Terence Riley '94, and performs annually to raise needed funds. The event is a rare opportunity for a fraternity chapter with only seven brothers to host a large fund-raiser, celebrate the end of a busy year, and enjoy itself. This year's performance marked the second consecutive year that the Kappa Alpha Psi was joined by the members of Sigma Gamma Rho for the occasion.

The traditional form of stepping includes using the hands, feet and voices to create the rhythm and sustain the beat throughout the performance. However, Kappa Alpha Psi strays from the norm a bit in that they use canes as an integral part of their show. The brothers have become synonymous with the creative and unconventional use of the canes, using it to twirl, pass and help create the beat rather than simply holding it under the arm while stepping in synchronization as had been their previous tradition. Other fraternities and sororities have also used the staff as a component of the dance.

The art of stepping, since being adapted in America from African Tribal Tradition, reached its recognition through black fraternities and sororities, and since then has been almost exclusively associated with them, with the exception of a few splinter groups in high schools and communities. Through these organizations it is achieving greater attention and popularity, so much so that national competitions have begun to take place. The Bucknell performance was also intended to be a competition, but not enough interest by other fraternities and sororities was expressed, and the switch to an exhibition was made.

Booker expressed the group's thanks to the Bucknell community for its support of the event in purchasing 250 tickets although only 190 were in attendance, indicating a clear interest in the support of the chapter and its chosen philanthropies on the part of the students and faculty.

The step show presents those in Lewisburg with an excellent opportunity to experience the essence of the tradition first hand and creates a window through which to view the long-standing ties of many of Bucknell's black students to their African heritage. The dance itself is a valuable cultural experience and provides for an entertaining evening, while supporting important and necessary charities. Through student support, the experience of stepping at Bucknell can enjoy a long and prosperous future.

topic...the Jews." Since the ranters bat Jewish stereotypes around with reckless abandon, the book may provoke more indignation than anything Roth has written since Portnoy's Complaint. It will be said that Roth is trying to extract comedy from bigotry and other life-and-death matters. In fact, the harangues, which tend to cancel one another out, constitute a serious enough inquiry into the Arab-Israeli moral stalemate and the hazards of Jewish powerlessness and power. It's also true that Roth is trying to extract comedy from bigotry and other life-and-death matters. He begins with his own, presumably unembellished, life-and-death matter, a suicidal depression caused by the sleeping pill Halcion. Fate itself is the comedian, dangling before our illusory noses the illusions that we chase: "What is the real life of man? There is none. There is only the urge to attain a real life...No, a man's character isn't his fate; a man's fate is the joke that his life plays on his character." The joke sometimes gets lost in Roth's characteristic fictional hall of mirrors, but it's still a pretty good one. B+

Lesbian Feminism: 'Her'story and ideas

AMANDA SWARR

Lesbian Feminism is a radical political ideology constructed in opposition to the institutions of patriarchy and heterosexuality. In the late 1960s, Lesbian Feminists created this movement as a subsection of the Feminist movement out of a need to bring issues of sexual orientation to the forefront of the movement.

The parallels of heterosexism (the assumption that all people are heterosexual) and homophobia (the fear and hatred of Lesbians, Gays, and Bisexuals) to sexism are all based on the assumption of gender roles. The confines of gender roles, traditional feminine and masculine heterosexual roles, are used to oppress women. Lesbian Feminists support the belief that derogatory terms and images promoted by the media are used to frighten women into taking a less militant stand on issues of sexism relevant to all women, which thus allow Feminists to be defined by the male culture.

In what became an initiation to action for many Lesbian Feminists, the New York Radicalesbians presented some of the first documented Lesbian Feminist theory in a 1970 paper entitled "The Woman-Identified Woman." They stated: "A lesbian is the rage of all women condensed to the point of explosion" In theoretical works, Lesbian Feminists demonstrate that institutions that oppress women are based on the assumption that women should support the efforts of men over their own needs; for example, the family, the workplace, the educational system, the media, and various religions are patriarchal institutions that are grounded in heterosexuality. Lesbian Feminists argue that if everyone can love people of either sex, male supremacy cannot last.

Lesbian Feminists believe that until women see themselves as able to love other women sexually, they will be denying themselves the love and value that they accord to men, affirming their second-class status. Most Lesbian Feminists hold up Lesbians as model Feminists fighting patriarchy, and believe that intimate Lesbian relationships with women are the only ones which can be truly equal in a patriarchal society.

Another groundbreaking theoretical work for Lesbian Feminists was Adrienne Rich's treatise "Compulsory Heterosexuality and Lesbian Existence," published in 1980. "Compulsory heterosexuality" is Rich's term for the social power of heterosexuality, and she states that the visible devices used to enforce heterosexuality "range from literal physical enslavement to the disguising and distortion of possible options."

Rich sees Lesbianism as a continuum which should be a part of all women's emotional (and possibly intimate) lives, including the exploration of Lesbian herstory and culture; in her words, denial of the "enforcement of heterosexuality as a means of assuring the conventional male right of physical, economically, and emotional access to women"

Some Lesbian Feminists embrace the radical and controversial idea of political Lesbianism. Sexuality is the fundamental oppression of men over women, both physically and symbolically through the act of the oppressor entering the oppressed by penetrating. The idea of political Lesbianism confronts heterosexuality, especially within Feminism, as a reactionary mechanism of the patriarchy.

According to the Leeds Revolutionary Feminists: "a political lesbian is a woman-identified woman who does not f__k men" (1980). These women believe that denial of men's access to sex is the only way to end the oppression of Lesbian, Bisexual, and Heterosexual women. Lesbian Feminists who support political Lesbianism state that: "giving up f__king for a feminist is taking your politics seriously" (1980).

Lesbians have a different sense of reality from heterosexual Feminists, and can, therefore, reveal the extremity of heterosexual privilege.

Tired of patriarchy, try liberal feminism

BY MEGAN CALLUS

Feminism is not a single static concept. Rather, it is a complicated and often paradoxical one which constantly seems to be in a state of transformation. Despite the challenges of defining feminist thought, a brief overview of the history and contemporary understandings of liberal feminism gives insight into one aspect of the movement.

Liberal feminism began with the liberal theory that emphasized the capacity of all human beings to reason. Therefore if women are not biologically inferior to men and that women have the same intellectual capacity as men, women deserve the same rights and opportunities.

Mary Wollstonecraft, who was a major advocate of this theory in the eighteenth century, argued that society owed girls the same education as boys simply because all persons have equal rights to develop their potentials so they can achieve what they want. In the nineteenth century, liberal feminists went beyond Wollstonecraft's arguments to state that society must also provide women with the same civil liberties and economic opportunities as men. They taught that women should not be treated as the property of their husbands or appendages to men, but as independent decision-makers who exist for themselves and deserve every opportunity to make their own choices.

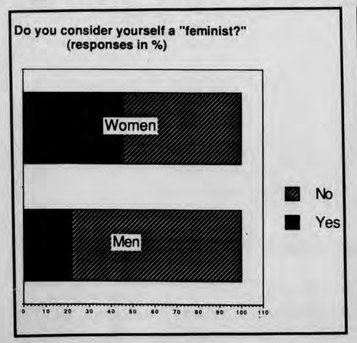
The goal of contemporary liberal feminist thought continues to be sexual equality. Liberal feminists wish to free women from oppressive gender roles. According to Jane English, gender roles are "the patterns of behavior which the two sexes are socialized, encouraged, or coerced into adopting, ranging from 'sex-appropriate' personalities to interests and professions." In other words, boys are socialized to be masculine—rational, independent, and aggressive; girls are socialized to be feminine—emotional, nurturing, and passive.

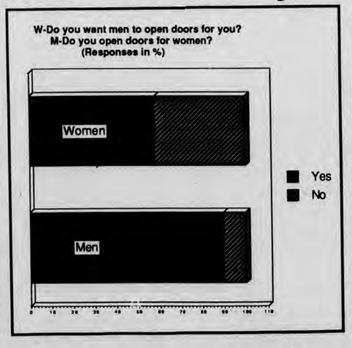
Because of these gender stereotypes in our society, women are considered capable only of certain occupations—such as teaching or nursing—not governing or heading corporations. For example, when faced with a male or female candidate, many voters choose the male based on the belief that women are too emotional to handle the pressures of government or to make adequate decisions. Until these stereotypes are eliminated, they can continue to be used to justify discrimination against women.

Although highly valuable to the women's movement, liberal feminist thought has been severely criticized. One of the most recent critiques made has been against its attempts to make women 'male clones'; an attempt to accept male values as human values (values which are dominated by the hierarchical and dualistic vision of the world that has led to the devaluation of women, people of color, the poor, the environment, etc.). If women are continued to be told to mimic male behaviors instead of respecting and perpetuating the characteristics and occupations associated with womanhood, a patriarchal society can never be transformed into one which accepts women's own strengths and abilities.

Liberal feminist thought also argues that through will, effort, and determination, women can advance to the same ranks as men. This does not take into account that men tend to dominate the power structures of our society, such as law, government, and business. On a simpler level, men generally are in charge of hiring, promoting, and legislating. Liberal feminism fails to consider how difficult it would be for women to gain equal access and power without making major structural changes within the public and private realm. By convincing women that through effort and strength they can make it in the male world, liberal feminism often ignores the need to challenge the patriarchal system itself.

What do Bucknellians have to say?





Data was obtained through a telephone survey taken on April 5, 6, and 7. 100 Bucknell University's males and females were randomly selected to answer a survey of 12 yes-and-no and short response questions. The poll is by no means an official representation of campus views; rather, it is meant to give readers an idea of the general sentiment on campus. The survey was conducted by Kate Fink '93, Colleen Rush '95, Krissy Schurr '95, and Susan Smith '93.

Feminists on campus take advantage of all opportunities to express their views. Whether it be through an on-campus "Take Back The Night" march, sponsoring guest speakers, Chalk Talk on the quad sidewalks; or a debate in the classroom, the increasing Feminist presence on campus is felt in some way or another. Left, students united to protest in the 'Domino Demonstration' on December 6, 1991. The demonstration was in response to the 'Montreal Massacre' in which one man shot and killed several women simply because he had become frustrated with feminists. Feminists across the United States came together to demonstrate against the brutality. The protests were called 'Domino Demonstrations' because feminists felt that it was these relatively smaller-scale acts which served to most disempower the feminist movement, as well as more deeply entrench the societal view that men naturally dominate women. If allowed to continue unchecked, these acts of male aggression toward women would ultimately have the power to subjugate women even further under a patriarchal rule.

If you call yourself a feminist, do you...?

Who are feminists, what do they believe, how do they want to change the world, and can you be one too?

BY SUSAN SMITH
Bucknellian Staff Writer

During the sexual revolution of the late '60's and early '70's, a new "F" word took place of the old one. While sex became a subject of open discussion, feminism took on evil connotations and an air of mystery and the forbidden. It was discussed either in hushed or harsh tones, due almost certainly to its uncertainty.

Those who were against the movement seemed to know more about what it meant to be a feminist than those who claimed the label. During the surging second wave of feminism, anti-feminists had a distinct set of stereotypes ready to draw upon; those really involved couldn't even agree on a mission statement.

The same debates (and more) about what feminism really is still shake the movement today, much as they did back in the '60's. As more women join, the same questions are asked, which is part of the frustration. Over and over, as women begin to see one reason for liking the movement they begin to question other aspects of it, and wonder aloud, "Is feminism about wanting to be the same as men?" "Does it mean that women want a unisex world?" "Do I have to be a working woman to be a feminist?" "Is the movement for black women as well as white?" "Do I have to stop liking men to join?"

The big debate: Sameness vs. Difference

Do women deserve equal rights because they are the same as men or because they are different, both biologically and mentally?

This debate has raged since the days of suffrage. In the late 1800's and early 1900's, when early feminists were working to secure their right to vote, they were asked why they deserved this privilege. Many felt that it was because women are equal to men. These feminists knew that they were as smart as men and that they could make intelligent decisions about who could run the country as well as their husbands. Other feminists countered and said that women should be given the vote because of their different abilities. Women, due to biological differences, were more rational. They were more nurturing and communicative and therefore could better decide what would be best for the country and their young children at home who would inherit it.

Biological strife surfaced again when the debate raged over protective labor laws. Some women felt that females should be shielded from working long hours at physically demanding jobs due to their biological differences, which they believed included weakness. Some didn't want unborn children endangered by the jobs that might be too physically difficult, as doctors in the 1920's believed that pregnant women couldn't even lift a typewriter without hurting themselves. Because these more physically demanding jobs paid well and provided greater opportunity to climb the corporate ladder, other women balked. They argued that some female workers had already borne children and were no longer at risk, or, more frightening to the opposition, which was mainly male, they didn't care to have children, but wanted to make a career out of working men's jobs. These women felt that they should have equal opportunity because, by eliminating the function of the womb, they were essentially the same as men.

Today, the sameness/difference debate still revolves around reproductive issues, but focuses more upon responsibility. The fire is often fueled by the abortion debate, which asks, "Who should be in charge of a woman's body?" Often asked as a side question—but one that made every newspaper during the nomination and rejection of two female possibilities for Attorney General, is, "Who is in charge of the baby once it is born?" Should childcare be shared, since it took two to create the offspring, or should the woman, who physically bore the child, be responsible for looking after it?

> ERA: Equality of rights under the law shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any state on account of sex.

Feminists would question and ask, "If women are responsible for caring for the child because they are biologically equipped to do so, then why aren't they also in charge about deciding whether or not to bear the responsibility?"

Zoe Baird and Kimba Wood, the two failed nominees for Attorney General—were both questioned about and rejected because of the undocumented workers that they hired to care for their children. Feminists rallied around these women and questioned the judgment of the Senate about the decision, due to the responsibility issue. NOW and other feminist organizations asked, "Weren't Baird's and Wood's husbands just as responsible for hiring the nannies? Why has no male nominee for Attorney General, Supreme Court Justice, or Congress, ever been questioned about who cared for his children?"

This leads to another essential debate of the movement...

Purpose: Promotion of women or Equality to men

Are feminists working to help women achieve personal fulfillment by making them equal beings to men, or are they promoting women as a separate and different sect of society?

While many people, both male and female, understand why and agree that a woman should earn the same salary as a man for accomplishing the same work, many question the purpose and value of women's bookstores, women's studies at universities, and women's resource centers. Those questioning ask, "Doesn't this defeat the move toward equality?" They often think that women are pushing their quest too far and "trying to take over."

Many feminist women, but not all (as no one in the movement can agree on any one issue except for the need of change from male domination) claim that women's resource centers and special courses such as women's history are needed to educate and speed along the process of equality. Men and women need to learn about the achievements and contributions of women that have been buried or left out of history for decades. Women's leadership conferences need to be held to teach women the skills and attitude that society instills in men from birth onward. Woman-oriented books must also be written to educate and enlighten those who are still questioning their abilities and potential roles. All of these opportunities help women to become more equal.

Other feminists feel that women need these special supports because women are different than men. These feminists want these differences heralded and promoted. They want women's ways of looking at the world legitimized. They want to push past equality into a totally new world of relationships and roles between men and women. One change that they push is consensus leadership.

Ways to break into the male world: Consensus vs. hierarchical leadership

It's a world led by white, upper-middle class men and it's time to change it say feminists. But how? Should women try to work for change within the system or come in from the outside through a different, non-traditional approach?

Studies have proven that women lead differently than men. While men tend to want to dominate even each other and generally believe in "power over," women believe leadership means having the "power to." This means that women aren't as concerned about who is in charge, but rather what is getting accomplished.

Therefore, in many women's groups, the format of consensus leadership, has emerged. With consensus leadership, no one is inherently in charge and everyone's voice is heard.

While some larger companies have adopted this style, most organizations dominated by males have not. Should females drop their new approach to leadership when trying to thrust into the male world of business, law and politics? Some feminists would answer yes; others no. Some feminists believe in quietly, but firmly increasing their numbers in the top rung by working within the prevailing male system; others regard this as giving in and insist on bombarding "the system" and demanding outright, on-the-spot compensation and change.

So who can rightly be called a feminist—anyone who believes in the equality of women?

Many women of color, lesbians, men, and newcomers to the movement might disagree, as the movement doesn't always seem all-inclusive.

Ironically enough, the feminist surge of the sixties actually started as a tag along to the civil rights movement. Many college-aged and educated women spent their summers involved in the equalization of rights for blacks. Soon, these women began to realize that they weren't even entitled to those rights for which they were campaigning for others.

Whether the rift between white women and women of color (black, Indian, Latino) started on the Senate floor, Strom Thurmond tagged the ERA onto a segragation act, or is part of the college-educated, upper-middle class attitude that many critics say precludes the movement, feelings of exclusion exist. Some women of color wonder if their different needs can be included in the agenda of the movement. Others feel that they need to work towards the end of oppression of their own races first.

Lesbians also wonder if their special needs will be promoted by the women's movement or if more "mainstream" feminists just view them as deterents to gaining popularity and solidarity. For years, the opposition tried to scare women from joining the movement by insinuating that if they did, they would become man-hating lesbians. Thus lesbians have often been nudged out of the limelight and forefront of the movement.

Men who haven't undergone the oppression of women wonder if without that experience, they can call themselves feminists. Many women would say no, that it is a women's movement. Others would invite fathers, brothers, husbands, boyfriends, and all other males who support women gaining equal rights to join the cause and take on the name.

This is all very confusing to newcomers to the movement, who, spurred to join because of unequal pay at work, an abusive husband, discrimination at law school, growing self-esteem, or quite likely the omening presence of all those men judging at the Anita Hill/Clarence Thomas sexual harassment hearings, are just full of questions. These uneducated but desirous women are often made to feel unwelcome by older members of the movement. While it may seem that it is their naiveté that bothers the older members, often it is just a lack of outright appreciation since twenty-year olds often take their rights for granted. They often do not realize that two decades ago women fought not only to work, but to wear pants on the job, not to be fired upon becoming pregnant or gaining five pounds in the airline industry and not to be discriminated against educationally.

The ERA—What it comes down to

While not every feminist fights for the passage of the ERA, just about every woman in the movement believes in what it stands for. Whether it be a lesbian feminist fighting for insurance coverage for one's lover, an eco-feminist working toward a reproductively-sound environment, or a feminist homemaker desiring recognition for her contributions to society, all types believe that "Equality of rights under the law shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any state on account of sex."

Catch one of the feminist waves

First wave of feminism: the radical movement

BY AMY A. DURGAN

Although the radical feminist movement cannot be confined to a set of homogeneous beliefs and theories, or can be done justice in such a small space, the revolutionary movement has an historical context along with basic principles.

In 1967, groups of women came together in reaction to being treated as second class citizens within both the civil rights movement and anti-war political activities of the 1960s. They realized, through the contempt expressed by male members of the "New Left," that a socialist revolution would not bring about women's liberation. They rejected both the gynephobic attitudes prevalent in male radical organizations and also the groups' undemocratic organizational structure, and pointed out instead that patriarchy was at the root of women's oppression and that feminism must be the basis of any revolutionary change.

Radical feminism rejected the view that economic revolution alone would liberate women, as well as the liberal feminist idea that women's empowerment could be attained through their integration into a sexist, racist, and class-stratified society. They advocated that "the personal is political," and critiqued such issues as family, marriage, love, heterosexuality, and rape, claiming that relations between men and women are not simply issues of social custom or individual choice. The manifestation of male supremacy can be found in "law, tradition, economics, education, organized religion, science, language, the mass media, sexual morality, child rearing, the domestic division of labor, and everyday social interaction," said Alice Echols, author of Daring to be Bad.

Radical feminism, however, was not monolithic. Feminists within this movement disagreed on a number of questions, such as whether women's behavior was a result of conditioning or material necessity, whether so-called sexual liberation served the purpose of increasing women's sexual pleasure, or whether men's sexuality should be curbed, and whether radical feminism implied an emphasis on or a minimization of gender differences.

By 1975, cultural feminism had become more predominant than the radical feminist movement. Attention was turned away from opposing the patriarchy through political activism to opposing the patriarchy through concentrating on the individual and creating a female counterculture. As a result, cultural feminists focused on personal, rather than societal, transformation.

Although some argue that the movement has virtually disappeared, the effects of the 60's and 70's remain. Because they fought for economic and legal reform for women, defended a woman's right to control her fertility, denounced homophobia and heterosexism, deconstructed the myth of women as either "good" girls or "bad" girls, and spoke out as women of color and first raised issues of racism within the feminist movement, the first wave of feminists have helped to transform the political and cultural climate in which we live.

The older generation

BY KATE FINK
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The second wave of the feminist movement, which began in approximately the late 1960's, was an outgrowth of the civil rights movement. At this time, women were more educated and white middle class women were seen in the workforce more than ever before. This time period raised their consciousness that they were deserving of the same kind of rights as any white male.

The activists were mostly white, middle class women, who took advantage of the organizations and networks already existing from the women's movement of prior periods to spread their new vision.

The prominent philosophy held by the second wavers was based on "essentialism," the belief that women and men are biologically different and that these differences determine a need for each sex to be considered fundamentally different in day-to-day activities. They pushed for changes to be made so that the needs of women would be accommodated, instead of continuing with the method of accommodating men and requiring women to meet their needs by adjusting.

The movement caused an investigation of college curricula, which revealed that women were left out. Psychology was based solely on experiments using men, history focused on the accomplishments of men, and literature studied mostly male authors. Women's studies programs were subsequently added, which took women's culture into consideration. It accommodated the differing ways that women are able to learn math, it studied women and biology, and it brought into light historical accomplishments of successful women.

Prominent figures of the second wave were Betty Friedan, who wrote The Feminine Mystique, the landmark, controversial book that inspired women to fight for their rights; Robin Morgan, who wrote an anthology of feminist writing, Sisterhood is Powerful; June Sordan, a black poet; Audre Lorde, a black lesbian socialist poet; and Mary Daly, an authority on religion.

Toward the mid-1980's, the movement began to be overshadowed by the third wave of feminism, which attacked essentialism and proposed that gender differences are socially rather than biologically constructed. However, the third wave is neither a contradiction of nor a stepwise progression from the second wave. Instead, the second wave served as a basis of inspiration for women to think about their situation, to intellectualize it, and to debate it so that their needs could best be considered and met. Thus, the third wave arose out of the transformation of consciousness brought about by the second wave.

Although many young people have joined in the third wave, the views of the second wave are still held by many. Some of the second wave activists have "burned out" because they kept the same arguments that they had in the 60's. But these individuals have not caused a death in the wave since many young people are doing research on second wave beliefs today.

The new generation: Third Wavers

BY CARRIE WULLEN

The third wave of feminism, a young multi-racial feminist movement that pays equal attention to civil rights, is presently at an infant stage of development—a state of becoming. The young women and men becoming part of the third wave, in reclaiming feminism for our generation, are in the process of defining the movement.

Third Wavers confront issues such as homophobia, racism, reproductive rights, and environmental degradation from a feminist perspective. They focus on the need for the women's movement to become multi-racial, multi-cultural, and multi-sexual—a level of inclusivity that the first- and second-wave feminism failed to reach.

The second wave was derided as a white woman's movement, given that most activists were white and middle class. The white heterosexual middle class woman was taken as the female norm. Because white feminists ignored issues of race and class, many women of color felt excluded from the second wave.

Rebecca Walker is one of the most prominent young feminist voices in this movement. She recently spoke at Bucknell about her new national organization entitled the "Third Wave." Walker, the 22-year-old Ms. Magazine contributing editor and daughter of writer Alice Walker, co-founded the Third Wave for young people dedicated to social activism and women's empowerment. Walker envisions the Third Wave as the culmination of many concentric circles defining themselves. She hopes that the Third Wave will serve as an inspiration for many new groups to organize around specific problems.

Members of the Third Wave have already made visible progress. They organized the Freedom Summer '92, a national youth voter-registration compaign. This bus caravan of young activists traveled across the country to register more than 20,000 new voters.' Future plans for the Third Wave include the publication of an anthology of young women writers, which is all about networking and "utilizing the energy of young women nationwide."

The crux of Third Wave activity pushes for people to act and to "make sure that our acts have a visible impact." Young women are realizing that it has become time to take their turn to become involved and to make a difference.

If you would like to become a part of the national Third Wave organization, write to: 209 E. 51st St.#315, New York, NY 10022, or call 212-338-8126.

Dispelling the 'Beauty Myth'

BY DANALYN ADAMS
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Slim-Fast, Nutri-System, Weight Watchers, Living-Well Lady, Bally's Jack LaLanne, Gold's Gym...The prescription "Watch your weight, eat right, and exercise," has become a national compulsion and a national creed. The quest for a fit, fat-free body has become an American obsession. The compulsion has manifested itself through the popular press, which, in turn, has negatively affected the vulnerable and impressionable youth—girls and young women in particular.

The obsession has spawned a multi-billion dollar industry which continues to expand yearly. It has triggered an upheaval in America's lifestyle that affects social relationships, festivities, and leisure activities. Attitudes about the body have been altered and society has been seduced into allowing these body attitudes to profoundly affect judgments about the character of others. The compulsion has totally disrupted a private and formerly very pleasurable necessity called eating. The youth of today are faced with the backlash of the media epidemic which emphasizes the necessity of a perfect body. As a result, increasing numbers of eating disorders are emerging, threatening the physical and emotional welfare of the younger generations.

A 1991 national bestseller, The Beauty Myth, by Naomi Wolf, a staunch feminist, expounds upon the notion that images of beauty are used against women. Wolf contends that "beauty" is a currency system similar to the gold standard. Like any economy, it is determined by the political arena, and in contemporary western society it is the most efficient belief system which maintains male dominance. By assigning value to women in a vertical hierarchy according to a culturally imposed physical standard, it is an expression of male power in which women must unnaturally compete for resources that men have appropriated for themselves.

Wolf argues that "beauty" is not universal or changeless, though the West pretends that all ideals of female beauty stem from the popularized "Ideal Woman." The beauty myth is actually not about women at all; it is about men's institutions and institutional power. Competition between women has been incorporated into the myth so that women will be divided from one another, dramatically reducing the power of the female in the modern era.

Since the Industrial Revolution, western women have been controlled by media ideals and stereotypes. Wolf believes that the current beauty myth has been summoned out of political fear on the part of male-dominated institutions threatened by women's freedom, and that it exploits female anxiety and apprehension regarding sexual liberation (begun in the 1970's) fears that females may be going too far in the pursuit of equality. Powerful industries—the $33 billion-a-year diet industry, the $20 billion cosmetics industry, the $300 million cosmetic surgery industry, and the $7 billion pornography industry—have emerged from the capital derived from female anxieties and perpetuate the contemporary beauty myth. Wolf holds that the contemporary economy depends on the representation of women within the beauty myth.

In The Beauty Myth, Wolf reports on the devalued female in the societal arenas of work, culture, religion, sex, violence, and hunger. Wolf suffered from anorexia nervosa, the self-starving disease, as an adolescent. Compulsiveness about the food women eat and the bodies they put it into have turned eating disorders into a national epidemic. Wolf reports that 90 to 95 percent of anorexics and bulimics (binge and purge) are women. The American Anorexia and Bulimia Association states that anorexia and bulimia strike one million American women each year. According to the Association, 150,000 American women die of anorexia alone every year. The anorexic patient is thinner than were the previous generation of patients. Anorexia began as a middle-class disease in the United States and has gradually spread eastward, as well as down the social ladder, to a broader range of age groups, and even to men.

It is evident that the incidence of eating disorders has risen dramatically in the last 20 years. Food, weights, diets, and exercise dominate the thoughts and conversations of females, as they dominate the magazines, television programs. Even the beauty and health advice in the mainstream press and in other cultural authorities push the importance of being thin. These cultural authorities include the health industry, employers, teachers, parents, the federal government, and even religious leaders.

Women's judgments are primarily shaped by larger cultural values and concerns. The entire culture has placed paramount importance on the ability to control appetite and body size. The fashion industries and advertisers proclaim that slim and fit are beautiful, while fat and flabby are ugly. One recent study showed that 25 years ago, the average model weighed eight percent less than the average American woman. Today, the average model is twenty-three percent below the average weight, and American women everywhere want to look just like her.

Naomi Wolf's The Beauty Myth raised a number of intriguing perspectives regarding the plight of women in today's society. College women have been especially affected by mass cultural influences. On the average, one woman in five on a college campus is anorexic. Furthermore, 20% of American college women binge and purge on a regular basis.

Definitions of beauty undermine women in their professions; culture alienates women from their own bodies and sexuality. Women really have little choice concerning their obsession with appearance. Placing so huge an emphasis on appearance has resulted in females entertaining rigid and distorted beliefs about health and beauty. Women believe that their choices are thinness or fatness, gluttony or starvation, exercise or lethargy, beauty or ugliness. It has been easily forgotten that there exists a middle ground, one much more likely to promote happy, healthy, and productive lives—moderation. Moderation in diet and exercise is the key which will open the gate to women's freedom of choice regarding their bodily appearance and promote a healthier state of mind.

Feminism's place in men's lives

BY JOEL WAINWRIGHT

Why do women earn less than men for equivalent work? Why do women lack fundamental reproductive rights? Why are women forced to avoid certain situations because of the threat of rape?

It is easier to list the issues that Feminism addresses than to define Feminism as one would define an ideology. Some men say they misunderstand Feminism because it is so undefined, but many women feel that this is one of Feminism's strengths.

Regardless of the lack of a strict definition, one fact remains clear: Feminism means change. Because Feminists challenge gender roles and the privileges which men have been afforded by the institution of patriarchy, Feminism promises changes for both women and men.

Naturally, the prospect of a different world inspires people to react in different ways, depending on who they are and the context within which they act. Men's differing reactions to Feminism generally fall into thematic groups, ranging from nurturing and acceptance to opposition with violence.

Men at Bucknell, accordingly, have expressed a variety of viewpoints, although few were extreme enough to be considered "violent." Many say that the movement has enlightened them: "When I was growing up, males always had the more dominant role. But Bucknell made me more aware that everyone should have the same opportunities," said Norm Bartlett '93. Another man said, "I have definitely become more aware of the issues. I feel comfortable that they are brought forth. There is no question that they shouldn't."

Others are indifferent toward the movement. "I don't see men as having lots of power over women so it has had little effect. I respect women's rights to equality, but I always have," said one man. Alexi Makkas '93 agrees. "I have been exposed to more issues; it has educated me, but I haven't changed my behavior. I've never been discriminatory," he said.

Many men, however, express discontent with the methods that Feminists sometimes use to get their points across. Men who otherwise fully support the movement were reluctant to call themselves "feminists" because they do not want to be associated with the actions taken by those so labeled, which offend them. "The women's movement has had a negative impact, if any. It's difficult to accomplish anything when they shove things down your throat over and over again," said Makkas. "I lose respect for the movement when it is done through overbearing means."

"The movement is more radical here [at Bucknell]. I'm not intimidated by it, but sometimes I question how mature the tactics are," said Marc Wachter '95.

Jamie Diafaria '94 agreed, saying, "I don't like the male-bashing aspect of it at all. It's like a baseball game. You can cheer for your own team or against the other team. The women's movement seems to be setting out to rally against men. Women like Hillary Clinton have achieved status without making a lot of noise. I think that it can be done without so much negative energy."

In contrast, similar actions are supported by other men. Said Clay Burkle '94, "Chalk talk is good. That's what it's for, to express your views. It's a peaceful display of ideas."

"The movement seems to be peaceful around here. Chalk talk doesn't harm me," said Ty Rothermel '96. Nor do extreme measures bother another man, who said, "Usually extreme points of view are heard. That's what you have to do."

Most of the men said they supported feminists in expressing their views, but as Makkas stated, "People should be able to listen and make informed decisions for themselves."

"Its 'Educators' vs. 'Preachers'," said Gregg Dorr '93. "I think that more interactive sharing of ideas would be more beneficial. If I want to know, I'll ask about it and be receptive."

"My views have been formed not because of one organization, but because women here are more outspoken. They stand up for their rights," said Bartlett.

"Speakers and proper marketing venues are effective," said Wachter.

The voice of a new generation

Revolutions in traditional birth control

BY JOYCE DOLLINGER
Bucknellian Staff Writer

We live in a sexually-oriented world, and with sex on everyone's mind, women of our generation have grown up faced with the decision about which birth control to use. Today, medical technology has tried to make it easier for women to choose the right birth control, but new breakthroughs in contraceptive methods have increased confusion as well as options.

Depo-Provera is the first injectable contraceptive available to women. It was invented by the Upjohn Company, a worldwide human health care provider, and was released in January for use. A news release from the company stated that Depo-Provera is available for contraception in more than 90 countries, including Germany, Norway, Sweden, Belgium, France, the United Kingdom and New Zealand.

Depo-Provera is a prescription medication that provides protection for three months and is more than 99% effective. The Depo-Provera contraceptive injection inhibits the production of an egg in the ovary. Ovulation is triggered by signals from pituitary hormones in the brain. Sufficient levels of the hormone progesterone, either naturally or through Depo-Provera, interfere with the production of pituitary hormones, thus inhibiting ovulation.

However, Depo-Provera has many risks and side effects, some of which include irregular menstrual bleeding, bone mineral changes, cancer, accidental pregnancies, weight gain, headaches, nervousness, abdominal cramps, dizziness, weakness or fatigue, decreased sexual desire, leg cramps, nausea, vaginal discharge or irritation, breast swelling or tenderness, bloating, swelling of the hands or feet, backache, depression, insomnia, acne, pelvic pain, no hair growth or excessive hair loss, rashes, and hot flashes.

Also, according to the Depo-Provera physician information guide, there are certain people who should never use this injectable contraceptive such as those who might be pregnant, those who have cancer, stroke or blood clots in their legs, those who have liver problems, and those who might be allergic to Depo-Provera. Finally, women who use Depo-Provera must remember that a return to fertility will take some time after her use of the contraceptive.

Another birth control for women is Norplant, a contraceptive implant. Norplant is an effective, long-lasting, reversible birth control method that provides contraception for up to five years. Norplant was approved for use in the United States in 1991. It has also been used by over 500,000 women in 17 countries. In the United States, however, the capsules themselves cost $365, doctors fees cost up to $750, and removal costs are between $50-$150, while in other countries the same product costs around $100.

This contraceptive implant is inserted during a minor in-office surgical procedure that takes ten to 15 minutes. Using a local anesthetic, a doctor inserts six thin, flexible capsules just over one inch long in a fanlike pattern just under the skin of the inside part of the woman's upper arm. The capsules are made of Silastic, a soft rubber material, and filled with a synthetic reproduction of progestin. After the capsules are inserted and the arm healed, one can only slightly see the outline of the capsules. The capsules will not move or break, but patients must be careful not to bump the area or lift heavy objects with the arm that the capsules are in for some time after the procedure.

Contraception occurs as the capsules slowly release low doses of the hormone. The progestin in the capsules work the same way as oral contraceptives, preventing ovulation and causing the cervical mucus to thicken, making it difficult for sperm to penetrate. The contraceptive effect begins 24 hours after the insertion if inserted within the first seven days of the menstrual cycle.

Despite the convenience and ease of the procedure, Norplant is not without side effects. Irregular bleeding, headaches, nervousness, dizziness, acne, change in appetite, weight gain, enlargement of the ovaries, breast tenderness, inflammation of the skin, increased hair growth or hair loss, and discoloration of the skin over the capsules are all effects associated with this method of birth control.

Additionally, women who are possibly pregnant, who smoke, have liver disease, or experience unexplained vaginal bleeding, breast cancer, blood clots, or a have history of these symptoms should not use Norplant.

There has also been some controversy whether or not young women should or can use Norplant. There is a debate in the city of Baltimore about whether or not young women of high school age should be able to use Norplant. On Sunday, Mar. 7, 1993, The New York Times ran an article on Norplant for high school women. Opponents cited in the article said that Norplant is "social engineering aimed at the poor," while another said it is "a potential health hazard." But Taressa Collins, along with other teenage mothers who want to use the Norplant system, believe that "the whole debate ignores the reality of my whole existence." Collins, struggling against the fear that becoming pregnant would detour her dreams and ambitions as it had for so many women around her, was impressed by the simple fact of Norplant's longevity: Its five-year potency would enable her to finish high school and maybe even some college without getting pregnant again.

The last of the new female forms of birth control devices is the female condom. Unlike Depo-Provera and Norplant, the female condom guards from the spread of AIDS and sexually transmitted diseases. On the market today are three different female condoms. First is the Bikini Condom, created by International Prophylatics Inc., which resembles a G-string panty. It is made of latex that is twice as thick

TRUCKERS

We came back with a timid "hello" and a wave, not expecting anything else.

Hours later we were like "peas in a pod" with three of the truckers. We were the back door of one truck and the front door of another (A.K.A. - the rocking chair position). Our new friends Beaver Trapper, Goldfish, and Polar Bear gave us each a "handle." Jenn was named Shortstop and Michelle, riding shotgun, was given the name of Fireride. As we continued to talk to them for a while, they pleaded with us to stop for coffee with them. Initially, we did not even consider stopping, but we needed gas, so we cautiously accepted their offer. They did warn us they were ugly, but we had no clue as to the intensity of what we were about to see.

We met with them in the truck-stop restaurant and immediately felt out of place in our Bucknell sweatshirts. We sat and had a soda with our new- found friends, and as we were on our way out, walking in front of our buddies, Shortstop overheard Beaver Trapper say "boy I like the view from back here." We hoped for a quick getaway, but by the time we got back on the road, they were close behind us. We didn't even eat dinner because we were afraid to stop and have them ogle us.

As the night progressed, we continued to talk to our friends and become "edumacated" in trucker jargon.

But talking trucker trash is not easy. There is an art to every word that is spoken. For example, most people are aware that "10-4" is a common phrase among truckers, but many do not realize that the "r" is silent and it is actually pronounced "10-fo." The tow trucks became "dragon wagons," road crews became "flag wavin' taxis," car carriers became "parking lots," rigs with canopies were "covered wagons," undercover police cars were "plain wrappers," police cars with lights on the top were "candy coated," and rest areas were "pickle parks." Occasionally when a little four-wheeler (a car) would fly by, they would yell "bear bait!" and anxiously wait for the kill. We also learned that the highway was just like "a bowl of natural cereal; once you get past the fruits and the nuts, all you have left are the flakes to deal with." Every once in a while westbound traffic checked with east-bound traffic and vice versa to locate all of the "county mounties" and their "yard sticks."

So you're out there on the highway, listening to your CB, don't act like "you're goin' to Idaho with potatoes in your ears." Watch out for those candy coated and plain wrapper bears at the yard sticks...

These fine people are not just any kind of truck drivers. They called themselves "professional Accommodations, Transportation, Relocation Engineers" and they attend the University of American Highways to receive a B.S. in P.E. (Practical Experience). At 2 am and 1000 miles later, the truckers needed to make their first fill-up, so we decided to wait for them in the parking lot of the truck stop. Initially we were confused by the six undercover cop cars and the new female voices on the radio with names such as Temptation and Angel Eyes.

When one of our trucker friends came over to our car, he told us to park next to the police cars with our windows rolled up and our doors locked. We later found out that these women on the radio were not truckers, but rather "lot lizards," more commonly known as hookers. After the truckers finished fueling up their rigs, they met us by the exit. We were ready to go, but for some reason Beaver Trapper and Goldfish stopped their truck, got out, and approached our car with their hands behind their backs. We both looked at each other and said simultaneously, "ohhh...*!#@" Their first gesture was an invitation to view the inside of their truck—bunk included. We graciously declined and told them that we preferred to stay together (doors locked and windows rolled up). They were quick to apologize and then presented us with red roses (a truck stop special!). This made us feel obligated to stay with them for the remaining 15 hours of our trip.

Over time they even became very protective and were cautious about who could talk to us. When one trucker drove by and made the comment: "my, what a fine pair of seat covers in that cute little Escort!" they jokingly told the trucker that he needed to make a special appointment. Beaver Trapper wouldn't even tell some of the truckers where we were when they asked about the location of the sweet voices on the radio. As the night dragged on, they serenaded us with goofy songs, told us countless dirty blonde jokes, and ended every sentence with either darlin' or baby doll.

Along the way, we met more interesting people with creative names such as Thunder, Skyjockey, Daddy Long Legs, Tex Mex, Mountain Man, Flathead, Desperado, and Rattler, and the entire time we thought that J.B. Hunt was a carrier of tomato sauce.

Beaver Trapper remarked that "truckers may not be the most clean cut people, but we're regular people, even though we live half our lives on the road and in truck stops. Truckers may intimidate people because we don't look or act like the average person, but we're on the road to do our job, not to get every four-wheeler that pulls in front of us. If you listen to us long enough, you will find that we are actually "prophets" of the highway—we seem to know a little bit about everything."

It's such a big world out there. Being stuck in the Bucknell Bubble really made us think about what we're missing sometimes. There's a lot more to life than just Central PA. We learned more on the road during those 30 hours than we ever have or probably will learn in school.

So if you're out there on the highway, listening to your CB, don't act like "you're goin' to Idaho with potatoes in your ears." Watch out for those candy coated and plain wrapper bears at the yard sticks, realize that "deer" are actually 4-legged animals (and not slang for something else), don't pull out in front of the rigs on the down-hill slope, and if you are lucky enough to get a freeride with a truck or two, be prepared to put up with many dirty jokes and idle time in pickle parks while they complete their log books. Just be careful and aware that it may be a tearful goodbye when you go your separate ways...10-fo?

TICKET

As we neared the Virginia border my mighty vessel began to have problems. Not sure what to do when the car didn't go "vroom" when I stepped on the pedal, I did the only thing I could think of—I ate an apple and turned up the music. We made it to West Virginia before I finally realized that flame shooting out of the headlight was a bad thing. I pulled into a Unocal 76 truck stop. I got out to talk to a large man who smelled of burnt rubber and Aqua-Velva. He wore a blue pajama-looking jumpsuit with his name neatly embroidered on the left breast pocket. His name was Fud. I am not lying. I wouldn't lie to a police officer. I'm an honest boy.

Really.

Fud looked at me, sized me up to be a snot-nosed college boy driving one of those new-fangled imports that steal American jobs and that upon my death will certainly cause me to be sent to HELL for buying. He told me he couldn't be of any help.

A friendly truck driver wearing a nifty earth-tone flannel ensemble and a Bill's Bait and Tackle baseball hat ambled over to inquire about the nature of our dilemma. I explained that we were in quite the quandry since the car didn't move when I stepped on the accelerator. We agreed that this was a bad thing for a car to be doing and that it would greatly impede our trip. He then gestured over to the car and to the three people inside (one guy, two girls—all freshmen) and asked if they were my DATES. I told him no. that I'm a good Christian boy and I'm not into the group thing and we were just trying to get back to school. He had me rev the engine and concluded that the problem might be the clutch but was probably the fuel injection system. Apparently an unhappy fuel injector has a very distinctive sound to the properly trained ear. I figured that he must know what he was talking about since he drove a truck. He also said that if he saw us stranded on the highway he would give us a ride. I decided that we could make it 160 miles to school without a fuel injector or clutch and pulled out of the truck stop.

Approximately 11 feet down the highway my car informed me that a clutch and fuel injection system are even more important to a car's ability to operate than its stereo system and we coasted downhill to an "off" ramp, past a stop sign and into a Holiday Shopper mini-mart parking lot where the car's wheels sank into the mud. I suddenly realized that something had gone wrong in West Virginia (on the border between Falling Waters and Martinsburg, that is) and we just might not make it back to school in time to watch the CBS docudrama The Man With Three Wives. This REALLY upset me because I think polygamists are SO fascinating. This crushing revelation was followed by the fact that I don't know anything about West Virginia outside of it being mentioned along with "Mountain Mama" in a John Denver song and I sure didn't remember Denver ever singing about West Virgina Acura dealerships that were open on Sundays. By this time the freshmen were out of the car, making phone calls home and taking pictures of the local populace (who looked like character actors for Deliverance) and of me as I stared at the engine as if it were going to talk.

Of course this didn't happen, but I was not even considering calling home, because in an emergency I always believe that it is the best policy not to tell the parents until six months after the incident so no one has to worry and everyone can sit back and laugh over the whole thing.

Anyway, after speaking with some of the locals, we were able to learn three things: the number of the closest tow truck driver, that the closest Acura dealership to Martinsburg, WV is in Japan and, that the man with the WORLD'S LONGEST SIDEBURNS AND GOATEE HAIR lives in Martinsburg. I saw him.

It was scary.

I called the tow truck guy and he showed up less than half an hour later with what can only be described as The Mother of All Tow Trucks. With an engine the size of my car, two fuel tanks, a tractor beam and a custom paint job that said "Tow Hog" on the hood I knew we were dealing with the crème de la crème of the stranded vehicle rescue industry. Our tow truck driver, like Fud, wore a blue pajama-looking jumpsuit with his name neatly embroidered on the left breast pocket. His name was Doug but looked like his name should have been out "Wild Cherry" on the side panel.

At 10:30 we rolled into town (I have never been so thrilled to see the Susquehanna Mall before) and disentangled ourselves. As the freshmen limped off to their respective dorm rooms to call their parents and tell them about the lunatic sophomore who got them stranded, I dashed into the Elaine Langone Center for the Terminally Broke and tried to get WAY to much money from my MAC account. Soon I determined that none of the cash machines in town would give me money because of some dumb rule that say you can't take out more money than you have in your account. Doug would not take a personal check (smart kid) and soon I was being escorted around The 'Burg looking for a Credit Union (quick tip—there are not many businesses open late on a Sunday night in Buddy. Not wanting to spend the night in Martinsburg, and having no idea where I could get my car fixed there, I asked Doug how much it would cost to go all the way to Lewisburg (the BEST place to get repairs on an import, of course). He pulled out a pocket calculator to do the higher math and told me a very LARGE number which I accepted because I wanted to give the Martinsburg economy it's single largest injection of capital in the past 30 years and, more importantly, because I was feeling stupid.

Soon five people were crammed into the cab of the Tow Hog and I was getting to know everyone a lot more intimately than I would have preferred. Doug was pretty nice though and we kept up a steady patter of conversation for most of the trip and even stopped at McLewisburg) or possibly a high-stakes bingo game.

Anyway, after speaking with some of the locals, we were able to learn three things: the number of the closest tow truck driver, that the closest Acura dealership to Martinsburg, WV, is in Japan, and that the man with the WORLD'S LARGEST SIDEBURNS AND GOATEE HAIR lives in Martinsburg. I saw him.

We stopped at the Days Inn so I could try to cash a check through them. No luck. I then got the bright idea to call my roomate who fences stolen musical instruments, cars and pirated country music albums to see if he had any cash. Fresh out of guitars, Cadillacs and hillbilly music, he promptly organized an emergency bake sale, sold an old Pop-Tart for $100 to some girl from California and after breaking into every vending machine on campus, he came up with the money. I brought Doug up to my hall to meet everyone, because by now he was practically a celebrity.

Down in the parking lot, I had Doug unload the car in the most open area so he would have room to maneuver the Tow Hog. I couldn't even back it up to get it all the way into the spot. This brings us full circle to the issue of my parking tickets. You remember the tickets don't you? That's what this is all about. I don't blame you for ticketing me. How could you have known about what went wrong in West Virginia? All I ask is that I don't have to pay the parking tickets since I took the only place that had space enough for the Tow Hog to unload the car. And since the car is as dead as Dan Quayle's political career, I couldn't move it anywhere—even to turn it so it wouldn't be backed in. But if it is inconveniencing anyone, the University is more than welcome to hire a tow truck to move the car to a better location. In fact, I have a number you can call...

Gallery Series presents Layne Redmond and The Mob of Angels in "Ritual Offering"

BY NICOLE PANICO
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Angels have descended on Bucknell armed not with harps, but drums. Layne Redmond and The Mob of Angels will appear at Bucknell in the Gallery Series program "Ritual Offering" at 8 p.m. on Tuesday, April 13. The performance will be held in the Elaine Langone Center Gallery and is free and open to the public.

The Mob of Angels, a women's drumming ensemble directed, composed, and led by Redmond, revives the ancient Mediterranean tradition of women's ceremonial drumming and ritual celebrations.

Redmond plays the frame drum, a light portable hand drum based on the design of a grain sieve, one of the oldest known instruments. The instrument "creates a contemporary music that pulses with the rhythms of an archaic language." According to Redmond, her work is "a non-traditional music that speaks of pre-historic traditions and rituals that celebrate the feminine."

Redmond learned to play the drums from the renowned frame drummer Glen Velez, world music composer and percussionist for the Paul Winter Consort. One of Velez's first students, Redmond played with him for eight years.

Since then she has recorded five albums and performed both solo and with Velez across the United States and Europe in concerts, as well as on cable television and radio.

All of the members of the Mob of Angels are former students of Redmond. They, like many others, have moved on to incorporate their drumming into women's spiritual worship.

Redmond has taught and continues to teach drumming workshops at numerous transformational centers including The New York Open Center, Omega, Interface, Hollyhock, Rowe Conference Center, The Innerlight Center, and The Center for Symbolic Studies. These workshops have been used by corporations to teach teamwork and by holistic studies centers to bring about group celebration.

The Gallery Series presents "Ritual Offering" with Layne Redmond (left) and the Mob of Angels on Tuesday, April 13, at 8 p.m. in the Elaine Langone Center Gallery. The women's drumming ensemble revives the ancient Mediterranean tradition of women's ceremonial drumming and ritual celebrations. The continuing series of performance art and experimental music is free and open to the public.

In addition to workshops, Redmond has researched and published articles on the historical and prehistorical connections between women and drumming. Publications such as Woman of Power and Ear Magazine have also printed her articles on the history of the frame drum.

Presently, Redmond is working on a forthcoming book about women and the frame drum. Her research displays many images of women drummers discovered in the ruins of ancient societies in Egypt, the Middle East, and Greece. Furthermore, her research uncovers that religious drummers may have been women as well as men. These findings give Redmond the inspiration to write compositions suggestive of ancient, meditative rituals within which her pre-historic percussion instrument, the frame drum, produces rhythms set off by sounds, voices, and other instruments.

"The effect on the audience is one of ethereal reverie," said Faith Quintavell of The Philadelphia Inquirer.

Redmond's concerts are in high demand at many universties. She was one of the only two women featured in Planet Drum, the recent book about ethnic drumming by Gratful Dead drummer Mickey Hart.

Redmond is delighted with the success of her career. "It's taken off in a big way," said Redmond. "I've had difficulty coping with all the opportunities that are coming my way at this point. Something is definitely happening out there. I don't feel like I have a mission, but I feel that the mission has me."

Looking back: Schrag exhibit opens in Gallery

BY KRISTIE ROBSON
Bucknellian Staff Writer

"The most varied of thoughts and feelings can be sensed in paintings and prints. Expressions of peace and calm are as profound and alive as those of anxiety and drama. They are like the slow movements in a musical composition, corresponding to beautifully pure and quiet moments in life," said Karl Schrag.

Schrag has spent 70 years of his career grappling with the task of visualizing life's inner drama. He has not only formed a visual catalogue of his own inner development, but has brought to form the turbulence of the era which surrounded him. "Karl Schrag: A Retrospective," a collection of 40 paintings and 25 prints by Schrag, is on exhibit until June 6 in the Elaine Langone Center Gallery. The Gallery is open weekdays from 11 a.m. to 4 p.m. and weekends from 1 to 4 p.m.

Born in Karlsruhe, Germany in 1912, Schrag began painting and drawing at the age of four. His early life was marked by numerous moves. The first, to Zurich, Switzerland, was due to the troubling developments in Germany; the second, to Paris, for livlier instruction; and the third to New York City in 1938.

In 1945 Schrag joined Stanley William Hayter's printing collection Atelier 17, where he worked alongside such renowned contemporaries as Chagall, Miro, and Pollack. Five years later Schrag became director of Atelier, and by 1960 Schrag had his first retrospective exhibit at the Brooklyn Museum of Art.

Schrag's early works captured the traumas resounding from a world engaged in war with such paintings as "Persecution," "Meal of the Poor," "To Hell with Hitler," and "War." With the end of the war, Schrag's work began to take on a new form. The life-giving forces of nature began to appear—the direct result of the artist's discovery of Maine. Since 1959, Schrag has spent nearly every summer in Deer Isle, Maine.

"Much of the inspiration for my landscape comes from Maine because it has so many contrasts—the darkest woods, the most luminescent distances—and so many moods which correspond to the feelings one has about life," said Schrag. His paintings, filled with landscape scenarios inspired by his summers, transfer mood to color with an intensity that been compared by critics to van Gogh, Munch, and the German Expressionists.

Schrag's winters are spent in New York City, where his artwork shifts from landscapes to more figural work. One subject that has changed the most over time is Schrag's self-portraits. From his first self-portrait, "Artist with Paper Hat," to his latest "Night Time," one can easily see the evolution of maturity in style and age.

Having dedicated most of his life to art, Schrag is reluctant to say he has ever "developed" a style, claiming his work has progressed much like a person's handwriting, without any conscious effort to force changes. But like handwriting, artists' styles evolve through work, and a style never stops evolving.

"I am approaching the moment when, both as a person and as an artist, I have the possibility of great freedom," said Schrag, at the age of 65, in an interview. "I feel I am breaking down more and more barriers in my work, taking more chances. I am attracted to the danger zones."

The works to come after that interview did indeed contain adventurous new styles. He introduced color "frames" around the work not for decorative purposes, but instead to influence or contrast the appearance of every other color, structure, and light within the work. Expressions spanning from great despair to joyous vitality are the result of Schrag's continual awareness and visual mirroring of internal human emotion in harmony with nature.

"A wedding of dream and reality," said Schrag of his work. "one of their offspring is the art which gives me so much despair and so much inner happiness."

(.12mm vs. .06 mm) as the average male condom. A condom pouch is rolled up within the crotch of the panty. When the penis first penetrates the vaginal opening, the condom pouch is automatically pushed up into the vagina. The condom pouch contains a water based lubricant. The Bikini condom has a breakage rate of .5% while male condoms have a breakage rate of 196-2%. For a package of two, the condom runs $4.79.

Another female condom development is Women's Choice, created by M.D. Personal Products. It is made of latex and is 30% thicker than a male condom. Women's Choice is very different from the Bikini Condom because it resembles a wider version of the male condom. At the open end of the condom is a two-inch diameter flexible ring that stays outside the vagina. At the closed end of the condom is a thickened path of latex in a dome shape. The dome end of the condom is anchored in place in the upper vagina, but it does not fit as snugly as a diaphragm. The Women's Choice condom contains a silicone lubricant both inside and outside the device. It is inserted with an applicator similar to that of a tampon. The cost is $2 each.

The third female condom is called Reality, and is produced by Wisconsin Pharmacal Company. Reality is a polyurethane sheath with two flexible polyurethane rings. One of the rings is inside the condom at the closed end of the sheath, which serves as an insertion mechanism and internal anchor for the device. The other ring forms the external edge of the sheath and stays outside the vagina during intercourse. This condom is also lubricated. Reality is inserted much like a diaphragm, with the inner ring fitting behind the pubic bone in the upper vagina where it automatically conforms to the upper contours of the vaginal walls. Each condom costs between $1.50 and $2.

There are many advantages to using female condoms: they provide women with a sense of control over condom use, they are available over the counter, they are not as messy as barrier methods requiring spermicides and some women experience heightened clitoral and labial sensation because of friction created by the outer portion of the device. The condoms are also thicker than male condoms, so they are less likely to break. There are no significant adverse effects.

Some disadvantages to the female condom include difficulty in insertion, a cosmetically unappealing appearance, more cumbersome as opposed to the male condom and it may interfere with foreplay for women if inserted prior to sexual activity. The condom is also more expensive and cumbersome than male condoms, and some women report vaginal itching and irritation after use.

Before deciding on what birth control method to use, contact your physician or see a nurse at Student Health Services.

TKE's future is under scrutiny

Rumors of shut-down concern brothers

BY DEB MANASSE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Members of Tau Kappa Epsilon fraternity (TKE) spoke with university officials, members of the alumni corporation and national TKE officers this week to discuss the future of Bucknell's TKE chapter.

This move came in response to what Frank Sanders, senior director of chapter services at the TKE national organization, called "reports of alleged risk management violations."

According to TKE president Jeff Weidenfeller '94, serious discussions concerning TKE's fate began Monday when a rumor led brothers to believe that the chapter's future was tenuous.

By late Monday morning a Christmas light display spelling out the word "Bye" had been constructed on the roof of the TKE house and an "Open House" sign had been placed outside.

"There was a misunderstanding as to our future on the campus," said Weidenfeller. "We had heard a rumor and we attempted to determine its validity Monday morning. We thought we had verified it and that furthered the misunderstanding."

Sanders said that although he does not believe that TKE is in imminent danger of losing either its charter or the recognition of the university, there are still several matters to be worked out regarding the Bucknell chapter.

"I don't believe the issue is resolved," said Sanders. "It is our expectation that our chapters will follow our guidelines. Our concern is that at present [the Bucknell chapter] may not be doing that."

"Whether or not they can remain active depends on their ability to abide by our guidelines," said Sanders.

According to Associate Dean of Student Life Edward Dadez, although TKE's three alcohol violations are a factor in the fraternity's recent troubles, the actions being taken are "not only because of alcohol violations during the '92-'93 year, but because of the ongoing relationship of the chapter with the university, the alumni, and nationals."

Sanders said that the national

Writ of summons filed against University

BY TARA GILLIGAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

A former employee of the athletic department support staff has filed a writ of summons against the University and is considering filing a lawsuit against the athletic department as soon as next month.

The writ of summons, which names Rick Hartzell, athletic director, leaves open the possibility that Carl Shingara, former equipment manager, will sue the University over the termination of his contract two years ago.

According to Shingara's attorney, Jonathan Butterfield, who works in a general civil practice in Williamsport, the action "arises out of a termination" from the University. Shingara, according to Butterfield, claims that the University abruptly fired him because "they believed he was talking to the press" and viewed him as "the 'deep throat' of the athletic department."

Butterfield said that the writ of summons "has the effect of keeping the statute of limitations from running out." He also said that Shingara is considering filing the lawsuit in "maybe a month." "We haven't really filled in the details," Butterfield said.

Shingara, who lives in Sunbury, worked for the University for 21 years, according to his lawyer. Butterfield said that he believes Shingara is presently unemployed.

Shingara was not available for comment Thursday night. In an interview with two editors of The Bucknellian last spring he spoke of the possibility of filing a lawsuit. At that time, no members of the University would comment on the case.

Hartzell also could not be reached for comment last night.

Barbara Shailor, vice president for student services, said that she could not comment on the case while it is under litigation.

Other members of the administration declined to comment.

Students burned out of apartments

4th St. fire under investigation

BY SARA K. WALKER
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The Lewisburg Fire Marshall is still trying to establish the cause of the last Friday's fire, which occurred at 127 Fourth Street.

Fire engines were dispatched at 5:13 a.m.

Nine Bucknell students were living in the apartment at the time of the fire: three male graduate students, two female graduate students, and four female undergraduate students. The Office of Residential Life has since accommodated these students by placing them in dormitories.

Susan Naughton—The Bucknellian

Four women living in the house destroyed by fire were in violation of a Lewisburg ordinance which limits the number of unrelated people living together.

Residential Life has taken three rooms which were intended to be lounges in Vedder Hall and transformed them into doubles. These are the same rooms, coincidentally, in which several of the Tau Kappa Epsilon brothers were assigned to live following the fire at their fraternity house. Gerald Commerford, assistant dean for housing, stated that "we were lucky" to have the accommodations for these students.

The three male graduate students are residing together in a room in Vedder Hall, as are the two female graduate students. One undergraduate female is liv-

Shackelford motion debate persisting

BY NEIL BARDACH
Bucknellian Staff Writer

In a debate that has already endured three faculty meetings in the last month and a half, the motion to abolish the University Review Committee (URC) continued to be considered Monday with the presentation of amendments to the original motion.

Jean Shackelford, professor of economics, who originally filed the motion, presented the amendments.

The original motion was simply, "I move that the URC be abolished," said Shackelford. The amendments given by Shackelford provide a more concrete foundation for the motion. During Monday's meeting, which was a continuation of last Monday's scheduled faculty meeting, two of the amendments were debated and voted upon. Due to the sensitive nature of the motion, the amendments were voted upon by means of a secret ballot.

The first of the motions discussed concerned the procedure for URC votes. The motion, which passed by a count of 73-38 with a simple majority necessary, states that all votes of the URC must be passed by a majority of five persons on the committee. There are currently seven voting members on the URC; however, not all members vote on all cases.

Richard Fleming, chair and associate professor of philosophy and chair of the URC, explained that "sometimes, [members of the URC] feel a conflict of interest," and therefore they do not vote on some cases. This usually occurs when the committee member knows the person being reviewed. In this case, five votes would still be required to pass a review through the committee, even if only five committee members vote.

The second amendment that was voted on dealt with a possible

Commerford labels 'dingles' first concern

BY TARA GILLIGAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

After receiving their room pick numbers today, students will have several weeks to swing deals with friends and agonize over where they want to live for the next year.

Little has changed in the process of room selection; for the second year in a row the Office of Residential Life will be housing students in "dingles," the small rooms in Swartz which served as singles until last year's overcrowding problems forced the University to convert them into doubles.

According to Gerald Commerford, assistant dean of housing, eliminating these dingles is his "highest priority."

The switch to sophomore rush has much to do with this problem of overcrowding, Commerford said. In former years, sophomore men could live in fraternity houses, and junior and senior fraternity men often chose to rent apartments or houses in town. But the switch to sophomore rush has meant that the University must provide housing for second-year students while upperclassmen fill the fraternity houses.

Commerford said that in order to prevent more students from having to live in dingles, he will not allow any students to sign up for rooms in three areas of Swartz: the first floor in the A and B wings and the second floor in the B wing. "I never put all the rooms out for room selection," he said. "That eliminates flexibility."

Commerford will assign students from the wait list to rooms in these halls and, depending on the number of students on the list, he'll assign as many as possible of these rooms as singles.

While admitting that his approach is far from an ideal solution, Commerford sees no other way of eliminating the need for dingles given current projections of the numbers of students requesting on-campus housing.

Also contributing to the housing problem is the low number of students who request to live off campus. This year, the Office of Residential Life received 424 applications for off-campus living.

Commerford said that if another fifty students requested to live off

Messenger struggles through budget problems

BY ANDREW COHEN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The University Messenger has fallen upon hard financial times as advertisements which comprise its total revenue have been lower than normal this year. One issue has already been cancelled and the publication of the last issue in May will depend upon how much revenue is raised, according to Alex Buccino '93, Messenger editor. The Messenger has taken its financial problems to its readers and begun a campaign to solicit donations.

Profanity in the paper is one of the major reasons for lost advertising revenue, said Lee Guzofsky '94 another Messenger editor. "The people with the purse strings don't enjoy some of the words that we don't bother to edit because we want it to be a creative outlet and we want it to be free expression." Another is-

Conservative paper begins to lay out plans

BY NANCY NORBECK
Bucknellian Staff Writer

If things work out for Jonathan Meyers '95 and his staff this semester, there will be a new bi-weekly publication on the Bucknell campus.

Meyers posted signs all over campus several weeks ago advertising for writers, editors, photographers, and other help in producing a politically conservative newspaper at Bucknell; now with the support of a small editorial staff, he has begun dealing with the logistics of his journalistic enterprise.

The current staff consists of Meyers as Chief Editor and an editorial board of Mike Kovac '96, Jeff Clark '96, Bill Cortellessa '95, and Robert Woodward '96.

According to Meyers, "We have gotten a great deal accomplished so far—except for the name." The staff's goal is to produce a bi-weekly eight-page tabloid starting next semester.

The new editors predict that they will most likely only produce campus many of the housing difficulties could be eliminated. Until the "absolute number" of students choose to live off campus, the housing crunch will continue, he said.

"We have to continue to [assign dingles] until the number of students living off campus can reach the absolute number who live off campus," he said.

In the next week, Commerford will determine how many rooms to allocate for males and for females. His decisions depend on the number of students living in theme halls, fraternity houses, and apartments in town.

Commerford said that occasionally students try to beat the system. The room pick numbers are non-transferable and students who trade picks will be reassigned to a lower priority number, he said.

While it is difficult to catch dishonest students, Commerford referred to a situation this year in which two students used a friend's priority number (43) to book a room in Roberts Hall. Their room pick number was 50. "The bottom line was that they would have moved out if there were people who wanted their place" and who had higher priority than they did with their original number.

Juniors will sign up for rooms on May 3, sophomores on May 5, and first-year students on May 6.

organization is working with the Bucknell administration to "deal with some concerns that have been raised and to try to resolve some areas of concern about the Bucknell chapter."

"Basically we've been discussing the future of our house in terms of how to make a positive change so that we can become more of an asset instead of a liability to the university," said Weidenfeller.

"The present threat has been decreased," said Weidenfeller. "We are far less concerned about being kicked off campus. Our focus is on positive change now but the potential for being kicked off is still around."

"There is always an option to close the group but I don't believe we've reached that point," said Sanders. "It is my understanding that the university is not to the point of removing recognition."

Sanders added that the TKE national organization would "have to seriously consider whether the chapter would remain active" if Bucknell chose to remove recognition from TKE.

third committee. The purpose of this committee would be to judge cases that were appealed by the person being reviewed. The reason for this amendment, according to Shackelford, was that the current "appeals process goes against due process." In the current system, the URC hears appeals for cases that it reviewed in the first place.

The amendment, which passed by a narrow 57-54 vote, was debated heavily. One of the problems of the amendment, according to Michael Payne, chair and professor of English, was that this proposed system "would be in conflict with what is already in the [Faculty] Handbook."

He also felt that appealed cases should be assigned to ad hoc committees, that such "a committee has a lifetime of only one case. Assigning [these cases] to a standing committee is a mistake."

The other amendments to the motion, as well as the motion itself, are scheduled to be voted on next Monday at 5 p.m.

According to Jil Badolato '95, a resident of the Fourth Street apartment, the students ha been in conversation with the fire marshall who is investigating the cause the fire.

The fire marshall ha been investigating the activities which occurred at the apartment prior to fire. According to Badolato, several friends of the students cooked pasta the apartment earlier that evening.

All nine Bucknell studen are suffering the loss of their apartments, but the four female undergrad te students are facing one further complication in the aftermath of the

The borough of Lewisburg h an ordinance regulation stating that there may be no more than three related persons living together. It was discovered prior to the fire, accor t to Chief Heiter at the Lewisburg Police Department, that more than th people were residing in the Fourth Street apartment. The four women were Jessica Alexander '95, Lorena Lima '95, and Kristin Moody '95, and Badola

As a result of this discovery, a meeti had been scheduled between the owner of the property, a code enforcem officer, a Town and Gown committee member, the four female students, an of Students John Dunlop, and Commerford. Before the meeting cou take place, however, the apartment burned down.

When the Fire Department and several police officers arrived at the scene of the fire, only two of the four women had be located, according to Heiter. Moody and Alexander had escaped from the fire, but Badolato and Lima were, for a time, considered to be missing. Because of this, "the pressure is on everyone," Heiter said.

Afraid that the students might still be present in the blaze, police officers went into the burning room where the two women could have been, while Moody and Alexander made several telephone calls to try to locate the whereabouts of the women. According to Heiter, this search was on for two hours until they were located.

To avoid situations like this one, Heiter advised others to be absolutely truthful when registering to live off-campus. He said that it is important to inform the University of one's exact address in case of an emergency or in case someone needs to contact the student. Furthermore, Heiter stressed the importance of adhering to the ordinance.

The ordinance has been in existence for several years now. The reason for the ordinance, according to Heiter, has to do with of the size of the apartments and houses. Many of them, he said, are not conducive to more than three persons. Heiter commended the efforts of Bucknell to try to comply with the ordinance.

It is the owner of the property who would be cited for the code violation, and not the students, according to Heiter. He stated, however, that the owner of this particular apartment was unaware of the fact that the ordinance was being broken. If the landlord had known, he would have insisted that the students move out, said Heiter.

During the past year, the members of the Lesbian/Gay/Bisexual Advisory Board sought assistance and support in making a very important "statement" to Bucknell students and community. Our goal is to make public the names of administration, faculty, and staff members who support the civil rights of homosexual and bisexual people. This "statement of support" is not a new idea; a similar statement was made in 1987 which was signed by more than 150 members of the Bucknell community and published in The Bucknellian. The following "Statement of Support" has been signed by the persons whose names appear below.

We affirm and make public our support of FLAG&B and other Lesbian/Gay/Bisexual support groups on campus, as well as the University's non-discrimination policy. We believe in the rights of heterosexual, homosexual, and bisexual people alike to lead lives free of oppression and harassment, and discrimination. We recognize the need for on-going educational efforts, leading to the understanding and integration of all minority groups at Bucknell.

Friday, April 9

A resident of Larison Hall reported being the victim of harassing telephone calls on numerous occasions over the last ten days. Investigation continuing.

At 5:32 a.m., University Public Safety officers were requested to assist the local police at the scene of a fire at 129 South 4th Street. The Department of Public Safety assisted in the location of several students who were not home at the time of the fire and were unaccounted for during and after the fire.

At 10:00 a.m., a University student in Smith Hall reported being the victim of a series of harassing telephone calls. Several racial slurs were directed at the victim and the investigation is continuing.

Saturday, April 10

At 2 p.m., a University student residing in an uphill fraternity reported being the victim of numerous harassing telephone calls. Several sexual statements were directed at the victim.

Sunday, April 11

At 1:41 a.m., Public Safety officers responded to Vedder Hall on the report of an injured student. Student was transported to Evangelical Hospital by a Student Health Service driver where he was treated and released.

At 2:05 p.m., a University student reported a theft. Victim reported that between 4 p.m. and 6:45 p.m. on 4/10/93, unknown person(s) had removed approximately $230.00 from her wallet which was left unattended in the Bison.

At 3 p.m., a University student residing in Kappa Sigma fraternity reported that the rear window had been shattered. An officer responded and discovered that unknown person(s) had struck the front windshield of the victim's car two times causing severe damage to the windshield.

Tuesday, April 13

Between 11:30 a.m. and 12:00 noon, a female student was walking in the area of Smoketown Road and Stein Lane and the last course when she observed a pick-up truck pass another a number of times. The driver of the truck made obscene gestures toward the female student. The student notified Public Safety of the incident on Wednesday, April 14. Public Safety notified West Buffalo Township Police Department.

A DESCRIPTION OF THE VEHICLE AND SUBJECT IS AS FOLLOWS:

-BLUE PICK UP TRUCK/SMALL TYPE BED - WHITE-MALE/HEAVY IN WEIGHT/WEARING TURQUOISE SHIRT/EYEGLASSES/SHORT LIGHT BROWN HAIR-

The police and public safety are pursuing information which may lead to the identification of a suspect. The investigation is ongoing.

Since the Wood Company "can focus more on what new... are on an individual basis," according to Tim Tenon, newly appointed director of dining services, can we soon expect classical music in the caf Shorter lines? A big screen TV for eating entertainment? A flexible mealplan? Healthier food? Bigger portions? And cheaper prices?

Perhaps. Changes in Bostwick Cafeteria, the Bison, and the Terrace Room really depend upon the results of an upcoming student survey and the findings of the Dining Services Advisory Committee, according to both Tenon and Elizabeth Farley, associate vice-president for finance.

While students requested the return of Eggo waffles and more peanut butter for ice cream when surveyed by The Bucknellian during Thursday night's dinner hour at the caf, the majority of their constructive criticism focused on the basics, which would make eating at the caf more like eating at home.

No one asked exactly for their mother's cooking or more sections with names like "Hometown Hits," a concept most found silly, but instead for eating ease and sensibility.

David Slupe '93 requested greater flexibility with the portions and said, "If you ask for a little more, they should give you a little extra."

Joel Lee '94 said, "You should be able to mix entrees, even if you only get half of each." He pointed out that at home some family members load their plates with more vegetables, while others serve themselves bigger portions of meat. Such options should exist at the Caf as well.

Marty Makary '93 a member of the Dining Services Advisory Committee was most concerned about the quality, not quantity of food. He said, "We need healthy food. They trick us here with food that tastes good but has terrible nutritional value."

Michelle Fallone '96, referring to the taste of the food, said, "It's good enough for me to eat."

According to Jeremy Himeisen GR, many students may not know about the high fat and cholesterol content of their food. Himeisen said, "For example, the Heartland [lower cholesterol, fat, and sodium] selection on Tuesday night had 15g of fat and 266 calories. That's a very high ratio of fat per calorie."

Price was another basic complaint that students voiced. Tom Eagleson '93 said, "I ate at Denison for half the price."

Makary also voiced concern over the prices and said that he would suggest to the Dining Services Board that special dinners like Easter, Thanksgiving and spring break be cut. "They try to appeal to us with fancy dinners, but not all students can afford that."

TKE's ...uture is under scrutiny

Rumors of shut-down concern brothers

BY DEB MANASSE...
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Members of Tau Kappa Epsilon fraternity (TKE) spoke with university officials, members of the alumni corporation and national TKE officers this week to discuss the future of Bucknell's TKE chapter.

This move came in response to what Frank Sanders, senior director of chapter services at the TKE national organization, called "reports of alleged risk management violations."

According to TKE president Jeff Weidenfeller '94, serious discussions concerning TKE's fate began Monday when a rumor led brothers to believe that the chapter's future was tenuous.

By late Monday morning a Christmas light display spelling out the word "Bye" had been constructed on the roof of the TKE house and an "Open House" sign had been placed outside.

"There was a misunderstanding as to our future on the campus," said Weidenfeller. "We had heard a rumor and we attempted to determine its validity Monday morning. We thought we had verified it and that furthered the misunderstanding."

Sanders said that although he does not believe that TKE is in imminent danger of losing either its charter or the recognition of the university, there are still several matters to be worked out regarding the Bucknell chapter.

"I don't believe the issue is resolved," said Sanders. "It is our expectation that our chapters will follow our guidelines. Our concern is that at present [the Bucknell chapter] may not be doing that."

"Whether or not they can remain active depends on their ability to abide by our guidelines," said Sanders.

According to Associate Dean of Student Life Edward Dadez, although TKE's three alcohol violations are a factor in the fraternity's recent troubles, the actions being taken are "not only because of alcohol violations during the '92-'93 year but because of the ongoing relationship of the chapter with the university, the alumni, and nationals."

Sanders said that the national

Writ of summons filed against University

BY TARA GILLIGAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

A former employee of the athletic department support staff has filed a writ of summons against the University and is considering filing a lawsuit against the athletic department as soon as next month.

The writ of summons, which names Rick Hartzell, athletic director, leaves open the possibility that Carl Shingara, former equipment manager, will sue the University over the termination of his contract two years ago.

According to Shingara's attorney, Jonathan Butterfield, who works in a general civil practice in Williamsport, the action "arises out of a termination" from the University. Shingara, according to Butterfield, claims that the University abruptly fired him because "they believed he was talking to the press" and viewed him as "the 'deep throat' of the athletic department."

Butterfield said that the writ of summons "has the effect of keeping the statute of limitations from running out." He also said that Shingara is considering filing the lawsuit in "maybe a month. We've haven't really filled in the details," Butterfield said.

Shingara, who lives in Sunbury, worked at the University for 21 years, according to his lawyer. Butterfield said that he believes Shingara is presently unemployed.

Shingara was not available for comment Thursday night. In an interview with two editors of The Bucknellian last spring he spoke of the possibility of filing a lawsuit. At that time, no members of the University would comment on the case.

Hartzell also could not be reached for comment last night.

Barbara Shailor, vice president for student services, said that she could not comment on the case while it is under litigation.

Other members of the administration declined to comment.

Students burned out of apartments

4th St. fire under investigation

BY SARA K. WALKER
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The Lewisburg Fire Marshall is still trying to establish the cause of the last Friday's fire, which occurred at 127 Fourth Street.

Fire engines were dispatched at 5:13 a.m.

Nine Bucknell students were living in the apartment at the time of the fire; the female graduate students, undergraduate students, and four females.

Susan Naughton—The Bucknellian

Four women living in the house destroyed by fire were in violation of a Lewisburg ordinance which limits the number of unrelated people living together.

The ordinance has been in existence for several years now. The reason for the ordinance, according to Heiter, has to do with of the size of the apartments and houses. Many of them, he said, are not conducive to more than three persons. Heiter commended the efforts of Bucknell to try to comply with the ordinance.

It is the owner of the property who would be cited for the code violation, and not the students, according to Heiter. He stated, however, that the owner of this particular apartment was unaware of the fact that the ordinance was being broken. If the landlord had known, he would have insisted that the students move out, said Heiter.

Shackelford motion debate persisting

BY NEIL BARDACH
Bucknellian Staff Writer

In a debate that has already endured three faculty meetings in the past month and a half, the motion to abolish the University Review Committee (URC) continued to be considered Monday with the presentation of amendments to the original motion.

Jean Shackelford, professor of economics, who originally filed the motion, presented the amendments.

The original motion was simply, "I move that the URC be abolished," said Shackelford. The amendments given by Shackelford provide a more concrete foundation for the motion. During Monday's meeting, which was a continuation of last Monday's scheduled faculty meeting, two of the amendments were debated and voted upon. Due to the sensitive nature of the motion, the amendments were voted upon by means of a secret ballot.

The first of the motions discussed concerned the procedure for URC votes. The motion, which passed by a count of 73-38 with a simple majority necessary, states that all votes of the URC must be passed by a majority of five persons on the committee. There are currently seven voting members on the URC; however, not all members vote on all cases.

Richard Fleming, chair and associate professor of philosophy and chair of the URC, explained that "sometimes, [members of the URC] feel a conflict of interest," and therefore they do not vote on those cases. This usually occurs when the committee member knows the person being reviewed. In this case, five votes would still be required to pass a review through the committee, even if only five committee members vote.

The second amendment that was voted on dealt with a possible

Commerford labels 'dingles' first concern

BY TARA GILLIGAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

After receiving their room pick numbers today, students will have several weeks to swing deals with friends and agonize over where they want to live for the next year.

Little has changed in the process of room selection; for the second year in a row the Office of Residential Life will be housing students in "dingles," the small rooms in Swartz which served as singles until last year's overcrowding problems forced the University to convert them into doubles.

According to Gerald Commerford, assistant dean of housing, eliminating these dingles is his "highest priority."

The switch to sophomore rush has much to do with this problem of overcrowding, Commerford said. In former years, sophomore men could live in fraternity houses, and junior and senior fraternity men often chose to rent apartments or houses in town. But the switch to sophomore rush has meant that the University must provide housing for second-year students while upperclassmen fill the fraternity houses.

Commerford said that in order to prevent more students from having to live in dingles, he will not allow any students to sign up for rooms in three areas of Swartz: the first floor in the A and B wings and the second floor in the B wing. "I never put all the rooms out for room selection," he said. "That eliminates flexibility."

Commerford will assign students from the wait list to rooms in the halls and, depending on the number of students on the list, he'll assign as many as possible of these rooms as singles.

While admitting that his approach is far from an ideal solution, Commerford sees no other way of eliminating the need for dingles given current projections of the numbers of students requesting on-campus housing.

Also contributing to the housing problem is the low number of students who request to live off campus. This year, the Office of Residential Life received 424 applications for off-campus living.

Commerford said that if another fifty students requested to live o...

Messenger struggles through budget problems

BY ANDREW COHEN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The University Messenger has fallen upon hard financial times as advertisements which comprise its total revenue have been lower than normal this year. One issue has already been cancelled and the publication of the last issue in May will depend upon how much revenue is raised, according to Alex Buccino '93, Messenger editor. The Messenger has taken its financial problems to its readers and begun a campaign to solicit donations.

Profanity in the paper is one of the major reasons for lost advertising revenue, said Lee Guzofsky '94 another Messenger editor. "The people with the purse strings don't enjoy some of the words that we don't bother to edit because we want it to be a creative outlet and we want it to be free expression." Another is...

Conservative paper begins to lay out plans

BY NANCY NORBECK
Bucknellian Staff Writer

If things work out for Jonathan Meyers '95 and his staff this semester, there will be a new bi-weekly publication on the Bucknell campus.

Meyers posted signs all over campus several weeks ago advertising for writers, editors, photographers, and other help in producing a politically conservative newspaper at Bucknell; now with the support of a small editorial staff, he has begun dealing with the logistics of his journalistic enterprise.

The current staff consists of Meyers as Chief Editor and an editorial board of Mike Kovac '96, Jeff Clark '96, Bill Cortellessa '95, and Robert Woodward '96.

According to Meyers, "We have gotten a great deal accomplished so far—except for the name." The staff's goal is to produce a bi-weekly eight-page tabloid starting next semester.

The new editors predict that they will most likely only produce

campus many of the housing difficulties could be eliminated. Until the "absolute number" of students choose to live off campus, the housing crunch will continue, he said.

"We have to continue to [assign dingles] until the number of students living off campus can reach the absolute number who live off campus," he said.

In the next week, Commerford will determine how many rooms to allocate for males and for females. His decisions depend on the number of students living in theme halls, fraternity houses, and apartments in town.

Commerford said that occasionally students try to beat the system. The room pick numbers are non-transferable and students who trade picks will be reassigned to a lower priority number, he said.

While it is difficult to catch dishonest students, Commerford referred to a situation this year in which two students used a friend's priority number (43) to book a room in Roberts Hall. Their room pick number was 50. "The bottom line was that they would have moved out if there were people who wanted their place" and who had higher priority than they did with their original number.

Juniors will sign up for rooms on May 3, sophomores on May 5, and first-year students on May 6.

organization is working with the Bucknell administration to "deal with some concerns that have been raised and to try to resolve some areas of concern about the Bucknell chapter."

"Basically we've been discussing the future of our house in terms of how to make a positive change so that we can become more of an asset instead of a liability to the university," said Weidenfeller.

"The present threat has been decreased," said Weidenfeller. "We are far less concerned about being kicked off campus. Our focus is on positive change now but the potential for being kicked off is still around."

"There is always an option to close the group but I don't believe we've reached that point," said Sanders. "It is my understanding that the university is not to the point of removing recognition."

Sanders added that the TKE national organization would "have to seriously consider whether the chapter would remain active" if Bucknell chose to remove recognition from TKE.

third committee. The purpose of this committee would be to judge cases that were appealed by the person being reviewed. The reason for this amendment, according to Shackelford, was that the current "appeals process goes against due process." In the current system, the URC hears appeals for cases that it reviewed in the first place.

The amendment, which passed by a narrow 57-54 vote, was debated heavily. One of the problems of the amendment, according to Michael Payne, chair and professor of English, was that this proposed system "would be in conflict with what is already in the [Faculty] Handbook."

He also felt that appealed cases should be assigned to ad hoc committees, that such "a committee has a lifetime of only one case. Assigning [these cases] to a standing committee is a mistake."

The other amendments to the motion, as well as the motion itself, are scheduled to be voted on next Monday at 5 p.m.

ing in a lounge in Vedder; another has taken residency in a lounge available in Larison Hall. The other two students have opted to live on St. Catherine Street with friends.

The University also offered to supply the students with meals from the cafeteria until today at noon. After today the students will be responsible for their own meals.

According to Jill Badolato '95, a resident of the Fourth Street apartment, the students have been in conversation with the fire marshall who is investigating the cause of the fire.

The fire marshall has been investigating the activities which occurred at the apartment prior to the fire. According to Badolato, several friends of the students cooked pasta in the apartment earlier that evening.

All nine Bucknell students are suffering the loss of their apartments, but the four female undergraduate students are facing one further complication in the aftermath of the fire.

The borough of Lewisburg has an ordinance regulation stating that there may be no more than three unrelated persons living together. It was discovered prior to the fire, according to Chief Heiter at the Lewisburg Police Department, that more than three people were residing in the Fourth Street apartment. The four women were Jessica Alexander '95, Lorena Lima '95, and Kristin Moody '95, and Badolato.

As a result of this discovery, a meeting had been scheduled between the owner of the property, a code enforcement officer, a Town and Gown committee member, the four female students, Dean of Students John Dunlop, and Commerford. Before the meeting could take place, however, the apartment burned down.

When the Fire Department and several police officers arrived at the scene of the fire, only two of the four women had been located, according to Heiter. Moody and Alexander had escaped from the fire, but Badolato and Lima were, for a time, considered to be missing. Because of this, "the pressure is on everyone," Heiter said.

Afraid that the students might still be present in the blaze, police officers went into the burning room where the two women could have been, while Moody and Alexander made several telephone calls to try to locate the whereabouts of the women. According to Heiter, this search went on for two hours until they were located.

To avoid situations like this one, Heiter advised others to be absolutely truthful when registering to live off-campus. He said that it is important to inform the University of one's exact address in case of an emergency or in case someone needs to contact the student. Furthermore, Heiter stressed the importance of adhering to the ordinance.

The ordinance has been in existence for several years now. The reason for the ordinance, according to Heiter, has to do with of the size of the apartments and houses. Many of them, he said, are not conducive to more than three persons. Heiter commended the efforts of Bucknell to try to comply with the ordinance.

It is the owner of the property who would be cited for the code violation, and not the students, according to Heiter. He stated, however, that the owner of this particular apartment was unaware of the fact that the ordinance was being broken. If the landlord had known, he would have insisted that the students move out, said Heiter.

During the past year, the members of the Lesbian / Gay / Bisexual Advisory Board sought assistance and support in making a very important "statement" to Bucknell students and community. Our goal is to make public the names of administration, faculty, and staff members who support the civil rights of homosexual and bisexual people. This "statement of support" is not a new idea; a similar statement was made in 1987 which was signed by more than 150 members of the Bucknell community and published in The Bucknellian. The following "Statement of Support" has been signed by the persons whose names appear below.

We affirm and make public our support of FLAG&B and other Lesbian/Gay/Bisexual support groups on campus, as well as the University's non-discrimination policy. We believe in the rights of heterosexual, homosexual, and bisexual people alike to lead lives free of oppression, harassment, and discrimination. We recognize the need for on-going educational efforts, leading to the understanding and integration of all minority groups at Bucknell.

Students have simple tastes

BY SUSAN SMITH
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Since the Wood Company "can focus more on what needs are on an individual basis," according to Tim Tenon, newly appointed director of dining services, can we soon expect classical music in the caf? Shorter lines? A big screen TV for eating entertainment? A flexible mealplan? Healthier food? Bigger portions? And cheaper prices?

Perhaps. Changes in Bostwick Cafeteria, the Bison, and the Terrace Room really depend upon the results of an upcoming student survey and the findings of the Dining Services Advisory Committee, according to both Tenon and Ellis Harley, associate vice-president for finance.

While students requested the return of Eggo waffles and more peanut butter fudge ice cream when surveyed by The Bucknellian during Thursday night's dinner hour at the caf, the majority of their constructive criticism focused on the basics, which would make eating at the caf more like eating at home.

No one asked exactly for their mother's cooking or more sections with names like "Hometown Hits," a concept most found silly, but instead for eating ease and sensibility.

David Slupe '93 requested greater flexibility with the portions and said, "If you ask for a little more, they should give you a little extra."

Joel Lee '94 said, "You should be able to mix entrees, even if you only get half of each." He pointed out that at home some family members load their plates with more vegetables, while others serve themselves bigger portions of meat. Such options should exist at the Caf as well.

Marty Makary '93 a member of the Dining Services Advisory Committee was most concerned about the quality, not quantity of food. He said, "We need healthy food. They trick us here with food that tastes good but has terrible nutritional value."

Michelle Fallone '96, referring to the taste of the food, said, "It's good enough for me to eat."

According to Jeremy Hirneisen GR, many students may not know about the high fat and cholesterol content of their food. Hirneisen said, "For example, the Heartland [lower cholesterol, fat, and sodium] selection on Tuesday night had 15g of fat and 266 calories. That's a very high ratio of fat per calorie."

Price was another basic complaint that students voiced. Tom Eagleson '93 said, "I ate at Denison for half the price."

Makary also voiced concern over the prices and said that he would suggest to the Dining Services Board that special dinners like Easter, Thanksgiving and spring break be cut. "They try to appeal to us with fancy dinners, but not all students can afford that."

Not all students can afford to waste a meal due to an away sporting event or late afternoon in the lab either. Many students suggested meal plans with a set number of meals per week to be used for either lunch or dinner on the weekdays or weekends.

Fancy food set-ups didn't appeal to the majority of students surveyed. Other Wood schools have established pizza speciality shops or stationed food carts around academic buildings during breakfast and lunch. On the whole, Bucknell students were more interested in the simplicity of hot healthy meals with short lines and reasonable prices.

Susan Naughton—The Bucknellian

The Wood Company has introduced innovative ideas in food preparation and serving. Students can make their own Belgian waffles and top them with apple or cherry sauce, whipped cream, or ice cream.

Why we chose the Wood Company:

BY SUSAN SMITH
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Liken the Wood Company's consulting contract for dining services to that of a good internship. Under unusual circumstances it may lead to a quick and permanent job. The company under stress may even skip the interview process, ignoring other potential candidates.

When Bucknell found itself short a dining director in January, it was forced to act quickly. The Wood Company, providing technological consultation for Bucknell since the fall, was convenient for the job.

Dan Phillips, director of ARA-run dining services at Susquehanna University, eight miles south of Lewisburg, said that when Bucknell had to choose a catering company, "It was over and done before we knew it."

ARA, Marriott, and ServiceAmerica, three of the larger dining service companies in the country, were not even informed of the opening.

While Ellis Harley, associate vice president for finance, realized that "putting it [the dining service contract] out to be bid is the appropriate process," the University was "pleased with the relationship developed" during the consulting period and "needed to be up and running" when students returned to school in February.

The Wood Company's mission statement assures "personalized service," which is often appealing to small, private universities according to Linda Sowash, director of residential life at nearby Bloomsburg University. She said that while Bucknell's January decision was a hasty and seemingly spur of the moment one, it was understandable for a private school of Bucknell's size.

State schools are required to seek bids whenever a dining service contract expires. In 1991 Bloomsburg switched from the Wood Company to ARA due to a "low bid, in addition to lots of programs."

State school dining programs are set in stone for three or four year periods. Any changes during that period must be approved by the state. As a private institution, Bucknell is under no such obligation.

Because contract specifications are expected to be more flexible at a private university, the dining service company must be adaptable as well. Tenon said that Wood's regional focus allows for this flexibility.

Since Wood's home office is located in Allentown, "everything is within a few hours of the office," according to Tenon. This allows the president and vice-presidents of the company to visit their customer schools.

For big weekends and other special events, "Wood can pull from other Wood Company locations in this area," such as Moravian College, Franklin and Marshall College, Shippensburg University, Lehigh University, and Lafayette College, said Tenon. Staffs, equipment, and supplies can easily be sent to Bucknell.

The Wood Company handles 37 colleges, as well as business dining, healthcare, and prep school divisions. ARA and Marriot work accounts in these areas as well as high schools and airlines. These companies also handle hundreds of college accounts, including some of the largest universities such as University of Texas and University of Florida.

According to Tenon, the Wood Company's comparative smallness allows them to focus more on their clients.

According to Harley, one other small dining service company, the Birchfield Company, was evaluated before the Wood Company was chosen for consulting purposes last fall. The Wood Company was originally hired to computerize dining services.

The Wood Company is currently under a one year contract.

Opinions of theme halls differ

SHANNON SKOPAK
Bucknellian Staff Writer

It's that time of year again—the snow has melted from the ground, students are playing frisbee in the quad, and next year's room picks are upon us again. For those of us who choose to live in dorms next year, the alternative of a theme hall, a residential college initiated and created by students themselves, may be considered.

The purpose of a theme hall is to bring students with common interests together to create a richer learning and living environment. Theme halls work closely with members of the University's staff who assist in "bridging the gap between the classroom and a residential hall" said Gerald Commerford, assistant dean for housing.

Students opinions on theme halls vary from person to person. Patrick Haughton '96 said that theme halls are "good because people live with friends that have shared interests."

However many students say that the idea of theme halls is being abused by students, usually under classmen, who want to live with their friends and are afraid of a low room picks. "Theme halls don't mean very much," said Mark Andolina '96. "It's just that people want to live with their friends." Another student agreed, saying, "People are on theme halls to get a better lottery pick for rooms where they can stay with their friends on a hall. More emphasis is placed on being in a hall with friends rather than the theme itself."

The majority of theme halls are located in Swartz Hall and are occupied by sophomores. To apply for a theme hall, interested groups were required to submit a proposal describing the group's theme and objectives to a committee of eight student representatives from the Residence Hall Association who reviewed and decided on the proposals. This year 24 of 28 groups who applied were approved, while the remaining four are presently on hold due to requests for specific facilities.

After the approval process has been completed students are assigned to dormitory halls, mostly in Swartz Hall, reviving the controversy over dingles. While some students say that placing the theme halls in dingles discourages students from applying for them, others feel that any group of students who want to block off large numbers of rooms must comply with whatever space is available.

Pete Pirsch '96, who will be residing on a theme hall in the upcoming semester, says that theme halls have living conditions "unfit for two people. I would have lived off campus if I'd known about the dingle and would still be living with some of my friends." Keith Lockwood '96, said that it's "unfair that sophomores are placed in rooms of less quality than freshmen".

Other students say that they feel the opposite way toward Swartz. "Swartz is in the perfect location and people will live in a dingle to be there," said one student.

Another student commented that, "it's important for freshmen to have more comfortable living situations since they...can't choose their roommates. Sophomores choose to live in a theme hall and know there's a possibility they will have poor living space".

According to Commerford, there was "potential in everything" and therefore the fairest method to assigning halls was through a drawing.

Theme halls for next semester range from community service, such as, Bucknell emergency services and Lewisburg Youth Involvement, to themes on current issues, examples of which are AIDS Awareness and A Greener West. Other halls have interest themes like Arts Appreciation and Health and Fitness. Whichever theme hall students reside on Commerford says that it is a "commitment to work toward goals" and to create a worthwhile living environment.

Brian Sipes—The Bucknellian

Many of the theme halls for next year will be located in Swartz hall, home of the "dingles," rooms which were converted last year from singles into doubles.

one or two issues in the remaining weeks of this semester. The first issue is tentatively slated to come out around May 1.

Meyers is currently in the process of applying for University funding. He hopes to avoid having to sell advertising space within the paper. "The content of the paper will focus on political, social, economic, and other relevant issues," Meyers said. He plans to include analyses of local, national, and international events.

The paper shares many writers with The Sentinel, another conservative publication on campus, though Meyers expects the styles of the two papers will differ. "The individual writing styles within the paper will be different. The articles won't only be humorous—there will be some serious things as well."

According to Evan Maloney '94 of The Sentinel, the two papers may merge at some point in the future, however "as of now, The Sentinel will remain a separate entity."

According to Woodward, the paper is still trying to recruit writers. "So far the paper is looking largely editorial, but we are trying to get a good balance between editorial and regular writers. We're also trying to make sure that the paper is not as harsh as others have been, ripping on people all the time. We want to weed that out."

Meyers hopes that the paper will be a forum for ideas. "We will have letters pages as well as regular articles so that people can express themselves."

Due to the conservative nature of the paper, Meyers said that he anticipates a reaction from the more liberal element on campus. "We want to try to be as restrained and sensitive to other ideas as possible, but since we are politically based, we're bound to offend someone."

Woodward said that the goal of the paper is to achieve a synthesis of ideas. "It's not necessarily just the conservative side. There is truth in both liberal and conservative views. We want to get the best of both sides and use that to foster a community of free thought. That's my personal definition of conservative: you don't give up what you know is good until you're sure you have something better. It all comes back to balance."

sue responsible for lost advertising revenue has been the recession throughout the economy. Said Buccino, "Max [Oberdorf, publisher of the Messenger] mentioned two things—the profanity and the general financial situation in the economy, that things are tough all over."

Another reason for the lower advertising revenue might be a change in the Messenger's advertising contracts. "Normally we locked our advertisers into fourteen issues, but our sale's manager [James Guinn-Bailey] thought it would be a good idea to have seven issue [semesterly] contracts," said Max Oberdorf, owner of the Messenger and the Valley Trader.

Recent issues of the Messenger have called for student donations to help keep the paper publishing. Oberdorf said the idea originated as a joke, but it appears to have taken hold, at least with the Messenger staff. According to Guzofsky, "We're getting donations coming in and we're offering a certificate, like a stock certificate, suitable for framing, for those people who offer us money."

Donations have come in slowly thus far, said Buccino. "We only had one hundred and thirty dollars as of last issue, one hundred of which came from a single anonymous donor with a nice letter attached that basically said that we sucked."

The Messenger is looking for "three thousand dollars to cover seven issues this semester," said Buccino. The money would also pay for direct mailing of the paper to student mailboxes as was done in years past (a $400 per issue expense) and bringing the Messenger's circulation back up to 3,000 (it has been cut to 2,000 as a result of the financial problems), Oberdorf said.

Although the response has been slow, Guzofsky said that he is confident about the potential for raising funds out of the student body. "Some people at first didn't take it seriously, they thought it was another joke, but now they realize it's something to consider." In addition to asking for donation, the Messenger is planning to sell teeshirts in the fall, Guzofsky said.

As for the imminent danger of being unable to print a final issue this semester, Guzofsky said that if donations and advertising are unable to pay for the issue, "Bryan [Truglio '94, another editor], Al, and I are ready to contribute as much as is necessary for each individual issue out of our own pockets."

One thing that the Messenger won't do is change its editorial policy to woo back advertisers. "We're not a peaches and cream paper," said Oberdorf, "and we're not here for the advertisers to dictate what we're supposed to say."

Since the paper is privately owned by Oberdorf, seeking financial support from the University is impossible. This option, however, said Buccino would never be considered under any circumstances since it would radically change the philosophy of the paper. "We won't go to student government for funds. The Messenger has always been totally independent of Bucknell administration and we have to stay that way." In fact, if the survival of the Messenger depended on such funds, Buccino said that it would be preferable to dismantle it, "As far as I'm concerned, the paper should close down before it gets money from the University."

This has not been the first time that the Messenger has fallen upon hard times. Through the years and its various names (previously called the Lewisburg Merchant and then the University Merchant, before changing again in 1990 to the University Messenger) the paper has endured financial difficulties not unlike the current problems, according to Oberdorf who added, "We got through it in the past, we'll get over it again."

Oberdorf has been actively involved with the Messenger since its early days. He bought the paper from three Bucknell students in 1987 for $2400. It began as a publication that covered local businesses which helped advertising, but "as each year went by, that kind of got humdrum," said Oberdorf.

The Messenger took on its current tone in 1990 when "Matt Pigman came along," said Oberdorf. "I sat down with him and his father and changed the look and the values of it. There were better articles and more meaty articles." Ever since, said Oberdorf, the Messenger has been a publication that "could take on a function that maybe The Bucknellian might not take on. I can't say for what, for instance—but there are things that they do. It's not the same sports, or any sports for that matter."

One of Oberdorf's plans for putting the paper solidly in the black is to attract advertising from "some big beer place. I'm not afraid to run those—it's not like students don't drink." Oberdorf also said that he "was hoping that the bookstore would advertise but," he continued laughing, "that ain't gonna happen."

WRC requests information

The Women's Resource Center is asking for anonymous descriptions of campus incidents of sexual harassment and/or discrimination.

The descriptions must include date, time and place of the incident, but no details that may identify the individuals involved.

The incidents are to be compiled in a display entitled "A Week in the Life" which will attempt to make campus incidents of sexual harassment and discrimination.

Reports can be dropped of to the Sexual Harassment Task Force in 200A Roberts Hall. Questions can be directed to Janice Butler at 524-1475.

Holocaust to be commemorated

Bucknell's annual Holocaust Memorial program will be held Tuesday, Apr. 20 in the Forum. The program begins with a memorial service at 7:30 p.m., followed by the Hillel Holocaust Memorial Guest Program at 8:20 p.m.

This year's guest speaker is Anna Willingham, a native of Czechoslovakia who was sent into hiding during World War II.

Willingham attended medical school in Czechoslovakia and Vienna; she also holds bachelor's and master's degrees in psychology and a master's degree in social work, and has worked as a career counselor for the past 15 years.

Final exam rules are reiterated

Each semester faculty and associate deans receive numerous requests to change final examination dates. While students may report valid concerns, it is important that they be reminded of the University's policy regarding final examinations.

Important things to remember are that exams cannot be taken in advance, only absences from serious illness are permitted. If an instructor violates any of these rules, students are expected to notify the appropriate dean of college.

Step into the Walk-a-thon

Susquehanna Valley Women in Transition, an organization that assists abused women and their children by providing emergency shelters, support groups, legal advocacy, and a 24-hour hotline, is holding a walk-a-thon on Saturday, May 1 in Hufnagle Park.

Registration for the 5K and 10K walk begins at 9:30 a.m.; all participants turn in their pledge forms and prepaid pledge money at that time. The walk-a-thon begins at 10:30 with refreshment stops along the route. Prizes are available for the individuals with the most pledges.

Swastikas found in Harvard dorm

Students found a swastika and graffiti on a wall in a dormitory where several Jewish students live, the Harvard Crimson reported.

Abagail S. Kolodny, a sophomore who discovered the vandalism, told the paper that she was "deeply offended" by the vandalism. Many other Jewish students were similarly horrified.

According to the Crimson, several swastikas appeared in the elevator of another dormitory in November, prompting students to respond with a petition condemning the act.

The incident was under investigation by the Harvard University police.

Student charges man with gun

A 28-year-old Colorado Springs man with a gun allegedly threatened a first-year student at Colorado College.

Campus security responded immediately, disarmed the man, and called the Colorado Springs Police Department. The man, who was not a student at the college, had previously dated the woman he was now threatening; according to a college press release, it seems that he was angered by her plans to break off the relationship.

The man was later released on bond, and is being charged with second-degree kidnapping. Other charges are pending, but have not yet been released. Campus security has banned the man from campus.

Lehigh accused on intolerance

Acceptance of homosexuality and bisexuality is becoming an issue at Lehigh University. LesBiGay (Lesbians, Bisexuals and Gays) alliance president, James Truver, said that Lehigh fosters anti-gay feelings. "Students at Lehigh are apathetic, but they tend to draw the line at gays and lesbians," Truver said.

Truver said that he sees the Greek system as one of the main groups that refuses to wholly accept homosexuality. "Old ways and old thinking dominate Lehigh's Greek system and new ideas have trouble seeding there."

Activism for homosexual and bisexual rights at Lehigh is minimal, and Truversaid that the school has a long way to go in order to catch up with other universities on the issue.

More students means less aid

Skidmore Director of Admissions Mary Lou Bates reports that while applications have increased by more than six percent over the past year, the bad news is that the need for financial aid has increased as well.

This year's 4260 applicants represent the end to a three year decline in applications, but these students also represent a twelve percent increase in financial aid requests. Currently thirty percent of the school receives money from the financial aid office, but that is not enough for the 49 percent of students who ask for aid. These numbers do not include loans or College Work Study. The student Senate plans to give $6000 to help fund financial aid, and is considering donating an additional $6000 to ensure the vitality of aid funds.

Examining cultural violence

A Mexican perspective on what causes chaos in our cities

BY RYAN WICK

Why are American cities so violent? In the age of mass media that exports our culture all over the world in the form of television, advertisements, music, and movies, should the rest of the world be worried that their citizens seek to emulate a society that is dangerous at best? Fernando Saucedo-Lastra, a native of Mexico City, has taught Spanish for nearly a year at Bucknell.

His first hand observations of both American and Mexican cultures provide interesting clues about the nature of our urban woes.

Mexico City is the largest city in the world, with over twenty million people, but it is not as violent as its American counterparts, such as New York and Washington, which contain less than half as many people. But if population is not directly proportional to violence, then what is the catalyst that turns American cities into battlefields? Could it be the abundance of guns in our society that are relatively inexpensive and almost completely unregulated?

Kristina Schurr—The Bucknellian

Fernando Saucedo-Lastra, an international Bucknell student who plans to improve social ills through a career in education.

When confronted with these questions under the warm spring sun of Lewisburg, Saucedo-Lastra leans back, sips his Snapple, and sighs. It all seems so far away. "In Mexico City, teenagers get together to survive," he says, "but you don't hear about killings. There are dangerous neighborhoods, but violence is not a daily thing—not a daily life problem. It is so difficult to buy weapons. It is so expensive—the forms you have to fill out, et cetera. Of all my friends and friends' families, no one has guns. In America, everyone can just buy."

His words hit close to home as we read about how Los Angeles is "out of ammo" because its citizens are trying to prepare for a repeat of last year's riots. The news constantly reminds Saucedo-Lastra that there is a problem in America that needs to be addressed. After reading about yet another urban adolescent killing spree, or of the airport-style metal detectors installed in some of our urban high schools, Fernando thinks of home: "Even in the worst high schools in Mexico City, it just doesn't happen. So when I hear about a twelve year old who just killed his friend, it's so shocking."

What if guns were as cheap and plentiful in Mexico as they are in the US? When asked this question, Saucedo-Lastra could foresee a potential for more violence. But he hopes that it will never happens.

In the end, however, he claims that America has had a positive influence on him. He has discovered that he is a country person. When he returns to Mexico, he will not live in the city anymore. And participating in the Navajo Jan Plan convinced him that education is his calling. It also opened his eyes to the subtle racism that exists in Mexico toward its own native population. He plans to educate these people, in his attempt "to do something for them," to decrease isolation, and increase understanding in a positive response to an increasingly negative world.

This is the second profile of a campus personality in a series of three by the Ryan Wick.

Bucknellians swing into spring

BY KATE FINK
Bucknellian Staff Writer

I was awakened the other day by a peculiar sound. I ruled out the possibility that it was a new hairdryer being used by my roommate. Nor did it sound like a roommate cooking oatmeal in the microwave. It definitely didn't sound like a snow plow, either. Since these were not the sounds that had been waking me up for months, I began to feel very disoriented, because my delicately balanced sleeping patterns were being disrupted. What was it? I yanked on the cord of my blinds to discover two little ducks bobbing in the newly thawed stream under my window. They quacked loudly. "Hey! It's spring!"

After a couple, no—I'll say quite a few false starts, including a blizzard and a flood, it seems that spring is finally here. New sounds, new smells, and new temperatures have overtaken the campus, requiring painful evaluations of priorities that inevitably lure even the most serious students out of doors. Suddenly, it takes an extra half-hour to walk anywhere because of the plethora of new distractions, and Tastee-Freeze is suddenly on the way to everywhere. Evening work schedules are thrown off because, for many, it is biologically impossible to do homework in the daylight hours. Yes, in the springtime Bucknellians mutate into a new breed, changing daily rituals to account for the spell cast by the magic of this transitional season of thaw.

Everyone becomes an athlete. Pickup games of catch and frisbee abound. That guy that you see driving everywhere, even from Roberts to get his mail, will suddenly run past you in jogging shorts and shiny new sneakers. Newcomers to the sport of rollerblading come out in full force. Bent over and grasping their partners' hands, they shuffle down the sidewalk. The fancy sand volleyball courts dotting the campus are finally used for something other than an enormous cat box. Teams of shirtless men are reminiscent, but never quite up to the standard, of Top Gun's (in)famous volleyball scene.

Sedentary souls emerge from winter hibernation, atrophied and awkward, ready to ease into their usually overly-ambitious and subsequently modified summer exercise regimen. People quit the monotony, stench, and suffocation of fieldhouse activity for jogs around the golf course, bike rides, and intramurals, ultimately making the out-of-doors a bustling, lively, and social place to be, especially in the late afternoon when classes have ended.

The library spills out onto the academic quad, a ritual of spring that is both a pleasure and a curse. The interim period between classes is a perfect time to frequent the quad; to catch some rays, or to catch up on the weekend's crucial events. But the people who believe that the studying done there will be both productive and retained later find out they were only fooling themselves. The quad also seems to cause people's minds to erase the fact that they had another class that day.

Springtime at Bucknell is also a season of pollution—Noise pollution, that is. For those of you who have reached a plateau in your music collections, the season offers the opportunity for music sampling. If you are able to isolate which notes are coming from which speaker propped in a dorm window, you can hear some interesting new music. The speaker-out-the-window concept is a popular way of enhancing any outdoor activity.

When the weather turns for the better, downtown transforms from blocks of old, sleepy houses to a myriad of youthful activity, with barbecues, dinner on the porch and street hockey. Neighborly discourse becomes more commonplace as residents break out of their winter doldrums with sociable overtures.

Spring is indeed a season of rebirth. In a matter of a few nice days, Bucknell becomes a haven of active, (almost) carefree spirits among expanses of rolling greens, flowers, and flowering trees. It is a wonderful place from which to witness the inspiring metamorphosis of Bucknellians after the long, wet winter. Welcome to spring, everyone!

Room pick policy demands closer attention

About this time every year, residential life's worst nightmare comes true—room picks. Few students are ever totally satisfied. And few students sit by silently and allow the luck of the draw to determine their housing arrangements. Naturally, they take advantage of the three main options for getting the type of room they want, where they want it, and with whom. For some, this involves theme halls, for others block-booking, and then there are the courageous few who go with their lottery pick. For a large number, however, some combination of these three options is involved in getting a room.

Every option is explored, bets are hedged, and finally—usually at the last minute—that fateful decision is made. Inevitably, some friendships are forever spoiled. But the system should attempt to minimize such outcomes.

Any University housing policy should keep three goals in mind: 1) ensuring fairness, 2) placing students where they want to be placed, and 3) allowing students to live with whom they wish. Unfortunately, the University's current approach has several loopholes that encourage abuses of the system.

Theme halls are evaluated to ensure that students will actually do the wonderful things that they promise as a condition of their getting a hall. Only the best 24 proposals were selected this year—28 is the number of theme halls proposed, by the way. But several halls don't do a thing once they are established, or else they put forth minimal effort as a show of good faith. And what recourse does the University have in such cases? Kick them out? Not likely. Some students sign up for a theme hall then see where their lottery pick falls and choose the better room. Such a system favors the crafty and conniving above those who choose to play fair.

Blockbooking allows groups of up to six students to live in a block of rooms in a particular hall. After the regular lottery, blockbook candidates have their own lottery, based on the oldest member of the block. This seems to be the best method of ensuring that friends are able to live on the same hall. The lottery, however, is vitally important since there is a preset number of blocks.

Under the current system most students are nervous wrecks until they finally get a room, and this situation leads to scamming, hedging, and even downright cheating. And for what? So that students can get good rooms with their friends.

It seems that given Residential Life's good intentions, they might consider the following to ensure that students can live with their friends.

Eliminate theme halls altogether. If students want to participate in socially active projects after they are placed in a hall, good for them. Virtue is its own reward, it shouldn't be hung out as a carrot for a guaranteed room.

Make students choose between blockbooking or using their room pick before the lottery. Set a limit of four students per block, and pro-rate room allocation between blockbooking and individual lottery picks based on the percentage of students who sign up for each.

This will eliminate much of the stress which surrounds room picks. Students will have to choose with whom they really want to live—regardless of lottery numbers. Once they have done so, then the lottery can take place. Of course, blocks may not get the type of rooms they want, but each student will be guaranteed of living with up to three friends. Those who want better rooms more than living with friends can always opt for the individual lottery.

This will also put a stop to most of the conniving that takes place since students will have to choose in advance. And of course, they will still have the option of using individual picks for room selection and then deciding which friends to live with. The point is that this system would provide students who want to live together a guarantee, without the pitfalls that exist in the current system.

Four seems to be the most efficient cap of blocks since it will allow for students to choose between gateways, mods, two doubles, or four singles.

The wide variety of options that currently exists is intended to make the process of room selection smoother and easier. Unfortunately, the opposite has happened. With more housing options the result has been more stress, more cheating, and more unhappiness.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Upcoming D.C. march makes many demands

TO THE EDITOR:

On April 25, the annual march in Washington, DC for lesbian, gay, and bisexual rights will take place. With over one million people expected to attend, members of the Bucknell community have an opportunity to play a part in a march that could hopefully lead to the end of blatant discrimination based on sexual orientation.

As the weekend of the march swiftly approaches, I would like to take this opportunity to explain the demands and goals of this monumental event.

Foremost is the passage of the lesbian, gay, and bisexual civil rights bill and the end of discrimination by the government, including the military. We are also asking for a repeal of all sodomy laws and other laws that outlaw private sexual expression between consenting adults. These laws are just as outdated as the Pennsylvania law that prevents sororities from having houses due to the fact that many woman living under one roof is considered a brothel. These laws are just useless.

> People all really want the same thing: the right to be who they want and to love whom they want.

We want a massive increase in funding for AIDS research and patient care, a goal that crosses sexual orientation boundaries. Universal access to health care and an end of sexism in the health care and medical research professions are goals that will help both the heterosexual and homosexual communities which have been devastated by the AIDS epidemic.

Legislation preventing discrimination against gays, lesbians, and bisexuals in the area of family diversity, custody, adoption, and foster care are also demanded. The definition of family needs should include the full diversity of all family structures.

Education must have equal inclusion for all sexual orientations. Gays, lesbians, and bisexuals must have a place in multicultural curricula.

We demand the right to reproductive freedom and choice, control of our bodies, and an end to sexual discrimination.

We demand an end to racial and ethnic discrimination in all forms.

Finally, we demand an end to discrimination and violent oppression based on actual or perceived identification of sexual orientation, race, religion, identity, sex and gender expression, disability, age, class, and AIDS/HIV infection.

As you can see, the march covers a wide gamut of issues that affect both the homosexual and heterosexual communities. It simply comes down to the fact that every human deserves to be treated with equal respect regardless of whether the person is straight or gay, white or black, rich or poor, man or woman. If you think about it, people all really want the same thing: the right to be who they want and to love whom they want. That is what this march is all about.

Please support this heartfelt cause. If you can attend the march, please do so! Talk to any FLAG & B members for information or you can call me (x5074). If you can not attend, you can support gay, lesbian, and bisexual rights right here on campus by wearing jeans on Jeans Day, April 30.

Droms clarifies news piece

TO THE EDITOR:

In the second paragraph of Maria Glod's article of April 9 describing new procedures for user password generation, you included a quote from me describing the old procedure. The following sentence includes several potentially offensive passwords assigned by that procedure. From the juxtaposition of the two sentences, your readers might infer that Ms. Glod obtained those passwords from me. It would, of course, be foolish for me as Co-Director of Computer Services to reveal any user passwords under any circumstances. I want to make it clear that I don't know who gave out the passwords and that neither Gene Spencer nor I am the source of the passwords in your article.

New January policy would ruin ski team

TO THE EDITOR:

At the April faculty meeting professor Andrea Halpern, chair of the Committee on Instruction, presented a January residence policy. I must say that I have a serious qualm with this proposed policy. I am a member of the Bucknell ski team. We are a club sport that races five weekends during the winter and is annually a contender for nationals. However, if this policy is implemented, I am afraid that this sport will no longer be offered at Bucknell.

The athletes that the policy permits on campus during January are only those "involved in winter varsity sports teams with scheduled events during that period." As a club sport, the ski team will be denied residence on campus. This would make it rather difficult for those members who live within a few hours of campus to commute to practices and meets. It would be utterly impossible for those who live farther; we have members from Vermont, Colorado, and California.

In all reality, this club would be forced out of existence. That would be very tragic. We have very talented athletes among us. In fact, the Men's A-Team traveled to Squaw Valley, California to compete in the national competition this past March. The Women's team made nationals last year.

Professor Halpern, do you feel it would be right to take such a great opportunity and sport away from those who truly love it? I do believe, because the Jan Plan has been unfortunately canceled, that there should be residence restrictions. But the restrictions should not be that strict. Club sports should not be forbidden campus residence while varsity sports are allowed on campus.

Veritas looking for input

TO THE EDITOR:

Some concerns have been raised in regard to Veritas, the student course/faculty evaluation booklet. These include the booklet format, the value of the questions asked, and the lack of participation. These issues are being addressed. As a result, the questionnaires will not be distributed this semester. The Veritas committee is already working to improve the Veritas for next year. OPINIONS

Constitution does not protect rights of blacks

BY LARNIE J. BOOKER
Bucknellian Columnist

In response to the opinions piece "Let the jury decide the Rodney King trial," by Tom Malinich in the April 2 issue of The Bucknellian: Mr. Malinich, what are you, some kind of idiot? You are just as blind as the jurors in the first Rodney King trial. You began by referring to your knowledge of American history and the idea that a person is innocent until proven guilty. Please take into consideration that you are quoting an inaccurate source. The American history you learned failed to include contributions of minorities to our society, so please do use a better reference next time.

Let me begin by attacking your concept that the Constitution is the legal writ which we should be following. First of all, the Constitution was written by white males, hence that is who it was written to benefit. It does not protect the rights of African-Americans. Of course you wouldn't know what it's like not to have your rights protected. Whenever you're pulled over by the police, I'm sure the thought of having your car searched for no reason does not cross your mind. I don't think that your life immediately becomes endangered. But you want to use the Constitution as a reference—sorry, try again!

> Justice is something that this country must seek. If you think that the police have the right to beat and verbally insult a person as was done to Mr. King, then you have a serious problem.

I would like for you to tell me how good the Constitution is if people can't believe in it. The people of South Central Los Angeles are plagued by poverty, crime, and drug-infested streets. You would think that the law would be there to protect them, yet with the first Rodney King verdict, they realized that this is not true. The Constitution means nothing to these people if their rights are not protected by it. It is merely a piece of paper that was written over 200 years ago. These people are fighting for survival and the first verdict showed them that their survival is not guaranteed.

I can guarantee you that if the officers had been black and the driver had been white, the trial would have lasted all but two minutes and those officers would have had the electric chairs brought to their houses.

You mentioned the Seventh Amendment, which mandates a trial by a capable and unbiased jury. Close your eyes and flash back with me to the first trial. The trial was moved to the white suburb of retired police officers and the entire jury was white. Oh yeah, that's a capable and unbiased jury. Open your damn eyes.

Justice is something that this country must seek. If you think that the police have the right to beat and verbally insult a person as was done to Mr. King, then you have a serious problem. You feel that we should live with the decision of the jurors. If you happen to have any free time, I'll be glad to receive no legal action for beating the hell out of you. I'm sure that your attitude will remain the same until one day the shoe is on the other foot and the police or somebody else is kicking your ass. I hope that I'm fortunate enough to be the person with the video camera, because I'll turn the damn thing off and walk away. But hey, it won't matter, because your Constitution will protect you.

You ended by saying that we should sit back, relax, and let the system work! If the damned thing worked, we would be able to sit back, but since it doesn't, minorities in this country are going to keep kicking it like a broken soda machine. We'll just keep kicking away at it until we get what we deserve or restitution for the injustices and pain that we have had to suffer.

Military reductions are not safe

BY CRISTINA M. TISA
Bucknellian Columnist

We've heard it and heard it, and Clinton was elected to do it. The military machine has succeeded in winning the Cold War and the New World Order is one of peace and cooperation. Now we can rest, and our service men and women can turn in their uniforms and give up their weapons. Military reduction is a great idea whose time has come. Right?

No. Now, perhaps more than ever, we need to maintain our strength and supremacy in order that we might lead the way to this New World Order. Granted, we probably have more than enough nuclear weaponry to ensure that a nuclear war never occurs. That was the gist of the arms race with the Soviet Union. However, the USSR no longer exists, and the 27,000-odd nuclear weapons that protected one nation now protect four: Russia, the Ukraine, Kazakhstan, and Byelorussia. Third World states such as Pakistan, Cuba, and Iraq possess, or are working to possess, nuclear capability, and I don't need to go into detail about the nature of those unstable dictatorships. The only means our government has to protect us is through a large, diverse, and specialized military.

> We can no longer depend on the permanency of states to establish and preserve peace.

A bigger threat lies within the conventional sector. The weapons used to control and conquer are commonplace, and the former Soviet stockpile has been divvied up among the new republics. The same four republics that shelter most of the nuclear capabilities also control 90% of the tactical weaponry.

The fall of the Iron Curtain does not mean that the world has become a safer place. Rather, it has become more volatile and unpredictable, and the threat of nuclear war has perhaps become more real. A united Germany could present a clear and present threat to global security. Helmut Kohl wants to make Germany the leader in the new United States of Europe, politically and economically. Sound familiar?

It is also important to remember that tensions with Russia, the successor state to the USSR, could escalate as rapidly as they were reduced. The Soviet Union was little more than a Third World state with a huge military budget, and the latest political crisis in Russia beautifully demonstrates the relative instability that has been characteristic of the region since the fall of the Romanovs. How can we so readily trust a nation that has been an enemy for so many decades?

It is not only for the reason of global security that I am against military reductions. About one third of government spending occurs in the military-industrial complex. Any of you who live in Connecticut know that a portion of your state depended on military contracts to maintain a strong economy. With the cutbacks that began under George Bush and continue under Bill Clinton, this region has suffered tremendously. The inability of the industry to adapt to civilian production caused it to self-destruct. Now thousands of people who once had well-paying jobs with good benefits are displaced into the national unemployment pool. And, since the industrial sector constitutes only about 12% of the national economy today, these people have no chance to obtain similar positions. If the government plans to close down hardware production plants, it must also provide a plan of recovery, and that must include plans to revive the manufacturing base.

In addition to the civilian employees, what about the discharged soldiers? Again, due to the condition of the economy, there isn't much for the servicemen and women to come home to. The military provides many people with an opportunity to attend college who normally could not afford it. It teaches skills and discipline that could be helpful to those not as privileged as you and I. If the military is reduced, what will become of these people?

The strategic climate in Europe has changed. We can no longer depend on the permanency of states to establish and preserve peace. As the remaining superpower, the United States must accept its role as leader. We must re-establish our economic strength and maintain our military capabilities. We have been in the front too long to abdicate, and we are too intertwined in global affairs to back down.

Foreign intervention will still be needed

BY ROSS FEINGOLD
Bucknellian Columnist

Doesn't it seem that an American president's administration is always going from one to another important juncture? The now not-so-young administration of Bill Clinton has certainly reached an important juncture in charting American foreign and military policy. In academia and in the media, the words "with the end of the Cold War..." have come to be the first words in any proposal or opinion in regard to American policies for the 90's. Indeed, with the end of the East-West conflict, President Clinton has the opportunity to re-define policy, and it is incumbent upon the President that he choose the most prudent course.

The great debate centers around what that course should be. However, precedent has already been set for the proper role of the Cold War victors, not only for the United States, but for the nations of Western Europe and Japan. Working within the appropriate framework of international organizations, most likely the resurgent United Nations, the western powers must finally show the world that they are prepared to use their power for the betterment of their fellow humans. While some would have the United States shut itself off to the problems of the world, in such an increasingly interdependent world this is not only morally wrong but also foolish. Indeed, it is time again for the United States to become the arsenal of democracy.

It is not necessary, nor possible, for the United States to be involved all over the world, all the time. But when great upheaval or suffering occurs, the United States must become involved, whether it be through diplomacy or through force if the situation calls for it. Two world wars this century show the need for, and set precedent for, heavy involvement in world affairs. The United States has intervened to stop aggression (Korea, Kuwait) and to keep the peace (Dominican Republic, Lebanon, Grenada, Somalia) and must assume these roles in current and future crises. The costs of intervention today pale in comparison to the costs of cleaning up a greater debacle tomorrow. Imagine if the world had not shut its eyes to Bosnia a year ago. Not only would an inordinate amount of bloodshed have been avoided, but if the fighting could have been defused, world payments in humanitarian aid, peacekeeping operations, and rebuilding the devastated areas would have been much, much less.

Crossing Lines

SELF AS CONTENT (TRUE ARTISTIC NARCISSISM)

IT STRIKES ME that some of the most astute assessments of myself and my work have come from anonymous sources. I began to notice this puzzling phenomenon a few months ago when I received a piece of "fan mail" in my box (C-970 in case anyone else is interested). The profoundly sincere letter was apparently penned by an introspective sophomore with impeccable taste in literature. After spending the first half of the page assuring me that she was in no way a bunny-broiling, bathtub-attacking psychopath with a fondness for ice-picks, silk scarves, and single white females, she went on to declare that she found my work "unique and entertaining." However, she chose not to identify herself because of the "inherent fear of being laughed at or scorned for doing something a bit out of the ordinary."

Now, coming from a family which brimmed with unrealistic expectations and conditional validations, I could not possibly imagine ever producing anything for which I wouldn't take full credit. Could it be that there really are some extraordinarily well-adjusted people in this world who spend time and energy laboring away at projects for the sake of creativity and emotion rather than acknowledgment? Amazing! Inconceivable!! It can't be true!!! Just ask campus newspaper editors who spend their time rewording press releases and giving themselves the byline. It's just not possible.

The next chunk of criticism was recently delivered to me secondhand by a decent enough engineering student at a boring enough gateway party. The engineer introduced himself as Jordan and then proceeded to inform me that one of his roommates (of course, Jordan wouldn't tell me the guy's name) consistently read "Crossing Lines" over dinner and despised it so much that he would frequently choke on his meal, causing driblets of partially-chewed mashed potato to fly from his mouth and onto my column.

"He'd say things like 'I don't understand this! What is he talking about here?'" Jordan told me. And then, even after he wiped off the mashed potato stains he still couldn't understand it. "I guess he thinks it's just too literary for The Bucknellian. You know—with all the big words and everything," Jordan hypothesized, as the other eight party guests clutched their oversized dixie cups and searched for the largest body of people to lose themselves in. I was supremely flattered.

Jordan also inquired about my writing process, stating that the feeling he got was that my work was extremely personal and stream of consciousness with no outlining or drafting. I told him he was partially correct. Usually I start with a driblet-sized list, highlighting the major themes and subject matters. This week's jottings looked exactly like this: anonymity; fan letter; conditional validation; press releases; Gateway party; Jordan the engineer; mashed potato driblets; stream of consciousness; Picasso Pills; phone call; McNutt; April Fool's Joke apology letter; Barbara Shailor; bestiality; truth; thank you; penis envy; obligatory narcissism; signature.

After making the list, I commit it to memory, tear it up, and head for my top dresser drawer filled with the standard writer's arsenal of Basidiomycetes and Picasso Pills. Then I just place my hands in some key position and, like Narcissus, contemplate my most favorite subject in the whole, wide world. Twenty-two minutes later, it's all over. The reflections have splattered on screen. I open a pack of cigarettes.

The latest evaluation of my columns took the form of an extended message left on my answering machine last Friday night. The caller, "in the interests of anonymity," wouldn't leave his name, but he was extremely distressed that I had not written in two weeks. In a tone absolutely saturated with benevolent concern, he informed my tape that he always enjoyed my "way of...driv[ing] the point home," and if I was experiencing writer's block he would be more than happy to lend me some of his ideas for a modest fee. Judging from the amount of time it took him to complete the difficult and demanding task of hanging up his receiver after he was finished with the proposition, he probably wasn't the soberest person in the world when he called, but it was still a nice gesture. Now get a life.

Actually, I would have been proud to write for last week's paper—an issue with two of the most brilliant articles I have ever seen in The Bucknellian. The first was Steve McNutt's self-anecdotal response to Bucknell Security's ticketing of his dead car. Fantastic stuff. The kid can draw and tell a story—a true wunderkindt. Even if the anonymous forces of POWER. don't like him, he's still gonna make it BIG. Just as long as he doesn't stoop to scribing narcissistic columns with phallic two-word titles, obscure continuities, and pretentious praising of peers for work that seems as indulgent as his own.

The second genius item was Cortney Todd's "apology" letter to Bucknell, Barbara Shailor, and the rest of the known universe for what had to be one of the greatest April Fool's Day jokes of all time. When Barbara officiously assisted in stripping the prankster of her anonymity, she actually helped to raise the joke up to truly artistic proportions. Todd was given the opportunity to assemble a wonderfully veiled statement of purpose and take proper credit for her creativity. Thanks, Barbara!

I feel like I can address Barbara by her first name now after a brief telephone conversation we had over spring break where she revealed herself to be an assiduous reader of my writing. However, the column in which I claimed I slipped the entire senior survey under my shirt and then proceeded to print my own oblique rendition of it moved the dean to a state described by others as "angry condescension." So I felt the need to phone Ms. Shailor and inform her that not everything she may see in print is exactly true. I also wished to reveal that: the twelve foot man from Mars she may have read about might not, in reality, have given birth to a baby with three heads; Elvis, in actuality, is really dead; and I, in fact, was given the addendum to the survey by the proctor of the exam (so remember that before you start rounding up a search party to check for the Basidiomycetes and the Picasso Pills). Anyway, I felt like we ended our conservation the best of friends. I, the faceless writer, came forward, revealed my truth, and endeavored to defend my humanity. Finally, I wished to explain that my sole creative purpose was simply to buffer the tragic indulgences of ourselves, this university, and life by creating both comic acknowledgments and false continuities—but I didn't know if it would be appropriate.

"Lewisburg, 17837" By Steve McNutt '95

Put some emphasis on grades and hard work

BY KATIE STRAUCH

Last week The Bucknellian ran an article written by Jason Spiegelman concerning the relevancy of a high GPA to a student's happiness. Normally, when I disagree with editorials, I am momentarily enraged and vow to write a scathing response, but then I am distracted somehow and the impulse is gone. This week, however, I will not be distracted, and I will write the response (but I hope it doesn't seem too scathing).

In his article, Jason contends that the Dean's List is a means of creating a "cut-off point between 'distinction' and 'despair.'" He went on to complain, "so much stress is placed on getting a 3.8 and straight A's that the true experience of college is almost lost." Finally, he listed "what is really important: happiness, health, flowers, sunsets, friends, malted milk balls, bananas that are just ripe enough, and Mountain Dew."

Okay, decade check? 1960? Nope? Phew, we are still in the 90's; I wasn't sure for a second (by the way Jason, thank God you didn't say "love"—that would have been just too much).

Please don't get me wrong. I'm not some overstressed, 4.0-crazed, Hitler-mentality, workaholic whose idea of fun is sitting home at night and computing my GPA. On the contrary, I go out quite frequently (perhaps too frequently) and I am all for "smelling the roses." No doubt; having fun, enjoying yourself, and appreciating the aesthetics of life are essential to experiencing life to its fullest—yet, unfortunately, people these days (not just at Bucknell) take that attitude too far. Therefore, I felt compelled to write an article, not to criticize Jason's point of view, but to counterbalance it.

Presently, it seems people are afraid to set standards for themselves because, if they do, they just might have to live up to them.

I don't know what school Jason is talking about when he says students place too much emphasis on grades (and by the way, I've heard this complaint from others, too), but I personally come across far more people at Bucknell who would rather settle for a low GPA and "have fun" than who would admit they want to work hard for a high GPA. All too often, I come across students who say, "Screw it! What do grades mean anyway?" Well, I'll tell you: Whether you believe it or not, it is not the raw, "on-my-transcript" interpretation of achieving an "A," "B," or "C" that grades stand for—it's the work that goes into the achievement. It is hard for most people to get an "A" at Bucknell. In order to get an "A" (for the most part) one has to attend classes regularly and put some serious effort into their work. This type of motivation almost always leads (as it has for me) to getting the most out of our classes (which, incidentally, is the principle reason we're here). I would hate to see this type of behavior devalued by the "don't-worry-be-happy" mentality.

The "A," like the Dean's List, is a goal for which to shoot and work hard. Many hard-working students never achieve the "A" (although I believe very few students at Bucknell, if they truly worked hard, couldn't achieve an "A"), but that doesn't make their accomplishment any less admirable—as long as they were truly shooting for the "the goal."

My point is this: I agree, having fun in college is important—but don't use that as an excuse to blow off achieving excellence. Don't settle for less. Don't be mediocre. That is what too many people do.

I am sick and tired of people "excusing" themselves out of achieving excellence: "Well, I would do well, but the important thing in college is friends." "Yeah, that paper is due tomorrow, but it's such a beautiful day out. I'll just schmooze my way into an extension." Grades are a measure of one's performance. They represent results and, whether you like it or not, results do count. Remember: college is the last time we will get credit for "trying." After college it won't be the effort we put in that counts, but the results our efforts achieve. We must not lose sight of this concept.

> It seems people are afraid to set standards for themselves because, if they do, they just might have to live up to them.

People must hold themselves responsible for their actions. While it is important to take time to "watch the sunset" and "live for the day," we must be careful not to place too much emphasis on that mentality and not enough on the value of personal accomplishment through motivation, perseverance, and determination.

People don't work hard enough. Look around you—how many people do you know who have real standards for themselves and work hard to live up to them? Not that many, I'm sure.

Believe it or not, I am far from being a cynic. Fundamentally, I believe students at Bucknell are going to learn eventually (if not now) how to live responsibly. I just don't want people to forget that my point of view pertains to the real world. Whether you are a teacher, artist, businessperson, volunteer, or banker, it will be your results by which you are measured. Now is the time to start finding that balance between work and play. It is fun to play, but it is even more fun to achieve. Don't forget that we are attending Bucknell to prepare ourselves for the world in which we must be productive.

And so, Jason, there is meaning behind the Dean's List, the "A," and "a standard." The standard was not created to beat you down, but lift you up. It's all in how you look at it.

Your point is welltaken, but keep in mind, your mentality will never lead to what is probably the highest form of happiness: Dignity through personal achievement and satisfaction with oneself.

Teach Chinese language here

BY BRIAN ENG
Bucknellian Columnist

Many students around campus have been hearing a lot about multiculturalism lately, but what exactly is multiculturalism? So many people today, including myself, don't really have a clear-cut answer to that question. As a community, here at Bucknell, what must we do and how must we feel to be multicultural-ized?

The first step in answering this question is clearly through education. Well, interestingly enough, each of us happens to be part of a community of individuals at an educational institution. There could be no better situation.

When we are talking about multiculturalizing a community through education, the first thing we should do is to begin to learn about all of the cultures that exist within the community. Since we happen to have classes and professors, we might as well educate ourselves in the classroom. One of the most important things about any culture that can be taught in the classroom is the language of that culture.

There has recently been a request made of the University that a Chinese language course be added to the curriculum. The introduction of this course would be an incredible start on the long road to educating the students at this University, present and future, on the subject of multiculturalism. There are already many courses in foreign languages and cultures here, and one more will bring just that much more strength to the foreign language department and to the ideals of multiculturalism here at Bucknell.

One thing keeps this course from being established—the University needs substantial assurance that there will be enough people interested in taking the course. After all, a new course requires a new professor and new course materials, and this costs the University new money. A petition has been circulated to see how many people would take the course. It's important that people sign this petition; it shows the administration that we care.

There are so many benefits to taking Chinese language and culture courses that it is difficult to fathom why there would be a lack of interest. There are more Chinese people than any other people in the world, and the Chinese language is the language most commonly spoken. It is one of the oldest cultures, and it would be an incredible experience to be able to study it.

But, like I said, there has to be enough interest in the course for it to ever get off the ground. Most students on campus would agree that there is no cultural diversity at Bucknell, which brings me back to my original point—we need to bring a multicultural attitude to this University. The establishment of this course would be a place to start. Multiculturalism is in the future for all of us—whether we like it or not, the majority of the world outside of the Bucknell Bubble is diverse. Multiculturalism is out there, and it's going to be out there long after we all leave this place. So let's get a head start on our lives right here.

FOREIGN

The time has come to put past foreign policy adventures behind us. President Clinton is in the position to issue a new American doctrine regarding foreign affairs, one that can be free from Cold War priorities and based on doing the morally correct thing, without fear of compromising resources in the face of an enemy threat. Sure, there can and will be real dollar costs in order to accomplish the goal of actually ensuring the existence of a new world order, but the human costs of not committing oneself to such a goal are much greater. We must decide whether we want a little red ink on the books or a lot of red blood on our hands.

Choose your strategy: The dreaded telemarketers are back

BY NANCY NORBECK
Bucknellian Columnist

This morning found me facing one of life's greatest indignities head-on. No, I am not talking about Rush Limbaugh. I am talking about telemarketing. And I want to let everyone in on the secret I discovered: how to get them to leave you alone.

Just as I approached the threshold of sleep (after asking some of my neighbors to refrain from their shrieking, at ten o'clock in the morning), my telephone rang, at a volume that could be heard by people in Kress (I live in Trax). I instantly bolted upright and reached for the phone.

I found myself uttering the usual furious statements, things like, "This had @$%*! well better be important!" Imagine, then, my utter disgust when I heard the voice on the other end of the phone saying, "Hello, I'm from MBNA, and I'd like to talk to you about our Visa card." Yeah, lady, I'll tell you what you can do with your Visa card.

She went on. "How are you today?"

And here were the immortal words that broke the telemarketing spell: "I WAS ASLEEP."

To my utter astonishment, she said, "Oh, I'm sorry to have disturbed you, we'll call you back at a More Convenient Time."

"GOOD," I replied as I hung up the phone.

It wasn't until later that I realized that this woman had said she would call back at a More Convenient Time, but had never bothered to ask me when that would be. I can only assume that she meant a More Convenient Time for her, and not a More Convenient Time for me. It's kind of a shame she didn't ask, because I probably would have told her that the soonest Convenient Time I have available would be sometime in 1998. By then, at least, I won't be at this number, and some other poor slob can answer it for me.

Credit card companies are by far the worst. I have heard endless tales of people being caught on the phone for hours on end because some telemarketer simply won't let them hang up. I suppose it should be a testament to our collective upbringing that we can't be so rude as to hang up on these people.

Mass mailings are the partners of these calls. I cannot count the number of trees that have been killed so that American Express and Chase Visa could send me applications for their cards, just so that I can throw them out. I do suspect, though, that if I had a credit card for each of the mailers I received this year alone, I could get a good game of poker going with them, though shuffling might be a little difficult.

From what I hear, my recent call was probably the quickest telemarketing call in history. I got a similar call one afternoon freshman year and tried convincing the caller that I already had a Visa card and didn't want another one. It didn't work. "Well, you can have ours, too," she said, "and our card features the lowest interest rate around, at a mere three billion percent, and no annual fee if you choose to sign over your first-born child. We really think this is a great deal and you're going to love our card and won't you sign up right now?"

One of my friends has a similar problem, only the people who call her think she's married. They call up and ask if Mrs. Jones is there, which is only slightly better than those people who call up and ask to "speak to the Lady of the House." I'd love to get one of those before I graduate. I'd keep them on the phone for hours while all the women in Trax debate over which one best qualifies as the "Lady of the House."

My friend gets these calls, too. They always want her to buy major appliances. She is 21 years old. She does not rent an apartment, much less own a house. She lives in a dorm room in Trax Hall. She tries to explain this to them, but they do not seem to be prepared to believe that she is not married, let alone that she would have no place to put a major appliance if she even had any interest in owning one.

My friend Curt has discovered that turning the tables on telemarketers tends to produce some interesting results. When a credit card company called him once, he explained to them that he could get a much better deal from his credit union, and he even offered to sign the caller up for a card. Another time he tried to sell his camera to the caller. He assures me that each time he found himself rolling on the floor laughing when he got off the phone.

I have a problem being too cruel to telemarketers, though, because I am an English major, and since I have visited the Career Rejection Center frequently this year, I realize that after I graduate, I too may have no recourse but to be a telemarketer, calling sleeping college students on weekend mornings. The thought chills me clear to the bone.

Senior holds grand ideas for future

BY NINA KNOCHE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Have you ever attended a play and not noticed the set? Bucknell senior Tim Steimle strives to create a set that neither overshadows nor hinders a performance, and often that takes more imagination than the most elaborate constructions.

Designing the set for the department of theatre and dance's production of Our Country's Good marks the final of a series of set designs for Steimle at Bucknell. Our Country's Good will be performed at 8 p.m. on Apr. 23-26 in Coleman Theatre. Tickets are $4 and available at the Elaine Langone Box Office.

Previously Steimle has designed the sets for three Cap & Dagger One Act Plays during the now-defunct JanPlan and in addition acted as technical director for the One Act's last year. He has also designed set pieces for the Bucknell Dance Company and directed a Cocktail Theatre during his sophomore year.

The idea for a set design is a combination of collaboration and imagination. Before hitting the drafting table Steimle says he researches the period and history of the play, reads the script, and talks with the director about what images he or she would like to use in the production. And, said Steimle, "I use a lot of visual metaphor in my work."

In his design for Our Country's Good, a play about European convicts shipped to Australia to found a new colony, Steimle wanted to find something that would give the feeling of a people ripped from their homeland and almost "lost in space." To create that effect, he used the concept of a raked stage, a large platform that slants upward from the audience, covering the entire stage area. For Our Country's Good the rake cuts off at ragged edges along the front edge, giving the space a sense of isolation.

Other set pieces and props have been reduced to their most minimal, apocalyptic sense. Steimle also designed a ceiling grid reminiscent of a deck ship that extends from the back wall out past the curtain line. Hanging over half of the entire stage, the grid is meant to give audience members a feeling of "oppression and entrapment."

Steimle's interest in theatre and set design began when he took his first drama course in sixth grade. Having performed on stage as well as helping out back stage during high school, he decided to pursue a career in set design at Bucknell.

A double major in art and theatre, Steimle enjoys painting, drawing, and sculpting in addition to designing. "[I] enjoy the tangible quality of visual art and temporary quality of set design because the set gets destroyed at the end of the production," said Steimle.

Steimle views his art as a means to create social revolution and positive change. His hope is that after seeing his work, people will grow into an understanding of themselves as well as of society.

After graduation Steimle hopes to spend a year working on his studio art at Bucknell before attending graduate school for a Masters of Fine Arts.

Students redefine opera in Tustin

The Bucknell Opera Company—ain't no fat ladies singing here

Susan Naughton—The Bucknellian

Members of the Bucknell Opera Company, Karen Losch '93 and Ken Laurora '95, rehearse for the group's show this weekend. The company will perform tonight and tomorrow in the Tustin Studio Theatre.

BY JOSH DEWALD
Bucknellian Staff Writer

If when you picture a typical opera, stuffy women singing in foreign languages of foreign subjects personify your perceptions, the Bucknell Opera Company's upcoming performance will attempt to change your tune. The company will perform tonight and tomorrow night at 8 p.m. in the Tustin Studio Theatre. Tickets are free but must be reserved through the department of music.

Throughout their program, the company will combine four separate segments of diversified opera into a modern spectacle. It will be performing segments from the "Impresario" by Mozart, the "Suor Angelica" by Puccinni, "Alice in Wonderland" by Robert Churls, and "Locus Valley Love Song" by Dr. S. Jackson Hill, associate dean of arts and sciences and professor of music. The opera will be sung completely in English, although two of the original pieces were written in Italian.

"Opera has grown and changed into many different directions as a medium," said John Caponegro '94, speaking of the diversity and atypical nature of the performance. "If you've never seen opera before, or if you have a biased view of it, come and find out what it's about."

Indeed, this weekend's show exemplifies many different operatic time periods, ranging from the 17th century tone of the Mozart to the recently finished work of Dr. Hill—a full 200 year span. Caponegro, who will play the roles of the Cheshire Cat in "Alice in Wonderland" and Tom Riley in "Locus Valley Love Song," is preparing to sing in his fourth production with the company.

Catherine Payn, assistant professor of music and director of the company, explained the emphasis on a balance between the serious and the comic. She spoke of the upcoming performance as showing "the diversity of repertoire that is inherent in the art form" by mixing works of traditional heritage with some contemporary forms moving in new directions.

Payn also referred to the diversity and humor of the production combining to show that there is "some repertoire for all tastes and all types of voices."

The opera, according to Payn, provides a wonderful outlet for the Bucknell community because it "allows students to integrate studies in literature with their interests in music, theatre, and psychology."

Both Payn and Caponegro agree that the show holds no leads per se, but a host of equally important roles. "Everybody has a part which is differently important," said Caponegro. "There are no leads because the scenes are all different."

The Bucknell Opera Company is comprised of 18 students, chosen through auditions, 16 of whom will perform this weekend. Although two of the singers are vocal performance majors, the majority of the company is made up of non-music majors. However, added Payn, they all have a love of music, and are required not only to be singers, but actors, and in one extreme case this time, dancers.

"The students commit to a long-term relationship with the company," said Payn, explaining how she chose the programming over a four-year span so that the students could experience all different sorts of styles. The programming is also chosen according to which pieces are better suited for young voices, although any operatic literature is extremely technically demanding.

As has been tradition in past spring performances, the tone of the opera will be slightly lighter than that of the fall performance, and of a more comic nature with many surprises. In general, the production promises to be an entertaining and cultural experience, valuable and interesting for any who attend.

So if you're interested in a defiance of stereotypes, a diverse operatic performance with a proper balance of serious opera and comic relief, and a production free of fat ladies, horns, and spears, the place to be is Tustin.

Student concert captures Weis

Symphonic Band and Wind Ensemble hold joint performance

The Bucknell University Symphonic Band and Wind Ensemble, under the direction of William Kenny, assistant professor of music and director of bands, will present a concert on Sunday, April 18 at 2:30 p.m. in the Weis Center. The concert's program includes various works by Sir Arthur Sullivan, Gustav Holst, John Williams, John Phillip Sousa, and others.

The Wind Ensemble will perform "Moorside March from 'A Moorside Suite'" by Gustav Holst; "Giles Farnaby Suite" by Gordon Jacob; "An American Medley" for brass quintet, flute and percussion by Allan Black; and "Pineapple Poll" by Arthur Sullivan.

Following a brief intermission, the Symphonic Band will perform "Sketches on a Tudor Psalm" by Fisher Tull, "Ye Banks and Braes o' Bonnie Doon" by Percy Aldridge Grainger, "Second Suite in F for Military Band" by Gustav Holst, "The Symphonic Marches" by John Williams, and "The Glory of the Yankee Navy" by John Phillip Sousa.

Kenny has been with the music department since 1990. He holds degrees from Oregon State University and the University of Illinois, and is a member of the Commonwealth Brass Quintet.

Sunday's concert is free and open to the public. For more information about the availability of any special accommodations or services regarding this event, contact Ruth Burnham at 524-1031.

Lucier closes Gallery music series

As the final event in Bucknell's Gallery Series, Alvin Lucier, a pioneer of experimental music, will perform his most famous work "I am Sitting in a Room." The concert will take place on Tuesday, April 20, at 8 p.m. in the Center Gallery in the Elaine Langone Center.

"I am Sitting in a Room" is a "chance to experience the avant-garde firsthand with one of its creators," said Wiliam Duckworth, professor of music at Bucknell and director of the Gallery Series.

Lucier has been a leading innovator in many areas of music composition and performance, including the use of brain waves in live performance and the generation of visual imagery by sound in vibrating media.

At Tuesday evening's performance, Lucier will re-create his original work by repeatedly broadcasting his speaking voice within the Center Gallery to the point that the resonant frequencies of the room are enhanced and become discernable. Because the acoustic properties of each room varies, Lucier's performance will create a sound unique to the Center Gallery.

Lucier will also present some of his most recent works which include "Nothing is Real (Strawberry Fields)" for piano, teapot, and miniature sound system; and "Music for Piano with Amplified Sonorous Vessels" for piano, wine glass, clay pot, sea shell, and bamboo vase.

Born in Nashua, New Hampshire, Lucier was educated at the Portsmouth Abbey School, Yale, and Brandeis before spending two years in Rome on a Fulbright Scholarship. He has taught at Brandeis, and conducted the University Chamber Chorus which devoted much of its time to the performance of new music.

Lucier has performed and lectured extensively in the United States, Europe, and Asia. He has written a book, in collaboration with Douglas Simon, entitled Chambers, and has recorded his works with several studios.

Recently Lucier has been composing works for solo instruments, chamber ensembles, and orchestra. These works explore, by means of close tunings with pure tones, the movement of sound waves spinning through space.

The continuing series of performing art and experimental music is funded in part by grants from the Meet the Composer and the Bucknell University department of music.

Bison sweep two Buckeye foes

DARREN S. MILLMAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

After a weekend in which the men's lacrosse team ran like a well-oiled machine, leaving its opponents, Butler and Ohio State, mired in the mud of Lewisburg, the Bison appeared poised for a long-awaited upset victory at Penn on Wednesday.

Bucknell confidently took the field against the Quakers and let the host team know that it was in for a battle from the opening faceoff to the final whistle. Those who attended the game were not disappointed, as the first quarter shaped up to be just as thrilling as one might have expected, with the home team holding a slim 2-1 lead after 15 minutes of play.

The cool Philadelphia evening was no match for the two opposing offenses, both of which heated up in the second quarter of play. Once again, the evenly matched teams played to a virtual deadlock, with the Quakers increasing their lead by only a single goal and bringing the score at halftime to 6-4.

"This was an awesome game," said midfielder Garrett Austin '94. "The momentum see-sawed back and forth nearly the entire game." This classic contest became even more exciting in the third quarter, as the teams fought and clawed to score five goals apiece.

The two-goal margin at the onset of the final quarter of play was the closest the Bison would get. Penn finally seized the opportunity to extend its lead over the Bison, and pulled away to a 15-10 victory. Bucknell's record is now evened at 4-4.

"This was definitely the toughest loss of the season," said Austin, "but I also think we will handle this one the best. Coach Fedorjaka put it best when he said, 'The only way you're losers after that game is if you hold your heads low for the remainder of the season.'"

Justin Zackey '94 continued his recent goal-scoring barrage, tallying five more in the game to bring his season total to 31. Fellow attackman Todd Streelman '93 also had five points in the game, registering a goal and four assists.

The midwest lacrosse roadshow visited Lewisburg last weekend as Bucknell clashed with Butler on Saturday and Ohio State on Sunday. Butler put up little resistance to the Bison's offensive attack, allowing the home team to jump out to a 7-2 halftime lead. Bucknell put it in cruise control during the third quarter before pounding the visitors 6-1 in the final 15 minutes of play en route to the 15-5 win.

A total of 11 players got their names in the scoring column for the Bison including close defenseman Sean Krieg '94, who recorded the first goal of his career. Zackey led all scorers with four goals and one assist, while Streelman dished off four assists. Midfielder Chris Pemberton '95 (three goals) and attackman Steven Lewis '95 (one goal, two assists) both excelled for the Bison. Austin also had a multiple-point game, notching a goal and an assist.

The Ohio State game on Sunday was something of an oddity because only the uniforms on the players remained constant from the first half to the second. The first 30 minutes featured a closely contested battle with the home team holding on to only a 7-5 margin at the half. What once appeared to be a close game rapidly developed into a full-fledged rout, as Bucknell blasted the Buckeyes 13-3 in the second half for a 20-8 win.

Not to be outdone by the day before, 11 Bison players registered points once again. Krieg must have discovered the secret to going coast-to-coast for the score, because he did it once again for career goal number two.

Streelman exploded for a team season-high ten points (six goals, four assists). Zackey had seven points of his own (five goals, two assists), and Lewis added a goal and three assists.

Bucknell will be at Lehigh on Sunday before traveling to Penn State on Wednesday for a 7:30 p.m. contest.

Although he said the team will not look past Lehigh, Austin did say, "Right now we're really focusing on Penn State." Penn State promises to be a hard-fought battle.

Lisa Fink '93 drives the ball against Towson State during Bucknell's last home game. The centerfielder is fourth in the nation in stolen bases and ranked in hitting with a better than .450 average.

Noted genius and Hall of Fame manager Casey Stengel once said, "This game is 90% mental and the other half is just physical." Now Stengel never played college softball (it's the college part that would've been most difficult for Casey), but his understanding of what it takes to be a winner in baseball applies to almost any sport. If only this year's softball team, with its 13-3 record (the best start in school history), would give themselves a little credit and use that 90% to their advantage.

Traveling to Army last Friday afternoon for a doubleheader against the two-time defending Patriot League champions, the Lady Bison "never really got off the van" for the first game. Head coach Terrie Grieb saw another explanation for her team's shaky performance in losing the opener 10-0. She has tried to convince her team all along that it is as good as its record, but that lesson is one most squads have to learn for themselves.

The championship banners and the playing of the national anthem as both teams lined up on their respective foul lines seemed to cast an air of invulnerability around the Lady Cadets, according to Grieb. "They're not the team that they've been the past two years," said Grieb.

It's always suspect to point out one situation in a ten-run loss that may have turned the tide, but one could be found in the top of the first. Catcher Jen Yuengling '93 led off the game with a double, but was left stranded at third. Had she scored to open the game, the "Army mystique" to which the Lady Bison have fallen victim before may have been wiped away. Instead, Army's starting pitcher Darlene Dondero didn't surrender another hit the rest of the game and Bucknell fell apart in the bottom of the fourth.

In that half-inning, Army sent 11 batters to the plate, scoring seven of them (two walks and two hit batsmen resulted in four of those runs).

In the nightcap, Heidi Dawson '95 allowed just one earned run as the Lady Bison did far more than just achieve a split of the doubleheader. Leading comfortably by the score of 7-2 as they batted in the seventh, the Lady Bison finally rid themselves of the "Army mystique." The Lady Cadets brought Dondero in to pitch the final two-thirds of the inning. The pitcher who threw the one-hitter in the first game got hammered this time out, allowing three hits and four runs. Yuengling (2-5), Lisa Fink '93 (2-4, 3 RBI), Wendi Fitz '95 (2-5, 3 RBI), Casey Pina '96 (3-3), and Kelly Corr '95 (3-4) racked up multiple-hit games.

Said Grieb about the importance of hitting Dondero, "Now we know we can hit anybody when we get to the tournament. We came back and now they know what they can do."

That confidence was cancelled out by unusual circumstances just before the doubleheader against Mt. St. Mary's last Wednesday. "We looked dead tired," explained Grieb. "Eight people had exams and were up almost all night and Lisa Fink wasn't feeling well. But, I'm glad to get out of there with wins."

The bottom line is that they swept the twinbill. In game one, Dawson yielded just one run (unearned) in winning her sixth game of the season and improving the team's record to 12-3. Pina drove home the game-winner in the

Commentary

There is certainly a lot going on in the world of sports at this time of year—both on and off campus. As another baseball season starts, hockey and basketball gear up for their playoffs. Inside the Bucknell bubble, spring is by far the busiest athletic season, with at least one team playing virtually every day of the week. So let's sample the sights and sounds from ballfields around the country.

• How pleasant it will be not having to watch the NHL playoffs in that cramped, stuffy satellite room in the library again this year. Thanks ESPN and ABC! ESPN—again showing that if it is going to cover a sport, it is going to do it right—has done a terrific job with the NHL this year, althoughit did not always have the best available game each night. ABC, who is under the same ownership as ESPN, will use its broadcast teams for its weekend telecasts. Hopefully, enough people will tune in so that the network does not lose much money, thus forcing it to end the experiment.

• Bucknell softball coach Terrie Grieb has done a great job with the team this year, but no matter what her record, she'll always be a great coach in my mind because she doesn't make her team sing during games. Man, that's annoying.

• Reggie White said he was going to sign with a team of God's choice. If that is really true, I would not want to play Green Bay this year. You only have to watch Notre Dame football for a short time to know about the breaks a team gets when a higher being is looking out for it.

• I wonder how long it will take for the popularity of lacrosse to spread west.

Women's lacrosse scores wins in two of three

BUCKNELLIAN TEAM CORRESPONDENT

Coming off of a 1-1 weekend with a win against Holy Cross and a loss against Lehigh, the Bucknell women's lacrosse team pulled together for its second win of the season, thrashing East Stroudsburg with a final score of 21-11.

On Apr. 9 the Bison chalked up their first win with an 11-5 victory over Holy Cross. Head coach Heather Lewis didn't feel that Holy Cross was really at Bucknell's level. "It was good to come away with a win," said Lewis. The Bison were leading 5-3 at the end of the first half and the intensity on the field was amazing. Lisa Young '95 scored four goals, followed closely by Janelle Brown '95 and Trisha Way '94 with a pair of goals each. Goalie Wendy Schwieger '94 saved a career-best 14 of 19 shots and kept Holy Cross scoreless for most of the second half.

Saturday, the Bison traveled to Lehigh to play a wet and messy game. The disappointing final score of 14-8 dampened the Bison's spirits far more than the pouring rain during the majority of the game. At the start of the second half, the Bison were down 5-2 but quickly came back with a series of unanswered shots to bring the game to 5-5. A shot-for-shot barrage continued until the score was 7-7; then the Engineers pulled ahead. The Bison never recovered. Ruggers have near loss washed away

Bucknellian Staff Writer

Last Saturday, the men's rugby team traveled to Philadelphia to battle LaSalle University.

Due to the Easter holiday, many Bucknellians were home during the weekend, and as a result, the Bison fielded a young, inexperienced team. LaSalle was able to capitalize on a few of the mistakes made by the Orange and Blue, and the game was called in the third quarter due to inclement weather with LaSalle leading 13-0.

Said Rob Seiler '95, "For a young team, we did a real good job, considering the weather conditions."

The Bison were aggressive throughout, but their inexperience cost them both offensively and defensively. Seiler said, "We were doing very well, but we lacked the punch to get it into the try zone. We just didn't have the experience to finish."

In addition to the team's inexperience, it was forced to play with a LaSalle player because of the lack of available Bison during the weekend. Seiler said, "Playing a man short is really difficult, especially when a lot of guys are forced to play an unfamiliar position."

Tomorrow, the Bison will battle the Wilkes-Barre Men's Rugby Club at 1 p.m. on Swartz Field.

Tennis sweeps Loyola

BY JON TERRY
Bucknellian Staff Writer

After dropping tough matches to Lafayette and Towson St. early in the week, the young Bucknell tennis squad got healthy in a hurry at the expense of the Loyola Greyhounds.

The 3-5 Bison swept all nine matches yesterday against lowly Loyola. Chris Rimpel '93, the team's only senior, obliterated his opponent 6-0, 6-0, and the doubles team of Rick Zeoli '95 and Ray Crosta '96 were equally impressive, issuing their foes a bagel in an eight-game pro set.

The squad's number-one player, Chris Stenstrom '94, struggled to a three-set win, taking the deciding set in a tiebreaker. Second-ranked Mark McGuire '95, the team's most consistent singles player this year with a 5-3 record, won in two easy sets. The Stenstrom-McGuire doubles team has also been dominant this year. The duo is now 7-1 in 1993 after an 8-3 victory over Loyola.

The early-week matches were not as successful, however. Last Friday, the Bison fell to first-place Lafayette, 7-2. McGuire battled to a 7-5, 7-6 win in #2 singles, while McGuire and Stenstrom cruised to an 8-5 set in #1 doubles for the team's only two wins. The Leopards are now 7-1 in the league—their best start since 1988, when they went on to win the East Coast Conference title.

On Monday, Bucknell lost a home match to Towson St., 6-3. Rimpel, Crosta, and McGuire/Stenstrom were the Bison winners, while Stenstrom was the only other player to win a set.

Next up for the team is a pair of weekend road matches. Tomorrow the team will journey to Holy Cross for a showdown with the league doormats.

Then on Sunday morning, the road warriors will be in the Bronx for an important match against Fordham. The Rams are just a half-game ahead of the Bison in the league standings.

Baseball faces Patriot League rivals

BY JON TERRY
Bucknellian Staff Writer

What could be nicer than a lovely Tuesday afternoon in Olean, NY? That's what pitchers Rob Glus '95 and Dave Scranton '95 thought until they got pounded for 17 runs on 14 hits and eight walks in the first four innings of Bucknell's 17-8 loss to St. Bonaventure.

Despite the disappointing effort by the two sophomores, the non-conference affair was merely a tune-up for this weekend's important doubleheaders against Patriot League rivals Fordham and Holy Cross. The Bison are now 8-17 overall, but more importantly they are atop the conference's Southern Division with a 5-3 mark. Don't read too much into the team's losing overall record—not one of the eight Patriot League teams has a winning overall record.

Jake Kazanjian '93 will pitch against two-time Patriot League defending champion Fordham tomorrow. Kazanjian, whose 1-0 gem over the Rams last year was perhaps his best outing ever, tossed three no-hit innings in relief against the Bonnies on Tuesday. A major key to the team's success over the last two weeks has been the resurgence of Kazanjian and Kurt Waldner '93. These two aces will be counted on to shut down the powerful Rams, as well as the rest of the league down the stretch.

Brian Sipes — The Bucknellian

Third baseman Larry Trout '93 throws a runner out at first in a game earlier this year. Trout has begun to heat up both with the glove and at the plate in recent weeks.

Waldner, whose next win will be the seventeenth of his career, matching the all-time Bucknell record set by Don Richards from 1954-1956, has been dominant in league play thus far. He is 3-0 in those contests with three complete games, two shutouts, and a 2.14 ERA. Waldner has held division foes to a paltry .190 batting average. In fact, the entire staff has gotten the job done when it has counted. The staff's ERA is 2.57 in conference games, while opposing hitters have been held to a .225 average.

Another key is the offensive attack. The squad as a whole has slumped all season to the tune of a .244 team average (.259 in Patriot League games). Scott Sutfin '94 (.349, 17 runs scored), Larry Trout '93 (.284, 10 RBI), and Bryan Koch '95 (.257, 12 RBI) have been the only consistent regulars, but others appear to be coming alive.

Among them is centerfielder Matt Sniegocki '93, who hit his second homer of the year on Tuesday. Sniegocki, who was one of the team's best offensive threats in

Crew returns wiser after San Diego Classic

BUCKNELLIAN TEAM CORRESPONDENT

Bucknell Crew's Varsity Lightweight Men traveled to California two weekends ago and competed in the prestigious San Diego Crew Classic. After two days of practice on Mission Bay, the Bison rowed against many of the most competitve collegiate crews in the world. Teams from Harvard, Penn, Yale, and even Cambridge, England participated in the lightweight category at this year's event.

Representing the Bison were, bow to stern, Andy Bush '93, Carlos Valdes '95, team captain Edward Williams '93, Brent Chandaria '93, Jim Behnke '93, Norm Bartlett '93, Derek Updegraff '93, stroke Matt Kersting '95, and coxswain Erin Burns '93. In Saturday's qualifying heat Bucknell placed fifth, defeated by such worthies as Penn, Harvard, California Maritime, and Loyola Marymount. Nonetheless, the lightweights' performance earned them a spot in Sunday's "petite" final rounds. The Bison rowed right through the competition to place first, crushing both Loyola Marymount and St. Mary's College.

While the lightweights were rowing under sunny skies in California, the rest of Bucknell Crew braved the snow and 35-degree weather in Ithaca, NY. Competition was tough, given that the eight Bucknell crews had been unable to practice on the water since the team's spring break trip to Georgia because of the severe flooding of the Susquehanna River. Nonetheless, they held their own against Ithaca College and Colgate University.

Giving encore performances of their rows in Augusta a week earlier, all three of the novice boats walked away with victories. The women's eight and the men's four each destroyed both Ithaca and Colgate. The lightweight men's eight narrowly defeated a challenging Ithaca crew, the only other boat in the race.

Unfortunately the Colgate crews stole the show in most of the varsity races. The women's four placed second to Colgate, but still defeated a strong Ithaca boat. The lightweight women's four held their own against Colgate for most of the race, rowing neck-and-neck until the final sprint in which they finished second. Colgate again finished first in the heavyweight men's four. Ithaca prevailed in the heavyweight men's eight and the junior varsity men's eight.

As the Bison return to Bucknell and resume practice on the Susquehanna, they are confident that these performances will be avenged at the Patriot League Championships on Apr. 24. Tomorrow, Bucknell will host the Tenth Annual Bucknell Invitational Regatta at Pineknotter Park in Northumberland, just behind Front Street Station restaurant. Crews from Villanova, Johns Hopkins, Drexel, and Franklin and Marshall will compete.

Heidi Dawson '95

Softball pitcher Heidi Dawson '95 has been selected as The Bucknellian's Athlete of the Week for her outstanding performance in her last two starts. The dominant right-hander sports a 6-1 record and an ERA close to 1.00.

Last week, she beat Army and Mt. St. Mary's to earn Patriot League Pitcher of the Week honors. Dawson and teammate Alison Love '95 have combined to give Bucknell one of the league's most formidable pitching staffs.

Dawson will start three important league games in the next week when she faces Lehigh, Lafayette, and Fordham.

Trivia Answer:

The 1988 softball team opened 12-4, but this year's squad has broken that record with its 13-3 record after 16 games.

BASEBALL

1992, is hitting just .194 this year with a team-high 16 strikeouts, but he has been making good contact of late. Mike Kearns '93 is another important cog. The leadoff hitter has seen his average dip to .231, but he is tied for the team lead with 12 RBI's.

If part-timers Tom Chiacchio '95 (.423) and Charlie Griak '96 (.321) can keep producing, and if the regulars can get their bats warmed up as the weather does the same, the Bison will be in contention all the way.

Bucknell will be challenged by some tough pitching this weekend. Holy Cross has the top two pitchers in the league in seniors Bill Lazos (2.14 ERA) and David Boudreau (2.31 ERA), while Fordham boasts Ramon Hernandez (2.70 ERA) and Bill Conkling (3-1, 2.96 ERA).

The Rams are in first place in the Northern Division with a 7-3 record, while the lowly Crusaders .203 team batting average has them in the basement of the Patriot League's Northern Division with a 2-4 conference record.

Track cruises to blowout victories

Hurdlers lead Lady Bison to easy victory

BUCKNELLIAN TEAM CORRESPONDENT

By the end of Saturday's cold and rainy track meet, the question wasn't if there was going to be a 4 x 400m relay. The question was whether it would be a running relay or a swimming relay. "The water was nearly up to my ankles in lane one," one runner lamented. Even so, the women's track team got the job done as they beat Colgate, Moravian, Bloomsburg and Lycoming. Bucknell dominated the meet, as the Bison placed in every event and won ten events overall.

It seems that at every meet different members of the team lead the way to victory. This time, it was the hurdle crew. Maybe they found it easier to run faster when they were jumping over puddles. Super soph Bridget Dean led a Bucknell sweep of the 400 intermediate hurdles in a time of 1:05.82. The rest of the hurdle 'gang' finishing behind Dean was Leah Johnson '95, Norine Nadeau '96, Beth Muehl '94, and Nicole Kropp '96 respectively. In the 100 high hurdles it was more blue and orange, as Dean and Nadeau went 1-2. Watch out Patriot League, Bucknell's hurdlers are for real.

Bucknell out-jumped and outthrew their opponents in the field, too. Doing triple duty was thrower Kristen Overturf '96. Overturf, who has the potential to be one of the school's best throwers, placed fourth in the hammer (111'8"), second in the shot put (30'11"), and second in the discus (102'5"). Combined with the talents of monster athlete Tameka Hinton '96, winner of the 100m, the throwin' Bison should rack up some much-needed points at Patriot Leagues. The throws have typically been a weak area for the Bison, but not so this year. In the jumps, Kelly Peet '96, Mary Clare Thompson '95, Monica Carnahan '95, and Tanya Barnes '95 went 1-3-4-5, demonstrating another strong area on the team. One question to ask is: what area of the team isn't strong?

Other winners were Norine Nadeau (javelin), Bridgette Mayer '96 (5000m), Sharon Shilling '95 (400m), Kathy Wurster '94 (800m), captain Dana Harbst '93 (200m), and both the 4 x 100m and 4 x 400m relays.

Looking ahead, the Bison travel to Shippensburg this Sunday for a much-awaited showdown with the Red Raiders. Bucknell lost last year in a fairly close meet, held yes, you guessed it, in the rain.

But this year the mighty Bison will settle for nothing less than victory. They would like to "sink Ship."

Men show off depth, win 15 of 19 events

BY CHRIS DROWNE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

After winning 15 of the 19 events in last Saturday's home meet it would be easy to shift into cruise control. Not this team. All eyes are focused on the next three weeks: Shippensburg, Penn Relays, and most importantly, the Patriot League Championships.

Even in describing last weekend's blowout, head coach Art Gulden found himself, as he usually does, putting the event into its proper context. "There were indications of excellence," said Gulden, reflecting on last week while trying to envision his team at the big meets.

However, you could hardly blame anyone for focusing on the blowout for at least an article. In the field events, Bucknell captured gold in every event except the pole vault (don't worry, they took 2nd, 4th, 5th, and 6th). Blaine Fawcett '93 won the javelin with a toss of 177' 11." The other two throwing events went to James Heizman '96, 137' in the hammer throw, and Sam Bijelic '94, 45' 1" in the shot put. Finally, Pete Gregory '93 threw the discus far enough (147' 7") to record a first-place finish.

If you can't remember what the weather was last Saturday, you can probably guess. If you said rain, you'd be correct. If you're a jumper that means a long tough day at the office. John Plante '94 out-leapt his Moravian competitors by two inches in taking the high jump title. Brian Drechsler '95 soared past a couple of Colgate pretenders in the long jump to capture top honors in the wet sand. Triple-jumper Karim Abdul-Matin '96 bested all others by over a yard in picking up his gold.

Back on the spongy orange track, the sprinters ignored the weather and posted outstanding results. Rick Van Emburgh '95 showed that he might be healthy again with a first-place finish in the 400-meter dash. Brad Bernardini '94 cruised through the rain and the 100-meter course in 11.14 to take the gold. Both the 4 x 100-meter 4 X 400-meter relay quartets enjoyed first-place finishes as well with times of 43.03 and 3:29.7, respectively.

"It would have been easy for everybody to use the weather as an excuse, but they didn't," said Gulden. "Everyone ran aggressively and attacked. That's fun to see."

Moving up to the longer distances, Tom Eagleson '93 won the 800-meter race in 1:55.66. John Lewis '93 ran 1500-meters in under four minutes. Judd Jarden '93 finished the 5000-meter run in first-place with a time of 16:08.9 and Ryan Byrd '95 won the 3000-meter steeplechase in just over ten minutes.

With all of those first-place finishes, you would expect the final team scores to be ugly. They were. Bucknell won with 167 points and the four other teams could have combined scores and still finished in second [Colgate (53), Moravian (51), Bloomsburg (11), Lycoming (4)].

Now, getting back to the upcoming three meets, the Bison are healthy and impressing their coach during their final workouts. "They're doing things they've never done before in workouts. The times are faster," stated Gulden. "The times, attitude, and aggressiveness are all there."

Shippensburg beat the Bison last spring and have always posed a significant challenge. This year may be different.

"We're not spotting them three or four events because we're not healthy or ready to compete in everything like last year," said Gulden.

Following that dual-meet, select Bison will travel to Philly for the Penn Relays.

Then, the meet that everyone on the squad has been preparing for since September, the Patriot League Championships, returns to Lewisburg.

After seeing Bucknell pound two opponents from Ohio last weekend, it is obvious that eastern lax still dominates.

• Trivia Question: Who was the first manager of the Texas Rangers? Answer later.

• Poor Dean Smith. First he wins the National Championship, now he has to figure out a way to repeat the feat with All-Americans Jerry Stackhouse and Rasheed Wallace. While on the subject of college hoops, congrats to the Michigan Wolverines, who set the NCAA record for most time-outs called in one tournament.

• Kudos to the NCAA for passing a new rule that the clock will be stopped after a made basket in the final minute of a game. This will hopefully eliminate needless time-outs after a team that is down by twelve points puts an uncontested shot in the hole in the final seconds. The NBA uses this rule, and it works pretty well. Besides, it will be one less thing for Chris Webber to think about at the end of a game. The NCAA also voted to reduce the shot clock from 45 to 35 seconds. Sorry, Pete Carrill.

• Quote of the week: "The only reason the [Seattle] SuperSonics signed Sam Perkins is to make it look like Derrick McKey is actually working hard." Credit for this gem goes to the ever-opinionated Bill Walton, who was his usual self on NBC last Saturday before the Knicks-Celtics game. Gee, those two teams don't get too much airtime, do they? By the way, there is no truth to the rumor that the Knickerboxers are courting Riddick Bowe for the playoffs.

• Did you catch the highlight of the guy in Chicago the other night who won a million beans for hitting a three-quarter court shot? Paul Olkowski must have tutored him.

• Trivia Answer: Ted Williams. The Splendid Splinter should have known better.

• If I see one more team add teal to its color scheme I just might hurl. Hear that, Seattle Mariners?

• Can you believe MTV Sports won an Emmy for "outstanding edited series?" Wide World of Sports should be embarrassed.

fourth and Heather Hoehn '94 drove in the insurance run in the sixth for the 3-1 victory.

The second game was tied at two entering the seventh when the Lady Bison broke out for three runs aided by a Mountaineer error. Yuengling (hitting over .450 on the season) scored to break the tie. Corr and Hoehn crossed for the insurance runs following walks to Carol Gesler '93 and Pina that Dawson wouldn't need.

Bucknell will need to master that important 90% that Stengel talked about when it faces league rivals Lehigh and Lafayette this weekend. The Engineers will bring their lovely brown, yellow, and white uniforms along with a first-place standing to Lewisburg. An interesting sidelight to this doubleheader will be the battle of the Corr sisters. Bucknell's shortstop Kelly has been a major reason for the team's success, while her sister Sherri plays first base and outfield for Lehigh. "Laugh-a-lot" makes the trek from Easton sporting a respectable lineup, but not the pitching to stop the Lady Bison.

The important mid-week contest pits Bucknell against Fordham. The Bronx Institution has split virtually every doubleheader it has played this season. If the Lady Bison can finally realize how good they are and can be, these six games could leave them atop the Patriot League's standings.

Bison Retrospectives: Commentaries from 1968-69

The 1968-69 sports editor wrote a weekly column entitled "From the Bull Pen" that was one of the most-read pieces of the paper. We thought that it would be interesting to take a look back at his insights. Compare these views from 25-years ago to today's popular conceptions.

BY KEN WERNICK '69

In January, the National Collegiate Athletic Association will hold its annual convention, at Los Angeles. At that time, there is a good possibility that a rule to return intercollegiate football to a "One platoon system" will be recommended by the Rules Committee.

A Question of Equality

In 1964, the colleges returned to "two platoon" football, after 11 years of play under the "one platoon" rules. Under the "one platoon" rules (which can vary depending on modifications), all colleges in the NCAA would play 11 men—that is, these men would be the offensive,defensive, kick-off, punting, and punt-return teams, all rolled into one.

This would be complicated by several modifications including substitutions. Some possibilities would be free substitutions with less than five minutes remaining in a period, substitutions of two players (such as a punter or field-goal kicker) in a quarter, or a substitutions of one player after each play. Paul Dietzel, when he was coaching at Louisiana State University, made use of a "Chinese Bandit" team (a "third team" that was used whenever the ball came within the LSU 20-yard line). Dietzel's "Bandits" were a strong defensive outfit—and gained national fame by their frequent goal-line stands.

As to the advantages of one-platoon football, Bison Athletic Director Robert A. Latour stated, "Schools that are our size, with a limited budget, would be able to compete on a more equal basis with larger schools." It has also been stated that costs would decrease under the new system. Under one-platoon play, for example, the Bisons took 35 players to away contests. Now, under two-platoon rules, 44 usually make the trips. Under one-platoon rules, you would understandably need a lesser number of players.

A return to one-platoon football would, according to B.U. football coach Carroll Huntress, "do nothing to affect our recruiting system or financial aid." But, by limiting the size of the squads, it would probably decrease the scholarships offered by larger schools. Also, prospective applicants would see that their chances for playing on a "big-name" school would be lessened, and would turn to smaller schools where, if academically qualified, they could possibly excel. Here, especially, Bucknell would be helped.

> "I would be more than glad to return to one-platoon football, but first somebody must convince me that the costs have become higher."
> —Ara Parseghian, Notre Dame

A look at the 1968 Bison football schedule verifies this fact. While competing against many schools that are "academically similar," the budget allocations are quite "dissimilar." Nine of the ten opponents on this year's slate give far more money to their football programs than does Bucknell—only Gettysburg gives less. And, two of them, Penn and Harvard, have unlimited football scholarships. Temple, Maine, and Delaware are state-supported and Lafayette, Lehigh, Colgate and Davidson are able to spend much more money on football than Bucknell.

To increase the Bison football allocation is, at present, impossible and not fair to other campus departments. But to get the NCAA to structure intercollegiate football to "equalize" the schools via a one-platoon system seems workable.

There are disadvantages to one-platoon football. Coaches, for the most part, are against it. Ara Parseghian of Notre Dame stated, "I would be more than glad to return to one-platoon football, but first somebody must convince me that the costs have become higher. I just have to see it." Bucknell's Carroll Huntress said, "In one-platoon rules, injuries are more likely to occur, and all schools are very limited in their specialists. It seems to me that the caliber of football would decline."

Perhaps the major complaint is that less boys would be able to compete in intercollegiate football. As Latour and Huntress both stated, "Any boy should be able to play football." Whether this would indeed be endangered by a one-platoon syste, only time will tell. The day may soon come when Bison fans may see someone like Sam Havrilak playing quarterback and defensive safety; Bill Ludwig at middle guard and offensive guard; Steve Zarlinski at defensive tackle and offensive tackle. Gordon White, sports writer for the New York Times, says that the change "will probably happen."

It seems that the Bison football program could only be helped by a return to a one-platoon system. In January, the rule change has a good chance of going into effect. And who knows, next fall we might very well be seeing some familiar Bisons at some very "unfamiliar" positions.

During the past year, this column has been used for many varied purposes—to comment editorially on questions pertinent to the athletic program here, to give credit to certain individuals, to criticize existing conditions and to provide interesting features. This column, which is my final one as sports editor, is unique, for it will briefly deal with a look into the future of the Bucknell athletic program, and answer relevant questions concerning its philosophy.

Where Are We Going?

Three primary areas that we can investigate to help answer these questions are "scheduling," "recruiting," and "facilities." For in the improvement of these areas lies the key to a successful athletic program.

Next year, the Middle Atlantic Conference, of which Bucknell is a member, will realign. The change will standardize the scheduling, and will make the MAC champion truly representative of its performance during the year. Head-to-head games to determine MAC champions and (between East and West) the fact that each team will play the same foes in all sports rather than selected ones, will help to make the league a more exciting and cohesive entity.

In addition to playing the five MAC Western Division teams (Lehigh, Lafayette, Gettysburg, Delaware, and Rider), Bucknell will also be meeting such school in 1969-70 as Bowling Green (Ohio) in swimming, Wittenberg in football (and The Citadel, Baldwin-Wallace, Rutgers, and Davidson in 1970-71), Syracuse, Rochester NYU and Miami (Fla.) in basketball, Rutgers, Syracuse, and Georgia Tech in wrestling (and possibly Dartmouth in 1970-71), Navy in tennis and golf and William and Mary, North Carolina, and VPI in lacrosse. Scranton was dropped from the basketball schedule this year, and Wilbright and Washington and Jefferson are slated to be dropped from next year's hoop slate, as are Temple and Hofstra (in 1970-71) from football.

But, what determines the "types" of schools that are scheduled? In the words of Athletic Director Robert A. Latour, "We try to meet schools with similar academic standards, the same interest in athletics, and a comparable number of students." Recently, the search for these "types" of schools has expanded the athletic program to include opponents from the states of Ohio, North Carolina, Virginia, and Maryland.

> Challenges must be met, but Bucknell has shown in the past that it can succesfully overcome them.

To be sure, the expansion of the Bucknell athletic program to these states has helped recruiting. "We made a fine impression upon many people on the basketball trips to Indiana and Florida," said Latour. The selectivity of scheduling is complemented by a selectivity of recruiting, as the "scholar-athlete" is highly sought. The program, however, is in the fact that these students are rare, and are often lost to the Ivy League or to prestigious New England schools. To get these students, Bucknell is currently and must continue to expand its horizons to a larger geographic area.

"We're getting many miles out of our facilities," said Latour. But no one can disguise the fact that athletic facilities here now are very poor. There are 600 half-lockers for 1,600 men, the worst track facilities in the conference, and inadequate indoor facilities for upperclass recreation. To be sure, it is the junior or senior that is hurt most by this, for it is he who has no locker all year and no space in the gym during the winter months. The fact that Lafayette is currently building an all-weather track and a new fieldhouse makes Bucknell's deficiency even more glaring.

The Bucknell athletic department faces many challenges for the future. Facilities must be improved at the earliest possible time, a "national" reputation, which is well on its way to being established, must continued to be sought to get more "scholar-athletes," and the track and wrestling programs must be improved.

But the fact remains that, while these challenges exist, the current athletic staff is meeting them. It is impossible to revamp an entire schedule in one or two years. Changes must take place slowly, but once a tradition is established, it is not easily lost. Twelve years ago, Bucknell had a swimming pool, and no team. Now it has one of the most respected squads in the country. Five years ago the basketball team was winning a very small percentage of their games; currently they are showing some of the nation's top teams (like Davidson last year and Florida this year) that Bucknell basketball does, in fact, exist. Five years ago, the soccer team was hopelessly losing three-fourths of their games—this year they finished 8-4 for the second consecutive season and almost garnered an NCAA berth. Three years ago, lacrosse was not even a varsity sport, operating on the club level. Today, it is facing some of the best competition in the East, against teams like William and Mary and Penn State.

Challenges must be met, but Bucknell has shown in the past that it can successfully overcome them. There are some who speculate that athletic de-emphasis is the only answer to raising Bucknell's prestige and academic interests. This a misconception, and a look at the Bison athletic achievements in the past and its hopes for the future prove it.

Shackelford motion narrowly defeated

Jean Auro—The Bucknellian
At Monday's faculty meeting, the motion proposed by Jean Shackelford, professor of economics, was defeated by a narrow margin of 52-50. The motion has been the topic of hot debate in recent weeks.

The motion to abolish the University Review Committee (URC) was defeated by a narrow 52-50 margin at Monday's faculty meeting.

The motion was originally proposed last month by Jean Shackelford, professor of economics; Monday's meeting marked the final session in a series of heated discussions over the future of the University's tenure review process.

The vote on the motion was delayed for over an hour as the faculty debated several technicalities at length that would have come into play had the motion passed.

The debates began this Monday when John Peeler, professor of political science and parliamentarian of the faculty meetings, read a letter from President Gary Sojka that highlighted several problems that he thought the abolishment of the URC would create, including some changes that would have to be made to the Faculty Handbook. The Handbook cannot be amended without the president's approval.

David Ray, professor of mathematics and chair of the faculty, also presented three technical issues which the faculty had not previously heard.

Ray first noted that the motion did not detail what majority was needed to abolish the URC. Ray argued for a simple majority, stating that because the URC was created by means of a simple majority, it should take only a simple majority to abolish the committee.

Peeler countered Ray with the argument that the motion was indeed "an amendment to abolish a committee," and according to the Faculty Handbook, should therefore require a two-thirds majority vote. After considerable debate over the issue, the faculty decided by means of a voice vote that only a simple majority was required.

Majority decisions on two other amendments were settled also. The faculty eventually decided that two of the amendments required a two-thirds majority, and the other two, a simple majority.

Ray next posed the question of whether or not the rules of faculty meeting voting procedures had to be suspended in order to vote on three of the amendments. The issue was dropped when the members of the faculty agreed that it was not necessary.

The third issue that Ray brought up concerned the need for a two-thirds majority vote on the amendment regarding a separate appeals

Former Vice President to address campus

Former Vice President Dan Quayle will lecture at Bucknell this coming Wednesday.

From White House to lecture hall, former Vice President Danforth Quayle will make his way to Bucknell this Wednesday as part of a national lecture tour.

Quayle, the 44th Vice President of the United States, will speak at the Weis Center at 8 p.m. on Apr. 28. Removed from his four-year stint in the political limelight, Quayle has been addressing audiences across the country since just after Clinton's inauguration. "As of January 20th he was out of work and so he's on the lecture circuit," said Bill Boswell, director of the Weis Center and advisor to the Student Lectureship Committee.

The Student Lectureship Committee, the group sponsoring the $22,000 visit, chose Quayle's name after exhausting a varied lecturer list including Henry Kissinger, Dennis Miller, and Maya Angelou. The committee has arranged for the visit through Keppler Associates, one of many agents consulted in the selection process.

The cost of the lecture covers a $20,000 stipend for Quayle and approximately $2,000 in traveling expenses.

In selecting a speaker the committee searched for an orator who would attract enough students to fill the 1,200 seats in the Weis Center.

Christina Tisa '96, treasurer of the committee, said that she and others involved in the decision "expect a really good turnout."

No one on the committee could comment on the content of Quayle's speech. Boswell said that he sent a facsimile to Quayle yesterday and was still waiting for a response. He did suggest that Quayle "will tailor his talk to the students."

Christopher Brett Karcher '93, chair of the committee, said that the lecture "is not going to be a public address, but it is a private invitation to speak."

"[Quayle] is not here to make political speeches or to promote

Grounds crews shape up campus

BY SARA K. WALKER
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Brian Sipes—The Bucknellian
Grounds crews have been working overtime to prepare the campus for important spring weekends.

Smiling students reclining on the academic quad, the sun brightly shining, daffodils in full bloom, and neatly trimmed shrubbery and trees makes for the ideal college campus. These are the factors which contribute to Bucknell's widely-held reputation for having beautiful grounds.

The grounds are especially beautiful in the spring, the time of year when crews are out in full force, preparing for what George Trutt, campus superintendent, refers to as the "feature time of the year." In the last month and a half of the semester, Bucknell has to make a good impression for prospective students, parents, and graduates and their families.

In order to complete the grounds maintenance in time for spring, it is necessary to put in extra time and effort, Trutt said. The grounds keepers are supplemented by the janitorial staff two evenings a week and Saturday mornings, when extra help is necessary and if the weather permits, he said.

In addition to this extra help, "some overtime is spent by the regulars," said Trutt. Their responsibilities include what Trutt described as "dressing up the shrubbery beds," replacing the dead or damaged plants, and "getting the gardens back in shape."

The University's aesthetic grounds are not solely the result of a lot of hard work. The maintenance is also expensive. Barry Maxwell, vice president for administration, said that while money is allotted in the budget for the grounds-keeping, it is "hard to break out grounds keeping from the total physical plant operating budget."

This groundskeeping budget includes staffing, utilities, and supplies, among other expenses.

Fire wakes sleepy residents in Harris

The third floor of Harris filled with smoke this morning at approximately 5:10 a.m., due to a blanket that caught fire in 361 Harris Hall. The resident assistant had to awaken Mitchell Wenger '96, the resident of the room, and three other students who were asleep in the room.

The students involved said that "they lit an incense stick and then fell asleep. The incense stick fell on a blanket lying on the floor. [And] the blanket," which was lodged under the door according to the Public Safety incident report, "then caught fire."

Future of TKE house rests on shaky ground

Tau Kappa Epsilon's Alumni Advisory Board passed a motion which would close the chapter as of next September if the fraternity violates University alcohol policy before that time, said Richard Ernest, vice-chairman of the TKE board of control.

According to Edward Dadez, associate dean of residential life and Greek advisor, TKE is in danger of losing either its charter or its University recognition as a result of repeated alcohol violations and poor relations with the University, the alumni, and the national chapter.

"We basically have been given another chance," said Jeff Weidenfeller '94, president of TKE. "Should there be another violation the house

IFC to set up fence for House Party

BY TARA GILLIGAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The regulations concerning House Party Weekend, May 7-8, will be slightly more rigorous than in years past. Along with a stricter BYOB policy, members of the Interfraternity Council (IFC) will set up a snow fence to encircle the uphill fraternity houses in order to discourage students from walking around campus with open containers of alcoholic beverages.

According to Edward Dadez, associate dean of Student Life and Greek advisor, the purpose of the fence will be to "rope off the uphill so that people of age can walk from fraternity house to fraternity house with beer." He said that the University will try to decide on a comparable plan for downhill fraternity houses.

The idea for the fence, he said, came from members of IFC, which has also agreed to rent and set up the snow fence.

While the fence is intended to keep students from wandering around beyond the immediate areas of the fraternity houses, Dadez and Vince DeCerchio, director of Public Safety, both indicated that there will be no one

How bad are projected budgetary problems?

BY ANDREW COHEN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

News Analysis

It's time to tighten the belts on spending, says the administration. Computer projections, given a cadre of assumptions, have left the University in the position that "in the foreseeable future, there will be little option other than to reduce costs, and reduce the rate of increase of future costs in order to bring expenditures more into line with what we see as constrained revenues," according to Barry Maxwell, vice president for administration. But what does this really mean, and how valid are the assumptions that led to such a projection?

The problems surrounding the budget are based on computer projections made over the next five years. But the computer has little to do with the results except to grind out numbers. "The most fundamental aspect of the model," said Maxwell, "is the assumptions that we make." Some of these assumptions amount to judgement calls, and, as would be expected, the judgements tend toward the conservative. Three of the major budgetary issues in which assumptions play an important role are inflation, tuition, and financial aid.

The computer model allows for the administration to assume several inflation rates. According to Maxwell, "We're assuming that over the next five years, inflation could be in the range of three to five percent."

If the inflation projections are higher than the actual inflation rate, the budget problems as they are now described would be exaggerated. According to Maxwell, higher projections "from the financial standpoint make it look worse because inflation has an impact on all areas of the expenditure budget."

The inflation projections the University is using are at the high end of the probable range, said Maxwell. "For the foresee-the Republican party," he said.

According to the contract, Quayle will respond to questions from the audience after his lecture. Boswell said the format of the question and answer period would be left up to Quayle.

While many students are looking forward to his lecture, there has been some opposition to Quayle's visit. Students and professors protest the large price tag attached to the lecture; others suggested an irony in asking Quayle to speak on the day Bucknell has designated as Peace day during Earth Week.

Theresa Amott, associate professor of economics, is "distressed that the Student Lectureship Committee could find no better use for such a large sum of money."

However, Tisa said that other potential speakers would have requested comparable compensations. Kissinger, for example, would have received $30,000.

Amott further objected to the committee's choice; "his term was without distinction, and I cannot imagine what a person of Dan Quayle's intellectual stature can possibly bring to this campus community," she said.

Among those who spoke out in support of the Quayle visit, Jeff Dinard '93, president of the Young Republicans, said he expects the lecture to be "wonderful! He's a great guy. I'm glad he's coming, and I'll be there."

Boswell said that, while his main role in the process is to manage the business arrangements, he supports the group's decision. Boswell said he conducted his own informal poll of students to see whether they favored a visit by the former Vice President. "Ninety percent of the students in any group that I talked to" said they would be interested in attending a lecture given by Quayle.

Evan Maloney '94, editor of The Sentinel, a politically conservative newspaper, was astounded that anyone could object to the former Vice President. Maloney said that he could not see "how [Quayle] would be considered anti-peace—people criticized him for not going to Vietnam, yet they call him a hawk."

According to Tisa, the dissent on campus is positive; a protest against the former Vice President's visit "shows that there is an awareness," she said.

Jon Hansen '94, chair-elect of the committee, said that "even if you don't respect Dan Quayle at least respect the office he held."

Prior to becoming the 44th Vice President of the United States, Quayle attended De Pauw University and received a degree in political science. From there he went on to acquire a law degree from Indiana University.

In 1980, he began his first term in the United States Congress, the youngest person ever to be elected to the Senate. During his eight year term, he served on the Armed Services Committee, the Budget Committee, and the Labor and Human Resources Committee. In 1982 he worked with Senator Edward Kennedy to author the Job Training Partnership Act.

In March, Quayle was invited to serve as the Chairman of the new Competitiveness Center of the Hudson Institute where he will join the Institute's Board of Trustees.

Ticket Policy for Quayle lecture:

Seating is limited and tickets are required for admission. All seating is unreserved and tickets are free. One ticket per valid Bucknell Student ID will be available starting on Fri., Apr. 23, from 11:30 a.m. to 5:30 p.m. at the Weis Center Box Office in person only. On Tues. and Wed., Apr. 27 and 28, from 11:30 a.m. to 5:30 p.m., any remaining tickets will be distributed to Bucknell staff and students with valid IDs. (Please note that the Weis Center Box Office is closed on Mondays, and that tickets will not be given to Bucknell staff on Friday: there are no plans to distribute tickets to non-Bucknellians.) The lobby will be open at 7 p.m. on Apr. 28 and a waiting list started. Tickets will be honored only until 7:45 p.m. at which time unfilled seats will be opened to those on the waiting list until the hall is filled.

assigned specifically to monitor the fence.

According to DeCerchio, the Office of Public Safety will have two or three additional officers on duty that weekend, but no one will be stationed at the border. "We'll be patrolling these areas periodically," he said.

DeCerchio, who has always maintained a low profile during House Party and other major weekend events, said the current policy "allows students a certain element of responsibility and self-detection" while not removing the University's control over events.

As in the past, DeCerchio defined his position on monitoring events such as House Party. "Certain events by their nature are distinct," he said, suggesting that for graduation, Homecoming, and House Party, the University is justified in relaxing restrictions. "In those situations, we allow a variation of the University policy. But we do not change our policy on following the law," he said.

He compared his approach to that of major cities; some cities have ordinances against open alcohol containers but still allow open beverage containers in public arenas such as athletic stadiums, he said. Likewise, the University, while still complying with the Lewisburg ordinance which outlaws open containers of alcohol, will designate one area of campus—the fenced region—where students of age will be free to carry cans of beer.

The University will not wholly abandon its obligation to enforce rules during that weekend. The policy guidelines drawn up by members of the Greek community and representatives of Student Life explicitly state the rules: all students of legal drinking age must wear wristbands, which will be available through the Office of Residential Life in the week preceding House Party and from the Greek Monitoring Team (GMT) station during the events; no kegs, bottles, or clear plastic cups will be allowed; no open containers will be permitted beyond the snow fence and no pools will be allowed.

Additionally, the guidelines state that the GMT and Public Safety will make periodic house checks throughout the weekend.

DeCerchio said that "persons who are carrying alcoholic beverages and who do not have wristbands will be checked for IDs." Students who are of age will be given a warning if they are found to be violating the wristband rule. Public Safety will confiscate beer from underaged drinkers and will file University judicial charges.

The Lewisburg and East Buffalo Police Departments will assign extra officers to work that weekend and will be prepared to issue criminal citations for underage drinking, according to DeCerchio.

get, said that a total of $662,000 was provided for groundskeeping this past year. According to Naugle, the breakdown of this figure includes $510,000 for scheduled wages, $70,000 for refuse removal, $50,000 for outside contractors such as tree-trimmers, $24,000 for the wages of students hired during the summer months, and the remaining $8,000 for curb and crosswalk painting and various other repairs and replacements.

Each year Naugle and other members of the Physical Plant make up a preliminary budget and then hand it in for its approval by the administration. Naugle said that the budget is usually based the cost of maintenance during the preceding year.

Maxwell said that unlike the situation facing other segments of the University, there has been no need to make cuts in the Physical Plant's budget. "As long as Physical Plant stays within the approved budget guidelines, there is no need to make a cut," he said.

All departments are allowed a 2% increase when proposing their new budgets each year. Physical Plant stayed within this guideline by only making a 1.5% increase. There was, therefore, no need to cut its budget. This 1.5% increase, however, does not include the increase in cost of utilities, according to Maxwell.

Bucknell University's beautiful campus is more than just budding flowers in the springtime; it is the result of an increase in the budget, an increase in hours put in by the physical plant workers, and the need for additional help in order to get the job done.

PUBLIC SAFETY LOG

Thursday, April 15

At 11:15 a.m., a University student from SPE fraternity reported two acts of vandalism. He had discovered that during the night, unknown person(s) did enter the unlocked fraternity and expend a fire extinguisher and break a window.

Friday, April 16

At 5:07 p.m., two University students reported a suspicious vehicle to the Department of Public Safety. A male driver had honked his horn and made rude gestures while driving around the golf course. Investigation continuing by East Buffalo Township Police Department.

At 2:15 p.m., the mother of a University student residing in Smith Hall reported that her son was the victim of a theft on 3/19/93. He had allegedly forgot a bag containing personal property outside of Smith Hall while loading up to go home for spring break and unknown person(s) did remove items from the area.

Saturday, April 17

At 7 p.m., a Department of Public Safety student worker returned an abandoned bicycle to the Department of Public Safety for safe keeping.

At 8:12 p.m., Public Safety officers responded to Harris Hall for a fire alarm activation. Upon arrival, it was discovered that unknown person(s) had discharged a fire extinguisher for no apparent reason which set off the building's alarm system. Five windows were also discovered broken at that time.

At 9:24 p.m., Public Safety officers responded to Swartz Hall for a fire alarm activation. It was discovered that unknown person(s) had discharged a fire extinguisher for no apparent reason.

At 11:23 p.m., Public Safety officers responded to Vedder Hall on the report of an alcohol overdose. Victim was located and subsequently transported to Evangelical Hospital for treatment. Victim was not a student and charges related to underage drinking pending through the Lewisburg Police Department.

Sunday, April 18

At 3:25 a.m., a parent of a University student reported an act of vandalism to a patrolling Public Safety officer. It was discovered that unknown person(s) had broken numerous windows in Harris Hall.

At 3:34 p.m., a University student reported that unknown person(s) had caused damage to a door in Kress Hall. The University locksmith was contacted and responded to repair the door.

At 7:55 p.m., a University student reported that the windshield on her car had been shattered while parked in the farm lot to the rear of KDR fraternity.

At 11:15 p.m., a University student reported that his bookbag and contents had been stolen. He had left the book bag in a room in Swartz overnight, and when he returned to retrieve it, it was gone.

Monday, April 19

At 3 p.m., a University employee reported that his car had been vandalized while parked to the rear of Davis Gym.

Tuesday, April 20

At 3:31 a.m., Public Safety officers responded to Vedder Hall on the report of a fire alarm activation. Upon arrival it was discovered that unknown person(s) had discharged a fire extinguisher for no apparent reason causing the alarm system to activate.

Wednesday, April 21

At 6:15 a.m., a University employee reported that unknown person(s) had shot out ten light bulbs which are part of the graduation countdown clock. Several .177 caliber pellets were located at the scene. Investigation continuing.

At 7:22 p.m., a report was received of a vehicle accident at the intersection of 7th and Walker Streets. A Public Safety officer responded and it was discovered that a University student had not set his parking brake and the car had drifted and struck a stop sign. There were no injuries and Lewisburg Police were on the scene to file a report.

Fell leaves legacy of integrity and scholarship in retirement

BY TIMOTHY W. KIRK
Bucknellian Staff Writer

John Howard Harris Professor of Philosophy Joseph Fell will close his 29-year tenure at Bucknell this spring, delivering his last lecture to students on May 12.

Hired in 1963 as Assistant Professor of Philosophy, Fell's career has spanned three University Presidents and significantly affected students, faculty, and administrators.

History and psychology major Scott Breuninger '93 asserted, "Fell's teaching inspires undergraduates in any discipline to new heights of reflective thought. His concern and care for his students is fundamental to the collective philosophic endeavor."

Fell sees that endeavor as a dynamic "marriage of the intellect and the will" which leads to "seeing the whole."

"Too often we concentrate on the particular, failing to return to the premises on which those particulars are based," says Fell. "We must be continually asking, 'What is important to me? What is worth the limited time that I have?'" It is this emphasis on holistic reflection, on careful and strenuous thought that characterizes Fell in the eyes of his students and colleagues.

Associate Professor and Chair of Philosophy Richard Fleming said, "Joe has been, and will continue to be, incredibly important to this department. His absolute integrity is powerful, almost intimidating. His dedication to truth, reflection, and deep, careful thought is virtually unmatched. Moreover, he demands the same from you—student or colleague. Joe Fell exemplifies the philosophical project."

Fell served as chair of the department from 1977-83 and 1985-90, and as Presidential Professor, an honorary professorship appointed by President Gary Sojka, from 1987-92. He emphasizes quality and diversity as the strengths of the philosophy department at Bucknell. "The department is in terribly good shape, and I don't take the credit for that. Our diversity means there is no 'party line,' and that distinguishes it from the majority of American philosophy departments. We have also been, and continue to be, very strong in the history of philosophy."

Though renowned for his scholarship on Heidegger and Sartre, much of Fell's current work centers on his undergraduate philosophy teacher at William's College, John William Miller. "Miller said that philosophy is its history, and he's right. It's necessary for one to frame a picture of where he or she is, before one can determine in what direction to go, and that picture is only accurately created in a context—an historical context. Without such a context, it's no wonder we get lost in the particular," said Fell. Once one has contextualized the self, Fell stresses following a direction or cause with a passion. He sees the college years as integral to this process.

"You must determine where it is most vital to go from here, and develop a passion for doing something that you think matters. It's not finding a cause, but making—willing— a direction for yourself."

Fell's own passion has drawn significant attention over the years. Ernest Keen, professor of psychology, speaks of Fell's passionate work: "Joe is retiring because his strenuous and scrupulous teaching leaves him too little time for his own philosophizing. The latter takes an enormous amount of time, because, he tells me with characteristic modesty, that writing for him is glacially slow. He would not think of describing it as thorough, careful, or incisive, even though it is obvious to all who read his work that these are, in monumental measure, exactly Joe's signature on even the most imaginative and courageous line of thought.

"These signatures mark not only his writing, but his teaching—his lecturing, his planning courses, his commenting on student papers, his grading, his advising, and his inspiring of students—as well.

"It is fair to say, as I heard a student say of Joe's teaching only recently, that more than any professor, Joe creates in the classroom an atmosphere of serious philosophical thought."

Fell's concern for academics is not mired in the particular. "I remain grossly concerned with the mismatch of social life and what happens in the classroom. It seems that the best students are alienated by the overall campus environment, and this is an internal contradiction. The emphasis on increasing events and activities for students on campus sends them a funny message; it says that academics is not enough to engage their energies."

This concern is felt by his students. Susan Wells '93, a philosophy and biology major, noted, "I've had Fell for four or five classes as well as an independent study, and his interest in his students—concern for both their understanding of the material and their well-being as people—has struck me as paramount to who he is. Ever since I took the introductory class he has displayed a unique mixture of passion and compassion which has served to promote individual scholarship and stimulate critical thought."

Professor of Religion and Political Science Douglas Sturm said, "Over the years, Joe Fell's presence on Bucknell's campus has been extraordinary. He is a meticulous teacher, deeply devoted to his students. He is a thoughtful philosopher, never given to hasty judgment. He is a warm friend, gifted with good humor. And, he is a productive writer, whose major works on Sartre and Heidegger are probing and provocative. We shouldn't let him retire."

Susan Naughton—The Bucknellian

In his 29 years of teaching philosophy at Bucknell, Joseph Fell has made significant contributions in his field. He has, at the same time, served as an inspiration for his students and colleagues.

" [Fell's] absolute integrity is powerful, almost intimidating. His dedication to truth, reflection, and deep, careful thought is virtually unmatched. Moreover, he demands the same from you — student or colleague"

Pre-meds ill-prepared in physics

BY SUSAN SMITH
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Possible revision of the Classical and Modern Physics course is currently being discussed due to concern from pre-medical students that "Bucknell's physics doesn't prepare a pre-med for the medical admissions test (MCAT)," according to Marty Makary '93, former president of the Pre-med Society.

In the Class of '93, 23 pre-med students opted to fulfill their physics requirement at other universities so that they could learn the basics needed for the exam. Physics accounts for one-half of one of the four sections of the MCATs.

According to Makary, "They [the Physics Department] teach modern—we need classic[al]."

According to Steve Becker, associate professor of physics and chair of the department, Bucknell offers a physics course "designed for science or engineering majors," which, "as the title implies, is half classical and half modern physics."

Becker said that the problems arise because "the MCATs are behind the times."

"Even if we would teach a course on classical physics, we don't feel that some of the topics the MCAT covers are fundamental or important enough to be in such a course," said Becker.

Students are able to take a basic, high school-like physics course at many other universities which have not changed their physics curricula in decades. "Bucknell is fairly progressive in changing its courses," said Becker. "We're not alone, we're just ahead of the other schools."

"Even if we would teach a course on classical physics, we don't feel that some of the topics the MCAT covers are fundamental or important enough to be in such a course."
—Steve Becker, Associate Professor of Physics

Bucknell's Classical and Modern physics course teaches "the great ideas of physics," according to Becker. These concepts include gravity, light waves, and sound. Pre-med Matt Sholl '93 said, "I don't deny that it's fascinating and eye-opening." Sholl said that to do well on the MCATs, however, he needed to learn about lenses and electricity, two basics which were not covered in the course.

During past January terms, the physics department has offered a mini course on the basics to pre-med students, according to Becker.

With the end of Jan Plans, the physics department will meet early next fall to discuss three new options for offering those students intending to enter the health science professions a way of learning the basics of classical physics.

Becker said he would choose to offer a half-credit course each spring semester, ending just prior to the MCATs, which would "gear up pre-meds for the exam." The current Classical and Modern Physics course would serve as a prerequisite to this half-credit course.

Other options include adding the basics to the course presently offered or offering two types of physics courses, the current one plus one oriented toward health science pre-professionals.

Makary and Sholl, who were both accepted at medical schools for the fall of '93, hope that the Pre-med Society's initiatives will help other students to score higher on the physical science section of the MCAT.

According to John Tonzetich, pre-med advisor, Bucknell students typically score higher than the national average on both the test and the physical science section.

He acknowledged, however, that students are having a tougher time securing acceptance to medical school than in years past due to an increased applicant pool. For each of the past two years, the applicant pool has increased by 15%, making each test score and letter grade even more important to the pre-med.

by an unidentified resident of fourth Harris who took the blanket into the bathroom and extinguished it in the shower. Therere was no property damage done to the room.

While the room was being checked to "determine that the fire was limited to the blanket," public safety officers found one empty beer can, no other open containers, and one firecracker wrapper, according to the report.

Vince DeCerchio, director of the office of public safety said that "the resident of the room," whom he refused to confirm as Wenger, "is being investigated because at 4:00 a.m. it was reported that firecrackers were shot off in that area."

Due to the fact that the R.A. "had a hard time awakening them even though the alarm was going off, I continue to be concerned," said DeCerchio, "about the false alarms in the halls every weekend. Now, residents are not paying attention to these alarms."

The incident is currently under investigation by the office of residential life, according to Kevin Ahuna, area coordinator for residential life.

Women and men 'Take Back the Night'

Susan Naughton—The Bucknellian

Women and men alike participated in the fourth annual "Take Back the Night" march yesterday. The event was part of National Victims' Rights Awareness Month. A Speakout held in the Rooke Meditation Chapel to promote awareness and to protest violence against women preceded the 10 o'clock march. Participants in the march walked around campus and through town chanting the slogans at right.

"Yes means Yes, No means No, Whatever we wear Wherever we go"

"Two, Four, Six, Eight No more date rape"

"Hey, Hey, Ho, Ho, Sexual assault has got to go"

"Sexist, racist, anti-gay— You can't take our night away"

"Take back the night— women unite"

Fast for those who must fast

The Horizons Fellowship and Dining Services are sponsoring fasting on Tuesday, April 27 for world hunger. Students can sign away their lunch and Dining Services will donate $1.75 to $2 to OXFAM. OXFAM is an organization that deals with distributing money to combat world hunger.

Sean Gray '96, Co-President of Horizons, predicts the program to raise one thousand dollars. On Monday, from 11 a.m. to 1 p.m., a table will be set up in the Elaine Langone Center where students can sign up for the fast.

Nobel laureate to give lecture

Professor Lawrence Klein, Nobel Laureate in Economics, will honor 25-year career of the retiring Professor Balwant Singh with a lecture on May 5.

Singh and Klein worked together as Research Fellows at the University of Pennsylvania where Klein serves as a professor.

The lecture will discuss Klein's assessment of President Clinton's economic recovery program.

It will take place in the Elaine Langone Center Forum at 8:00 p.m. It is free to the public and will be followed by a reception in the Faculty Lounge for Professors Singh and Klein.

Four students at SUNY abducted

Four women at the State University of New York, Binghamton, were allegedly abducted and held overnight. The women said that they were blindfolded, put in a van, and taken to a basement.

Binghamton's administration said that they are taking the incident "very seriously." But the students said that at they do not want press charges. University officials have not ruled out possibility that the three women were part of a hazing ritual. The president of the Binghamton Omega Phi Beta chapter which the four women were pledging, said that the sorority had no involvement.

Towson student makes big order

The Washington Post reported that a Towson State student called in an order to a McDonald's for 600 hamburgers.

The student tried to explain himself by saying that he was a colonel and he needed to feed his troops at the national guard.

Police officials traced the call to him and officials took him to the McDonald's to purchase 338 hamburgers—what was left over from his order. The hamburgers were on sale and cost the student $93.

Students start anti-gay petition

Students at Southern Utah University have started a petition to ask businesses to sanction the University if allows a gay, lesbian, and bisexual club.

The students are trying to prevent the group from being recognized as a University organization and consequently receive funds from the University. These funds are collected though student fees.

Although the students said that had collected 35 signatures from businesses, a University spokesman said that the petition would not prevent the club from being recognized.

Candidates interview for dean replacement

BY NANCY NORBECK
Bucknellian Staff Writer

A search is underway for a new Dean of Students to replace John Dunlop, who currently holds the position, when he retires at the end of the current academic year. The search involves all elements of the University, from students to higher administration.

According to Mark Kerr, director of the Career Development Center and chair of the committee conducting the search, the candidate pool has been narrowed down to four candidates, all of whom are from other colleges.

"At this point, we have four prime candidates from a very strong pool of applicants," he said. Committees will look at these four candidates first before moving, if necessary, to the second tier of potential deans.

The committee is looking for a candidate with experience in Student Affairs or Student Life, as well as Residential Life. Academic experience in teaching is also preferred.

The ideal candidate, according to Kerr, will have had contact with students, both in advising and working with students, and in the context of student development. He or she will also ideally have had experiences handling the kinds of emergencies and crises that may arise in the course of an academic year.

The University received over 100 applications for the position; only about twenty were from women. When the telephone interview pool was narrowed down to its final size of fourteen, there were five or six women applicants left, according to Kerr.

"When we chose our top four candidates, we originally included two men and two women. One of those women, a top candidate, decided to stay at her present job, and we were very sorry to see her go," Kerr said. The present interview group now consists of three men and one woman.

Several groups of students, chosen by Barbara Shailor's office, are helping with the search. These students, chosen for diversity, in background as well as major and class year, have been meeting with candidates to ask questions and to evaluate them. Another group of student leaders, including members of Student Government and the InterFraternity and Panhellenic Councils, have also been meeting with the candidates in small forums.

Open forums are also being held for interested students to meet and talk to the candidates. One of these forums took place Wednesday.

Students hold protest at McDonald's

Foursome argues against meat consumption

BY JEFF BOULTER
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Four students protested the consumption of beef on Saturday in front of the McDonald's Restaurant on Route 15 in Lewisburg.

Wearing signs which condemned others for eating meat, Joel Wainwright '95, Amanda Swarr '95, Carolyn Haller '96, and Ken Urban '96 passed out pamphlets about the "Adopt-A-McDonald's" campaign to cars leaving the restaurant and distributed them among parked cars.

"Adopt-A-McDonald's" is a national campaign which seeks individuals or groups to distribute literature at McDonald's branches around the country about the "Beyond Beef" effort to cut global beef consumption by 50 percent.

The four students involved in Saturday's protest stood in the parking lot and distributed the pamphlets. The manager, Marlin Bressi, came out and asked them to leave because they were on McDonald's property. At his request, they removed pamphlets from the cars in the McDonald's parking lot and then moved the protest to a highway median for a short time. They then proceeded to put pamphlets on cars in the Ames department store parking lot nearby.

Explaining the group's motives for staging the protest, Wainwright said, "We were there to try to sway people's emotions."

"They were in violation of a strict solicitation rule," according to Tom Rippon, owner of the McDonald's who was not present at the incident.

Rippon said that he was not planning to file any criminal charges against the foursome. "We are not looking for a confrontation," he said. Rippon also admitted that he did not know the names of the individuals involved.

Rippon said that because of its reputation as a well-established international chain, McDonald's is often "the target of negative social images," and that Saturday's incident may have been "an attempt to get attention."

The student protesters, to illustrate that their protest was not against the McDonald's establishment, but rather against the consumption of meat products, ate at the restaurant before distributing their pamphlets.

"We had french fries," said Swarr. "That just shows the point—we're not against McDonald's.

Jean Auro—The Bucknellian

McDonald's Restaurant was the site of a recent student protest.

We're for changing people's attitudes about consuming flesh."

The main push of the "Beyond Beef" campaign is to persuade McDonald's to offer a "veggie-burger" consisting of potatoes and other organic foods as an alternative to eating meat.

The material the students distributed was published by supporters of the "Beyond Beef" campaign. The materials cite the environmental hazards of eating hamburger and the dangers of eating meat which may be contaminated by bacteria.

The students also distributed a coloring book for kids to raise their awareness of the advantages to abstaining from eating meat, including saving cows, wild animals, and starving people.

Responding to rumors of a second protest, Rippon said he would prefer to participate in a public debate on Bucknell's campus with the protesters with "a rational forum of steady reasoning... more appropriate to public dialog."

However, the protesters said that they were optimistic about another protest. "It's not over—we did not adopt it for a day," said Swarr. "We hope to do it again."

The manager of the restaurant declined to comment.

Lectureship shot double bogey with Quayle

Why is the University spending more than $22,000 to bring its fourth or fifth choice, Dan Quayle, a has been who never was, to speak at the Weis Center on Wednesday? The set of decisions that led up to the "choice" of Quayle by the Student Lectureship Committee are suspect, to say the least. Why pay Quayle such an exorbitant sum? Why attempt to hide it, as the committee did? And why schedule Quayle to speak on Peace Day of Bucknell's Earth Week?

Is Quayle worth over $20,000? For the price of an entire student's tuition, one might think that the Lectureship Committee could have brought someone with more than just a name—someone with something to say. Besides the fact that Quayle's intellect is only exceeded by his ability to spell starchy vegetables, the Lectureship Committee doesn't even know what he is going to speak about. They hired him for name, nothing else. This is not a matter of simple political differences. There are many conservatives with a great deal of intellectual acuity, but Dan Quayle is not one them.

The Student Lectureship Committee contends that logistics dictated its decision. The date was set, several other speakers backed out, and with three weeks left before the big event, the booking agent got Quayle. The committee was pressed for time and decided to sell out for a $22,000 title—former Vice President of the United States. It should take responsibility for this poor decision.

If the committee could not get its first several choices, why have a lecture at all? Maybe the money could have been applied to the various academic lecture endowments which are grossly under-funded. The committee could have even found a way to set the money aside for a quality speaker next year, such as Henry Kissinger, who commands $30,000 but has just a tad more to say than Quayle.

In reality, no one should know the amount that is being spent on Quayle because the Lectureship Committee would not officially release it due to its contract with Quayle. Is this because Quayle doesn't want to know how much of our money he is getting, or because the Lectureship Committee doesn't want us to know? Either way one looks at it, the answer is the same: embarassment. This is our student activity money. We have a right to know when the entirety of more than 200 student activity fees are spent.

It is especially ironic that Quayle is speaking on Peace Day of Bucknell's Earth Week. This is almost as bad as asking Kurt Waldheim to speak at the same time as a Holocaust commemoration. Although Quayle is not speaking as part of the week's activities, his record makes this speech an affront to everything that Earth Week and Peace Day stand for.

Quayle and Earth Week are like oil and water.

While Quayle was in charge of the Council on Competitiveness, it eliminated almost all meaningful environmental quality regulations. That he is speaking on Peace Day is even more mind-boggling. As a self-proclaimed "hawk," Quayle was a constant supporter of armed conflict. But maybe this is too harsh. Maybe Quayle is coming to speak about the possible ways in which students can exempt themselves from wartime military service. Probably not, but no one knows for sure, not even the Lectureship Committee. War Day of Pollution Week would be a more appropriate time to have Quayle speak.

The committee has said that while one may not respect Quayle on his own terms, one should nonetheless respect the office that he held. But Quayle has to speak, he cannot just sit in front of the campus and exude vice-presidency. We are supposed to be paying for him, not for the title that he once held. But are we?

It's possible that we are being too hard on poor Dan. Maybe we should ask, What was the vice-presidency under Quayle? The answer to this question suggests that maybe Quayle does belong here after all. If the weather clears up, Dan, greens fees for eighteen holes are $20 plus $11.50 for a cart. But don't worry, Student Lectureship will probably pay for that, also.

Military solutions cause more problems

TO THE EDITOR:

According to Christina Tisa, Bucknellian columnist, "Now, perhaps more than ever, we [the United States military] need to maintain our strength and supremacy in order that we might lead the way to this new world order." She cites dangers like nuclear proliferation, German ambitions, Russia's instability ("How can we so readily trust a nation that has been an enemy for so many decades?"), and finally she tells us that since "one third of government spending occurs in the military-industrial complex," we would have to "revive the manufacturing base" of our economy to avoid economic disaster. Therefore, the argument goes, don't cut military spending. Maintain our strength and supremacy.

The vision of our grandchildren's world embedded in this logic is almost too bizarre to face.

The vision of our grandchildren's world embedded in this logic is almost too bizarre to face. A continuation of military solutions to human problems, as the world population doubles and the resource base halves every few decades, is a continuation of military terror, economic disaster, and, finally, starvation for masses of people. If our grandchildren are alive at all in half a century, they will have survived the militarization of the United States and Europe, they will have been accomplices in the genocidal exploitation of people of color on this planet, and they will surely ask why, in the interest of simple human decency, late 20th century leaders didn't learn anything from their own century of slaughter, starvation, and greed.

Concert to conflict with track championships

TO THE EDITOR:

I recently found out that the Indigo Girls will be coming to Bucknell on Apr. 30 for a concert in the stadium. I was excited about this until I realized that our Outdoor Track and Field Patriot League Championships are the next day (Saturday, May 1), also in Christy Mathewson Stadium. I became enraged at the total disregard to the track and field teams.

Why am I so annoyed? Let me give an analogy that should make it clear. A month and a half ago, the men's Patriot League basketball tournament was held in Davis Gym. That gym was sacred during the tournament. As a matter of fact, the day of the finals, no one was allowed in the gym or the pool after 1 p.m. Question: Would the University have scheduled an event in Davis Gym 12 hours before the start of the game? I highly doubt it. Then why is an event scheduled in the stadium that will end less than 12 hours before the track meet? That meet is just as significant as the Bucknell-Holy Cross basketball game. It is the Patriot League Championships. Yet that doesn't seem to matter to those who scheduled the concert. I would like to know how the University intends to clean the stadium from the concert and set up for the meet by 8 a.m. Saturday morning when the meet begins.

I want to make it clear that I am an avid fan of the basketball team. I went and cheered at many games, including the Holy Cross game. I believe that the gym should have been kept clear before the game. They deserve that courtesy. But I believe that the track and field teams should be given the same courtesy. Our stadium should remain clear before our biggest meet of the season.

Since I have been here, the men's and women's track and field teams have won a combined ten championship titles. Overall, Coach Gulden's teams are probably the most successful at this University. So why is there such little regard for them? Why didn't anyone check to see if there was a track meet? The Patriot League Championships have been scheduled for over a year—before the concert, I'm sure.

I realize that track and field is not a revenue sport. It may not even hold the interest of many students on campus. But to those of us that spend two to three hours a day training, it means a whole heck of a lot. I am hurt and angry at the lack of respect that has been shown toward the track and field teams. If bringing in money is all that is important to this University, then I feel that it is time to re-evaluate the purpose of college athletics.

Helping those in need is goal of pro-life mainstream

TO THE EDITOR:

I am dismayed at the recent publicity concerning the shooting of the abortionist, Dr. Gunn, that attempts to portray individuals involved in the pro-life movement as radical extremists. The exact opposite is true of most of those who favor life, especially those who volunteer their time to work at thousands of Pregnancy Care Centers across the nation.

These volunteers give of themselves in a very personal way, demonstrating unconditional care and concern for women and men whose life situation makes them particularly vulnerable to abortion.

Pregnancy Care Centers, such as the Crisis Pregnancy Center in Lewisburg, are able to provide a broad range of services at no charge because there are many members of the pro-life movement who are willing to give sacrificially of themselves and their resources. They give because they care. Without their support, we would not be able to provide the practical assistance women may need at a very desperate time in their lives. This is the true caring heart of the pro-life movement that many people may not be aware of.

That we abhor Dr. Gunn's work as an abortionist is without question. We also abhor and condemn the vigilante killing committed by Mr. Griffin.

Mr. Griffin's actions are not the actions of the pro-life movement but are the actions of a confused individual trying to bring about justice through very inappropriate means.

COI plan supports January club sports

TO THE EDITOR:

In last week's issue, Michael Curtis was concerned about the status of club sports in the January Residence policy recommended by the Committee on Instruction. The article in The Bucknellian understandably listed only some examples of activities that we were recommending be legitimate reasons for on-campus residence. As was announced at the faculty meeting, the proposed policy was reviewed by representatives of Athletics, Career Development, and other representatives of offices on campus historically involved in January activities. Upon their recommendation, we in fact offered as another example of bona fide activities that "club sport team members, where existing schedules cannot be adjusted," be allowed January residence for the entire period. The Associate Dean for Housing will be devising an application process for January residence to be in place by next fall.

OPINIONS

Quit complaining about Hillary Rodham Clinton

BY NANCY NORBECK
Bucknellian Columnist

Hey, have you heard that they increased the life insurance on Hillary Clinton?

No, why?

They're afraid if something happens to her, Bill might actually have to run the country.

Okay, Bill Clinton is in office and his wife is more popular than he is. So what is the big problem? People are complaining that she shouldn't use her full name, that she shouldn't be in charge of health care, and that she has too much influence in general. But none of these complaints carry much weight.

About her name, who cares? If she wants to be called Hillary Rodham Clinton, then call her that! Whatever happened to that P.C. concept of calling people what they want to be called? It's not as if Hillary using her maiden name is going to cause some international crisis. Nobody ever told Arthur Conan Doyle or William Randolph Hearst that they could only use their first and last names. Why not let Hillary assert her own identity? Doesn't America have more important things to worry about than the First Lady's name?

Nobody ever told Arthur Conan Doyle or William Randolph Hearst that they could only use their first and last names.

And so what if she's in charge of health care reform? It isn't like Hillary Rodham Clinton is some blonde ditz who had never even heard of health care until November—she did a better job of campaigning for health care reform than her husband did. She is a lawyer in her own right—why shouldn't she be allowed to continue to be productive just because she happens to be First Lady? When your husband takes the oath of office, the Secret Service doesn't come and suck out your brain. If Hillary Rodham Clinton were married to anyone else, nobody would have cared if she was put in charge of health care reform (unless, of course, she had once hired illegal aliens to take care of Chelsea, but that's another ugly story). Besides, the American public should be happy that Hillary is in charge of the health care panel. She's saving us money because she's not being paid.

What is the American public afraid of? It almost seems that the U.S. is afraid that if anything happens to Bill, Hillary might appoint herself President. Well, maybe she should!

I'm not saying that the Constitution should be tossed out like yesterday's news. But what's wrong with having a woman in power in this country? It is disappointing that since the '84 election we haven't had a female candidate for Vice President, let alone for President. It's not like other countries haven't had female leaders—everyone knows about Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher in Britain, and there's also Benazir Bhutto, who was elected Prime Minister in Pakistan, a country with much more discrimination against women than we have here in the U.S. This is America, the country that's supposed to be so much more enlightened and democratic than everyone else. So what's taking us so long? It doesn't look like there's any other way for a woman to have any sort of say in the White House than for her husband to be the President. So much for the Year of the Woman.

Hillary Rodham Clinton is an intelligent woman who knows who she is and what she wants to accomplish with her life. She deserves to be independent and productive in whatever way she chooses, whether that choice is fighting drug abuse, encouraging children to read, reforming health care, or whatever other challenge might arise. Regardless of her personal politics, there is no reason for the American public to react to her with any more fear and resentment than they would to a man in a similar position.

The system works!

BY TOM MALINICH
Bucknellian Columnist

In the April 16, 1993 issue of The Bucknellian, Larnie J. Booker wrote an article entitled "Constitution does not protect rights of blacks," a response to an earlier piece I wrote concerning the second Rodney King trial. My dear friend Mr. Booker, thank you for making your article so personal! I feel that I've really gotten to know you! It's too bad your response came before the jury's verdicts did; two officers were found guilty and two were found innocent. What makes it worse, Mr. Booker, is that many prominent public figures are agreeing with what I initially claimed: "The system works!"

The Constitution of the United States is not to blame for racial strife; people are.... change begins with people like ourselves being open to others.

Allow me to repeat to you how four Americans responded to the verdicts. Janet Reno, Attorney General, said, "The jury has spoken and justice has prevailed." Los Angeles Mayor Tom Bradley was quoted as saying, "Today a measure of simple justice has been delivered to our community." Pay particular attention to these next two quotes. U.S. Attorney Dennis Vacco said, "I'm quite pleased that the jury did the right thing in this case. It clearly shows the system does work." And last but not least is our President, Mr. Clinton, "It was, once again, a reminder that our courts are the proper forum for the resolution of even our deepest legal disputes." Wow! I wouldn't be surprised if these great Americans were inspired by my brilliant piece appearing in the April 2 issue of The Bucknellian!

Mr. Booker, I would like to challenge your notion that the Constitution, the building block of America, does not protect the rights of African-Americans. True, the Constitution was initially written by white men, but they designed it to be a dynamic document. Since it was initially written, several Amendments were added to it; some of these were discussed and voted on by African-Americans. Secondly, the interpretation of the United States Constitution is the job of the Supreme Court justices. Thurgood Marshall and Clarence Thomas are two African-Americans who have been honored with this duty. Perhaps these great contributions by African-Americans do not impress you, Mr. Booker. Perhaps you feel this isn't enough. Give the system time to self-correct; it has done it before!

In conclusion, I would like to stress once again that the Constitution of the United States is not to blame for racial strife; people are. In order for the ugliness of racism to end, we cannot put our hope in passing more legislation because words written on paper cannot change the hearts of men and women. Mr. Booker, change begins with people like ourselves being open to others. I rest my case.

Celebrating Earth Day is a waste of time

BY DAVID WALSH
Bucknellian Columnist

In light of the recent rash of gratuitous, reactionary articles, and letters from various special-interest groups on campus that have infected this editorial page for the last several weeks, I undertake this column with the intent of restoring some modicum of rational thinking to this newspaper. Rather than making a heart-wrenching appeal to your moral sensibilities and attempting to elicit pangs of guilt from you, the reader, I will ask you to consider something somewhat unique in this age of trendy college activism. Namely, why you don't need to support one of the campus's fashionable causes: Earth Day.

This colossal waste of time began several years ago when a group of people with far too much time on their hands were thrown into a panic by a series of premature, and in many cases erroneous, reports about the condition of our planet. The most infamous of these was the as yet unconfirmed report from NASA that there was a hole in the ozone layer (a report based on one day of atmospheric readings in the Antarctic). Hence, Earth Day was spawned. Here on the Bucknell campus, I am told by several BAC members that the festivities will take the form of an Earth Carnival, although the OSA had no formal schedule of events available.

Now, I hope I am not misunderstood. Respecting the Earth and taking care of our environment are, without a doubt, noble endeavors. But to stir the populace into a misguided frenzy with inaccurate statistics and false statements about the state of our planet is incredibly irresponsible, to say the least. For instance, how many blossoming environmental activists are aware of these facts:

1) It has never been proven that there is a hole in the ozone layer; 2) There are more trees in America now than when the Declaration of Independence was written; 3) The eruption of Mt. Pinataubo in the Philippines several years ago spewed more than a thousand times the amount of ozone-depleting substances into the atmosphere than all the corporations in the history of the world have managed to produce. This eruption (one of the many thousands of major eruptions in the Earth's existence) could result in a temporary loss of four to six percent of the ozone in the northern hemisphere.

Facts like this serve to make one thing abundantly clear: the Earth is not some fragile china teacup. The premise of Earth Day and indeed the whole environmentalist movement fails to realize this, and that is why impressionable Bucknellians shouldn't be enticed into misinformed support for a cause based solely on an appeal to their consciences.

The truth is, there are certain realities that need to be confronted about life on this planet. First and foremost of these is that nature does not follow the rules of human beings. Things that seem horrifying and cruel to us are commonplace in the world of nature. In fact, just about any evil act committed by humanity that you can think of has been surpassed in the world of nature. Thousands and thousands of species have gone extinct in the history of the world (in fact, entire races, such as the dinosaurs have died out), fires rage out of control burning miles and miles of verdant forest, and things like volcanoes and cows (which produce tons of methane) destroy our atmosphere. Isn't it amazing we're still here?

Please, don't take this as a mandate to throw aluminum cans out your window or rip the catalytic converter off of your car. But if you do attend the Earth Day festivities, don't do it with an apocalyptic desperation, thinking the world will end tomorrow. The Earth has made it through the first four billion years without our help, so give it some credit and relax a little.

Faculty votes on retirement plan

In unanimous decision faculty rejects segment of Harley report

BY TARA GILLIGAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

While the secret ballots from the University Review Committee motion were being counted, James Baish, associate professor of mechanical engineering and chair of Faculty and Academic Personnel Committee, took command of the floor at Monday's faculty meeting to present his committee's motion concerning the retirement issue.

Baish's motion was in response to the uproar caused two weeks ago when several members of the faculty vehemently opposed one segment of the retirement policy proposed by the personnel committee, chaired by Ellis Harley, associate vice president for finance. Harley's proposal called for the creation of an ad hoc committee to review the cases of professors who for personal reasons were forced to retire before the target retirement age of 65.

At this week's meeting, Baish recommended "that the faculty accept the majority of the Harley report," but that they also "take exception to anything having to do with special arrangements."

The motion passed unanimously after little debate.

The president's staff will now review both the Harley report and the faculty's recommendation before presenting its own recommendation to the Board of Trustees next Saturday. According to Barry Maxwell, vice president for administration, the president's staff will most likely follow the recommendation of the faculty and suggest that the board accept "the Harley committee report, minus the section on special arrangements."

At Monday's meeting, Maxwell warned that the faculty must consider the rational behind incentive programs. Later this week, Maxwell recommended that the University establish a task force, composed of faculty and administration, to "assess the rational or justification for an incentive program."

Harley, who was not present at the meeting, said that he was not sure what kind of agreement the faculty and administration could ultimately agree on. He has maintained in past weeks that an incentive plan of any sort would conflict with recent legislation which prevents institutions from offering age-based incentives.

Baish recommended on Monday that the University consider some form of phased eligibility, taking into consideration age and years of service. Harley, however, questioned the legality of "such a program; it would have to be a program that is age-based."

The motion Baish presented was the recommendation of an informal committee formed after the initial discussion at the Apr. 5 faculty meeting.

committee.

The debate over the content of the actual motion began with discussion concerning Shackelford's fourth amendment regarding a separate appeals committee. Under the current system, the URC reviews appeals of decisions that they made.

One of the arguments of this amendment again centered around the problems with changing the Faculty Handbook. Shackelford argued that it merely "changes the wording in the Handbook, and not the technical" aspects. Under Shackelford's plan, the appeals committee would report directly to the President instead of to the URC.

Speaking in favor of the motion, Allan Grundstrom, professor of French, said, "This motion is not as radical as it seems. It's not the same as abolishing the URC. It's much more conservative."

He said that under the current set-up, Departmental Review Committees (DRC) have no power. "We have made the DRC a debate committee with modest input," he said.

Shinn stood in opposition to the motion, arguing that eradicating the committee would be too hasty an act. "If you pass this motion today, it will come back to you... because it is not complete," he said.

Peeler represented the middle ground of the URC debate. "Whatever happens, the message needs to be heard. The current URC process lacks legitimacy in the minds of the faculty year after year," he said.

Though it failed in the final vote, Shackelford's motion brought to light much of the faculty's displeasure with the current review process.

Opponents of the URC scored a minor victory at Monday's meeting. Larry Shinn, vice president for academic affairs, proposed a motion that would create a task force to evaluate the effectiveness of the URC and to suggest methods of improving the review process.

The motion was originally offered as a friendly amendment to one of the amendments of Shackelford's motion. The faculty approved of Shinn's amendment, 50-43, but when the main motion failed, the amendment, too, was lost.

Shinn offered his friendly amendment as an independent motion; the faculty will return to the motion in September.

At several points in the meeting, Brian Mannix '94, president of BSG, introduced a new element to the faculty debate, arguing that students should be represented on the appeals committee. Mannix's arguments for student representation sparked debate among several faculty members.

"Part of the faculty's responsibility is to review itself; thus, it should be a faculty committee," said Shackelford.

But Mannix and the BSG scored at least a minor victory with Shinn's motion. Shinn agreed that students should be included on the task force.

At the conclusion of the meeting, both Dennis Baumwoll, professor of English, and Michael Payne, professor of English and chairman of the department, agreed to postpone discussion of their respective motions until the next faculty meeting, which will take place in September.

able future, projections based on three to three and a half percent [as opposed to the current ones based on three to five percent] are probably more accurate and more realistic than the ones made in the upper end of the range."

Another assumption that appears to be more in line with reality is the rate of increase in the comprehensive fee that each student pays to attend Bucknell. Currently, the comprehensive fee—including tuition, room, board, and the student activity fee—is $22,320 per year, according to the Office of Admissions. Due to increases in the comprehensive fee in the recent past, "our concern is that future comprehensive fees are going to have to be held much closer to inflation than in the past," said Maxwell.

Although this benefits students and their parents, keeping the fees down means that increases in expenditures would have to take place at a lower rate since comprehensive fees comprise the University's major source of revenue. According to Maxwell, "The bulk of our revenue comes from comprehensive fees so that is the major assumption that has the most significance to the revenue side of the budget."

Financial aid represents approximately 20% of the University's expenditures, according to Maxwell, and presents the biggest budgetary challenge because requests for aid have been increasing at 15-20% per year, well above the projected increase in comprehensive fees.

The University is very reluctant to make any cuts in projected financial aid requests. According to Maxwell, "There's a concern that if the financial aid is not there in sufficient quantities, we will not be as attractive to quality academic students" to the extent that the University may have trouble meeting its admissions numbers and that those who are accepted will be less qualified academically.

In light of the importance of financial aid, the University is assuming continued expenditures at a commensurate rate of increase in financial aid requests as has been experienced in the past five to seven years—a time in which such requests increased dramatically, according to Maxwell. "We see a general projection in the next couple of years not terribly unlike what we've seen in the past." But is this crucial budgetary assumption an accurate one?

The assumption is based on input from several areas, said Maxwell. Among them, "There is a lot of discussion on the Planning and Budget Committee; some of it comes from simply anecdotal information (from others in the industry); a lot of it comes from insights that Gary Sojka has in talking to parents; some of it comes from our business office that is constantly confronted with unpaid balances from parents that are not able to pay because of personal circumstances [and for which data has been kept for approximately the last four years]; and finally, the trustees provide an invaluable perspective because they are in a different world than the academic community."

Even with several different bases for assumption, there still remains the question of the accuracy of the projection.

Recent data on financial aid requests reflect a recession in the national economy. Current projections assume that "aid requests will rise at the same rate" as they have in the recent past.

This entails the larger assumption "that the recession data, the recession environment will continue into the foreseeable future," said Maxwell. The reasoning behind such an assumption is that while "we see the economy rebounding in a lot of ways, as you can hear on the news all the time, it's not having much of an impact on the number of jobs."

If the argument that financial aid requests will continue to increase at recession levels during an economic upturn is incorrect, then the budget problems would again be exaggerated.

In the end, Maxwell said he acknowledges that the financial aid assumption is, in large part, a judgement call. "The assumption is tied to a series of complicated factors—our admissions experience, our past financial aid experience, the best judgements of both those staffs as to the amount of aid that is going to be necessary, coupled with numerical experience over the past five years. Those are some of the factors that go into making what, frankly, is a judgement call as to what portion of the budget ought to be allocated to financial aid. There is no magic formula. It's simply a judgment call based on our best assumptions."

Amid Bucknell's projected budget problems, Maxwell said that it is important to realize that the University is not alone. "I think higher education is at, to use Gary [Sojka's] term, an inflection point. The boom years of the eighties—with significant growth across the industry—are gone. Even when the economy does rebound, higher education is going into a period where it is not going to be business as usual."

will be closed," he said.

Despite the fact that the threat of closure has been a major concern over the past several months, members of the fraternity feel confident that the house will remain in good standing and that the shutdown will not be necessary, said Weidenfeller.

The rising concerns came to a head two weeks ago when a misunderstanding between the TKE chapter and its national organization caused brothers to believe that a shutdown was imminent.

Following lengthy discussions concerning the fate of the chapter, the TKE Alumni Advisory Board and its national organization have decided to support the continuation of the fraternity branch.

"We believe undergraduates should operate their own organization, said Ernest. "Our role is to guide and provide continuity for them."

The board will not impose its own system of monitoring the chapter but will recognize the University's stance on TKE's conduct. According to Ernest, the Board "is relying on the University mechanics," as a system for monitoring the chapter.

Despite the support of the Alumni Board, the Council on Greek Life (COGL) has yet to determine whether the chapter will continue to receive University recognition.

COGL is divided into three subcommittees, each focusing on specific Greek organizations and making recommendations concerning these chapters. The subcommittee headed by Barbara Shailor, vice president of student services, is evaluating the TKE chapter and making recommendations concerning its future.

"TKE has continued to exist with a threat hanging over its head," said Shailor.

These subgroups will convene at an Apr. 27 meeting where these recommendations will be considered, and the chapters will be rated. If TKE receives a negative rating, this information will then be taken to the Committee on Student Conduct where the fate of the chapter will be decided.

Although the chapter is currently on probation, it will be allowed to participate in House Party weekend. According to Dadez, the chapter had to agree to certain sanctions in order to be eligible to hold registered parties over the weekend. One of these sanctions requires that the chapter hire an outside security agent to monitor any events they host during House Party, said Dadez.

ATTENTION STUDENTS

Each year over 1 million students graduate from colleges and universities across the nation. Chances are, most students will leave without a health insurance plan in force. Many lose the coverage from their parents' group health plan at this transition time. Some students may need a temporary plan to "bridge the gap" in coverage from college to their first job. Others may obtain employment immediately, but may have a waiting period from group coverage.

In times of sudden or unforeseen changes, the need for health insurance coverage may be overlooked.

We have the answer to this problem in SHORT TERM MEDICAL INSURANCE from an A+ Best, AA Standard & Poor's carrier.

This Short Term Medical plan is the perfect solution for students who need temporary medical coverage to "bridge the gap."

Please call the Financial Services Division at ISU/Purdy Insurance Agency at 717-286-5855 or 1-800-677-2478 for more information.

Errors cost Lady Bison league sweeps; then pound Fordham

BY CHRIS DROWNE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

If you walked into the upstairs athletic offices yesterday afternoon, you might have noticed a television set up to the right of the secretary's desk. What channel was it tuned to? The weather channel. Maybe its been there all year, but the snow forecast followed by expected sun for Friday caught most people's eyes as they walked by it.

> "We know we're capable of beating anyone [in the league]. But, we have to show up ready to play and not just show up."
> —Lisa Fink '93
> Centerfielder

Like the recent weather, the softball team has been hot and cold the past week. After reeling off 13 wins in 14 games, the Lady Bison went 4-2 in three Patriot League doubleheaders to leave the league's regular season title up in the air entering the final weekend of play.

Last Saturday, Lafayette snuck out of Lewisburg with a split. In the opener, Bucknell built up a seemingly invincible 4-1 lead heading into the seventh inning. In the fifth, shortstop Kelly Corr '95 tripled home three. Catcher Jen Yuengling '93 drove in Bucknell's first run to erase the Leopards' early 1-0 lead.

The seventh inning is one the Lady Bison would prefer to forget. Ahead by three with two outs and two strikes, they allowed five unearned runs that enabled Lafayette to escape with a come-from-behind 6-4 victory. Ellen Gabriel '93 and Heather Hoehn '94 both committed errors that could have ended the game. The hard-luck loser was Alison Love '95, who dropped to 6-3 on the season despite allowing just the one earned run.

In the nightcap, Bucknell avenged the disappointing loss by exploding for seven runs on seven hits. Yuengling again drove home the first run and scored on a B.J. Schlosser '96 single. Like the first game, the Lady Bison exploded in the fifth inning, batting around and plating five runs. Corr again was in the middle on the outburst, as she scored and drove in a run. Unlike the opener, Bucknell played flawless defense and shut out the Leopards in the seventh to give Heidi Dawson '95 her sixth win of the season.

"They put the bad loss behind them and dominated the second game," said head coach Terrie Grieb. "They really showed me a lot in that victory."

Ellen Gabriel '93 went one for three in Saturday's loss to Lafayette.

The very next day, the Lady Bison hoped that their momentum would carry over as they played host to Lehigh. But left-handed pitchers have a way of breaking momentum. Engineer pitcher Merideth Wall earned her seventh win of the season, holding Bucknell to just one run on five hits. Centerfielder Lisa Fink '93, who scored that lone run, thought that the lefty was "probably the best pitcher in the league other than [Bucknell's] two pitchers."

Lehigh scored all three of its runs off of Dawson in the third inning. Fink's score was the result of a Gabriel sacrifice fly and wasn't

Baseball survives 3–2 week, remains tied for first place

BY JON TERRY
Bucknellian Staff Writer

For those of you who don't often get a chance to watch the Bucknell baseball team in action, here is a piece of advice you will need when watching the team play: never leave early.

After a 3-2 week in which they came from behind to win one game but blew huge leads in two others, the Bison enter the weekend 11-19 overall, although they are 7-5 in the Patriot League, still good enough for a share of first place with Lehigh in the conference's Southern Division.

The tumultuous week began last Saturday with a home doubleheader against traditional powerhouse Fordham. In the opener, Kurt Waldner '93 continued his standout season by three-hitting the Rams on his way to a 3-2 win. For Waldner, it was his fifth win of the year and 17th of his career, tying him for the top spot on Bucknell's all-time list. Waldner, who threw just the second no-hitter in Bucknell history earlier this year, feels confident, yet fortunate at the same time.

"I'm getting what Jake [Kazanjian '93] got last year," said Waldner. "I've been lucky in that I'm getting the good defense and the key hits. Hopefully Jake will start getting it again, too."

The senior righthander, who is now 4-0 in conference play, got just enough offensive support. After collecting two unearned runs in the first inning, Steve Gyimesi '93 provided some insurance with a fifth-inning RBI single. That run proved to be crucial, as Fordham got to Waldner for two in the sixth, but it wasn't enough.

In the nightcap, Kazanjian was rolling along with a 2-0 lead until the fifth frame, when Fordham's bats finally came alive. A two-run triple from Mike Butler tied the score, and an ensuing single by Joe Schultz gave the Rams their first lead of the day.

With the opposing bench riding Kazanjian hard throughout the late innings, the intense righthander was touched up for two more runs the very next inning on back-to-back homers from Tom Caldera and Mark Epler. The Bison rallied for a run in the sixth on a pinch-single by Pete Gorski '96, but a double play ruined their threat, forcing them to settle for a split after a 5-3 loss.

The great thing about baseball is that when you lose a tough game you get to come right back the next day. Well, after the first-game disas-

Bucknell's Bob Behler and Lehigh's Scott Gramling will call the play-by-play. The pre-game show begins at 11:45 a.m.

Commentary

I must preface this commentary by disclosing that I have been a life-long Pittsburgh Pirates fan.

Over the past three years, I have seen the Bucs dismantled by free agency. Sid Bream, Barry Bonds, Bobby Bonilla, and Doug Drabek have all departed an exciting and charismatic team for bigger dollars in other cities. My purpose however, is not to bemoan the Pirates but to discuss the effects of free agency on major league baseball. While the NBA and NFL enjoy the greatest prosperity in the history of their sports, the national pastime has fallen on hard times. Free agency has been a major contributor.

In the years before free agency, players complained that owners of major league franchises prospered while understating profits. The low profits allowed owners to rationalize relatively low players' salaries. That all changed with Curt Flood and Andy Messersmith in the mid-1970's. The dramatic and immediate increase in player's salaries proved that the players concerns about owner's accounting practices were legitimate. In the twenty years since its inception, players have used free agency to spread the wealth.

Unfortunately, at this point the wealth has just about run out in some major league cities, and the equitability of the whole system is questionable. Not only do small markets suffer for this, but baseball as a whole suffers. Free agency has taken the fun out of the game for the fans for two major reasons. First, fans can no longer rely on having star players remain with one team for their en-

Tennis team on serve heading into league match

After winning four of their last five, racquetmen improve record to 6–6 in time for Patriot League tourney

BY JON TERRY
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The Bucknell men's tennis team is on fire entering this weekend's Patriot League Championships at Lehigh. The squad has won four of its last five matches, including Wednesday's 9-0 whitewashing of Franklin and Marshall. The Bison are now an even 6-6 in 1993 after struggling early in the season thanks to wet weather and a young team.

The F&M match was actually closer than the final score indicated. Although just one match went three sets (sophomore Mark McGuire's 7-5, 2-6, 6-4 win in second singles), the Diplomats challenged Bucknell in many other contests.

Chris Rimpel '93, playing third singles, won 6-3, 7-6 (7-5) over Selinsgrove's John Pagana, while Ray Crosta '96 took down another Selinsgrove native, Chris Bruno, 6-3, 7-5, in number five singles.

McGuire has been the team's most consistent player this season. His singles record stands at 8-4 and, along with partner Chris Stenstrom '94, is 9-3 in first doubles.

Last weekend the Bison enjoyed their road trip from hell. The team had to play on Saturday at Holy Cross, followed by a Sunday morning affair in the Bronx against Fordham. Not only did the team survive, but it came away with two tough victories.

In Worcester, Bucknell took five of the six singles matches on their way to a 6-3 triumph. Stenstrom, McGuire, Rimpel, Rick Zeoli '95, and John Hoffman '95 were singles winners, while Rimpel and Peter Conn '95 won easily in doubles.

Jean Auro —The Bucknellian
Mark McGuire '95 has been the most consistant winner on this year's team with an overall record of 17-7.

After the match came a nice meal and a long trip to Fordham. After barely making their 8 a.m. wake up call, the weary team went out and soundly beat the Rams, 7-2. The doubles teams were the heroes on this day, as the Bucknell duos took all three matches rather handily.

McGuire, Zeoli, Crosta, and Hoffman were singles winners. McGuire was really the only one tested, having to win a second-set tiebreaker to pull out the victory.

The week's only blemish came at the hands of first-place Lehigh, which beat the Bison 8-1 in Lewisburg on Tuesday. At 11-5, the Engineers are the powers of the Patriot League, and they proved it to Bucknell this week. In the six singles matches, Lehigh won every set, yielding an average of only about two and a half games in each. Crosta forced his opponent, Rick Lewis, into a first-set tiebreaker, and McGuire lost 7-5 in the second set, but those two were the only Bison to win more than four games in a set.

Zeoli and Crosta teamed up for the only win of the day for Bucknell in third doubles, taking an easy eight-game pro set, 8-2.

So the stage is set for the Patriot League Championships this weekend. The Bison finished sixth in the overall standings, and now that they are on a bit of a roll, they feel they can slip past some other schools in the team standings.

Behind Lehigh in the league standings are Lafayette and Colgate, who share second place with identical 8–4 records. The two Service Academies follow, with Army holding a 10–6 record and Navy at 11–10 while playing in their superior facilities.

The Bison are next at 6–6, and last weekend's victims, Fordham and Holy Cross, bring up the rear with records of 3–11 and 1–5, respectively. Final standings could prove vital in determining this year's Presidents' Cup winner.

McGuire has the best chance of any Bison player to win his flight. The sophomore has flourished under the tutelage of first-year coach Bob Hammerlee. McGuire's toughest competition at number two singles will likely come from Army's Marco Coen and Lehigh's Saleen Saab.

With Rimpel the only senior, Hammerlee has plenty of time to watch his young group develop. This weekend will be an early test.

Bison grounds keepers rake in praise

BY NEIL BARDACH
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The best indication that any grounds crew is doing a good job is if its work is never noticed. To that end, the crew at Bucknell works swiftly and carefully to ensure that all of the sports fields are ready come game time.

Junior Brown, who heads the grounds crew, makes sure that all of the fields are playable, especially given the recent weather conditions. "The main thing is now is just trying to keep them somewhat playable and safe, because of the spring and the wet weather," said Brown.

> "I think we have the best grounds crew in the country."
> —Gene Depew
> Baseball Coach

The duties of the crew include mowing the fields and lining them before each home game, as well as general upkeep throughout the year. The grounds crew consists of 11 full time workers, including Brown, but they do not work solely on the athletic fields.

The crew also has to be present during times when the baseball and softball teams play a twin bill.

"If it's a doubleheader, then we've usually got a guy or two there to redrag the field and reline it, to get it ready for the second game," said Brown.

One of the men who assists Brown in his duties is Bill Zimmerman. Zimmerman, who supervises the grounds crew, said of his duties, "I'm mainly responsible for mowing all of the athletic fields, and once in a while, if [Brown] needs help, then I'll give him a hand lining. We have a cover for the baseball field now, and it takes a half an hour to get it off [the field] so that [the teams] can play."

In spite of the hard work the crew puts in during the regular season, its job does not end with the season. Once the season is over, the grounds crew must recondition the fields. Then, the field is regraded and reseeded. As an added precaution, the crew puts down pre-emergence, a substance that prevents weeds from taking root. Brown said that some of the fields can be watered early in the process, but usually "it's all up to nature to do the rest." Finally, said Brown, "It's just a matter of keeping it going until fall."

Just as the athletic teams rely on the grounds crew in order to ensure a smooth performance, the crew requires the help of the teams to do their job properly.

"The athletic department really plays a big hand in [getting the fields ready]," said Brown. "They really cooperate well with taking the water off the tarp and helping to get the tarp rolled up. They really do a good job at it— I think the cooperation is 100%."

"I don't think anyone has the attitude of cooperation and such a positive outlook toward getting things done that need to be done that our guys have," said head baseball coach Gene Depew, echoing Brown's sentiments.

He added, "I think we have the best grounds crew in the country."

Brown tries to get the job done with as few people as possible. "Normally, I just have two guys working on lining the fields," he said. However, he explained that "as far as lining ... that keeps two guys busy. But if they get behind, then we put another crew on there so we'd have four people doing it." Problems arise for the crew when weather is bad. He said of the lining, "If we've got to line [in bad weather], it's awfully tough. You can't put it down while it's wet, because if it quits raining, we'd have to do the fields twice a week or so."

During the football season, the grounds crew begins work early to get the field ready for the home games. "Once we get into the season, then we'll start on Thursday," said Brown. "Bill tries to mow on Wednesday afternoon while it's dry. That way, we'll get a better mow down. Then, we start lining Thursday and we finish up on Friday ... and everything should be set for the game on Saturday. Also, there's a certain amount of us [who come] out through the game, you might say in the security end, but not really. But, if they would want something, we [would] go get it, that is, for the team or what have you."

The crew faces unique problems when the baseball and softball seasons come around due to the fairly exact playing conditions required for each. Brown and his crew can never be sure exactly how long it will take them to get a field ready for a game, especially in the wet Lewisburg spring. Brown cites an instance last weekend when the weather was bad and both softball and baseball had doubleheaders on the same day. After a long rain in the morning, Brown had to get both fields ready in a short period of time. "Baseball made a decision not to cancel both of the [games] until three o'clock; they at least wanted to get one in," said Brown. When the rain finally stopped, Brown said that "I kept most of my people on softball and Geno (Depew) had his team out there getting the water off the tarp and getting the tarp rolled up. By quarter of eleven, we had both fields ready to play ball. Now, we had men out there doing work, I mean that's a bad situation, and we took care of the bad situation, and they were able to play ball."

Under normal conditions, the job is fairly routine. "Normally," said Brown, "if you had a dry field, then two of our people take care of baseball for the first game, and the second game we just have one guy out there. They just stay there until the field is lined and then they leave." With so few of his own men out there, Brown relies on the team to pitch in, and he says, "That's another thing where the [team] pitches right in and helps out our guys."

Depew stresses how good the grounds crew here actually is. "We travel a lot, and we see the trouble that the other schools have. Just down at Navy a few weeks ago, the grass was so incredibly high it was unbelievable." He adds, "Our situation is incredibly good. Our guys are willing to come out on a Saturday. We have doubleheaders on Sunday, and the grounds crew always asks us how many guys we want working on a particular day."

Depew concludes, "Junior Brown is great. I really feel strongly that our situation is outstanding. Others may have more expertise, and then again maybe not. Our guys are excellent. I don't think anyone has a more positive outlook and cooperative approach toward the job than the guys we've got." With such a cooperative crew, don't be surprised if you never notice them.

Rugby blanks two, ends perfect season

BUCKNELLIAN TEAM CORRESPONDENT

Bucknell's women's club rugby team won its final game of the spring season this past Saturday by shutting out Scranton, 29-0.

The All-Blacks dominated the game from start to finish and relied on a team effort for the win. The backs and forwards worked in tandem to cripple the Scranton women, and what few offensives that were mounted by the opposition were thwarted by the Orange and Blue with precise tackling and acquisition of the ball.

"This year has been amazing," said team captain Kristie Robson '95. "The Bucknell women have come a long way thanks to the dedication and experience of past team captains Kerri Steckler ['93] and Karen Beck ['93]. They truly taught this team how to win with skill and aggression."

The Bucknell offense was like a tidal wave, driving over Scranton as well as their try line. The Bison scored five times, with Robson leading the way with four tries and two kick conversions after a pair of tries.

On one of her scoring efforts, Robson was assisted by Dawn Soisson '96 with a pass from the freshman as she was being tackled. Cathi Hafer '96 also chipped in with one try and one assist.

The All-Blacks have improved vastly over the course of the year, and this fact was evident in comments from spectators viewing the Scranton shutout. The Wilkes-Barre men's team, as well as the Bucknell squad that it was to play later on, complemented the Bison for their textbook execution.

Two weeks ago, the Bucknell ruggers beat Penn, 10-0, on Swartz field. Technically speaking, the game was not as impressive as last weekend's win. Even with their difficulties, though, the Bison still managed to blank the visitors in Lewisburg by stopping each and every one of their offenses.

The team will be losing three key seniors this year—Beck, Steckler, and Julie Grammont—and they will be greatly missed.

Fortunately, the majority of the squad is young, consisting mostly of freshmen. These first-year players have developed over the months into competent and skillful ruggers who have a passion for both the game and the club itself.

The returning players have the potential necessary to continue the winning tradition of the past year, and will be seen as realistic competitors for the divisional title in the fall—the first one they have ever attempted to capture.

Dollenberg, Fries shine in Annapolis

JONATHAN BORDEAU
Bucknellian Staff Writer

After coming home to Lewisburg with mixed results from the Rutgers Invitational Golf Tournament, the Bison began to prepare for last weekend's Patriot League Championship.

Results from a match on Thursday at the Lock Haven Invitational rounded out the roster that represented Bucknell at the United States Naval Academy Golf Club in Annapolis, MD. For their performance at Lock Haven, Jeff Graph '96 and Mike Schaffer '95 joined co-captains Dave Fries '93 and Doug Dollenberg '94, Drew Smith '95, and Paul Gregory '95 to represent Bucknell at the league championships.

High winds and sunny, dry conditions made the course at Navy play long and fast. "The winds made the par four's very, very long," commented coach Tommy Thompson. "The sunny conditions dried the greens out and made them play fast."

Scores, however, did not reflect the adverse wind conditions. After a respectable first round of play on Friday and a stellar, low-team score on Saturday, the Bison remained only ten strokes behind front-runner Navy. After shooting 313 on the second day of play, the Bison retreated in the final standings with a team score of 329 strokes, not enough to outlast tournament champion Army.

The Bison finished with a three-day, three round team total of 972 strokes, good enough for fourth in the Patriot League. Army's onslaught on the course resulted in a team total of 940, nine strokes ahead of tournament host Navy. Colgate edged out Bucknell for third in the league with a team total of 956 strokes. Holy Cross placed a distant fifth in the final standings with a team total of 1,021 strokes, placing the Crusaders ahead of Fordham, Lafayette, and Lehigh. Lehigh finished the tournament in last place with a team total of 1,063.

"As a whole, the team played pretty well," said coach Thompson. "We achieved our goal of placing in the top half of the Patriot League. We knew the service academies [Army and Navy] would be strong, and we knew that third place would be decided between [Bucknell] and Colgate. I am pleased with the results and the season."

Individually, co-captain Dollenberg led the way for the Bison, recording an impressive three-round individual total of 236. As a medalist after the second round, Dollenberg's final round placed him sixth overall in the tournament field of 48. Fries had another strong outing for the Bison. He finished with a total of 244 strokes, placing him 12th overall out of the field of 48 competitors. Gregory placed third for the Bison, shooting a 245, earning him 13th place.

> "We had a sort of up and down 'Dow Jones' season."
> — David Fries '93
> Co-Captain

As an almost anticlimactic event, the Bison traveled to Susquehanna University on Monday for the Susquehanna Invitational. In the seven-player, five-score format, Schaffer avenged his performance at the league championships, entering the clubhouse with a 78. Dollenberg was close behind with a 79. Other Bison scores included Dave Varney '95 (81), Fries (83), and Gregory (83).

The 404 team score was good enough for third place in the one day tournament comprised of fifteen teams. SUNY-Binghamton, one of the top-ranked Division III schools in the nation, placed first. York College of Pennsylvania also edged out the Bison.

Due to the early date of the Patriot League Championships, many of the tournaments that were forced into postponement due to unplayable courses have since been cancelled. Tournaments at Army and Navy were postponed due to the elements and have since been canceled due to scheduling conflicts amongst the competitors. Officially, the Bison's season is over.

Coach Thompson, however, is awaiting word from the Eastern Invitational Tournament Selection Committee to see if the Bison are included. Bucknell golfers will hear other shot at being represented at the Eastern Invitational. Coach Thompson has submitted credentials to the selection committee on behalf of Dollenberg. Dollenberg was the low-man for the Bison during both the fall and spring seasons. After compiling a split-season average of 79.5 strokes, Dollenberg has a strong shot at earning one of the five individual invitations to the tournament.

Yancey Smith — The Bucknellian

Pete Gregory '95 tees off during a home practice round last month.

"Doug has to be one of the few favorites to be selected," said Fries. "He is first team all-Patriot League, and he won a few tournaments during the fall season. He should go." Dollenberg also will learn early next week whether he has been selected to compete.

As a whole, the team feels that the season had its high moments and low moments. "We had a sort of up and down 'Dow Jones' season," said Fries.

The spring season was characterized and plagued by inconsistent play. The main nemesis for Bison golfers this season was turning in consistently good scores. Sporadic play from all team players showed signs of promise, then signs of weakness. The Bison return all but one golfer, senior co-captain Dollenberg, for coach Thompson.

"Next year should be good for us," commented Fries. "We have a lot of young, experienced talent that should help us next year."

early next week whether they are invited to the May 1 tournament.

"Our chances for making the tournament are better than average," said Fries. "We were 19th after the spring season, and we have consistently beaten a lot of the teams that were ranked 11 through 18. I think, as a team, we have a pretty good shot."

If the team is not selected for competition, Bucknell still has an

Lady Bison fall to Colgate, top Hoyas

Kangas leads Bucknell to home win; team travels to face #15 Drexel tomorrow

BUCKNELLIAN TEAM CORRESPONDENT

Fired up and ready to go, the Bucknell women's lacrosse team met with Georgetown's Hoyas on Saturday following their 21-11 victory over East Stroudsburg last Thursday. The Hoyas came into the game with an even 4-4 record and wins over Villanova and other teams against whom Bucknell had not fared well. Georgetown was favored, but Bucknell played a spectacular game, never letting Georgetown get ahead.

At the half Bucknell and Georgetown were neck-and-neck with three goals each. "There were a lot of excellent individual plays that led to a great team performance," said one Bucknell fan. The Bison defense only let four goals slip by in the second half, while the attack fired in seven more goals. The result was a final score of 10-7.

The Bison attack was lead by sophomore Jen Kangas with three goals and Tracy Freeman '95, and Leigh Owens '95 with two goals apiece. Tricia Way '94, Lisa Young '95, and Tracy Meerworth '96 also contributed to the offense.

Defensively, the Bison virtually shut down the Hoyas in the second half. Jen Hayes '93, Laura Hagan '96, Liza Wampler '94, and the rest of the Bucknell defense only let Georgetown take 14 shots as compared to the Bison's 32 for the entire game. This game led the Bison to a 3-6 record when they met up with Colgate on Tuesday.

A chance to take second place in the Patriot League was in view for the Bison as they traveled to Hamilton, NY on Tuesday to play the Colgate Red Raiders. Still pumped up after their win over Georgetown last weekend, the Bison were ready for action.

Bucknell scored first early in the half and started what became a goal-for-goal shootoff. The Raiders and the Bison remained within one point of each other for most of the first half. The intensity was high and after 30 minutes the game was still close with a score of 8-6. The Bison still felt that they had the game under control.

Only one minute into the second half, the Bison tied the score at 8 all. Tricia Way '94 and Lisa Young '95 cruised down the field right from the draw to score back-to-back goals. Then the trouble began.

"Colgate just stepped up the pace, and we didn't follow," said Leigh Owens '95. The Raiders out-shot and outscored the Bison in the second half, pulling the second place spot out of reach and ending the game with a 17-8 final.

After the disappointment at Colgate that coach Heather Lewis called simply the result of "a bad day," the Bison are ready to prove that that was exactly what the Colgate game was.

The Bison meet 15th-ranked Drexel on Saturday and continue a two-day road trip with a game at Hofstra. One can only hope that the wet weather hasn't dampened the Bison's spirit or confidence. Following a tough weekend, the Bison will play their last game at home on Apr. 28 against UMBC.

BREAKIN' BISON RANK AMONG FINAL NATIONAL LEADERS

Bucknell forward Mike Bright '93 and guard Russell Peyton '93 rank among the top ten in the nation in steals, according to the final 1992-93 basketball statistics released by the NCAA.

Bright finished with a school-record 94 steals in 29 games, and his average of 3.24 steals per game ranked fourth in the nation. Peyton, who had 88 steals, ranked ninth with 3.03 per contest. No other school in the nation had two players in the top 25, let alone the top ten.

The Breakin' Bison finished the 1992-93 season with a 23-6 record, and the .793 winning percentage ranked 16th in the nation. This was also Bucknell's second straight 20-win season, and its 11th consecutive winning season.

1993-94 CAPTAINS NAMED

The Bucknell women's basketball team has named Monica Nawarskas '94 and K.C. Vlah '96 its captains for next season. Nawarskas, a forward, averaged 9.3 points and 5.0 rebounds per game in the regular season last year. Both totals were second on the team behind Juliet McGee '93.

Vlah, a Patriot League All-Rookie point guard, started every game as a freshman, averaging 5.9 points per contest. The Lady Bison finished fifth in the conference last year, advancing to the semi-finals of the tournament before falling to eventual champion Holy Cross.

Kathleen Hartnett '94 and Debra Zapotocky '94 will be the captains of the women's swimming team next year. Hartnett, the two-time defending conference champion in the 200-yard backstroke, also competed in five events at the Eastern Regional Championships in late February. Zapotocky, a diver, will be looking to strengthen that part of the team's repertoire next year.

Toby Lovecchio's women's soccer team has announced its 1993 tri-captains. They are Julie Cooling '94, a midfielder from Annandale, NJ; Joanne Crane '95, a midfielder from Randolph, NJ; and Jennifer Giordano '95, a fullback from Waldwick, NJ. Last year the team garnered the final Patriot League playoff spot despite a 6-12-1 overall record.

Football scrimmage set for tomorrow

BY BO SMOLKA

Special to The Bucknellian

Bucknell's football team will hold its annual spring scrimmage tomorrow at 1:30 p.m. in Christy Mathewson Stadium.

The scrimmage has traditionally marked the end of spring drills, but it has been moved up a week since the stadium will be in use next week for the Patriot League track championship meet.

The key concerns this spring—and entering pre-season in August—center around rebuilding the offensive backfield and defensive line, as Bucknell has lost its top four running backs from last year, as well as three of the four starting defensive linemen.

Quarterback/punter Travis Kopp '95, who missed the last four games of the season last year with a broken ankle, rehabilitated over the winter and has looked strong thus far in the spring. Kopp and reserve Andy Amrhein '94 most likely will be the only quarterbacks in the spring game, as Kopp's main competition, Rob Glus '95, will be at Lafayette with the baseball team.

Bucknell finished 4-7 overall and 1-4 in the Patriot League last year, and returns 11 starters from that squad, including potential all-league linebackers Russ Strohecker '95 and Dan Zappa '95, each of whom recorded over 100 tackles last season.

Bucknell opens the 1993 schedule at home against Bloomsburg on Sept. 4 at 1 p.m.

Doug Dollenberg '94

Doug Dollenberg '94 has been named The Bucknellian's Athlete of the Week for his standout performance in the Patriot League Golf Championships held last weekend in Annapolis, MD.

In his best outing of the year, Dollenberg led the entire 47-member field after 36 holes, shooting 79 and 76. His final-round 81 slipped him into a sixth-place finish, but he succeeded in lowering his season average to 80.8. Throw out a 91 he shot early in the season (his only score above 81 all year), and his average dips below the magic 80 plateau.

The Hunt Valley, MD native and chemical engineering major made the Dean's List this past fall.

Trivia Answer:

Cal's Jason Kidd averaged 3.79 steals/game to take top honors while Bright averaged 3.24/game.

Lehigh, PSU knock off Bison laxmen

BY DARREN MILLMAN

Bucknellian Staff Writer

With its record even at 4-4, the Bison men's lacrosse team had a golden opportunity last week to rescue itself from mediocrity. With road games against Patriot League foe Lehigh on Sunday and Penn State on Wednesday, the Bison looked to point themselves in the direction of a successful season.

In seasons past, Lehigh has generally been a bit overmatched by the Bison, while Bucknell has found itself slightly undermanned in contests with the Nittany Lions. Something changed this season, and it wasn't the long awaited Bison upset of Penn State.

On Sunday afternoon, Bucknell traveled to Bethlehem after having played perhaps its finest game of the season just a few days earlier at Penn. Despite losing to the Quakers, the Bison had proved to themselves that they could compete with one of the country's better teams. When discussing college lacrosse, one is not likely to hear the words "Lehigh Engineers" and "one of the country's better teams" uttered in the same sentence unless it is a sentence such as, "The Lehigh Engineers just got spanked by one of the country's better teams."

Previous experience aside, the Engineers came out strong against the Bison, eager to turn the tables on their yearly nemesis. With the score 4-3 in favor of Bucknell at the end of the first quarter of play, Lehigh showed it was not going to allow the Bison to pull away. As the half approached, Bucknell could not build on its one-goal advantage, and the intermission arrived with the Bison clinging to a slim 6-5 lead.

Clearly, the Engineers smelled blood, and as attackman Justin Zackey '94 stated, "They killed us in the third quarter."

Lehigh ran all over Bucknell, lighting up the net for four goals while not relinquishing a single score to the Orange and Blue. "We just had a complete mental and physical breakdown," said Zackey.

Things continued poorly in the final fifteen minutes with the Engineers tallying six more goals while the Bison could manage only three. The final score read 15-9 in favor of the underdog Engineers. "This was easily the most disappointing loss of the season," remarked Zackey.

If there was a bright spot for the Bison, it was the offense of Zackey. The team's leading scorer all season, Zackey once again had a big game scoring four goals and three assists. Attackman Steven Lewis '95 had two goals and an assist while Garrett Austin '94 and Todd Streelman '93 each added a goal and an assist in the losing cause.

Coming off the major setback at Lehigh, the Bison had little time to recover before going to State College to challenge Penn State. Bucknell started out a bit slow, falling behind 5-2 after the first quarter of play. With the score 6-3 in favor of Penn State, the tide of the game changed dramatically shortly into the second quarter.

When discussing college lacrosse, one is not likely to hear the words "Lehigh Engineers" and "one of the country's better teams" uttered in the same sentence unless it is a sentence such as, "The Lehigh Engineers just got spanked by one of the country's better teams."

Poised to make a comeback, Lewis drove the cage from behind, and despite being held by the defenseman, was able to get a good shot on goal. Nothing about this play went in favor of the Bison. First, the officials missed the hold call against the Nittany Lion defenseman. Second, the PSU goalie made a big save on Lewis' shot. And finally, the play turned into a fast-break in the other direction and a Penn State goal. What once appeared to be the Bison's big break, translated into a 7-3 deficit in a matter of several seconds.

Penn State stretched its lead to 11-4 before the half, and was never really challenged on its way to a 14-9 victory. Of note for the Bison, in his first start of the season, goalie Matt Wojnovich '94 had an excellent game in the Bucknell net recording a season-high 20 saves.

The beat goes on for Zackey, who again led all scorers with five goals and an assist to bring his team-leading point total to 51 (40 goals, 11 assists). Streelman, the team's second leading scorer with 38 points (17 goals, 21 assists), had two goals and an assist. The other multiple point scorers for the Bison were Ricky Herrema '93 with two goals, and Lewis with two assists.

The Bison make the long road-trip to Colgate on Saturday to take on a much improved Red Raider squad before returning to Lewisburg for a 3:30 p.m. game against an overmatched Marist team on Tuesday.

Track teams pay back Shippensburg

Hinton, Wurster lead Lady Bison to win

BUCKNELLIAN TEAM CORRESPONDENT

A year ago, Bucknell's women lost to Shippensburg in a meet filled with frustrations. Top sprinters Tameka Hinton '95 and Dana Harbst '93 were out with injuries, and the Bison had no entrants in the field events, so they literally gave away 27 points. It was a rainy, miserable afternoon as the Red Raiders left Lewisburg with a victory.

That thought was surely on the ladies' minds as they got off the bus on Sunday in Shippensburg, but things were different this year. The weather was sunny and warm, and the Bison tracksters were hot. Things were blue for the Red Raiders as they lost to the Bison 77-68. It was the third win in four years for the Big Blue over Shippensburg. The victory was sweet, even worth missing church.

Who were the stars of this week's victory? It was the distance crew who did most of the damage, as the herd trampled Ship in every event from the 800m to the 5,000m. The 800m saw Becky Tobin '95 and Maria Ryan '96 fight their way to a 1-2 finish. I do mean fight, as both runners were boxed in for most of the race. Tobin had to swing into lane three in the last 150m to break free and secure the win.

In the 1,500m, veterans Kathy Wurster '94 and Gina Abraham '93 cruised easily to first and second place. Both crossed the line at the same time, but the win was given to Wurster. Wurster, who has had the "Midas touch" in track this year, made her debut in the 3,000m and won easily in 11:04.2. Wurster literally jogged the first 7 1/2 laps and then "turned on the juice" and blew away the field in the last 200m.

The 5,000m saw more orange and blue taking gold as frosh phenom Bridgette Mayer easily won in 19:54.2. Mayer has been steadily improving, so look for her to be a threat to contend with in her 10,000m debut at the Patriot League Championships next week.

Tameka Hinton '95 had a great day, as usual. She won the 100m (12.4), the 200m (25.2), the shot put (39'81/2"), and anchored the winning 4 x 100m relay. Hinton is so strong in the sprints that when she gets the baton, if she is in the lead it is like money in the bank. She'll be looking to defend her conference titles next week.

Other winners for the thundering herd were Kelly Peet '96 in the long jump, and Bridget Dean '95 in the 100m hurdles.

There are two meets on tap for the Lady Bison this week. Bucknell's 4 x 800m and 4 x 400m relays and heptathalete Norine Nadeau '96 will travel to Philadelphia on Thursday for the prestigious Penn Relays. The goals are to set school records and qualify for the ECACs. On Saturday, the team travels to Millersville for the final tune up before the Patriot League Championships May 1 at Bucknell.

Fawcett wins two events as Bison cruise

BY CHRIS DROWNE

Bucknellian Staff Writer

The third and fourth weeks back from spring break always demand at least two papers and one exam from all of us. Trying to burn the proverbial candle at both ends can only last so long before the two flames catch up with one another, which was the case for the track and field team this past weekend.

Sleepless as a result of staying up all night doing books and dead tired from "speed workouts," the Bison were finally able to get some sleep on the way back from their annual spring battle with Shippensburg. For the host Division II Raiders, this was the opportunity to knock off a Division I program within its own state for the second straight year. Bucknell "gave away four or five events" due to sickness, injuries, or holdouts last spring in falling victim to Ship.

"This meet is like the quest for the Holy Grail to [Shippensburg]." — Art Gulden Head Coach

Not this year. Despite the heavy work week, the Bison were able to trot enough athletes off to the meet so that they wouldn't give any events away this time. In fact, Bucknell placed in the top two in every event except the 110 meter hurdles and the pole vault.

"This meet is like the quest for the Holy Grail to them," said head coach Art Gulden, "but we competed well and responded to their challenge."

They responded indeed, with a 90-64 victory. Seven different Bison took top honors in eight different events plus a relay victory. Blaine Fawcett '93 qualified for IC4A Championships in the javelin with a toss of 190' 10." What made his throw even more impressive was that it was into a brisk wind. Erik Steiler '96 garnered third-place honors. Fawcett also tied a personal-best in winning the high jump with a leap of 6' 6." Brian Preputnik '96 finished third.

In the other field events, Bucknell swept the shot put, and took one and two in the discus. Sam Bijelic '94 won the shot as teammates Steiler and Pete Gregory '93 took second and third, respectively. The discus championship went to Gregory.

Brett Karcher '93 finished third in the pole vault, clearing 13.' The triple jump and long jump saw strong Bucknell performances bested in the final leap. Chris Bowser of Shippensburg won the triple over Karim Abdul-Matin '96 and Dennis Hare '96. John Barneman '96 was runner-up in the long jump. In referring to Barneman, Gulden said, "He's come a long way in the last month."

The Bison racked up the points in the distance events, as they swept every event that required more than two laps around the track. Tom Eagleson '93 took the gold in the 1,500 meter run (3:59.7). Jim Farrer '93 finished two-and-a-half seconds behind Eagleson for second. Steve Clarke '93 beat teammates John Lewis '93 and Ryan Byrd '95 as Bucknell swept the 3,000 meter steeplechase. In the 5,000 meters Chris Priestaff '95 ran off with top honors and fellow Bison Terry Shea '96 placed third.

Gulden praised his athletes for having their priorities in line and still being able to win a tough meet against a hungry opponent. "They hit the books and then gave us what their bodies had left. We usually get caught looking ahead to the Championships," said Gulden.

The combination of Brad Bernardini '94 and Derek Hamilton '94 finished one-three in the 100 meter dash and the two-three in the 200 meter dash. Kris Fishchlein '95 captured the bronze in the quarter mile, while Eagleson and Dave Slupe '93 went two-three in the half.

Bucknell won the 400-meter relay, but lost the mile relay. In his first real test since recovering from an early season injury, Rick Van Emburgh '95 placed second in the 400 meter hurdles.

All in all, Gulden seemed pleased at the "very good competitive efforts." This week select members of both the men's and women's squads will travel southeast to Philly for the Penn Relays. Fawcett will throw the javelin tomorrow and the relay teams will run today.

enough to prevent Dawson from losing her first game since Bucknell's first doubleheader of the year.

Wall wasn't overpowering, but kept Bucknell hitters from pulling the ball by keeping it away from the inner half of the plate. Instead of finding holes on the right side of the field, the Lady Bison found fielders' mitts all game long. "We put the ball in play, just right to people," said Grieb.

Bucknell found more of those holes in the second game and salvaged a split with a 5-4 win. Bucknell wasted little time in scoring this game, as it put up a three-spot in the bottom of the first. Yuengling got the Lady Bison going again as she opened the game with a single, extending her hitting streak to 17 games (see Stat of the Week). Fink drove home Yuengling, and Corr drove in third baseman Carol Gesler '93.

Brian Sipes — The Bucknellian

Allison Love '95 unloads a fastball during last Saturday's loss to Lafayette out at the mods.

Lehigh tied it up in the third on two unearned runs. Bucknell's defense has yielded 71 runs so far this season—but only 34 are earned.

An inning later, the Lady Bison went ahead to stay with two runs. Jill Spatzer '93 doubled in Hoehn and then scored herself on an error. Spatzer, who went on a six-game hiatus, returned in time to go 2-3 and help Bucknell get back on track.

Love gave up another unearned run in the sixth en route to her seventh win of the season. "Our pitching has been solid most of the year. We only gave up four earned runs all weekend," said Grieb.

That solid pitching was just waiting for the offense and defense to join it for an entire doubleheader, and it couldn't have happened to a nicer group than the Fordham Rams. "We put it all together in those games," said Grieb. Indeed they did, scoring twelve runs on 22 hits and, most importantly, no errors.

Fink (4-4) and Devaney Kerr '94 (3-3) were perfect at the plate and drove in two runs apiece. Spatzer also drove in two to lead the Lady Bison. All of that offense, coupled with a five-strikeout, zero-run performance from Love brought the Rams' streak of impressive play to a screeching halt. Fordham had last week's Patriot League Player and Pitcher of the Week and were poised to further jumble the league standings.

The second game was more of the same dominance for Bucknell. Gesler, Fink, and Corr each had two hits. Corr, who Grieb points to as being one of the offensive leaders this year, drove in three runs (Fink twice). The final margin was only 5-2, but it was not that close. Dawson won her seventh and struck out five.

Yuengling's hitting streak reached a school-record 19 games and is still alive heading into this weekend's set of doubleheaders. Which brings us back to The Weather Channel.

The Lady Bison are scheduled to go to Colgate and then up to Holy Cross this weekend. But, six inches of snow in Hamilton will probably bring the Red Raiders south to Lewisburg this Saturday. Holy Cross, located above the Arctic Circle in Worcester, MA, might follow that lead and come down Sunday afternoon.

Perhaps only the cold air can cool off some of the hotter Bison. Fink (.471) and Yuengling (.420) rank among the top 20 in the nation in batting average. Corr is hitting .340 and is tied for the team-high in RBI with 13. On the mound, Dawson and Love should both receive serious all-league consideration with ERAs under 1.45.

When asked to comment on the Patriot League tournament that is just one week away, Fink said, "We know we're capable of beating anyone. But we have to show up ready to play and not just show up."

Grieb is in complete accordance with her four-year starter. "There's no dominant team in the league that we should worry about. We just need to take care of business."

ter against Holy Cross on Sunday, the Bison would challenge those words. After building up a 5-0 lead on run-scoring singles by Scott Sutfin '94 and John Martine '94, a two-run single from Mike Kearns '93, and a two-run two-bagger from Sutfin, Bucknell seemed in command. Lefty Denis Maguire '93 was cruising along with a two-hit shutout through six innings, and things looked just dandy.

But then the Bison just fell apart. The Crusaders started the inning with two bloop singles off a weary Maguire. After a walk and an error from third baseman Larry Trout '93, Holy Cross started crushing the ball. One more hit off Maguire forced manager Gene Depew to go to his bullpen for Brian Walter '94. Walter, however, was no relief on this day.

Brian Sipes — The Bucknellian

Kurt Waldner '93 delivers one of his patented knuckle-curves en route to his record-tying 17th career victory last Saturday against Fordham. The ace of this year's staff, Waldner is a perfect 4-0 in Patriot League play. He will face Lafayette tomorrow.

After another hit, Gyimesi misplayed a fly ball, and before you knew it, the score was 5-4. John Palumbo was up next for the Cross, and he executed a perfect suicide squeeze bunt to tie the score. Two batters later, a hit drove in another run, and just like that it was 6-5. The Bison went down in order in the seventh, and the heart-wrenching loss was in the books.

The nightcap started off like the opener ended—with Holy Cross runners circling the bases. They jumped out to a 4-1 lead off of starter David Scranton '95 after just two innings. The Crusaders would have plenty of baserunners, in fact, as Scranton allowed seven hits and eight walks in seven innings.

This time the rally caps worked for Bucknell, however. The Bison rallied for four runs in the third to take the lead, thanks to two big Crusader errors and RBI singles from Trout and Gyimesi.

Holy Cross got one back in the sixth, however, and the game was knotted at 5-5 going into the bottom of the seventh. In that inning, pinch-hitter Gorski led off with a walk and promptly advanced to second when Kearns was hit by a pitch. Then, with Sutfin at the plate, Gorski got caught between second and third, but catcher Terrence Butt threw the ball into left field, allowing Gorski to romp home with the winning run.

On Tuesday, Susquehanna traveled up Rt. 15 for a single game under rare Lewisburg sunny skies. The Bison looked as if they were going to run away with this one as they battered Susquehanna starter Bob Ritter all over the yard, opening up an 8-0 lead after four innings.

Remember, though, no lead has been safe this year, no matter how wide the margin. The Crusaders rallied for three runs off Kyle Morris in the fifth inning to make it 8-3. Still under control, right? Wrong. After going up 9-3, Morris, Walter, and Kazanjian combined to squander the lead. Susquehanna plated three in the seventh, two in the eighth, and one more in the ninth to force a 9-9 deadlock.

Never fear, though. Sutfin, who has been amazing all year, was a hero once again. The junior shortstop had four hits on the afternoon to raise his season average to .375. By far the most important of his four hits on the day was his ninth-inning single that plated Kearns with the winning run, and thus helping his team avoid a most embarrassing loss.

If the Bison hope to maintain their division lead and get into the playoffs, they are going to have to do a better job in the late innings. After the fifth inning this year, Bucknell has been outscored 77-29. As Susquehanna proved, it doesn't matter who the competition is, any team is capable of mounting a comeback.

Despite the struggles of the relief corps, Waldner does not feel there is any added pressure on the starting staff. "When I'm on the mound, I'm not thinking I have to go the whole way, or if the relievers can get the job done, " said Waldner. "They have shown in the past that they can go out there and get guys out."

What about the attitude of the team after last weekend's lost chances? "It's definitely frustrating," said Kearns. "We're disappointed because we could have won almost all of our league games. We're still confident, though, because at least we've been in them, which is a good sign. I'm glad we bounced back in the second game against Holy Cross."

Tomorrow afternoon the Bison travel to Lafayette to play a doubleheader. The Leopards, who split a pair in Lewisburg earlier this year, are 6-6 in the league, just one game behind Bucknell and Lehigh.

Those very Engineers will be in town on Sunday for an important twin bill. The two teams also split a double dip earlier in the campaign.

"We are confident about [this weekend's games] because we've already played both teams tough," said Kearns. "All four games have been close—we could have won all four."

tire careers; also, the business side of baseball seems more important than the game itself.

The ease of player movement, and the incentive to do so, makes it impossible for fans to relate to players. The identification with players and teams that helped baseball to burgeon in the forties, fifties, and sixties has been stripped by free agency.

Today, only the uncommon intelligence and creativity of Minnesota general manager Andy McPhail, or the uncommon loyalty of Baltimore's native son Cal Ripken Jr. can keep star players with the franchises that drafted and developed them. Lacking creative management and loyal stars, most teams' rosters change dramatically from season to season. The general inconsistency of lineups from one year to the next alienates fans.

Even if a team's supporters are willing to learn four or five new players each year, it is quite obvious that baseball, from the fans' perspective, has still changed dramatically. The business of player negotiation and arbitration seems to overwhelm the strategy and excitement of a tie game in the late innings. In short, even for the fans, baseball is no longer a kid's game; it is a business.

For example, the threat of Barry Bonds leaving the Pirates overshadowed an exciting finish to the 1992 season. Fans talked about how much money it would take to sign Bonds rather than about the evening's pitching matchup. Baseball should be an exciting diversion for spectators; instead, it has become a mundane reminder of everyday financial struggles.

Going to a baseball game used to be about fastballs, home runs, and diving catches. Today, it is about accounting, marketing, and learning new names. The fun and excitement have been stolen from the game, and free agency is the thief.

Fortunately, baseball is such a great game, it survives in spite of those who run it. As James Earl Jones said in Field of Dreams, "Through it all, baseball has been the one constant." To this day, though it struggles, it remains the constant. If both the owners and players realize that maintaining ongoing conflicts between management and the employees is an archaic method of running a business, they may one day reach a partnership between the players and ownership that will allow both to prosper and the fans to once again enjoy the game. I only hope that baseball can survive the turmoil created by greed and deceit so that my children and grandchildren can love the game, not the business.

Orange and blue hosts indigo

The Grammy-winning acoustic duo plays the Christy Mathewson-Memorial Stadium

BY NICOLE COBBAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

This semester's fashionable Bucknellian will not sport the traditional orange and blue colors, but indigo. Christy Mathewson Memorial Stadium hosts the Grammy-winning Indigo Girls on Friday, April 30, at 8:30 p.m. for an outdoor music extravaganza.

Tickets for the concert are $12 ($10 with BUID), available through the Weis Center box office, or may be ordered by mail by sending a self-addressed, stamped envelope to Weis Center Events.

Amy Ray and Emily Saliers, collectively known as the Indigo Girls, met at Shamrock High School in Decatur, GA where they graced the stage as a guitar-strumming duo. After graduation, both attended Emory University in Atlanta where, after a successful taste of the local club circuit, the two decided to go pro.

Ray christened the group with a name she "found in the dictionary," and soon after the Indigo Girls made their recording debut with a single in 1985 called "Crazy Game."

Two years later, on their own label, Ray and Saliers produced their first full-length album, Strange Fire, and the rest has been musical history.

The success of Strange Fire was a surprising hit, immediately launching the careers of Ray and Saliers, hooking them into a contract with Epic. However, not everyone was convinced by the instant popularity.

Emily Saliers and Amy Ray, collectively known as the Indigo Girls, perform at Bucknell next Friday, April 30. The group got its start when Ray and Saliers met in high school. They both attended the same college, and from there their careers exploded onto the pop music scene. Since then the two have racked up four Grammy Award nominations, one win, and a following that grows larger with each successive album.

Annual street festival takes place in town

BY M. DECLAN FRENCH
Bucknellian Staff Writer

In addition to the many on-campus activities and events planned for this Parents' Weekend, the Lewisburg Arts Council will once again be sponsoring the Lewisburg Street Fair and Sale which is the highlight of the Council's annual two-week Festival of the Arts. On Saturday, April 24, beginning at 10 a.m., Market Street in Lewisburg will become a pedestrian mall lined with dozens of booths selling one-of-a-kind handcrafted items, ethnic foods, and other specialities.

Boy Scout Troop 509 will open the day with a flag ceremony on the steps of the Federal Building at the corner of Market Street and South Third.

Artisans from a wide area will converge in Lewisburg to show and sell their wares. Ceramics, stained glass, paintings, wood carvings, jewelry, handweaving, and leather goods will be among the offerings, as well as craftsmen demonstrating how their products are made.

Live entertainment will be offered to the public throughout the day, including guitarists, fiddlers, country music bands, barbershop and brass quartets, and other vocalists. The West Branch Chorus will be performing some of their barbershop harmony at 11 a.m. in the parking lot of the Northern Central Bank on the corner of Market and South Fourth. At the same time, the Buffalo Valley Brass will be playing on the front porch of the Pineapple Inn, at the corner of South Fifth Street. They will have repeat performances at 1 and 2 p.m.

Between 1 and 2 p.m., the Society for Creative Anachronism will be demonstrating jousting on South Third Street, followed by the Cloverleaf Cloggers who will be carrying out carefully choreographed, yet characteristically creative clogging.

Also at 2 p.m., Red Apple Juice, a bluegrass band from the State College area, will be performing in the Northern Central Bank parking lot. At 3 p.m., the Badlees will give an acoustic concert at the Hufnagle Park gazebo on the corner of Sixth Street and Market.

In years past, Bucknellians and their parents have joined with the local community in enjoying a street fair which seems to be most often described with the word "quality." Nina Knoche '93 said that last year she was "suprised by the amount of local artists who attended the fair and the consistently high quality of the crafts offered." Heather Lennox '94 said that "although I had no money, the Fair is an experience not to be missed."

Musical performances will be in the parking lot of the Northern Central Bank between 1 and 5 p.m., and those driving in Lewisburg should remember that Market Street will be cordoned off for the majority of the day to allow once again for this exiting spring tradition.

Late night at Bucknell—midnight munchies

BY KRISTINA SCHURR
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Raising his head from the notes spread across the desk, he yawns, stretches, and rubs his eyes. A quick glance at his watch confirms his suspicions. It's 2 a.m., and there is still much studying to be done. But it will be impossible without some nutritional reinforcement. Searching through the fridge proves fruitless—nothing worthwhile except a box of baking soda and a jar of cocktail onions. "I've eaten worse before," he thinks, remembering the time he'd used Crisco as dip for Ritz crackers. "But I need to be in peak condition for this chemistry exam tomorrow." With that, this Bucknellian hoists his backpack onto his shoulders and begins the 15-minute trudge to Perkins, one of the several favorite 24-hour eateries in Lewisburg.

Sound familiar? Perkins, Hardees and Dunkin' Donuts, the three always-open local eating places in town are often frequented by Bucknellians trying to keep their eyes open for just a few hours longer before a big exam or paper is due. At about 12:30 a.m. on any given weeknight, you can see scores of students with books open in front of them, one hand supporting their heads, the other clutching a cup of coffee. Is it that the Formica tables and vinyl booths are much more conducive to studying than the Bertrand study carrels? Students had different things to say about this eating/studying phenomenon.

For many students, nocturnal trips to the land of fluorescent lights and never-ending streams of caffeine are a regular part of their study routine. And among students with mounds of work to do before they sleep, Perkins seems to be the favorite spot. But students say that they are not only going there for the "bottomless pot of coffee." Much studying occurs there as well. Said Rebecca Ross '95, "I usually go to Perkins with my friends for coffee and a bagel when I'm pulling an all-nighter. And there's always lots of BU people and police officers there. Since I usually pull an all-nighter about once per week, I end up going there quite a lot." And Sue Piccirillo '94 said, "Perkins is really good because you can just sit there and study for hours."

What do the servers at Perkins think about this influx of students and their books? "I don't have a problem with them studying and sitting at the tables for a while," said Perkins server Christy Heimbach. "At that time of night it's relaxing, and the students are good tippers."

Dunkin Donuts is also a favorite of the weeknight crowd, but most "D&D" runs are considerably shorter than their Perkins counterparts. "I'm always up late studying so I go to Dunkin' Donuts and Perkins often," said Brad Baldia '95. "But unlike my Perkins trips where I study while I eat, Dunkin' Donuts is always just take-out stuff."

Although Dunkin' Donuts may not be home to those who need to focus on their work, it provides an interesting stress break for several people.

"On week nights my friends and I go there simply for a study break," said Mike Kaczinski '95. "And several times when we've been there we've rearranged the sign out in front to advertise more interesting things. We leave the car running between the sign and the building, run out to switch the letters around, and hop back in the car to peel away. It's a great stress-reliever."

Brian Sipes—The Bucknellian

Many students appreciate the opportunity to get quick and inexpensive food any time at Hardee's. Above: Yancey Smith '96.

Brian Sipes—The Bucknellian

But Dunkin' Donuts employees don't get angry at these stunts. Said Dunkin' Donuts counterperson Diane Charles, "The students seem to have a good sense of humor. We suspect that they've been stealing our mugs and ashtrays, though."

Weeknights are not, however, the only time that Bucknellians flock to any of the three places for a midnight snack. Friday and Saturday nights find many students dragging themselves to these meccas of bright lights and big cups of coffee. After the work stress ends on Friday, though, funny things happen in these places on the weekends. Students tell stories of water fights in Perkins where customers at adjacent tables get doused; inebriated students ask for strange food such as "eggs in the shape of a face," or speak in foreign languages when ordering food.

One Perkins server is unfazed by the students' actions. "Drunk students aren't really a problem," said Todd Fogle. "Now and then it gets a little out of hand, but after you tell them to calm down, everything is okay."

Interestingly enough, Hardee's wins for those who need some nourishment after socializing. "Hardee's is usually the place we'll go after partying," said Gray Griffeth '95. "The food is cheap and you can sit there for a while without anyone bothering you. Once this semester my roommate and I went to Hardee's after a party, and I ate four of those hamburgers and four french fries that you get two for $2. I haven't been there since."

Amy Roberts, the counter person at Hardee's had much to say about inebriated Bucknellians who come in late on Friday and Saturday night. "They're generally obnoxious, pretty messy, and they just act so stupid." According to Roberts, the favorite choice of the drunk

Para finishes a successful concert with the orchestra to perform on viola with his trio

BY JASON SPIEGELMAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

When people listened to the Bucknell Symphony Orchestra last night, they appreciated the effort and talent of the musicians. But how many people know anything about the man who is the driving force behind those performers?

Currently an assistant professor of music and director of the Bucknell Symphony Orchestra, Christopher Para has a lifetime history of work in the field. He did both his undergraduate and graduate studies at the Eastman School of Music, one of the most highly regarded institutions of art in the country, ranking with Juliard and Curtis. Para studied for six years, obtaining degrees in both Viola Performance and Music Literature.

Since leaving Eastman, Para has held Principle Viola chairs in the Rochester Festival Orchestra (1984-1986) and in the Naples—Marco Orchestra (1986-1987) in Florida. In addition, he has done extensive solo work, appearing with the Genesee Symphony and the Brighton Symphony in New York, the University of Rochester Chamber Orchestra, and various other groups in London. While in England, Para also gave a recital at the Wolverhampton Art Gallery Series with Martha Gibbs Hill, currently a visiting instructor of music at Bucknell.

Known for his fluency in conducting as well as for his skill in performance, Para has been a guest conductor of the Procorda String Ensemble in England and a participating conductor at Nova Scotia at the Scotia Festival of Music, where he conducted for Pierre Boulez. He currently holds the position of Music Director with the Genesee Symphony in New York.

Para has also done different kinds of work in the field of music, having once owned and operated a violin shop in Rochester where he specialized in the restoration and repair of stringed instruments. Para's customers have included James B. Vandemark, noted string bass soloist, and Henryk Szeryng, a virtuoso violin soloist.

"I am happy with the way my life is unfolding," said Para. "My tenure at Bucknell was unplanned. My goal has always been toward a professional situation, and I had no intent on staying on at Bucknell after my first year as a visiting professor."

The year after Para held his visiting position, the director of the orchestra decided not to return to Bucknell, and Para was hired as the new director of orchestral music. "I fell in love with Bucknell," said Para. "But it was a major change to go from professional to academic work. I am very happy with the career change, which is enriched by the quality of faculty and students with whom I work."

"Chris has done phenomenal work with the orchestra," says Dr. William A. Payn, associate professor of music and director of choral studies. "His overall musicianship, dedication, and perseverance to the group has had a tremendous effect on the students. His spirit inspires them to become more involved, and the result is an orchestral sound that is at a new level of quality when compared to before Chris came."

Having recently returned from a semester's leave spent in England, Para is scheduled to conduct in Czechoslovakia this summer. He plans continuing his affiliation with both the Bucknell Orchestra and the Genesee Orchestra in the future.

When asked about his feelings regarding the Bucknell Orchestra, Para stated, "I really enjoy conducting it because it is an unusually good chemistry of people. I am proud of them, because they consistently play better than groups at larger schools do, and sometimes the sounds that they make are absolutely first-rate." Para expressed his admiration for the members of the group, who donate a lot of time and hard work, and says "I am constantly aware and appreciative of it."

Para's versatility as a performer can be heard when he plays viola with Martha Gibbs Hill and Professor of music Barry Hannigan, collectively known as the Loeffler Trio, on Tuesday, Apr. 27 at 8 p.m. The concert, which is free and open to the public, will take place in Bucknell Hall.

Saffire brings their unqiue jazz and blues sound to the Bison tomorrow night as part of the Parents Weekend celebration. Known as the "Uppity Blues Women," the group will perform their critically acclaimed music free of charge. The concert will start at 8 p.m. and is open to the public.

"My parents have been very supportive," said Saliers in an interview for People Weekly. "But my dad still says, 'When this short-lived career is over and you go back to grad school...'"

Their careers, however, remained strong. In 1989 the Indigo Girls produced their first major-label album, Indigo Girls, which went gold, earning them a Grammy Award for "Best Contemporary Folk Recording."

Critics likewise sat up and took notice of the female duo burning up the charts. "The rise of the Indigo Girls in 1989 was a happy reaffirmation of the enduring appeal—and commeradery ability—of intelligent acoustic-based music," wrote a Rolling Stones reporter in 1989, naming the two as emerging new faces of the year.

But even with a Grammy, a top 40 album, and the support of groups like R.E.M. and Hothouse Flowers, Ray and Saliers remained unspoiled, even disgruntled by it all. When asked about the success of "Closer to Fine," the chart-climbing single off of Indigo Girls, Saliers said, "We're still adjusting to the fact we're signed."

Indeed the move to Epic had been a hard one for Ray and Saliers, who had produced their first album fairly successfully on their own label.

"We'd taken this very serious independent stance, and we'd wanted to do it all on our own," said Ray. "It was working; we were making a living. But we had so much to do, we were just falling apart... I had always felt this is our music, and I didn't want anyone to mess it up. But Epic made us feel that they wouldn't."

The step proved to be a profitable and agreeable one. The Indigo Girls released their fifth album, Rites of Passage, with Epic last year, and their popularity continues to grow.

Their attraction to their audience has always been in their down-to-earth style and acclaimed talent. Their songs tell tales of universal feelings, trying to find oneself, spiritual seeking, love friendship-things that people can relate to.

"Listeners often have the feeling that Amy and Emily must have been looking over their shoulders at important moments of their lives," wrote Diana Hume George for Ms. "Beginning from a personal perspective, their songs aim to be expressive of other people's experiences."

That recipe has meant longstanding success for the Indigo Girls. Nominated for four Grammy Awards, recipient of one, they have toured as club headliners and as support to R.E.M. and Neil Young and have appeared on "The Tonight Show" and "Late Night with David Letterman."

In addition, the two have remained active in supporting charitable events. In 1990 the Indigo Girls headlined a benefit concert for the Children's Health Fund at the personal invitation of founder Paul Simon. In 1991 they performed for numerous causes, including Humanitas, the Verde Valley School, and the American Indian land rights in James Bay.

All this is a far cry from their club-hopping days in Georgia. "I started writing songs when I was nine," said Saliers. "I wanted to be a big star—but my songs made no sense." Both Saliers and Ray have become "big stars," and their songs are making sense to millions of people. Next week they'll make sense to a few thousand more, and hopefully their concert will bring Bucknell one step "closer to fine."

Loeffler trio performs concert in Bucknell Hall

BY CHRIS BIRD
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The Bucknell University Music Department presents the Loeffler Trio on Tuesday, April 27, at 8 p.m. in Bucknell Hall. The concert is free and open to the public.

The trio, which has performed on campus in the past, consists of visiting instructor of music Martha Gibbs Hill, soprano, assistant professor of music Christopher Para, viola, and professor of music Barry Hannigan, piano. They will be performing pieces by Brahms, Beethoven, Peterkin, Dale, and Loeffler, the group's namesake.

According to the trio, the pieces to be performed are very distinct works. German, English, and French are among the languages Hill will sing. The Beethoven piece is an early artistic song with simpler rhythms and a different texture than the rich and romantic Brahms song. Loeffler, a French impressionist, was greatly influenced by Debussy, and placed a great amount of emphasis on color, texture, and creating a flowing and lyrical work of music.

Hill is delighted about the pieces being done for the concert. Concerning the two works by Brahms slated for the performance, Hill said, "I first performed the pieces twelve years ago, and I find something new every time I do them."

Hill completed her graduate work at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill. Both Para and Hannigan studied at the Eastman School of Music. The three then combined their talents here at Bucknell. When asked what it was like to work with each other, words like "superb," "wonderful," and "enjoyable" were used by the musicians. "The three of us work very well together," said Hill. "We don't often disagree."

Students strut their stuff in Tustin studio

BY JESSICA HERBSTER
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Cap and Dagger and the Bucknell Dance Company invite the campus to join a group of actors and dancers in celebration of the creative process. On Thursday, April 29, at 5 p.m., these artists will converge in the Tustin Dance Studio for an evening of studio performances.

The list of choreographers for the evening include Melaine Fenwick '94, Janelle Oltorik '93, Sharon Martell '94, Effie Cologer '93, and Cathy Weber '93. Martell and Cologer are working on improvisational performances, and Fenwick will lead a group of dancers in a piece with a jazz and blues flare. The Dance Company senior women will join Oltorik in a unique work that combines dance with text reading and singing.

The intimate setting of the dance studio allows the dancers to escape the distance of a main-stage production. They will have the opportunity to enjoy the benefits of a more intense relationship with the audience and an alternate outlet for their creativity and personal expression.

Cap and Dagger members complement the dancers' work with dramatic performances. Nina Knoche '93 will be giving a sneak preview of Dr. Seuss' The Lorax which will be performed in its entirety on the Rooke Chapel lawn for Earth Day.

Mary Jordan '93 is in the process of writing a monologue dealing with the issue of unplanned pregnancy. The project allows Jordan to step outside the University's projects and to present a work that is entirely her own creation. Jordan enjoys the writing process because it allows her to express her "personal emotions and perspective." Jordan will also be presenting another scene with Katrina Herb '93.

The concept behind the project lies in the union of Bucknell's diverse creativity. The entire evening of performances allows these students to take risks and experiment with the creative talents of various artists. Both dancers and actors are thrilled to be working with each other and hope to continue the tradition in upcoming years. Although this is not the debut of this type of performance, there has not yet been a consistent drive to expand the limits of a performance such as this. Cap and Dagger and the Dance Company invite poets, musicians, playwrights, mimes, singers, and any other talented people that may be lurking in the Bucknell community to join them in this creative process.

Danna Frangione, associate professor of dance, and Nicole Cobban '95, treasurer of Cap and Dagger, are thrilled by the response they have received from the students. There are over a dozen short pieces slated for the performance, and the enthusiasm of the students has been high.

Admission to the evening's performance is free, but a $2 donation is suggested. All proceeds from the evening will go towards the Stephanie Sayre ('91) Memorial Scholarship. The scholarship program was created by Sayre's parents in memory of her lively and creative spirit. Her death last summer left a void in many lives here at Bucknell. Sayre was an active member of Cap and Dagger, and the group hopes to contribute to this scholarship in the spirit of creativity and expression that honors Saye's dedication to the Bucknell arts.

Seating for the show is limited, but remember, the cozier it gets, the more friends you'll make. Come and challenge these artists to shock you with their brilliance.

generation is the Frisco Burger and "lots of water."

Stupid things Bucknellians do in Hardee's? One group of students left with many of the live plants that decorate the restaurant. The management tried to stop them but the students kept on walking. Another time several men received food on trays to eat in the restaurant, then turned and walked out the door with the trays.

Dunkin' Donuts doesn't seem to get as much traffic during the weekends that it does during the week from stressed-out students in need of a sugar high. In fact, many students find themselves traveling to one of these places simply for lack of something better to do.

"If there really isn't anything to do on the weekends, then a bunch of us decide to take a walk out to Dunkin' Donuts," said Geoff Behrens '96. "We'll usually go at about 12 or 1 a.m. Sometimes there's some other students there, but it's usually just locals and a cop or two."

Lewisburg, Pennsylvania is a long way off from the all-night diner culture that comprises much of the New York City area. Residents don't find themselves sitting next to New York Post editors as they work on the final copies of tomorrow's edition; they see no late-night revelers returning from the downtown clubs. But with their midnight excursions, students have formed their own sort of "counter culture"; taking over these new Bisons that don't close at midnight.

Dancing toward your wildest dreams

Janelle Oltorik '93 graduates, insecure about her chosen profession of dance, but confident in her capabilities

The world of dance is tough. At many auditions, hundreds of dancers are lined up and told, "Thank you... Next!" before they are even given the opportunity to perform. Why would anyone put themselves through such a degrading process? Janelle Oltorik '93, president of the Bucknell Dance Company, provides wonderful insight to the profession she describes as "unstable and scary," yet is the ultimate "love" of her life.

Dancing, explained Oltorik, is a very personal, intimate profession. While the dancer is on stage, she is vulnerable to the audience. "I feel like I am cutting myself down the middle and exposing myself," she said.

A solo piece that she choreographed and will be performing in the upcoming Evening of Student Performances entitled "Gone Too Soon" tells the story of "a friend of mine who died."

Oltorik tries to "give something to the audience" through both her dancing and her choreography. She has been working on a second piece for the Evening of Student Performances with other senior female members of the Dance Company. The topic of the dance addresses rape, and Oltorik, whose voice grows soft while describing it, feels that these individuals have danced long enough together and formed a unique bond in order to deal with the subject matter.

The bond for Bucknell dancers appears to extend throughout the entire company. "Dance company becomes for these women, a different sorority. I don't know how Danna does it, but there is no competition. We are all so close, especially the senior girls. We really work together and it helps that the professors are cool."

The Evening of Student Performances, performed in collaboration with Cap and Dagger, will be held on Thursday, Apr. 29 at 5 p.m. in the Tustin Dance Studio. A suggested $2 donation is asked to benefit the Stephanie Sayre '91 Memorial Scholarship. Oltorik will also choreograph a piece with the Rooke Chapel Ringers for the Bucknell Dance Company's spring performance in Weis on May 7.

Dance at Bucknell has been in existence since the turn of the century in the form of a student-based club, with students performing and producing their own shows but it wasn't until the school recruited Danna Frangione, associate professor of dance, that dance as a discipline took off. Student choreography still plays a large part of the company, and usually students have the opportunity to set (choreograph) one piece for the company during their four years here.

Oltorik, Bucknell's first dance recruit, came to campus specifically for the program established by Frangione. "I wanted a liberal arts school," said Oltorik. "At Bucknell the students are encouraged to choreograph. I had always wanted to [choreograph], but my training never enabled me to do so."

Having expanded the boundaries of student choreography, Oltorik is currently setting her 11th piece for the company. "I have learned to interpret choreography with the help of Danna, who has been a wonderful mentor."

Oltorik also credits Shellie Cash-Muller, assistant professor of dance, with "providing her with the strong ballet basis necessary for dance technique."

The respect between Oltorik and her advisors is mutual. Cash-Muller describes her as a dancer who can "fluctuate through the dynamic spectrum of dance, is very expressive, and over the past four years has learned to take correction and immediately assimilates and incorporates the direction into her dancing." Although Cash-Muller feels that Oltorik's size may be a problem at those horrible cattle-call auditions, she does add that if she can make it through those beginning moments and actually dance, "she will have a good chance, a very good chance [at being cast]."

Despite the warning, Oltorik's size has already worked in her favor. "I was working in New York," said Oltorik. "I wanted to see the lifestyle. Could I hack the unstable, unplanned, and torturous poverty level of a dancer's life? I loved it. I was waitressing and taking classes—I've never had classes like in New York. It's the center of dance in the United States."

"I saw an audition poster for a cruise ship dancer. I didn't have audition clothes, shoes, or even a head shot. The audition was at 10 a.m. and supposedly over at noon. They kept me until 6:30 p.m. and then they told me if I could be on a plane at 12 p.m. the next day the job was mine. All I could say was 'Yes, I accept!' and then I went home and called my Mom and screamed. She could barely understand me.

"The job ran from June 29 until mid-August and every time I performed I kept thinking, 'I'm getting paid for this. All my life I have paid someone else so that I could dance and I'm getting paid for this!'

"I did learn later that the position I received was a replacement for someone with a size 6 1/2 shoe and a 34C bust, and I fit those requirements, so I think that helped."

Oltorik is hoping to work on a cruise ship again this summer in order to save money and then move to New York to find work in a major company.

Although a dancer's pay for a 52-week contract (most dancers never work 52 weeks out of the year) is only $15,000, the money isn't important to Oltorik. It's the performance aspect of dance that makes it worth while. "I am me in the dance studio," she said. "If I had to work in an office and wear a suit, it wouldn't be me."

Oltorik leaps into her career at Bucknell in a piece performed during the 1990 Bucknell Dance Company concert. Since then, Oltorik has choreographed 11 pieces for the company, and will premiere her latest work in the Dance Company's spring concert in Weis later this semester.

The sounds of Solomon

Coffeehouse performer with a passion for guitar

Josh Solomon '95 warms up the strings on his guitar. Solomon will perform at the next coffeehouse on Wednesday, April 28 in the Bison. Having taken up guitar just to learn to play "Stairway to Heaven," Solomon is now considering a music major or minor, and studies classical guitar at the University of Georgia during the summer.

Jean Auro—The Bucknellian

BY KATIE DEBONVILLE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

He fidgeted throughout the interview, playing with a set of key chains and speaking in a slight southern accent. But sophomore Josh Solomon, an animated student with a self-proclaimed wanderlust and a desire to go out into the world and see what it has to offer him, spoke with enthusiasm about his passion for music.

Solomon, along with friends Rich Shaheen '95 and Jenny Markewich '95, and a few other cohorts, will be performing in the Bison on Wednesday, April 28 at 9 p.m. for Coffeehouse.

"We'll be doing some covers of songs and few songs that Jenny wrote," Solomon said. A guitarist, Solomon will also perform some instrumental pieces, including a composition of his own. "It'll be kind of spur-of-the-moment—we'll do what we feel like doing," he said. "It will be very Coffeehouse-ish."

Solomon is no stranger to the Wednesday-night tradition in the Bison, having performed with Markewich last year. Solomon describes his Coffeehouse style as "what people want to hear." Although he'd love to get up in front of a crowd and play classical guitar, Solomon restricts his Coffeehouse repertoire to popular music, and only what he can do with his guitar. "I don't sing. I leave that to others," he said with a laugh.

Despite Solomon's willingness to satisfy the taste of his audience, he remains very much an independent musician. "I do music for myself," said Solomon, who stressed the importance of doing something simply for the enjoyment of doing it.

Solomon's interest in the guitar began just three years ago. "I went to summer camp in North Carolina and I saw a little girl playing 'Stairway to Heaven' on the guitar," said Solomon. "I decided that I wanted to take guitar lessons until I could play 'Stairway to Heaven.' Then I would stop."

Solomon quickly learned to play the popular song, yet his love for the guitar had been sparked, and he eagerly kept up with his lessons. A biochemistry major with a possible major or minor in music, Solomon studies jazz guitar at Bucknell with Jay Umble. "He's incredible," said Solomon. "He knows so much about the guitar."

Having taken a composition workshop, Solomon would someday like to write his own music. "Playing other people's music is good," he said, "but there's a whole facet to writing music. I want to have music that is mine."

Because of his biochemistry major (with which he would like to pursue a career in genetics), Solomon regrets that he doesn't have a lot of time to practice the guitar.

"When I do practice," said Solomon, "it tends to be in lieu of doing other studying." During the summer, he studies classical guitar at the University of Georgia. Solomon has also taught guitar lessons. "There's some excitement in seeing people advance, but I'd rather write," he said.

Solomon frequently mentions his insatiable wanderlust and his desire to "take off" and see the world. After college he hope to go West.

"There's so much to see," he said. "You can learn so much by hanging out with people."

Take his advice and check out the Coffeehouse this Wednesday. He'll be the one with the guitar, constantly moving, singing not included.

That was then...this is now: A past and present look at the Bucknell Bubble

Are the times really changing?

BY KATE FINK
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Many of the buildings on campus look the same. Many of them even still smell the same. But in the bustle of day to day activity, it is easy to forget that the Bucknell campus has been around for longer than any of us have been alive. Decades of changes have taken place; new buildings have been erected, old buildings have been renovated or torn down, and history has changed both attitudes and fundamentals of society. Despite some incredible transformations brought about by the evolution of society, it is amazing to think about how much Bucknell has stayed the same.

The personal nature of the University is a feature that brings many students to Lewisburg. But, "back in the early '60's," said Connie Karakelian '65, "The university really took care of you. There was little room for the independence you have today." Women had to sign in and sign out of their dorms so that they could be accounted for at all times. Curfews, later for men than for women, were strict and enforced.

"The double standard definitely prevailed," said Karakelian. "The idea was that if they could control the men, they could control the women." Women were required to wear skirts to class and even to the library. Jeans were only allowed at Sunday morning breakfast.

Hazing is officially forbidden now...but is the loss of beanies something to be mourned?

Bucknell's fashion consciousness was prevalent even then. J. Crew garb was preceded by plaid pleated skirts and matching sweaters en masse. Not a woman was socked without knee-hi's, and not a man lacked a button-down oxford shirt. (Funny, doesn't J. Crew make those?)

Course offerings were much the same, with the same choice of arts and sciences, business, and engineering colleges, although time has broadened offerings of majors and courses. Women's career possibilities were limited so they tended to take a more narrow selection of classesthan they do now. But, said Karakelian, "If you made it to college in those days, you were a broader thinker. Women tried to branch out as much as possible."

The social life revolved around — you guessed it — the Greek system. Parties were mostly date functions and were chaperoned by faculty members. The drug of choice was beer, which was graciously allowed to flow from kegs. Although chaperoned parties seem harmless, there has nevertheless always been "a gulf between the faculty and fraternities," said Professor John Anderson, who joined the faculty in 1961. "The faculty has always been suspicious of their activities." Karakelian observed that the Greek system became unstylish in the late '60's anti-establishment, individualist movement, but re-gained strength in the conservatism of the '80's.

As the saying goes, the more things change, the more they stay the same. That has certainly held true for Bucknell. The typical student is as stressed, hard-working, curious and social now as in any decade of the past. Although each generation has faced a unique set of restraints and opportunities, the college student has remained a unique breed.

Clockwise from top: The university in 1960 was without several landmarks of today—the Weis Center for the Performing Arts, Marts and Freas Hall, and the Elaine Langone Center. Even Swartz Hall (center right) was in its infancy with only two wings. Right: "This Is The Dawning of the Age of Aquarius??" Pre-J. Crew days, long hair, beard, and 'mod' clothing were the essentials for any Bucknellian wardrobe. Bottom: Today's University has been expanded to accomodate more students, classes, sports events, and cultural activities for the changing Bucknell community. Left: In the same pose, but vastly different clothes, Peter Spaulding '96 sports a typical '90's Bucknell look.

Top: The draft instituted during the Vietnam War became a major source of student unrest during the late 1960's, even within the Bucknell Bubble. Even though the college men in good academic standing were exempt from the draft, many felt strongly enough that too many people were being killed for senseless reasons that they protested the United States' forces in the East-Asia conflict.

Bottom: In January, 1993, many local residents, Bucknell students, and professors traveled to Harrisburg to protest the building of a waste incinerator in Allenwood, PA, which would release harmful pollutants into the environment. Two Bucknell students, (Amanda Swarr '95 shown at right), and three professors were arrested on a Civil Disobedience charge, the first such charge in Harrisburg in 25 years. It seems that protests for the preservation of the environment have replaced the draft proteset of the 1960's.

Bottom left and right: Where there are students, there will be food and spare-time socializing. The Bison, old and new, provides a timeless, ageless atmosphere for students seeking a break from the study grind. During its glory days, the Old Bison, located next to Seventh Street House on Moore Avenue, resembled the typical 1950's soda fountain. The building is currently the home of an occasional biology lab or music practice. The New Bison, opened in 1991, is the new daytime social mecca for students in-between classes or with an abundance of free time on their hands. The New Bison is said to have re-kindled an old subculture of "Bison Rats," people who spend every waking minute in the establishment.

Breaking gender traditions

BY ALEXANDRA STEFANOVIC

Larison Dining Hall, 1944. Even though the University's separate women's institution had been discontinued, women were still relegated to a separate dining area, complete with an all-female staff.

Being barefoot and pregnant didn't appeal to Bucknell women in the early 1900's. These women wouldn't tolerate the traditional ritual of sending homemade cookies and perfumed scented letters to their boyfriends or hubbies fighting in the World War. They were going to get an education. With the draft in full swing during this era, women became the majority on campus. In fact, as the number of women attending the Women's College increased, the reasons for a separate Womens' institute eroded. By 1915, the separate institute no longer existed.

This growing enrollment of women spurred the University to build another residence hall, "The New Cottage for Women." Constructed in 1904, it was later renamed Harris Hall. Each floor had an instructor to enforce student hours, evening prayers, and lights out.

In addition to the new residence hall, the University constructed the Women's Dining Hall. No longer were women required to eat in shifts. Instead they ate together, excluded from the men. There was also a change in curfews for women, extending them from 9:30 p.m. to 10 p.m. Actually, a twist in an old ritual occurred; upper-class women now escorted their dates uphill to meet their 8 p.m. curfew, enforced by the army. As a result of contributions made by Ellen Bertrand, women were allowed access to the library in 1933, though they were not permitted to stay after 5:30 p.m.

Men, on the other hand, were encouraged to stay in the library later than women, so that they might finish their studies. In an effort to accomodate the young men fighting during WW II, the Academic Calendar was extended into a 12 month, 3 semester schedule. This arrangement was adopted by the University in order to facilitate the education of the men journeying back and forth across the ocean.

As the 1940's rolled around, women were looked upon as a commodity. Women at Bucknell were strongly encouraged to graduate so that they could replenish the war-depleted workforce.

But tearful partings at the Lewisburg train station weren't the only wartime adjustments women faced on campus. Many assumed leadership posts traditionally filled by their male counterparts, now on the other side of the Atlantic. Some women completed a 40-hour Red Cross Nurses Aid training course and helped the trained staff at Evangelical hospital. Others took intensive study courses in emergency automobile repairs. These Bucknell women were being taught to handle any emergency; to drive ambulances, and to handle loading of the sick and injured persons onto ambulances.

In addition to mastering life-saving and survival skills during both war-time periods, women were also developing leadership qualities which inspired them establish sororities. Pi Beta Phi, Delta Delta Delta, Delta Zeta and Phi Mu were among the first sororities to be instituted at Bucknell. In addition to classes and the war effort, the events monopolizing women's time at the University were political referendums, pledge parties, Senior Formals and Senior picnics.

Also at this tme, many of the sorority members, as well as independent women, were required to inhabit the mens' fraternity houses. Since these houses needed to be maintained due to the great number of men called to the battlefield, women were a necessary addition to these unprecedented living arrangements. Womens' residence in fraternity houses also helped to alleviate some of the University's financial burden. Women in fraternity houses meant less resources needed, such as heating fuel, etc., to maintain the campus residence halls.

The University recognized one woman, in particular, for her service to Bucknell. Mary Moore Wolfe was the first woman to join the Board of Trustees in 1935. Dr. Wolfe earned her Bachelor of Arts degree in 1899; Masters of Arts degree in 1900; and her Doctorate of Science degree in 1933. A pioneer in professional education for women, she took a keen interest in the development of the curriculum and in all programs relating to the welfare of Bucknell women. She was also the first woman delegate to the Congress in Peru in 1938. Dr. Moore was 88 years old when she died at her home in Lewisburg, on October 18, 1962.

Times were changing fast for these women at Bucknell. They accepted and rose to the challenges brought forth when over one half of the University's male population was called upon to serve their country. While the movements of the early 1900's were significant, they prove minimal in comparison to the great revolution that occured at the University after 1950...

This article is the second in a series of three about Women at Bucknell.

Left: Homecoming hosts and hostesses are student leaders who are nominated by an organization and then elected by the general student body. This more democratic representation of senior class leaders replaced the old tradition of a single homecoming queen.

Bottom: Homecoming Queen '63. Long an honor for a senior class woman, being elected homecoming queen gave Meg Davis '63 a chance to be recognized by both the Bucknell and Lewisburg communities for her academic and leadership accomplishments.

Getting the goods on Our Country's Good

An exclusive interview with the cast of the latest production from the department of theatre and dance

The Scenario: The cast of the upcoming production* Our Country's Good is assembled in the Coleman Theatre green room for an interview. Although the play deals with serious issues, and is labled as being "for mature audiences only," people are laughing and talking. For the past six weeks they have lived their characters, played the lives of convicts, and are now ready to discuss why people should see Our Country's Good for their own good. Our Country's Good will run April 23-26 in the University Theatre in Coleman. Tickets are $4, and the show starts at 8 p.m.

The Cast:

Jessica Alexander '95	Duckling/Lieut. George Johnston
Jim Amlicke '93	Major Ross, RM/Ketch Freeman
Ashlynn Billingsley '94	Mary Brenham/Rev. Johnson
Dan Drukteinis '93	2nd Lieut. Ralph Clark, RM
George Hannah '93	Capt. Tench, RM/Black Caesar
Leane Hood '96	Liz Morden/Lieut. Will Dawes
Mandy Kalish '96	Meg Long
Kevin Klaus '94	Captain Arthur Phillip, RN
Colleen Lyttleton '93	Aboriginal Australian
Jeff Pennington '93	John Wisehammer
Gabe Portuondo '93	Capt. Collins, RM/Robert Sideway
Katie Strauch '94	Dabby Bryant/2nd Lieut. Faddy
Tommy Zappulla '96	Capt. Jemmy Campbell, RM
Bernie Zilinskas '95	Harry Brewer, RN/John Arscott

The Plot: In the seventeenth century, England chose to rid itself of criminals by shipping its convicts to Australia to found new colonies. The trip out was grueling, and once there, a shortage of food and adverse living conditions lowered morale while raising tensions. People were punished, either whipped or hanged, for stealing food and attempting to escape, but they did so anyway, driven by utter dispair. Women sold themselves for food, prostituting themselves to the officers for whatever advantage they could gain.

Capt. Arthur Phillip, governor of the colony, decided to put 2nd Lieut. Ralph Clark in charge of rehearsing a play to boost morale and reform the prisoners. Challenged by Major Ross and Capt. Jemmy Campbell, Clark proceeds with the play, teaching the convicts that they are more valuable and meaningful than they have been led to believe.

The Interview:

BY NICOLE COBBAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Q: This play is very controversial in its issues. What themes exactly does the play address?

Jim Amlicke: We have power versus powerless. That's one of the themes going on. Man versus man. Man versus the environment.

Bernie Zilinskas: I think one of the major themes in the play is the idea of punishment on many different levels. I think the play indulges in punishment on all different levels, and it explores them all fully. It explores physical punishment, brutally, mental punishment inflicted by others, and self-inflicted punishment. It raises the question of what guilt is. How do you pay for your crime? Is it possible that you can pay worse than being hung; by just being alive?

George Hannah: One of the most important things that the play shows is the effect of the environment on individuals. And I think that, more so than any other theme, is very clear...because one of the things that the author does is she [Timberlake Wertenbaker] takes all these people from the environment that they're used to and she shows how even though they're placed in a new environment. Rousseau says that "men are born free but everywhere they're in chains." Everywhere these people are shackled by the different environments that they've grown up in.

Gabe Portuondo: I think one of the other themes is the power of the theatre, because it transforms people, educates, as well as entertains. I think that is the dominate theme.

Q: Dan, your character [Ralph Clark] is the one who persists the most in pursuing the idea of redemption through theatre. Why do you think he does so?

"It's the closest thing to something that Bucknell would censor that you'll ever see at Bucknell."
—Jeff Pennington '93

Dan Drukteinis: There are a lot of reasons. One of them is just his own personal motivation to try to get to the top in the society. But also I think that he starts realizing that no matter who you are, you still have value; even these convicts. And he starts realizing that they think just like anybody else does, and that they can be reformed by treating them more humanely.

Q: What does this play have to say about theatre in general and the idea of reform through culture?

Bernie Zilinskas: One of the very strong arguments that the play has is that through culture, not only do people learn to be cultured, but they learn to appreciate different types of art for what they are and to find their own value for everything. I think they also, at the same time, find a learning and understanding of each other.

Kevin Klaus: I think the big message is that a lot of people assume that so-called "culture" is a very upper-class, elitist type thing. People look at other people who live in slums and say, "Oh those uncultured ingrates," or whatever, and it's not true. People have culture. It's an innate quality. So a big part of this play is to show that to be educated and cultured is not only for the rich and powerful. It's for everybody. It's a great tie between human beings.

Ashlyn Billingsley: I think we can also drag the play into the political forum. We can talk about the arguments for capital punishment, dying for a crime. And it is more of an advocate for saying that everyone is exceptionally human and equal. That you can be reformed and you shouldn't necessarily be locked up and treated like an animal, or a dog, or like a lesser being because you committed these crimes. And if people were to try to reform you and put you into some kind of constructive environment instead of taking you and locking you in prison and saying, "Okay, we're going to gas you for this," maybe you would find on your own the errors of your ways. Culture is a great way to do it. Especially theatre.

Q: So, given these themes and the fact that this is very much a period piece, based on an actual historical event, what can audiences get out of it? What in the play applies to contemporary, everyday life?

George Hannah: I think the reason that she [Timerlake Wertenbaker] does put it in another period is so that we can look at it more objectively. You find that in plays by Brecht and other political authors. What they do is they put it in a different period so that we can look at it more objectively. What you get out of it is the theme of classism. How many times do Bucknell students come in and view the custodians as though they're not even people, they're just there for their benefit. How many times do Bucknell students view anyone that's a non-student as something else, lower.

Q: Wertenbaker also makes some very strong statements about women. What do you think about the treatment of women in this play?

Ashlyn Billingsley: I think some of it brings up the fact that America right now is based on a patriarchal system and that women and women's issues have been neglected. Women still are just not seen as equal and are still harassed and treated in sexist ways and put into positions, not necessarily prostitution, but positions that can be psychological or symbolically the same as prostitution.

Mandy Kalish: Certain women in the play are prostitutes. But I think the play deals with an underlying meaning—not the fact that these women are prostitutes and are treated poorly, but the attitudes of the officers toward these women because of stereotypes. I don't think it's dealing as much with the role that women play in society but the role that men perceive women to play in society.

George Hannah: But we have to ask the question, How does the author choose to portray the environment that these women are coming out of? How many options does the author present these women with?

Jeff Pennington: The women's roles are essential to the play and they're all very strong and they're all self-reliant, self-respecting women. You can see a real strength. It's a very positive play for women. It shows that they are equal to the men and that they have a lot to offer and it shows throughout the play. Each character is an individual and has something great to offer to the plot and to themselves.

Leanne Hood: The fact is that the men and women were on the same level as far as being prisoners. But then on the same point, the issue of Liz Morden being a female and actually going to be tried to be hung was a big issue. It came up numerous times. It was very controversial as compared to if Liz Morden were a man. That wouldn't be a factor.

Q: The characters that you are playing are very different from your own personalities. What kind of preparation did you need to do to enter into the life of a convict?

Jeff Pennington: My character is in a lot worse situation than I am, but you have reach down into yourself. Everyone has a dark side to their personality, or I hope so, because that's where you get a lot of good...stuff.

Kevin Klaus: I think you can substitute it with other things. We all have really dark times in our lives. Whether or not they're as dark as other people's, for your own personal experience there's a lot of pain and suffering involved. And you can take that pain and you can apply it in a different context.

Jim Amlicke: In terms of finding one of my characters, Ketch, and finding substitutions in my life to create that character, I don't have a problem. It's the other character that I have nothing to substitute for. Here's a guy [Major Ross], he's brutal enough to force a women to almost take off her dress in front of everybody, pushes people down on the ground, tells them to bark like a dog. I have never had to deal with anything like that before. I find that very difficult.

George Hannah: I haven't yet accomplished it to a point where I feel satisfied, but I think when I go on stage I try to think about all these people—they all are desparate. They're all on their last leg. They all are desparate and hungry for a sense of control, a sense of freedom in their lives, or just a sense of being able to survive.

Q: Anything else?

Jeff Pennington: It's a contemporary piece. It's almost brand new. There's sex, but I'm not trying to sell it with sex. It's just really...cool. It's the closest thing to something that Bucknell would censor that you'll ever see at Bucknell. I say the word "cunt" in the first speech of the play, and I'm a pretty nice guy, but my parents will be shocked, and a lot of people will be shocked.

Bernie Zilinskas: What I think the students, or whoever comes to see the show, will enjoy most is that they can identify very much with the plights of the characters. What characters are striving for and what their fears are pretty much fears that everyone has experienced at one time or another. And I think they'll enjoy watching people succeed in the end. It's a very hopeful play.

A cappella sounds for Parents Weekend

Some Singers perform in Bison

Jean Auro—The Bucknellian

Left to right: Chuck Colozzi '96, Ken Laurora '95, David Chrzanowski '93, Jason Spiegelman '95, and Andre Fuqua '96 (missing: Chris Bird '95), collectively known as Some Singers, perform tomorrow night in the Bison at 6:30 p.m. to kick off Saturday night of Parents Weekend.

BY KATIE DEBONVILLE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

They're called Some Singers because, simply put, that's what they are—a group of six Bucknellians who love to sing their unique blend of a cappella sound and style. Together, Jason Spiegelman '95, Ken Laurora '95, Dave Chrzanowski '93, Chris Bird '95, Andre Fuqua '96, and Chuck Colozzi '96 form a sextet that is marked by dedication, diversity, and talent.

The semester's schedule has been both hectic and fulfilling for the group. Last Sunday, Some Singers performed twice, once at an afternoon concert at President Sojka's house, and once at the Buffalo Valley Lutheran Village.

The next on-campus performance by Some Singers will be their second annual Spring Jamboree tomorrow night at 6:30 p.m. in the Bison. Joining Some Singers for the hour-long "Spring Jam" will be the Silhouettes, Bucknell's only female a cappella group.

"The concert will only be an hour long to give people plenty of time to get to the Weis Center for the PRISM concert," said Spiegelman, an avid supporter of the music department's annual Parents Weekend performance.

According to Spiegelman, Some Singers was founded four years ago by Alex Bergmann '92. The four original members of the group all graduated last year. In fact, Spiegelman and Laurora are the only veterans in this year's sextet. However, Spiegelman was quick to point out the success of this year's group.

"The members are dedicated to getting a lot of work done," said Spiegelman. "We've put together a good repertoire." Bird agreed, saying, "We've progressed a lot since last semester."

This year, Some Singers have added a new aspect to their schedule—road tripping. "This is the first time we've done concerts at other schools," Spiegelman said, adding that the group will be performing at the invitation of SUNY Binghamtom's Harpur Arpeggios on April 30.

"It's good to get away and do some comical music. It's de-stressing," said Chrzanowski, the only senior in the group. Chrzanowski, a music performance major, will be leaving Some Singers after this year to continue his musical education at Yale University next fall.

"Because of the small membership of the group, vocal versatility is a key factor in successful performances," said Spiegelman. The group members also do a lot of their own arranging. Spiegelman arranged the sextet's rendition of "In the Still of the Night." Also included in the group's repertoire is "Lonesome Road," arranged by former Bucknellian Bob Rikes.

"By far, our most fun piece is 'Zombie Jamboree,' arranged by Brian Wilhour ['91]," said Spiegelman. Bird agreed that this piece is the group's "most interesting" work.

Some Singers also credits their new faculty advisor, Sarah McAskill, assistant director of annual giving, for much of this year's success. "She has been very helpful to the group," Spiegelman said.

Some Singers will finish up their season with a performance at a Mother/Daughter banquet in Beaver Springs later on this semester. They will also perform at the final Coffeehouse of the year, officially deemed A Cappella Night in the Bison, featuring the Bison Chips, Silhouettes, and Some Singers.

A Cappella Night also marks the final concert ever for Some Singers. Next year the group will be known as Chordination, a play-on-words chosen by the current members.

"Some Singers was the name chosen by the original members," said Spiegelman. "We wanted something snappier—something that better shows the purpose of the group."

Chip off the old Bucknell block

BY KATIE DEBONVILLE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Q: What's has 18 arms and 18 legs, a sense of humor, and can sing?

A: The Bison Chips, and they're coming tonight to a Weis Center near you.

Tonight at 8 p.m. on the Weis Center stage, the Chips will host Chipfest, their annual Parents Weekend a cappella concert. The event promises to be filled with music, laughter, and a surprise or two. Joining the Chips will be the Grace Notes, a female a cappella group from Georgetown University.

Members of the Bison Chips include Pete West '93, Eric Levenson '93, Matt Daumen '94, Brian Frutchey '95, Bryan Gess '95, Tim Anderson '95, Joe LaFalce '95, Mike Phillips '96, and Greg Choi '96.

According to the group leader West, the Chips have had a quiet but productive year. Illnesses kept the group from performing at last semester's final Coffeehouse in the Bison. In fact, their last on-campus performance was at a dinner for Bucknellians and their siblings during Siblings Weekend when they were joined by the Silhouettes, Bucknell's female a cappella group.

However the Chips have ventured beyond the Bucknell Bubble to perform this semester. "We traveled to York and sang at the Strand Capital Theatre in a vaudeville show," said West. With a hint of bitterness he added, "Our big road trip to Colby was ruined by the Blizzard of '93."

It is a Chipfest tradition that the Chip leaders of the preceding year return to act as masters of ceremony for the show. Chipfest '93 will be no exception, welcoming back former Chips members Chris Williams '92 and Rick Cranford '92 to the Weis Center stage for the event.

Copies of the Bison Chips Dare to be Dung album will be available on CD and cassette at the concert, and the recording is still on sale in the Bucknell University Bookstore. According to the group, a possible CD is in the works for next year.

Next fall looks to be an exciting season for the Bison Chips. "We're planning a huge Chip reunion for Homecoming Weekend," said West, who is already looking forward to returning to Bucknell for the event. The group is hoping that former Bison Chips will return to Lewisburg in herds for the concert, which will be recorded.

Just as seniors West and Levenson are excited about their fourth and final Chipfest, first-year newcomers Phillips and Choi are waiting with anticipation for their Chipfest debut.

"I think it'll be fun—it's along the lines of a musical," Phillips stated. Choi added, "I've heard a lot about Chipfest, and I'm excited. I'm looking forward to hearing the [Grace Notes] too."

"We're looking forward to singing on campus because we haven't sung that much this year," LaFalce stated. "We've got a handful of new arrangements to try out on the campus, and we hope that other people are excited about Chipfest, because we are."

The last performance of the year for the Bison Chips will be the A Cappella Night Coffeehouse in the Bison, scheduled for May 12. A Cappella Night traditionally features the three a cappella ensembles at Bucknell.

The Bison Chips expressed their gratitude to Bob Hammerlee, who is completing his first year as advisor to the ensemble. Bob Hammerlee is the brother of former Chip advisor James Hammerlee, who retired last year as University chaplain.

Poet-in-residence displays her plumage

BY NICOLE PANICO
Bucknellian Staff Writer

"Take heart" all you aspiring poets, because Poet-in-Residence Molly Peacock will give her last of two poetry readings here at Bucknell on Sunday, April 25, at 8 p.m. in Bucknell Hall.

Born in Buffalo, this leading contemporary poet earned her B.A. from the State University of New York City at Binghamton, where she graduated magna cum laude, and her M.A. in writing from Johns Hopkins University. Peacock has held teaching appointments at the University of Delaware, New York University, Columbia University, Hofstra University, and Sarah Lawrence College. Since 1989, she has taught the Writers on Writing Program at Barnard College.

Peacock has been awarded grants from the New York Foundation for the Arts, the National Endowment for the Arts, and the Ingram Merril Foundation. She has held numerous residencies at Yaddo in upstate New York, and at the MacDowell Colony in New Hampshire. Then, in 1984, she won the PEN/NEA Fiction Award.

Presently, Peacock is a Learning Specialist at Friends Seminary in New York City, and president of the Poetry Society of America. Conducting one-to-one poetry consultations, Peacock and her husband, Michael Groden, reside in New York City and in London, Ontario.

Peacock arrived at Bucknell on January 31. Since then, she has given a poetry reading in Bucknell Hall, and has visited the Lewisburg and Mifflinburg Area High Schools. During her visit, Peacock was very personal with the students, and said that they were very responsive in return. She read them one of her poems dealing with a high school sweetheart that she eventually married. Peacock encouraged the high school students to use their own lives in their writing.

When asked about her stay at Bucknell so far, Peacock raved, "My stay has been absolutely lovely! The students are a joy!" She also said that Bucknell University is truly a liberal arts school. "Bucknell is a testament to liberal arts schools. I have three engineering majors in my poetry seminar!"

Peacock commented that subjects often explosive in nature and verse that often experiments with traditional form are some characteristics of her poetry. "The main theme that concerns me is love, in all its manifestations: family love, eroticism, love of self, altruism, religious love, and hatred, of course, too."

Peacock is the author of three books of poetry: Take Heart, Raw Haven, and And Live Apart. Her poems have been published in many magazines, journals, and anthologies such as Poetry, The Paris Review, The New Republic, The Nation, Ploughshares, Shenandoah, and The New Yorker.

From June 7-18, Peacock will complete her period of residency by returning to the Bucknell campus to work with the members of the Younger Poets Seminar. The seminar offers competitive fellowships to student poets from universities across the country.

Friendship with Men
By Molly Peacock

Is friendship with men like friendship with birds?
Is friendship the way this parrot nestles beneath my chin, its feathers only disturbed by the regular wind from my nostrils?

Unexpectedly, another species and I achieve intimacy: we are each other's pets; as I imagine the seas as a great distance are pets of the stars.

Alumnus opens exhibit in Bertrand

BY ARA METJIAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

As students begin to wind down for the end of the semester, they will find still much more in store for them in the sphere of cultural activities. Among them is the "African Experience" which has featured events for the entire semester. Until the end of May, students can appreciate the work of Peter Baker '91 in his exhibit in the Bertrand Library entitled, "African Habitats."

Baker graduated with a degree in political science. Among one of his outstanding achievements here was his historical fiction novella Quality of Mercy which documents the colonialization of the Congo. This work subsequently won the Agnes Archer Award for written work demonstrating excellecnce, and the Phi Beta Kappa award.

Following his graduation, Baker travelled to Kenya and Tanzania. By observing the beauty of the African country, he began to see the interdependence of man and nature.

"Humankind needs the wild to survive," said Baker. "Nature and wildlife can serve as a mirror in which we see the result of our absence, the environment free of human manipulation. As long as there exists the wilderness of untamed lands, we find hope. When wildlife is lost, we will have conquered and caged ourselves, and like captive animals, our spirit will die."

Although his aspirations were to be a writer, financial needs soon pressed him to, "change my avocation to my vocation." He remarks that his photography is much like his writing—his writing employs the use of visual images, and thus his photography is merely an extension of his writing capabilities.

His exhibit here unfurls as a result of his trips to Africa. Baker explained that his exhibit is "meant to portray the continent of Africa as more than a land of animals and starvation."

"Nature provides the perfect palate of tones, textures, and forms," said Baker. "As a photographer, my eyes provide the frame, and my mind the composition. Photography enhances my ability to see, allowing me to focus selectively, alter perspective, and accentuate form."

Baker feels very strongly and positively about his exhibit. The opportunity to give something back to his school was very "rewarding," according to Baker.

"African Habitat," was funded by the Association of the Arts and may be seen through May 30.

On the road to a pollution-free world

BY DANALYN ADAMS
Bucknellian Staffwriter

When asked to name the world's top killers, most people won't place air pollution high on their lists. The facts say otherwise. Air pollution is truly a global public health emergency. United Nations statistics show that more than one billion people—a fifth of humanity—live in areas where the air is not fit to breathe. In the United States alone, approximately 150 million people reside in areas where air is considered unhealthy by the Environmental Protection Agency. According to the American Lung Association, this leads to as many as 120,000 deaths each year. One of the primary causes of air pollution stems from the emissions from gas-powered automobiles. Increasing emphasis upon the improvement of the global environment has inspired "Detroit's Big Three" auto-makers—General Motors, Ford, and Chrysler—to consider a collaborative effort in the design and construction of an electric car.

A student at Bucknell is at the center of the growing demand for electrically-powered automobiles. Troy Werley, a graduate student completing his seventh year at Bucknell University, is the designer of an electric truck, his ticket to a masters degree in mechanical engineering. Werley has spent the past three years designing and converting a 1980 Ford pickup into a smooth-running electric vehicle.

The burgundy and cream pickup is a hybrid—powered by a 30 horsepower electric motor including 12 six-volt batteries which occupy practically the entire bed of the truck. Werley's truck uses regular lead acid batteries, similar to those found in golf carts. "I see [my truck] as a good interim solution," Werley said. The truck's power system, which has a small gasoline engine for backup energy, may be a step in replacing the air-polluting internal combustion engine with a non-polluting power source.

Graduate student Troy Werley designed an electric car as part of his graduate study program at Bucknell. The truck took Werley three years to design and construct, ultimately resulting in a fully operational vehicle. It can cruise at a 45-50 mph range.

Werley did all of the mechanical work, from welding to installing the electrical circuits, no small feat for one individual. Professor Peter Stryker, Werley's adviser, said "I think he's done an exceptional job." The truck can travel about 25 miles before it must be recharged, a process which takes 12 hours, and it can cruise in the 45-50 mph range. Now that the truck is fully operational, Werley is road-testing the vehicle to collect data on its reliability and performance.

Werley stated that, "Right now the battery is the problem...some have been developed that have a lot of energy (and don't need to be recharged as often) but they can't get the peak power for acceleration. Based on the public's travel habits today, electric vehicles are not practical for long-range driving." Designing a vehicle for a 30-mile daily commute "is easily achievable," said Werley, but visiting Grandma who lives 100 miles away on the weekend isn't feasible without recharging the batteries. This poses a problem—where is a motorist going to recharge an electric car?

At this time, however, the "infrastructure is not developed...You can't back up to a service station, put a nozzle in and get more power," said Werley. He offered the future possibility of exchanging batteries at a station. While on a trip, motorists could pull into a service station about every six hours, and exchange their battery for a recharged one. However, batteries would have to be standardized, which must be a collaborative undertaking, a process that may not rest well with auto-makers. Norvik Technologies, the company which made a fast-charging unit for the Chrysler test TE-Van, contends that it could eventually market recharging units for between $2,000 and $10,000. The Chrysler model cost $150,000. Thus, "all the logistics behind [recharging batteries] make it unfeasible" in the immediate future, according to Werley.

Upon completion of his 200-page, eight-chapter master's thesis, Werley hopes to find a job in the automotive field. The truck will remain at Bucknell. Professor Stryker and members of the electrical engineering department are discussing the possibility of designing a computer that would integrate some elements of the operation. The professor also plans to use the pickup as a regular campus vehicle, keeping logs on performance and maintenance on a long-term basis. Hopefully, automotive makers will become as inspired as Werley has been, eventually increasing efforts to combat pollution through the development of environmentally-safe vehicles.

In a recent New York Times article, it was cited that the auto makers are discussing jointly building an electric car in order to meet the requirements of the clean-air law first enacted in California and recently adopted by several northeastern states. The state laws require that by the 1998 model year, "zero-emission vehicles," presumably electric cars, will be fit for sale, and hopefully, affordable for consumers.

There are a few models already on the drawing boards of the respective auto companies. General Motors developed the Impact, a two-seater which the corporation planned to mass produce, but then postponed it. Ford has an electric cargo van named Ecostar, based upon the current Aerostar gasoline-powered models, while Chrysler has built a TEVan, an electric version of its Dodge Caravan.

All three of the vehicles have limited driving range due to their power source, and all are expected to cost far more to produce than traditional gasoline-powered cars. For instance, the Dodge TEVan is priced at $120,000, compared to a range of $16,000 to $23,000 for the gasoline model. The majority of consumers would not be able to purchase the higher-priced electric vehicle, even though it is ultimately more environmentally sound. A widely held assumption is that the auto companies will initially have to subsidize the selling price of these electric vehicles by raising the prices of gasoline-powered cars.

Senior recital keeps engineers rolling

Gabrielle Karp '94 takes time out from her engineering major to practice the piano. Karp will perform in a joint senior recital with Sabrina Kleinknecht '93 this Thursday, April 29, in Bucknell Hall.

BY KATIE DEBONVILLE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

They spend their days in Dana Engineering, learning the finer points of mechanical and electrical engineering. Most students would find that an engineering major is enough to keep them busy, but not for Sabrina Kleinknecht '93 and Gabrielle Karp '94—they also spend large amounts of time in the music and arts building fulfilling the requirements of their music majors. The two will be performing a senior recital at 8 p.m. on Thursday, April 29 in Bucknell Hall.

The evening's recital will feature works by Beethoven, Ives, Chopin, Cowell, Messiaen, Schubert, and Muczynski. The program, chosen by the pianists, consists almost exclusively of twentieth century music.

"Twentieth century music is unpredictable—it's not old hat," said Karp. "Fewer people have performed it, and in that way you're like a pioneer...I also like surprising audiences by playing with my elbow." Members of the audience at the recital will be able to see what exactly Karp means by that statement.

Both Kleinknecht and Karp devote time to their engineering majors as well. Kleinknecht is a fifth-year student who also has a mechanical engineering major. In addition to her on-campus work, she spent a year abroad in Australia. Next fall Kleinknecht will attend the University of Rhode Island where she will study ocean engineering and music.

Karp, a fourth-year student, plans to use her electrial engineering major with her music major to pursue a career in sound engineering. She will spend this summer working as an intern in sound engineering in New York City.

Musicians are often marked by versatility, and neither Kleinknecht or Karp is an exception. Kleinknecht is about to complete her first semester as harpsichordist for the Collegium Musicum, Bucknell's early music ensemble. Karp is a veteran member of Bucknell concert chorale. Both also take piano lessons, Kleinknecht with visiting assistant professor of music Genevieve Lee, and Karp with professor of music Barry Hannigan.

Kleinknecht and Karp's engineering and music schedules keep them both incredibly busy. "We never see the sun," Karp said. "We leave to go to Dana before the sun rises, and we leave the music building after it sets."

In spite of their hectic lifestyles, both are happy with what they're doing. Kleinknecht found an unusual bonus to having two majors. "When you get frustrated with engineering, you can go to the music building and get frustrated with piano," she said. "and then go back to Dana to get frustrated again with engineering."

Quayle addresses students in Weis

BY TARA GILLIGAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

"I can see we're gonna have some fun tonight" were the first words out of the mouth of former Vice President Dan Quayle Wednesday night when he addressed a capacity crowd at the Weis Center.

After rolling through a few jokes, most of them quips against himself, Quayle settled into his three-part speech, presenting his "unbiased viewpoint of the first 100 days" of the Clinton administration, an analysis of foreign policy, and a "pitch for help" concerning the nation's social trends. Following his half-hour speech, Quayle fielded questions from students for just under an hour.

CLINTON'S FIRST 100 DAYS

"First, the fun part," he said, drawing laughs from the audience before launching into his jabs against Clinton. To Clinton's credit, Quayle spent several minutes commending facets of Clinton's leadership style. "He's a much better communicator than I had expected," said Quayle, contrasting Clinton's attention to detail with Ronald Reagan's ability to communicate broad themes.

He also commended his political opponent for his ability to overcome odds, saying that in June of last year, Ross Perot was the main competition against the Bush/Quayle ticket, while Clinton struggled in the polls.

Quayle pointed to what he considered to be problem areas in Clinton's first 100 days. "He had a disastrous week to ten days in office," said Quayle. "He should have been thinking about the economy, his jobs package, and things like that," instead on lifting the ban on gays in the military, he said.

Maintaining a strict party-line emphasis, Quayle told his audience, "His policies are simply not going to work... Many in the room that voted for him hoped that this would be a new type of Democrat," and yet, Quayle said, the first package Clinton sent to Capitol Hill was to raise taxes. "I just strongly disagree that that is the best way of handling the budget," said Quayle, who would prefer to "hold the line on taxes and regulate spending."

Before moving on to the second segment of his speech, Quayle delivered one further dig against Clinton. Had Bill Clinton announced in his campaign that he intended to raise taxes on middle class families, lift the ban on gays in the military, increase spending, and enter into a "co-presidency with his wife," Quayle claimed, "I'd still be Vice President."

FOREIGN POLICY

Quayle next spoke about foreign policy, particularly focusing on the situation in Russia. While Quayle made it clear that he differs with Clinton over the role of the United States in foreign activity, he said that when traveling abroad, he always openly supports the President. "Hopefully, the partisanship ends at waters edge," he said.

The picture Quayle painted about the future of Russia was dismal. "Behind Boris Yeltsin in Russia, the next leader... will be a leader basically hostile to the United States," he said, suggesting that the next leader will be authoritarian, aggressive for power, and in control of dangerous nuclear weapons. "Those weapons will be traded, and if you put those weapons in the hands of Saddam Hussein" and other world leaders, "someone is going to use them," he said.

Quayle also addressed the military crisis in Bosnia and Hercegovina. While Quayle said he believes it will be necessary for the United States to adopt an aggressive military policy against the Serbians, he remains skeptical over Clinton's position. "I hope the President listens very closely to Colin Powell and the military," he said. "If you commence air strikes, I doubt whether [they] will be sufficient to counter further aggression," he said, suggesting that the United States was effective in quieting Iraq only when Bush sent ground troops to "physically remove the Iraqi forces. We achieved that objective in a very short time."

Shinn gives perspective on Waco and Koresh

BY RYAN WICK
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The tragedy in Waco could have been avoided if the Bureau for Alcohol, Tobacco, and Firearms (ATF) knew more about the nature of cults, claims Larry Shinn, Bucknell's Vice-President for Academic Affairs and resident cult expert. Shinn has studied cults for 25 years and sees the standoff as two world views that collided, in which the violence of each reinforced the passion of the other.

> "If you have an isolated community around a charismatic leader then beware cornering them. If you corner them, they will only have one recourse — to go down together."
> —Larry Shinn, Vice President for Academic Affairs

"From where I sit," says Shinn, "none of this was necessary. The first mistake was to misunderstand the group. If you have an isolated community around a charismatic leader then beware cornering them. If you corner them, they will only have one recourse — to go down together."

Part of what shaped the ATF/FBI strategy was anti-cult people who themselves were negatively disposed to a group like this. The director of the Cult Awareness Network advised using whatever force necessary to remove members from the compound. Shinn believes the cult consisted of two distinct groups: those who were naive about the greater violent and apocalyptic possibilities of their belief, and those who knew from the time they joined, and as they were following Koresh, that they were willing to die for

Tech services survives without its directors

BY JEFF BOULTER
Bucknellian Staff Writer

While University officials remain tight-lipped on the issues surrounding the sudden resignations of Steven and Chrissy Chene, technical directors, Technical Services is coping with the absence of its directors.

Nancy Cook, operations manager for the Weis Center and Bill Boswell, director of cultural events for the Weis Center, have helped in keeping Technical Services running. Cook says that her extra responsibilities have been lessened by the efficient system the Chenes left behind. "We are able to maintain 80% efficiency due to students continuing the system that has been set," said Cook.

To pick up the slack left by the Chenes' resignation, the number of student Supervising Technical Assistants (STAs) has increased from 3 to 7. According to Cook, these STAs are each responsible for an event and must make sure that their event runs smoothly. Office Technical Assistants (TAs) have been maintaining the scheduling for student work.

Nick Massa '96, a TA-in-training with Technical Services, said that the STAs "have a very good knowledge that has helped to make things run very smoothly despite all the things that have gone on," and that the Technical Services staff has "dealt with it well."

For larger events, Cook has hired out of the University to Susquehanna Sound Consultants and Bob Spangler, a technical director, for events such as The Pittsburgh Ballet and the upcoming Bucknell Dance Company performance.

As for filling the positions left by the Chenes, Cook said that she is working on a proposal to the president of the University for permission to begin the search; she hopes to begin interviewing at the beginning of next semester.

Jeff Fullerton, '93, an STA, confirmed that students have borne much of the new responsibilities, and in reference to the resignations, he said that the University "hasn't told us a thing."

The Chenes said that despite

TKE receives sufficient rating, will maintain recognition

BY DEB MANASSE AND MARIA GLOD
Bucknellian Staff Writers

Tau Kappa Epsilon fraternity (TKE) received a rating of 3 on a 1-5 scale at Tuesday's evaluation by the Council on Greek Life (COGL), according to Jeff Weidenfeller '94, TKE president.

According to Weidenfeller, this rating means that the University will not remove recognition from the fraternity. "The University will take no action to remove us from campus," said Weidenfeller.

COGL, a sub-committee of the Committee on Complementary Activities, oversees the operations and activities of fraternities and sororities at Bucknell. The Council issued ratings to each sorority and fraternity at Thursday's meeting.

Although specific guidelines have not been designated by COGL, Weidenfeller said that "there will be stipulations given to us to prevent this from happening in the future. The fine print will be determined later."

According to a description given to The Bucknellian by Edward Dadez, associate dean of student life and Greek advisor, COGL's mission is to "make recommendations which it feels will improve the fraternity/sorority systems."

Health director warns of hepatitis-B danger

BY BETSY LEICHTFUSS
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Reacting to an increasing concern within the medical profession over the spread of hepatitis-B, Donald Stechschulte, medical director, and the Bucknell Student Health Service are asking students to consider becoming immune to the hepatitis-B virus.

Stechschulte has drafted letters to send to current and incoming students warning them of the threat of the disease and the benefits of immunization.

The health center is not sponsoring the vaccinations which, for a series of three injections, cost between $120 and $150, but Stechschulte and others have recently begun advocating a general public health initiative, already existing in the external medical community, suggesting that people in the high risk categories for hepatitis-B pre-their resignations, they still maintain "close, friendly relationships with the students."

Barbara Shailor, vice president for student services, said that she received letters of resignation from Steven and Chrissy Chene, and the University accepted their resignations from the positions of Campus Technical Directors, but said that she couldn't comment on the reasons behind the resignations.

Steven Chene also refused to comment on the circumstances directly but said that he and his wife were "moving on," and any comments made would "do too much damage" to their search for further employment. Without the University's support, the Chenes cannot use recommendations from former fellow faculty members. Chene's only explanation of the resignation was in "irreconcilable differences" between themselves and University.

While no definite comments were made about the resignations, numerous sources maintain that ethical codes had been violated, leading to forced resignations.

Cook's only comment about the resignations was that "irreconcilable personal differences" had developed between the Chene's and the University.

"Bucknell has been very good to us," said Steven Chene. But, he said, "they can keep the politics."

this faith. Shinn believes that by separating Koresh from his followers before approaching the compound, a more peaceful resolution could have been achieved.

There are many Branch Davidians as well as 7th Day Adventists, independent of Koresh, who believe that the end of the world is coming. They want to be on the side of God and not Satan. Koresh manipulated the religious symbols that were already pervasive in the cult and had his followers truly believing not only that the end of the world was coming, but that it was coming soon.

"The fact that Koresh expresses his mental illness in religious terms," explains Shinn, "is not necessarily discernible to those people who also believe the same ideas. They may not see his progression from being simply a doomsday preacher to someone who is willing to undergo suicide because he himself has lost touch with the world."

Shinn sees the situation in Waco as the result of societal ignorance. He maintains that most cults are not dangerous but society is prone to believe the media and the anti-cult description of "the cults," as a result cults are lumped together as dangerous. By not distinguishing between dangerous and benign cults, Shinn claims that law enforcement officials "don't take a Koresh seriously as soon as they ought to."

Shinn fears a legal backlash from this incident that may result in a "crackdown on groups that share none of the violent features of groups like that of Koresh." Ironically, religious cults such as the Hare Krishnas of the former Soviet Union flourished during the most repressive times.

PUBLIC SAFETY LOG

Thursday, April 22

At 1:31 p.m., Public Safety officers responded to a vehicle accident on Walker Street. It was discovered that two University students were involved. One had driven his vehicle into the rear end of the other vehicle which was stopped at the time. There were no injuries.

At 10:20 p.m., a University employee reported an act of disorderly conduct during the "Take Back the Night" march. Investigation is continuing.

At 8:50 a.m., a University employee reported that her jacket had been stolen from her office in Roberts Hall.

Friday, April 23

At 5:13 a.m., Public Safety officers responded to Harris Hall on the report of a fire alarm activation. Upon arrival, it was discovered that an incense stick had fallen onto a blanket and caught fire. The fire was contained to the blanket only and was extinguished.

At 3 p.m., a University employee reported an act of vandalism to the Department of Public Safety. It was discovered that unknown person(s) had written obscenities on walls throughout Coleman Hall.

At 8:28 p.m., Public Safety officers responded to Vedder Hall on the report of a fire alarm activation. It was discovered that unknown person(s) had activated a pull station on the 2nd floor for no apparent reason.

At 10:15 p.m., Public Safety officers were requested to respond to Vedder Hall and assist Residential Life staff at the location of an alleged party. It was discovered that all occupants of the room were under 21 and that there was a beer ball present. Investigation continuing and charges pending.

Saturday, April 24

At 2:33 a.m., a Public Safety student worker notified the on-duty officers of an act of vandalism that he had just witnessed on St. George St. Officers arrived and located suspect and turned case over to the Lewisburg Police Department.

At 11:50 p.m., Public Safety officers responded to Smith Hall to assist Residential Life staff in the breaking up of an illegal party. Several containers of alcoholic beverages were removed from the room. Investigation continuing and charges pending.

Sunday, April 25

At 3:45 p.m., a Public Safety officer was advised of the location of an injured employee. The officer responded to Swartz Field where he located an employee with a minor burn on his hand. Victim was treated and released from the Student Medical Service.

At 10:20 a.m., a Public Safety officer responded to the SAM fraternity on the report of a vandalized car. It was then discovered that there were two vehicles damaged by another vehicle. Investigation continuing.

At 2:28 a.m., a Public Safety student worker advised on-duty officers of an individual overturning bicycle racks in the quad area between Larison and Vedder. The suspect was located and charges are pending.

At 3 a.m., The Public Safety Office was advised of an injured student who had cut his head on the ceiling. A Student Health Service driver was contacted and transported victim to the hospital where he was treated and released.

At 12:09 a.m., a student requested transportation to the hospital. Victim was complaining of back pain and was transported to the hospital by a Student Health Service driver where victim was treated and released.

Tuesday, April 27

At 1:31 p.m., Public Safety officers responded to the intersection of Brown St. and Lynn St. on the report of a vehicle accident. It was then discovered that a University employee had pulled into the path of a student who could not stop in time to avoid the accident. There were no injuries and Lewisburg Police responded to take report.

Wednesday, April 28

At 4:23 a.m., Public Safety officers responded to Vedder Hall on the report of a student in need of medical attention. Student was transported to the hospital via ambulance for treatment.

At 6:30 p.m., a Public Safety officer responded to the Lacrosse locker room in Davis Gym to speak with several players about the thefts of their wallets. Upon arrival, it was discovered that unknown person(s) had removed 5 wallets randomly from unlocked lockers within the locker room. The door to the locker room was also left unlocked while practice was in session.

Thursday, April 29

A DU member advised The Department of Public Safety that around 3 a.m. this date, unknown person(s) did remove a composite from the fraternity.

UN Ambassador to reestablish ties

Zaw Thu Win of the Under-Secretary General's Office of the United Nations will be at Bucknell on Monday, May 3 for a presentation at 7 p.m. in the University Lounge, Freas Hall.

The first Burmese student ever to attend a Western university attended Bucknell. This led to the establishment of many links between Burma and Bucknell, including the well-publicized Burma-Bucknell weekend which was an established annual event between 1948 and 1962.

The discussion and slide presentation on Monday night will be hosted by Zaw Thu Win, Gene Chenoweth of the political science department, and Kent Sensing of the Mennonite Central Committee, who has recently returned from that region. Everyone is invited to attend.

Students make chemistry work

Dan Peterson '93 and David Sinning '93 were winners at the 1993 Intercollegiate Student Chemists Convention at Juniata College. Peterson won second place in the Inorganic Chemistry II section, while Sinning won first place in the Analytical Chemistry section of competition.

The competition involved 47 presentations from seventeen different schools in Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware, and Maryland in seven different divisions.

Students' artistic works displayed

The Art Department will host a student art exhibit in the Cave of the Langone Center beginning Wednesday, May 5, and ending Friday, May 14.

The exhibit features paintings, sculpture, and prints by students at the University. It is open to the public free of charge.

Service fraternity wins accolades

Alpha Phi Omega, a co-ed service fraternity, has received the Secretary's Award from the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania Department of Public Welfare.

The Award for Outstanding Service by a Youth Group was one of six given in the state. The fraternity was recognized for its volunteer work at Danville State Hospital, according to Linda Smith, volunteer resources coordinator at the hospital.

Over the last two years, members of the group have organized numerous evenings for patients, she said, including a Harvest Festival dance, a St. Patrick's Day dance, a Halloween party, and a beach party. Other activities include helping with softball and open gym sessions.

Smith praised the fraternity's organization, responsibility, and enthusiasm as well as the members' ability to plan and coordinate their own activities, working with patients.

ROTC rethought without gay ban

Consideration has been given to the possibility of Amherst's resuming affiliation with the ROTC program if the ban on homosexuals in the military is indeed lifted, as President Clinton has suggested.

Amherst is the only school in the nation to have severed relations with the ROTC program, having done so in 1990 because of the program's exclusion of gays and lesbians, said Terry Hines, the Air Force ROTC's chief of media relations. A repeal of the ban on gays in the military would leave the college with little reason to refuse ROTC affiliation.

Lehigh chooses grad addressee

Robert Galvin, chairman of the executive committee of Motorola, Inc., has been chosen as this year's commencement speaker at Lehigh. Motorola, the world's leading producer of two-way radios and cellular phones, was founded by Galvin's father.

Nishad Pai, Lehigh's senior class president, stated that Galvin was chosen because his vast experience in the business world has provided him with valuable insight to pass on to seniors.

"He exemplifies the qualities that everyone would want to attain in their career goals," said Pai. "Most of us [seniors] will find ourselves working in corporate America, and that's why he's a valuable speaker."

Galvin will be presented with an honorary doctoral degree at the ceremony.

Counterfeit cash found at concert

A man reportedly used fake money to purchase $210 worth of merchandise at the Spin Doctors concert at Amherst. The man approached a student selling T-shirts and asked to buy one; after she accepted the money, he asked to buy eleven more shirts and two hats.

The student vendor said that she accepted the money because it looked legitimate to her in the darkened gymnasium.

The incident is unusual for the school and the town, according to Acting Chief of Security Ed Zaniewski. "This may suggest that [the suspect] traveled a long way."

Amherst security passed the fake bills on to the local police, who have contacted federal authorities.

F&M students left in the cold

Ninety-nine students were without rooms at the completion of room selections earlier this month at Franklin & Marshall College. There are traditionally twenty or so students that are left homeless; this year's unusually high number is due to the fact that one of the buildings will not be used for housing next year.

"It is a problem for those students who are not sure what is taking place here at residential life," said Dr. Ralph Taber, dean of residential programs. "We are currently trying to find them rooms and we will get them rooms. But it is a discomfort for those students who are not sure where they are living next year."

Singh planning retirement in May

BY KATE FINK
Bucknellian Staff Writer

An era will close this May as Christian R. Lindback Professor of Management Balwant Singh ends his teaching career at Bucknell. Singh has dedicated 25 years to teaching statistics, management science, managerial economics, and operations management, staple quantitative courses, to management students.

Preparations have already been made for his farewell. Lawrence Klein, Nobel Laureate in Economics, with whom Singh served as a research fellow, has been invited to lecture at Bucknell as part of a dinner program which the management department will host to honor Singh's retirement.

Students held a retirement party of their own in the apartment of Craig Shryock '94, a management major. Approximately 40 management majors and some management faculty gathered together in the informal setting to display their appreciation. "At the end, Professor Singh stood up and made a speech, and everyone got all teary-eyed," said Shryock.

Knowing that quantitative classes do not tend to be students' favorites, Singh has always made an effort to provide an atmosphere in which students can be inspired and motivated. He has tried to reduce the tension associated with the heavy orientation towards numbers; one of the ways he has been able to reduce students' anxiety over their grades has been to offer re-tests.

"My primary philosophy of teaching is to teach the theories and then reinforce them with real world applications. Term papers force students to look at how the concepts are related to everything else in the world," said Singh. "Students retain more as a result."

Singh migrated to the United States with his wife and two children so that he could have more opportunities to study econometrics, the quantification of statistical relationships. His children adapted well to their new environment, going through the Lewisburg school system and then through Bucknell. His daughter is now the assistant manager of Pittsburgh National Bank, and his son is a graphic designer in Washington D.C.

After his retirement, Singh does not intend to go far. He plans to stay in Lewisburg and on the fourth floor of Olin Science to devote his time primarily to publishing. "I like to think of it as like a long, extended sabbatical leave," he said.

His focus is on financial institutions—the international movement of capital and the crises in money markets—and pricing policy in the public and private sector. He has written several papers for conferences already, but he needs to polish them, get feedback from peers, and integrate them to make a cohesive publication.

On staying in Lewisburg, Singh said, "Lewisburg was cited as one of the top ten small towns in America. Why would I leave?" He and his wife are very involved in the community, participating in church/prison functions, telethons for Geisinger Hospital, and most extensively in the Pakistan India Association, where events are sponsored to help families from India and Pakistan settle in after their move to the United States.

Singh looks back fondly on his years at Bucknell. "Students were great in and out of the classroom. I got respect and love from them. Alumni have kept in touch, so I feel very involved with students and their achievements after graduation." He is particularly attached to the relationships he has developed with the management department family and glad that he is not going to leave them.

He parts with some advice to students, "As long as you are at Bucknell, utilize the facilities to your best capacity. There is so much more to learn than many of you realize."

"My primary philosophy of teaching is to teach the theories and then reinforce them with real world applications. Term papers force students to look at how the concepts are related to everything else in the world. Students retain more as a result."

vent possible infection early through a non-infectious vaccine.

Although there are four other types of hepatitis, according to Stechschulte, hepatitis-B is the most dangerous and the one to avoid.

Solaida Mamsaang—The Bucknellian

According to Dr. Donald Stechschulte, director of the student health service, the sexually-transmitted disease hepatitis-B is a growing health concern among college students, and students at risk should seek inoculations for the disease.

Hepatitis-B is a sexually transmitted disease passed through blood transfusions, shared needles between IV drug users, and unprotected sexual intercourse with an infected person. Once one is affected by the disease it never goes away. At present it is not curable and can lead to liver failure and eventually even death.

Stechschulte's concern stems from the fact that students make up a large percentage of the high risk group, which is comprised of individuals from 18 to 24 years of age.

Those in the high risk category are persons who have unprotected sexual intercourse with multiple partners. "That, unfortunately," said Stechschulte, "is a significant percentage of Bucknell University students."

According to Stechschulte "the fastest growing segment is the college age population." Roughly 500,000 cases of hepatitis-B are reported each year; as many as 400,000 individuals, many of them students, are in this high risk category.

Stechschulte said that because of this frightening reality he encourages students to "strongly consider getting the hepatitis-B vaccine."

While there are currently only "a handful of people on this campus that have hepatitis-B," it is easier to prevent the virus with treatment than have to deal with the aftermath and attempt to treat it, Stechshulte said. Once someone contracts the disease, he said, "hepatitis-B just doesn't go away; you have it for the rest of your life." Hepatitis-B is always present in the blood stream, so once infected, the only way of assuring that one will not spread the disease is through prevention. "Prevention," said Stechschulte, "is the key word here."

According to Stechschulte, the ideal time to receive the vaccine is to "have it at home over summer—once in July, another in July and the final one when students return home in December."

The hepatitis-B vaccine is supplied in a series of three injections at the price of about $120 to $150 for the entire series of shots. The second injection is given a month after the first and the third six months after the second. Although, the price may seem high the benefits, says Stechschulte, are irreversible.

QUAYLE

FAMILY VALUES

In the third segment of his address, Quayle presented his pitch for family values. "I can't let you escape tonight without you hearing the words 'family values' from me," he said, claiming to have won over even Mario Cuomo, governor of New York, to his cause for values.

"We do have to give thought to values, to traditional values," he said. "I hope your generation will talk about rights and responsibilities perhaps more so than our generation."

To illustrate his belief that values have deteriorated, Quayle rattled off a list of statistics on the rapid increase in violent crime, illegitimate births, divorce, and teen suicide. "I don't think it comes down to spending," he said. According to Quayle, spending in education has increased by 630 percent in the last 30 years. "I think it's a cultural problem, a behavioral problem, an attitude problem, and it's not going to be solved by the government," he said.

Quayle ended his lecture by quoting Edmund Burke, an eighteenth century British orator and statesman: "For evil to triumph, let good people do nothing."

In his own words, Quayle ended, "You're good people. We will make a difference."

THE QUESTIONS

Quayle spent the next 57 minutes fielding questions from 16 students on topics ranging from specific policy issues to his future in politics. One student asked the obligatory "Can you spell potatoes?" to which Quayle responded: "Can you?"

Clearly suggesting the possibility of entering the 1996 race for the presidency, Quayle told one student, "I would consider that."

Board of Trustees needs more diversity

The Board of Trustees has had the final say on topics ranging fromGreek survival to tuition hikes. If the issue is significantly important to the University, chances are the Trustees have a hand in it—the deciding one at that. This weekend they will consider tightening the belts on the budget, as well as the retirement plan for faculty and staff. But who comprises the all-powerful Board? Who decides our fate? For the most part, it is white males from the corporate world with, among other qualifications, "the ability to give and raise money."

Of the forty-three active trustees, thirty-five are white males. This doesn't jibe with the Board's own specifications—namely "diversity of...gender and race." More important than the racial and gender makeup of the Board, is the perspective that it represents. It is a more or less homogenous unit whose members have in common a commitment to the University that reflects its corporate character.

The selection process guarantees that this trend will continue. The Trustee Committee on Nominations votes to bring prospective Trustees up for consideration by the entire board which is free to accept or reject them.

A "self-sustaining Board of Trustees" may be advantageous. But because the Board votes on legislative issues, and determines policy, it has a responsibility, if nothing else, to include a wide range of individuals to serve as active members. As the system stands, there are no checks against the Board. Anyone can make suggestions, but only the Board nominates and confirms. Given this unchecked system, the Board's present makeup and perspective is not surprising. It is, quite literally, a "self-sustaining" Board.

In order for this power of "self-sustenance" to work, the Board must recognize the drawbacks of a system which smacks, though perhaps unintentionally, of a "good ole boy" mentality from the days before women or minorities were considered for top business positions. Times have changed.

What can be done to diversify the Board? First it should have some degree of accountability. This may take the form of amending the Bucknell charter to create a body that could confirm future nominations. After all, every other group within the University has an external review body. On its present course, the Board seems incapable of diversifying quickly enough on its own.

The Board of Trustees needs to expand, as permitted by its bylaws, in an effort to broaden its perspective. While the ability to raise and contribute money is certainly essential to the University, the Board should make inclusion its first priority. It should consider stressing its other criteria above contributing and raising money.

The parent of a student on financial aid would bring a "diversity of experience" to the Board. A faculty member could offer "compatibility between the individual's and the University's mission" as well as "diversity of education." Recently graduated women and minorities would certainly provide much needed "diversity of experience, age, gender, race, and national origin."

These are only a few of the possible changes that will legitimize the Board and bring it more in touch with the University community. Isn't that what a University is supposed to strive for?

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Committee members attack editorial

Student says Bucknellian manipulated facts

TO THE EDITOR:

Firstly, let me thank you profusely for illustrating the point discussed in my media-bias opinion of a couple weeks ago. The media has the power to create and influence the public's ideology and opinion. As I stated in my column, this is very dangerous because the information spewed out in an author's words are tinged with his or her personal experience and viewpoint. To this I add another danger. Facts are often manipulated and negated to support an author's cause. This is what happened with last week's editorial and article about the Honorable Dan Quayle's ensuing lectureship at our campus. I regret that this cannot be published before his full-capacity lecture.

I think it is important to point out that the former Vice-President gave lectures all throughout his four years in office, and therefore is not new to the lecture circuit. He has been described as a pleasure to contract because of his personable character and genuine concern for the students. His reputation has held true for this committee.

Additionally, the $22,000 figure is entirely incorrect, and had Betsy Leichtfuss cared to investigate the figure further she would have discovered that the figure had not been determined as of last Friday. Furthermore, Dan Quayle was not the bottom-of-the-barrel choice as the article would have had you believe. Dennis Miller, Maya Angelou, and Henry Kissinger were indeed on our list of prospective lecturers. In the end, the vote was cast, and the Honorable Dan Quayle was chosen as our number-one candidate.

Returning to the payment issue, it was important for Miss Leichtfuss to point out that whatever the asking price, Quayle would only receive a percentage of the price, as he works through an agency, Keppler Associates. However, as this would have weakened the case put forth by Betsy Leichtfuss, you weren't told this. Well, I am telling you now—unfortunately, too late.

I would also like to personally address Professor Theresa Amott's concern that the "Student Lectureship Committee could find no better use for such a large sum of money." What better use for our money than to go toward a function proposed, organized, voted upon, and executed by students? We, the students comprising the Student Lectureship Committee, are responsible for organizing any lecture from start to finish. In the process we learn from and embody the Mission Statement of Bucknell University, which is to become "a productive citizen and an intellectually mature and self-aware person." In addition we are "prepared for the exercise of high responsibility in all phases of society." Because of our involvement in the SLC we learn to "cultivate respect for other individuals, enhance our moral sensitivity, personal creativity, and emotional stability."

Briefly, let me also state that The Sentinel is Bucknell's only open political forum. If the articles tend to be conservative it can only be because the campus Democrats either have nothing to say or no motivation to say it. How often does The Catalyst come out anyway?

In respect to his speaking on Peace Day, although entirely coincidental, I believe it to be entirely fitting. During the Vietnam era he served in the Army National Guard. During his four years in office he continually supported President Bush's stance in the Persian Gulf Crisis, which, if you will care to remember, earned Bush his highest public opinion poll (close to 98%). How fickle we Americans are when the bandwagon switches direction.

All in all, thank you for giving Quayle so much publicity that his lecture reached capacity fairly quickly. In the future, let me remind you that news is fact, not fiction. Any of the facts I have stated in my letter are entirely true, and are fully checkable.

CRISTINA M. TISA '96

Editor's Note: Three members of the Student Lectureship Committee independently confirmed the $20,000 speaking fee, an approximate figure of $2,000 for expenses, and that Mr. Quayle was the committee's "fourth or fifth" choice.

"Cliché journalism" cannot deny Quayle's ability

TO THE EDITOR:

Last week's Bucknellian editorial entitled "Lectureship Shot..." was inaccurate and unprofessional. The attacks on the Student Lectureship Committee and its decision to invite Dan Quayle as speaker lacked substance and demonstrated a style of journalism akin to a third-grade newsletter, not a university newspaper.

If The Bucknellian questioned Dan Quayle's qualifications as a speaker because of specific policy or personal decisions and outlined these arguments in a clear and concise manner, then the editorial would have had merit. After all, The Bucknellian has a legitimate right to question a speaker's qualifications and a group's actions. I, however, question the specific means The Bucknellian chose to use to outline its disapproval and believe last week's editorial represented cliché journalism that lacked any substance. Instead of outlining specific questionable actions by the former Vice President, The Bucknellian vaguely wrote of Quayle's inability to have "something to say" and inability to "spell starchy vegetables" as reasons for his unworthiness as a lecturer. Such evidence as opposition to Quayle does not in any way diminish the potential for Quayle to be an effective speaker. If The Bucknellian is hoping through its editorial to convince people of the worthiness of its arguments, then the only people such cliché attacks will convince are those already ardently against Quayle. Anyone with an open mind would not be convinced of Quayle's inability as a lecturer based upon these assertions, and subsequently one must label such an editorial a failure.

Furthermore, The Bucknellian criticized the Lectureship Committee for not knowing the subject on which Quayle would speak. It is not lectureship policy to ever ask for a specific transcript of a lecturer's topic. When inviting lecturers, however, the committee does have a basic notion of what a person will speak of; since Dan Quayle is a politician, the Lectureship Committee expects he will speak on politics. (He is also a lawyer, so perhaps he will speak on law.) Such conclusions should not amaze anyone, except perhaps the editorial staff. I also highly question whether The Bucknellian would have been so concerned beforehand as to the substance of, say, a Maya Angelou lecture. I do not intend to compare the ability and qualifications of Quayle and Angelou, but rather am implying that I believe The Bucknellian was not concerned with Lectureship policy, but rather was personally and politically affronted by the choice of Quayle, and thus was utilizing the lack of knowledge on lectureship's part as to the exact content of the Quayle lecture to attempt to further an attack on the decision.

The Bucknellian proposed alternative uses for the lectureship money. These proposals were illegitimate and demonstrate the unprofessional manner of the editorial staff. Simply by reading the Student Lectureship bylaws, The Bucknellian could have learned that the committee cannot hold money over semesters, nor can it administer funds to non co-sponsored lecture activities. Proposing alternatives that are not viable was irresponsible and demonstrates a total lack of preparation by The Bucknellian editorial staff for its editorial.

The Bucknellian stated that it is the students' right to know how their money is being spent. I agree that students do have a right to know how their tuition and activities fees are being spent. The Bucknellian, however, insinuated that the Lectureship Committee misled and was "secretive" in inviting Quayle to speak; that the committee pulled a fast one on the students. The Bucknellian was misinformed in believing the committee was being secretive. Lectureship never releases the details of a contract between a speaker and the committee to the entire community. Furthermore, if the Bucknell community as a whole is so interested in the inner operation and finagling of the Lectureship Committee, then it has done a good job of hiding its interest. There was no Lectureship Committee for a large part of last semester because out of a campus of 3,500 students there were not eight individuals interested in serving on the committee. The committee this semester has done a solid job and, judging from the response for tickets to the Quayle lecture, the committee brought in a lecturer who sparked community interest. I question the accusation of The Bucknellian that the committee is some secretive group, and hope that there is more interest in Student Lectureship for the fall semester.

The Bucknellian's editorial attacks on Dan Quayle and the Student Lectureship Committee were ill-prepared and misinformed. Dan Quayle speaking at Bucknell is not an embarrassment; what is an embarrassment is unprofessional and irresponsible journalism.

Don't be a hypocrite once Earth Day is over

BY JASON SPIEGELMAN
Bucknellian Columnist

Earth Day—it's coming up very quickly. It is celebrated nationwide, and for many it is a day when the true rewards of hard labors are realized. People will come crawling out of the woodwork to grandly pay homage to this great island in space, our own Mother Earth. Sounds pretty nifty, huh? Too bad it's all a charade.

It's really a shame that the driving force behind the wonderful results of Earth Day is hypocrisy. What really happens on Earth Day, or Mother's Day, or Veterans Day, or any other similarly dedicated day? People feel a sharp tinge of guilt and shame over the fact that their behavior for the past 364 days has been somewhat remiss, and they attempt to atone for this shortcoming by overcompensating for one 24-hour period.

Is this really what Earth Day should be about? Earth Day should be much more than a one-day celebration. It should be a period of time that symbolizes our actions for an entire year. Truly, what is the point of religiously recycling for one day, if tomorrow we return to the wasteful beings of last week? Can we really, in good conscience, be proud of what wonderful kids we are because we buy Mom flowers or take Dad out to lunch, but then turn around and ignore them for the other 11 months? How can we honestly consider ourselves to be racially aware just because we respect the accomplishments of Dr.

King for one day, when we give the man no other thought all year long?

The answer to this seemingly insurmountable catch-22 is really very simple. No, it's not really necessary to call up Mom and Dad every day just to show that you care, but maybe treating them with a little more of the respect that they so richly deserve would be a good rule to employ. We need not get outraged every time we see some environmentally detrimental act being performed, but if we alter our habits to look for a recycling bin whenever we have trash, then the function of Earth Day will be much more profound.

These observations go for every designated day in the calendar. We shouldn't need to look at a calendar to remember to appreciate our secretaries, and Veterans of the U.S. Military should automatically be given respect at all times.

So please, don't fall into the trap of making a difference for a short, designated amount of time. Let the days that truly mean something to you have a lasting impact and effect on your life. They will mean more that way.

BY PETER LALOS
Bucknellian Columnist

Over the past month, Tom Malinich '94 and Larnie Booker '93 have worked together to expose an ugly, hushed reality about contemporary American society—the irony of the situation being, of course, that the two of them have done it by beating each other's brains out in the pages of The Bucknellian. To date, each man has had two tries at it in an attempt to convince the other of his point, but neither one has relented. If anything, they have become even more set in their views as a result of their contact with one another.

The topic of which they speak is taboo and sensitive, and it is festering just beneath the surface of life in middle America. It lies in wait, sometimes for years, and its dangerous fallout seems to spring upon us when we least expect it, in places like Watts, Los Angeles, and Washington, D.C. I speak, of course, of race relations.

It's not enough to tell the people of these economically and socially ravaged neighborhoods to have faith, because staring them in the face are too many harsh facts of life that far outweigh mere words or promises.

The communication breakdown from which Tom and Larnie suffer is such a perfect microcosm of what is happening all across the United States that it is almost eerie. For the duration of America's 200-year history, there has been a clear lack of mutual understanding between whites and blacks, and these two men unwittingly show why.

When Tom wrote about having faith in the Constitution in regards to the Rodney King civil rights trial, his body was in Lewisburg; likewise, when Larnie contended that things just don't pan out for the black man under American law, he was in the Susquehanna Valley. But it is important to keep in mind that Tom's mind was in his predominantly white hometown of surburban Rochester when he expressed himself, while Larnie's was in his all-black neighborhood in Philadelphia. Anyone out there getting the picture? This should help: Same planet, different worlds.

Suffice it to say, it is without hesitation that the majority of white Americans claim that our country's systems of justice, law enforcement, employment opportunities, or what have you are going along well enough to keep as is. This is because, for your average caucasian, these systems do work, so he/she does not stop to consider that certain disenfranchised groups do not get equal consideration under the law. What it all comes down to, unfortunately, is that the privileged majority is not magnanimous enough to fight inequities in America because it is already doing fine, thank you very much.

On the other hand, blacks and other minorities can't afford to ignore bias, because they wake up to it every day. As a result, they don't have the luxury of believing, as do too many whites, that things will be fine for them regardless of what happens in the realm of race relations.

Walk up to a minority gang member in South Central Los Angeles after the first King trial and tell him to have faith in the law of the land, and he'll likely spray you with a submachine gun just as soon as look at you. All the jobs have been sucked out of my neighborhood. Watch for the gang sweep by the cops at midnight. Be careful where you walk after dark. These are the kinds of realities in cities that most people never see, and never want to. It's not enough to tell the people of these economically and socially ravaged neighborhoods to have faith, because staring them in the face are too many harsh facts of life that far outweigh mere words or promises.

Obviously, Larnie does not live in such squalid conditions, but the point is that he takes the time to understand this dark side of life in the United States, while Tom seems to only draw from the relatively narrow experience of being in the favored majority.

Tom, I would venture to say, is so taken aback by the fire in Larnie's words and can't understand it because he has never been forced to feel that type of frustration and anger. As a result, it is less appropriate to say that one should blame Tom for his lack of consideration so much as it is to ask him to take responsibility for them. He is only a product of his environment and, as a result, is not necessarily acting with malice aforethought in contending that all is well in America.

But, to put it in the clearest perspective, it is necessary that one goes back to the root of both parties' frames of reference. Tom's ancestors came to this country in silver buckles and lace, while Larnie's came in shackles—that's a stigma that blacks will

Quayle carries many accomplishments

BY JOHN GODBOUT
Bucknellian Columnist

After reading The Bucknellian's glaringly incomplete analysis of former Vice-President Dan Quayle's Lewisburg visit, I have concluded that what is generally an objective editorial board, which considers both sides of an issue before rendering an official verdict, has fallen into the tar pit of mass-media liberalism.

The Bucknellian charges that Quayle is "a has been who never was," and desires instead someone with something to say. As a service to those Bucknellians who prefer true reporting to accepting the tainted "truths" of "professional" reporters, I shall now elucidate the real Quayle record.

Regardless of political affiliation, Quayle is a shrewd politician who brought himself from a family business in Indiana to Congress and then the vice-presidency in a little over a decade, winning every election decisively—a meteoric rise by any account. While in office, he ignored daily press releases that portrayed him as a dim-witted, class-privileged boob who bought himself out of the Vietnam War and into the Executive Office, and instead focused on doing his job to the best of his ability.

Honest Democrats admit that Quayle did more work than any vice-president in the history of the country; although the policies of his Council on Competitiveness were all the American voters were ever the told about, he actually performed a myriad of other duties and arguably had a better grasp on the wants and needs of the American voters than Congress, President Bush, or President Clinton.

The reason that Bush Administration legislation almost always passed in Congress and, except at the very end, no Bush vetoes were ever overturned, was that Quayle was not an Al Gore-like demagogue—as the Administration's legislative liasion, he knew how to play the game, shaking hands and winning votes on both sides of the aisle in order to pass the President's bills, whereas Gore shakes his finger, calls Republicans names, and loses votes.

Quayle counseled President Bush against the 1990 tax package, saying it would throw the country into recession, cost jobs, reduce collectable tax revenue, and be political suicide for the President—he was right on all counts.

He told the President in 1991 that the economy was beginning to show signs of a slowdown, and that without an economic stimulus bill, long-term economic stagnation would harm the country—again, Quayle was right.

Quayle told the President early on to limit his support of Soviet President Gorbachev, and instead to focus on the political ascent of Boris Yeltsin, a capitalist who better represented U.S. interests. Look who's calling the shots in Russia now.

In 1990, Quayle gave a speech at Seton Hall in which he outlined U.S. interests in the Persian Gulf, citing both moral and economic factors. He wrote the speech himself, but later his explanation was used by the President, his staff, and Congressmen as a way to legitimate the military actions to the American voters (see Bob Woodward and David Broder, The Man Who Would Be President).

It was also Quayle who recommended that Bush seek Congressional approval before committing troops to Kuwait, a great political move that unified the country behind the military; (Woodward and Broder).

Internationally, Quayle was almost as significant a player as James Baker. He demanded that the military in El Salvador respect human rights there, he persuaded the Japanese to give financial aid to countries that the U.S. invests in highly, and he convinced Japanese automakers to buy millions of dollars more in U.S. parts (Woodward and Broder). These are just a few of Quayle's political plays that are still affecting the way other countries treat the United States.

People made fun of Quayle when he blamed many of the country's problems on the degradation of the family, but the majority of the country agrees with him—including the new prez, who has made statements in which he probably should have footnoted Quayle.

When Quayle made legal reforms an issue, the Democrats laughed. Now they're considering legislation to limit frivolous lawsuits, with the blessing of Bill.

These examples are just the beginning of Dan Quayle's continuing influence in Washington, and do not exhibit even half of what he did with the office of the vice-presidency, let alone in his ten years in Congress. Whether Republican or Democrat, the people who know him have nothing but respect for Dan Quayle.

Dan Quayle had a lot to teach the Bucknell community, which is what these lectures are for; it's too bad that some of us were already too knowledgeable to hear a different perspective.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Quayle must be smart

TO THE EDITOR:

I am amused at the myth that continues to be perpetuated by the news media and various members of the Bucknell community that Dan Quayle is some sort of mental midget. I cannot help but wonder exactly how the Student Lectureship Committee should go about determining the appropriate level of intelligence when selecting speakers.

Is someone who managed to become the youngest person ever elected to the United States Senate smart enough to speak at Bucknell? Is someone who subsequently managed to become Vice President of the United States smart enough to speak at Bucknell? And, not to ignore economics, is someone who manages to charge and actually receive $20,000 for an evening lecture smart enough to speak at Bucknell? Who in our intellectual community receives $20,000 per lecture? But then again, someone once said that an intellectual is someone who has knowledge for which no one is willing to pay.

Choosing Kissinger just as bad as Quayle

TO THE EDITOR:

I sympathize with your dismay that Dan Quayle was invited to speak at Bucknell. It's also disgusting to know how effortlessly he continues to fleece the public. I suggest, as an antidote for your dismay, and for mine, that we take a deep breath, and then Dan will be gone, headed back to count his money on a sun-drenched golf course or in his warm and soapy bathtub full of rubber ducks.

Rubber ducks aside, and yet more despairing for me anyway, was your suggestion that the Student Lectureship Committee might better have invited Henry Kissinger—might better have paid him $30,000 to lecture at Bucknell—on the grounds he "has just a tad more to say than Quayle." A tad more about what? I'm quite curious to know what you had in mind. Did you want him to come and tell us how, according to his principal biographers, during one part of a typical day he would bootlickingly nibble at Nixon's toes (this is a metaphor) in order to get a compliment from the great man, then at night the two of them would lay plans secretly to bomb North Vietnam and Cambodia, ultimately leading, according to some scholars, to millions (not a metaphor) of deaths in these two countries?

Or, did you have in mind Kissinger telling us how he and Nixon ordered the CIA to subvert democracy in Chile and bring forth fifteen years of fascism in that country? Or was it Kissinger's hand-delivered invitation to Argentinean generals in 1976 to lay siege to their opponents—which they did by murdering perhaps as many as 15,000 of them—lest their ability to do so would be hampered by an incoming president (Jimmy Carter, part metaphor, part real) who claimed to be worried about human rights violations in Latin America? Or, could Kissinger justify taking the students' $30,000 by explaining how he came to be the sometimes fawning, sometimes murderous, and always duplicitous person his biographers have demonstrated him to be?

My suggestion to anyone inclined to invite Henry Kissinger to Bucknell to tell us "a tad" about his adventures would be first to read two biographies about him: Seymour Hersh, The Price of Power; and Walter Isaacson, Kissinger. After doing so, I hope he or she would agree that Kissinger is not fit to speak here, or anywhere else, where the aspiration, however little achieved by many of us, is to truth and dignity.

SEAC counters claims of mailroom bulletin

TO THE EDITOR:

The bulletin posted in the student mailroom entitled "SEAC... You're Defeated!" argues against the occurrence of the greenhouse effect and contends that "human CO_2 emissions are squat compared with those from natural sources." In response, SEAC would first like to establish that atmospheric carbon dioxide levels have increased more that 25% since the industrial revolution—an accepted, measurable fact. In addition, nearly 50% of the world's tropical and deciduous forests have disappeared already and continue to be destroyed at a rate of 110,000 square kilometers per year (or one football field per second), turning essential carbon sinks into carbon sources. Disrupting the equilibrium between the earth's natural forces and the carbon cycle, the hand of man in the 20th century has induced an accumulation of greenhouse gases which has been accompanied by a general warming trend forty times more rapid than other temperature trends in Earth's history. Can this be dismissed as mere coincidence?

Your skepticism serves only to set back crucial movements which look to ensure the future of life on Earth.

The 1980's saw five of the warmest years to date—1980, 1981, 1983, 1987, and 1988. 1990 was the hottest year ever recorded. Though conflicting evidence exists as to the exact response of the planet's systems to atmospheric changes, most scientists agree that a "wait and see" policy could be catastrophic, as demonstrated by the signing of a "Warning to Humanity" by 1,575 respected scientists from 69 countries. Dr. Henry Kendall, Chairman of the Union of Concerned Scientists and a Nobel Laureate, remarks, "This kind of consensus is truly unprecedented.... There is an exceptional degree of agreement within the international scientific community that natural systems can no longer absorb the burden of current human practices."

To the anonymous author of the bulletin, with the likelihood that the most critical environmental battles will be won or lost in the 1990's, can you still regard SEAC as a group of "misguided zealots"? Your skepticism serves only to set back crucial movements which look to ensure the future of life on Earth.

What went wrong in Waco, Texas?

Blame Federal incompetence

TO THE EDITOR:

How effective are the FBI, ATF, U.S. Attorney General, and President Clinton when they put their heads together? Just look at all the dead people outside Waco, Texas for the answer. Our supposedly well-trained federal law enforcement officials started out by getting their collective butts kicked by the civilian men, women, and children of a religious compound. Confidence-inspiring, isn't it? But in an effort to prove to the public that our government can deal out justice, orders were given to defuse the situation. Then it became apparent that a peaceful outcome, where due process could be observed, would take awhile—a very long while. But nevertheless, the FBI had a goal and a chance to redeem our faith in the system. Simply get the people out so that justice can run its course. The FBI had every variable in its favor. It had all the time, men, weapons, and supplies that it needed. It was organized and well-trained. It was also not running out of food and water like its opponents were.

So why did nearly everyone in the compound end up dead in addition to those who had died already?—Because our federal law enforcement officials are incompetent. From Reno, who seems to be the only female with a law degree that comprehends the notions of "alien" and "Social Security tax," down to the smart guy who chatted about the upcoming raid, they all stink. Bill, you do, too.

But seriously, here's the reason everyone died. The FBI had the inside of the compound bugged with audio surveillance equipment. This allowed the FBI to listen to upcoming plans and prepare to counter them. Something they heard being planned must have really scared them, so they decided to strike first. CNN said that the compound was planning an attack. I can understand that the FBI would have been so afraid that they had to pre-empt the attack. After all, they only had gunships hovering, Bradleys, missile launchers, and M-1 tanks to defend themselves with. Why chance it? So the FBI picks the only logical choice, of course. Bust down a wall and gas the people inside so that they're unconscious when the place burns and can't get out. What a brilliant way to defuse the situation. Don't forget Clinton and Reno—they were in on it too. Y'all suck.

"Morality" held our society back from action

TO THE EDITOR:

It was a funny ending to the standoff in Waco, Texas. Who would think that the Branch Davidians would be devout enough to fulfill the prophecy of their charismatic leader David Koresh (high-school dropout, but damn could he recite the good book). U.S. Attorney General Janet Reno considered mass suicide an unlikely ending to the Waco stand-off. Janet, I have two words for you: Jim Jones (who, incidentally, still holds the mass suicide record, unless, of course, you count the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait as a suicide).

This is the perfect example of what's wrong with this country. It's so simple, yet nobody wants to hear it. This country thinks it has morality, which gives us this "holier-than-thou" attitude whenever we do anything in public. We forget that in most cases, morality gets in the way of progress. Morality is just a shield that is used to keep you in your place. The only problem is, you don't get to decide your place!

So what does this have to do with Waco? Well, it seems to me that if we weren't so worried about morality, we would have torched the place six weeks ago. How horrible! How can I say such a thing? Well, as soon as you get past the fact that about one hundred people would be killed, you may begin to see it as a rational response to the situation. By torching the place ourselves, we could have saved a great deal of money and had the same results.

Morality should have been left out altogether. If Madonna can do it, so can this great country. Actually, this country already does do it, it just doesn't tell you about it. How would the Feds be able to hold Morality over us if we all knew that they act as if above it? But they are—would a country with morals let thousands of homeless die in the streets? Sure, they just say they don't have the resources to implement an effective program. However, I know a nice piece of real estate that just opened up in Waco, ideally sized to house about 100.

I think the police in Philadelphia had the right idea when they dropped that bomb on the MOVE headquarters in 1985. The right idea, but they were dumb about it. There is no substitute for dumb.

We must always learn from our mistakes, and find the bright side to any crisis that we may experience. The bright side to the Waco incident is that if Koresh was the Messiah, he should be resurrected this Sunday. The scheduling change in Easter should fit in nicely with all of the other scheduling changes the University is making.

We also learned two important lessons from Waco. First, if you have a cult living in the middle of nowhere armed to the teeth, leave them alone. As long as they aren't hurting anyone, what do we care if their god likes to listen to rock and roll? Put my tax dollars toward that homeless guy at the end of my street. However, if they cross their line of isolation, use the second thing we learned—if they want to die fighting the law, kill them. If they're happy to be burning to ashes, burn them. In Waco, one woman, who was, incidentally, on fire, resisted being rescued. Why bother trying if she wanted to burn?

Don't get me wrong, I agree that they could have been manipulated by Koresh into being devoted. But they must have been content with their circumstance or they would have never stayed with him as long as they did. I mean, imagine the thinking you could do if you spent seven weeks without television. Some people try their whole lives to seek happiness and never find it. If I reach the point where I'm content enough to set myself on fire, then let me burn. In the '70s, Buddhist Monks did the same thing to protest the war in southeast Asia. And they were highly esteemed in their society. Our problem is not with Koresh, but with our society.

The Earth needs our care

TO THE EDITOR:

I was both shocked and angered by David Walsh's article in the April 23rd Bucknellian entitled "Celebrating Earth Day is a waste of time." Mr. Walsh's lackadaisical attitude toward environmental awareness is ridiculous. His reference to Earth Day as merely a "fashionable cause" amidst "trendy college activism," as well as the feeble factual support presented for his arguments, are indications that his article, not Earth Day, is a waste of time.

Even if it is true, as Mr. Walsh states, that there are now more trees in North America than there were two hundred years ago, that nature herself is destructive, or even that there is no indisputable proof of a hole in the ozone layer, these facts do not mean that the Earth can now take care of itself or that humans do not need to take responsibility for their actions. To ignore the countless ways that our environment is being destroyed each day is pure ignorance. Though I appreciate Mr. Walsh's point that we should not exaggerate data and present an image of imminent disaster, Earth Day and similar events were not created by environmental alarmists for the purpose of eliciting unnecessary guilt and anxiety. Rather, they are attempts to increase awareness in order to transform the exploitative lifestyles and selfish attitudes that have developed in many dominant world cultures.

Ironically, Mr. Walsh's article proves the antithesis of his argument. It serves to reinforce the great need that exists to celebrate Earth Day and to publicize environmental issues in order to change these detrimental attitudes that are still prevalent in our society. No, the world as we know it will probably not end tomorrow. However, future generations will undoubtedly be affected if fundamental modifications of our actions are not made. This is the message and importance of Earth Day.

Concert Committee is trying its best

TO THE EDITOR:

As chair of the Bucknell Concert Committee, I would like to take this opportunity to respond to the letter written by Kristen M. Opdyke on April 15, 1993 concerning the Indigo Girls concert conflicting with the Outdoor Track and Field Patriot League Championships.

First, when the Bucknell Concert Committee decided to plan a concert, I went to the Athletic Department to check the availability of the stadium and fieldhouse. I was assured that April 30th was free, with the exception of a tentative spring football scrimmage, which, I was told, could be changed. I also contacted University scheduling to ensure of no other conflicts.

Then, on January 12, 1993, I, along with Barbara Shailor, Sharon Poff, Bill Boswell, Vincent DeCerchio, George Trutt, Brian Mannix (President, BSG), and numerous concert committee members attended a meeting concerning this spring concert.

Certain members of the Athletic Department were invited to this meeting, but were not present. After this assemblage pooled its information, my advisor, Bill Boswell, proceeded to negotiate and sign contracts for the Indigo Girls in compliance with University guidelines. Only after this was completed was I informed, by word of mouth, not from the Athletic Department, of the track meet. When I learned of the problem, Bill Boswell and I met with the Director of Athletics, Rick Hartzell, and agreed to do everything we could to minimize potential conflicts.

Second, the Bucknell Concert Committee assumes the responsibility to comply with the track meet and will make sure no remains of the concert will be seen the next day. Thus, Bucknell physical plant and technical crew will be working very hard to restore the field btween the hours of 12 a.m. and 8 a.m. I assure Ms. Opdyke that the stadium will be ready for use on Saturday.

Third, I also wish that the scheduling of these events was not so close. However, I would like to point out that facilities are here for the benefit of the University as a whole and we must all share and compromise. This University is for everyone.

I hope I have answered Ms. Opdyke's questions. If not, Ms. Opdyke might be better served by speaking to those in the Athletic Department in charge of scheduling.

Earth Day should be an inclusionary, optimistic celebration

TO THE EDITOR:

The original intent of this article was to offer alternative opinions to ideas presented by David Walsh in his piece published last week entitled "Celebrating Earth Day is a waste of time." As I developed this article, however, I moved more toward countering his misleading Earth Day ideology, rather than criticizing his belief that Earth Day is propelled by "inaccurate statistics and false statements" by people who have "far too much time on their hands." Nevertheless, as I offer my opinions, I will inevitably draw on his arguments since they spurned the major elements of this article.

As I interpreted it, the theme of Walsh's article was that Earth Day is based on false beliefs, one being the ozone hole, and since theories such as this have failed to be proven, then the event is "a colossal waste of time." I would counter that science, by its nature, which makes it virtually impossible to "prove" a theory, is to blame, rather than the theory itself. Walsh continues his thesis by stating that since Earth Day, as an event, mentions such unproved theories, it is stirring the "populace into a misguided frenzy with inaccurate statistics and false statements." It is at this point that I break from Walsh's "statistics" regarding the ozone hole, and attempt to recognize the inclusiveness of Earth Day to more than one scientific belief.

The first Earth Day was celebrated in 1970 as thousands of individuals organized to respond to increasing trends of environmental damage, specifically related to issues of air and water pollution and the national need for conservation. The ozone hole was not included as an issue in this event or in following years because it was not discovered until 1984. Mr. Walsh's belief that Earth Day was "spawned" as a result of the ozone hole is erroneous and unfortunate in its ability to limit the event to one scientific theory.

Over the years, Earth Day has been celebrated by millions of people the world over as they saw the need for increased awareness of the multiple issues which develop through participation in the event.

In 1990, millions of people participated in the 20th anniversary of Earth Day. They were not responding to the ozone hole exclusively, but to the numerous issues which they believed needed immediate attention. What Mr. Walsh entitles as a "waste of time," is in fact an international event, celebrated by millions of people as a "call to arms" to increase awareness and take appropriate steps to limit our environmental devastation.

I agree with Mr. Walsh that the Earth is not a "fragile China teacup." If it was, we would have shattered it decades ago through our environmental incompetence and ignorance. It is essential that the human species address the negative consequences of our actions upon this planet. Comparably, a recognition of the widespread effects which have occurred in such a short historical context compared to the billions of years of planetary development is a necessary concern. If the world's history were presented as a clock, the human species would represent the last few seconds of the twelfth hour. Additionally, it is vital that we continue our education of the other issues which are intricately related to the environmental movement. Global biodiversity, deforestation, endemic poverty, widespread starvation—these are all issues that need to be addressed, beyond the "ozone hole." In addition, turning force of the planet is necessary. These are issues developed through Earth Day, which continues to grow as an event internationally and here at Bucknell.

It is within this frame of reference that I believe Earth Day is an event that the Bucknell community should celebrate this Saturday, not in "apocalyptic desperation," but in pragmatic optimism of the event's ability to increase our awareness of the need for environmental awareness and action. For all these reasons, Earth Day is hardly a waste of time, and should be celebrated.

"The system" only works for whites

TO THE EDITOR:

In response to the article written by Tom Malinich in the April 23 issue of The Bucknellian: Mr. Malinich, it interests me that you could use the Constitution to support your argument regarding the "Rodney King Trial" and then in a later article state that "...words written on paper cannot change the hearts of men and women." Another thing I find "interesting" about your article is the fact that you stated that "the system works!" In this regard, I couldn't agree with you more. You're right, "the system" does work. My only question is: "For Who?" It obviously didn't work for Rodney King, except for the fact that he was paid a large sum of money (which is often the substitute or pacifier for justice). If you would like to find other cases in which "the system" worked, you could take time to examine the "Charles Stewart" case that took place in Boston, MA and what happened to certain members of the community in that area.

I agree with your assertion that "words written on paper cannot change the hearts of men and women"; however, the Constitution was not written for that reason. It was written to provide a set of guidelines for a government by, of, and for the people. Unfortunately, "the people" did not include African-Americans (who were only considered three-fifths of a human being—remember the "Three-Fifths" Compromise?). Because the supporters of the Constitution did not want to face the hypocrisy that these "guidelines" reveal, they granted certain "problemed people" within "the system" some "civil rights." It is precisely for these reasons that African-American leaders such as (since he has become "popular") Malcolm X believed that if the intentions of the Constitution were to include all people then there would be no need for these so-called civil rights laws.

I'm not surprised that you, as well as many others, believe that "the system" works because the people who benefit from "the system" (regardless of the fact that it may be disadvantageous to others) are not going to, as you might say, "knock" it. I'm sure that in 1965, 1945, or even sometime in the early 1800's (a time during which physical slavery was practiced), there were lawyers, mayors, presidents, and other players within "the system" who felt that "the system" worked. I believe that they were right as well. It is, therefore, no surprise to me that you would use quotes from President Clinton, District Attorney Vacco, and Mayor Bradley to legitimize your point. Everything within "the system" you speak of has and continues to hinder African-Americans' (although not exclusively) progress in society and particularly the African-American or "Black" underclass. How can justice be served if "the system" which is supposed to serve the community discourages African-Americans from being judges and continues to nurture an environment in which African-Americans who question "the system" are ostracized? (Tom, if you would like to expand your understanding of "the system," according to how a Supreme Court justice in New York views it, please read Black Robes, White Justice, by Bruce Wright). I use the word "discourage" because "the system," or should I say "your system," is incapable of totally suppressing the strength and talents of African-Americans such as Thurgood Marshall, William A. Budd, and yes, I suppose, Clarence Thomas from realizing their potential and believing in themselves in the face of immeasurable odds.

In conclusion, I would like to urge everyone to question "the system" at all times. Question who it has worked for in the past and who it is working for now. Question how "the system" creates the racial disproportion found in the U.S. prison system. And, above all else, since "people are to blame for racial strife," question people like Tom Malinich.

King verdict was simply appeasement

TO THE EDITOR:

This is a response to the article "The system works!" by Tom Malinich from the April 23 issue of The Bucknellian. Hi Tom, yes it's me again, your dear friend. Since we are such good friends, I thought that the formal titles were no longer necessary.

In addition to the overall content of your article, I was very disturbed by two references that you made. First of all, I think that it is absolutely ludicrous for you to quote politicians. I'm sure that you do not expect these high-profile individuals to say anything against our justice system publicly. Surely you know better than that. Due to their positions, these government officials are supposed to maintain peace in our society. If they were to speak against your system, they would be considered antagonistic and their jobs would be in jeopardy! Once again, it is my duty to consider these sources invalid. I'm sorry, but this is beginning to become an ugly habit—seek help.

Second, I feel that it was very inappropriate for you to mention the names of Justice Thurgood Marshall and the other guy in the same sentence. Thurgood Marshall spent his life devoted to the cause of removing racial injustices from our country. He was an integral part in pursuing equality for African-Americans in this country. He is a man to be honored and to be revered. The other guy you mentioned, you know, Clarence Thomas, has done absolutely nothing. He is purely a political pawn used by former President George Bush to replace an African-American Supreme Court Justice with another African-American Supreme Court Justice. The late Marshall proved that he was a worthy candidate for the High Court while the other gentleman that you mentioned has proven absolutely nothing. I think that you should do one of two things:

1) You should sit down and write 200 times "I will not mention Thurgood Marshall and the other guy in the same sentence ever again" and send it to me.

2) You should write a letter of apology to the family of the late Justice Marshall.

Since you have been having problems with invalid sources in the past I will let you find his address. See, I'm here to help you.

In the wake of the verdict from the second Rodney King trial, you feel that I should believe that the system works. I think that I will try to explain the nature of the verdict to you in the simplest way possible. I will revert back to my childhood days of watching Sesame Street. Our word for today, Tom, is APPEASE. Come on, say it with me: ap peez'. Just in case you are ignorant of this word's meaning, Webster's defines it as "to give in to the demands of a hostile or dangerous power in an attempt to prevent trouble."

I'll break it down for you. The hostile or dangerous power are the residents of South Central Los Angeles. The trouble which was prevented was a second riot. The act of giving in was the conviction of only two officers. Let's see if this word is being used in the proper context. The jurors of the second trial convicted two of the officers in order to appease the residents of South Central Los Angeles. It seems to work for me.

Please don't be mistaken, I'm glad that two of the officers were convicted to jail sentences, yet I feel that the other two officers should not be considered innocent. It is often said that if you are not part of the solution, then you are part of the problem. There were four officers present, four officers who took part in the beating of Mr. King, and none of the officers attempted to cease the highly unnecessary behavior. Hence, there should have been four guilty verdicts. Yet, you feel that the system has corrected itself.

Please forgive me if I feel a little apprehensive about allowing the system to correct itself. Unfortunately, the last time my people tried this it took us a little under 200 years to gain "equal" rights. I guess in another 180 years or so your system will correct itself. It will be interesting to see how many other police officers commit injustices against undeserving citizens.

Quayle decision well made

TO THE EDITOR:

I wish to clarify and comment on some of the points raised in the Apr. 23 Bucknellian regarding the appearance by former Vice President Dan Quayle sponsored by the Student Lectureship Committee. I regret your decision to print an unsubstantiated report of Mr. Quayle's fee. As I told your reporter, it is often the case that such fees are contractually "special and confidential" because the speaker or performer has accepted an offer lower than the advertised asking price and it simply isn't good business to publicize that you gave somebody else a discount. When a fee is confidential, for either party to disclose it amounts to a breach of contract and can result in a cancellation or worse.

Personal political biases aside, Mr. Quayle's talk proved extremely popular with the student body: all available tickets were distributed in about four hours after the box office opened on Friday, well before The Bucknellian appeared. Students were turned away and many staff and non-Bucknellians expressed disappointment that they would not be able to attend. At the rumored cost of $22,000, the amount of student activities funds expended comes to less than $20 for each student in attendance. I suggest doing the same math on other speakers brought to campus, dividing expense by attendees. In terms of interest and per capita cost, Dan Quayle seems one of the better major investments of recent years.

Editorials should express opinions, opinions based on research and interpretation of fact. Your editorial relied on clichés (you seem to equate golf with vapidity, yet in the same issue The Bucknellian's pick for athlete of the week was a golfer—and did you know that Dan Quayle was a good enough college golfer to consider turning pro?) and displayed woefully little knowledge of or research into how your own student government works. For example, you should know that funds appropriated to committees and organizations by BSG are not "rolled over" but are returned for reappropriation in the next fiscal year. Like it or not, this tends to create a use it or lose it mentality.

Student government documents and many meetings are open to attendance by interested students, including reporters and editors. What else does BSG do with the nearly $400,000 collected in activities fees annually? If you are aware that BSG increased the Concert Committee's initial appropriation of $35,000 with an additional $50,000 to make a single concert possible, you did not find it deserving of comment. Eighty-five thousand dollars is, conservatively figured, one-fourth of every activity fee collected this year, or, put other ways, the entirety of over 700 student activities fees, or the equivalent of more than four students' annual tuition. As advisor to both the Lectureship and Concert committees, I find nothing objectionable in either of their choices, and would not presume to tell them how best to spend your money. Indeed, what I said to your reporter was that "I support the committee's right to make this decision." (I was quoted as saying I supported the decision, which is to my mind a quite different thing.)

To give a more balanced picture, it should be pointed out that the Lectureship Committee also sponsored the February residency of Quentin Keynes, and financially supported numerous other organizations' choices of speakers, to a total of nearly $10,000. Similarly, more than half of the monies appropriated for the Indigo Girls concert should be returned in ticket sales (the bulk of which will probably also come out of students' pockets), some of which has been set aside for other co-sponsored concerts, the largest being the appearance of Live at Bucknell's May Day/Earth Day celebration.

Objective reporting and thoughtful editorials seldom grow out of gossip. Even though you have real facts at your disposal (with a little effort), you opt to attack the choice of a lecture which proves to be highly in demand, perhaps only because there appears to be something remotely scandalous in the secrecy surrounding the fee. Neither the size of the fee nor my unwillingness to confirm it is unusual. You imply otherwise by omitting that information.

And if you really don't like how your elected officials are spending your money, support and elect ones more to your liking.

have to live with for the rest of eternity. Every white person, furthermore, must take this fact into account before automatically assuming that all U.S. citizens should have the same amount of confidence in American institutions.

And so it is all a matter of shared experience—or lack thereof—that lies at the heart of America's race problems. In another time, under different circumstances, Larnie and Tom might find out that they are both pre-med majors, and talk for hours about how hellish it is to take the MCATs. They would only do so, though, because the subject would represent common ground on which they could tread together. How much more closely knit our society would be if blacks and whites in America had more such commonalities.

In the end, Larnie only had it half right when he said, "Open your damn eyes." For, in doing this, skin color would be the only thing that most people would end up noticing. The proper request to make, rather, is one that asks people to open their minds and hearts, so that they can consider and appreciate the views and backgrounds of others before forming their opinions.

As it stands now, the fate of America's race problem lies in the hands of the privileged majority, because it is this group that must consent to being selfless enough to support minority causes that may not benefit it directly. Let us hope that the members of this group realize the need for such an act before another violent confrontation erupts in our cities. Next time, after all, the fires and smoke of discontent may flare in their neighborhoods.

Lending a helping hand to those in need

BY KRISTINA SCHURR
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Working with children has always been a focus of the life of Maria Pereira '95. Blessed with a high level of patience and a strong desire to care for those around her, she has spent much time helping others. Throughout high school she volunteered at a childrens' hospital, tutored Spanish-speaking children having difficulty learning English, taught a fourth-grade religion class during her senior year, and worked as a teacher's aide.

Pereira has had an extensive history of caring for people. Her mother has had rheumatory arthritis for as long as Pereira can remember, and when Pereira was 13, her mother was diagnosed as having Multiple Sclerosis. "After she was diagnosed, I not only had to help and take care of her, but I then I started being her legs. My Dad never dealt with it [her illness], and I had to be both a mom to my younger sister and a homemaker for my father as well. I had to take care of the family."

Now a Bucknell sophomore double-majoring in education and psychology, Pereira continues to direct her attention to children. She is a Big Sister to Nicholas Novitski, a differently-abled six-year-old boy from Lewisburg.

His mother Linda, a former teacher, contracted the disease cytomeglavirus from a student in one of her classes when she was pregnant with Nicholas. She quickly recovered, but Nicholas was born with serious birth defects. As a result, he has cerebral palsy, is mentally retarded, and is deaf in his left ear. The virus also damaged the area of his brain which controls speech, making it almost impossible for him to communicate other than with nods and hand gestures.

Responding to an ad placed by his mother in an October 1991 issue of What's Happening, Pereira began seeing Nicholas on a regular basis, and they soon became friends. She plays with him and encourages him to communicate with her by using hand gestures.

"I've gotten extremely close to him," said Pereira. "I feel so wonderful when I'm with him, almost as if he were my own son. And I know he misses me when I'm not around, the same way that I miss him. He gets so excited when I arrive at his house, but when I leave, he cries."

But Pereira isn't content just to spend about five hours per week working and playing with Nicholas. When she began working with him, she discovered that he needed a "talking board," a computer device which would enable him to communicate semi-verbally. Pressing certain buttons on the board allows users to communicate their needs. The cost of the talking board, however, is about $7,000, and the Novitski family, already strapped for cash, simply can't afford to buy one.

"His father left Linda after she refused to institutionalize Nicholas," said Pereira. "The father provides no child support—Nicholas and Linda are completely funded by the state. She left her job to get a masters degree in education, and she hasn't been able to find another teaching position. But it's a double-edged sword. If she doesn't find one in one month, her benefits will be cut, but if she finds one which pays more than $15,000 yearly, her benefits will still be cut."

Pereira decided that she would try to provide Nicholas with this board which would facilitate communication processes, and September 1992 marked her first attempt at fundraising. With the help of several fraternities and sororities, a Management 101 company, and the class of '96, Pereira has so far been able to raise $1,300.

"For House Party Weekend I'm also selling 32-ounce cups, imprinted with Nicholas's name and a design for House Party to some of the Greek organizations on campus," said Pereira (Extra cups will be sold in the Langone Center).

"I found a manufacturer that will match the amount of money I come up with, and will provide Nicholas with a talking board. I hope to get about $1,000 from the cup sale, giving me almost the $3,500 that I need. Hopefully my dad will provide the difference that I need. Since I'm going abroad first semester next year, I want Nicholas to be set up before I leave."

Susan Naughton—The Bucknellian

As part of the Big Brothers and Big Sisters program, Maria Pereira '95 spends five hours a week with Nicholas Novitski. Pereira is also trying to organize fundraisers to buy therapy equipment for him.

Despite Nicholas' illnesses, he does not have a shortened lifespan. A theory exists that, for cerebral palsy patients, it is possible to train them to communicate, as well as gain some command of their motor skills.

"Linda trained him very well not to flail (a tendency common to those who suffer from cerebral palsy) when he gets excited. He used to have to be fed; now he feeds himself. He can motion for a drink and he has learned to nod." Nicholas' days are kept busy with nurses helping him with occupational therapy, physical therapy, and teaching him basic skills.

Go beyond haute cuisine

Sauerkraut, turkey, bologna, roast beef, and chunks of onion on a Grey Poupon peppered hard roll—Stage Deli in Los Angeles calls it "The Schwarzenegger." Lettuce, tomato, and a slice of cheese on pita bread. It's known as the "Julia Roberts." Do you dream of having a meal named after you, but lack the Austrian accent, or don't entirely fit Roy Orbison's lyrics? Here's your chance.

Ingenious Bucknell cafeteria manager Tim Tenon, with the help of an anonymous source, is planning a "Senior Sandwich Competition." The contest will honor graduating seniors by commemorating their favorite Bison entrees. The rules are simple. Contestants merely write down their tastiest lunch or dinner time sandwich, giving all the details on condiments, preparation style, slicing, and presentation. Their selection will then be sampled and judged by an elite panel of faculty, students, and cafeteria management. The panel is looking for flavor and originality. Entries will be accepted from May 1-7 in special boxes at the Bison order line and the Bostwick Cafeteria.

The contest sponsors are offering some serious prizes for the winners. Study break packages, complete with a beverage, cookies and candy, go to three third-place winners. A $15 Bison certificate goes to the second-place winner. And for the grand prize—a catered buttery room party for ten. But that's not all. The winning entry will also be featured as an honorary Bison special (like the Bison Burger or the Bison Breakfast on a Bagel or any other of those B alliteration items) at "a bit of a discount" price! The winner can give the sandwich a special name, or choose to christen it after him/herself. The new name will immediately be added to the usually stagnant chalkboard, catching the eye of all the menu-starers who thought they had memorized everything anyway.

So seniors, start experimenting with that turkey, ham, bacon, and tuna salad. The possibilities are endless.

Take a ride on the Lewisburg Express

BY COLLEEN RUSH
Bucknellian Staffwriter

"All abooooard to Winfield!" shouted Denny Confer, an eager conductor at the Lewisburg and Buffalo Creek Train Depot. For some reason, the words did not evoke the grandest image to a features writer on assignment. The mission: to take a two-hour tour of Lewisburg and surrounding areas. The mode of transport: train. Not just any old train, though. THE train that runs through campus with a bell and horn that would wake the living dead.

When I arrived on the scene, I was greeted by the expected mix of random tourists and bored locals. Embarrassed to be there alone and without a handful of tourist pamphlets to browse through, I picked a sunny spot to sit in and pretended to scribble notes while I waited for the train to board.

I had been sitting in my sunny spot for awhile, awaiting what I thought would be the most boring adventure of a lifetime, when a voice inquired behind me, "You brought your homework?" Startled by the intrusion, I responded, "Huh? Nah, I'm writing an article about the train ride."

As I turned to locate the source of the intrusion, I realized that I was staring into the face of a real, live engineer. Not the Bucknell kind that lives in Dana, takes eight classes a semester, and involuntarily twitches at the words "Senior Design Project." I speak of the REAL engineer... the one that lives in striped denim overalls and a matching engineer cap... the one with a sun-weathered face and work-roughened hands. He even had a identification badge engraved George W. Comfort, Engineer.

Noticing my apparent boredom and desperation, the real engineer offered to show me the place where it all happened, the place that gave this man meaning and purpose: the engine. I eagerly accepted, grateful that I wouldn't have to sit by myself any longer and pleased that I would look important getting a personal tour of the train by a real engineer.

After formally introducing me to the inner workings of the engine, I felt compelled to get to know this product of the American past better. Unfortunately, after a few minutes of conversation, I discovered that I wasn't dealing with the real McCoy. George, I found out, is part of the weekend volunteer crew. He holds a 'real' job during the week, and volunteers to work on the weekend. Though mildly disappointed by this discovery, I quickly recovered when he followed his confession with a genuine smile and said, "This is not a job for me. I love doing it."

Whether to appease my naive ideals or satisfy his own curiosity, George then asked me if I'd like to ride in the engine after the tourist part of the train ride was over. I graciously accepted the invitation, eager to take advantage of such a unique privilege and secretly hoping he would let me wear his cap and toot the whistle once or twice.

After finishing my initial conversation with George, I strolled to the back of the train, relishing the envy of the unlucky passengers who hadn't received the royal treatment. As the train left the station, a friendly, almost too-enthusiastic voice invaded the train car through a loudspeaker. The voice informed us that we were leaving the Lewisburg depot, heading for Winfield, a 'town' six miles south of Lewisburg on Route 15.

Once the train reached cruising speed (six or seven mph), Denny, the voice, began what I can only call a most interesting spiel about Lewisburg. The whole adventure started in a typical tourist mode when Denny diverted the attention of the passengers to the right of the train to discuss, in an oh-so-business-sponsored way, the community value of The Country Cupboard, a local hot-spot for Lewisburgers. ("No trip to Lewisburg would be complete without a visit to Country Cupboard," Denny informed the passengers). Not buying into the obviously paid advertisement, I redirected my attention to the left of the train, where I found a much more interesting topic. If you didn't see it, you would certainly smell the sewage treatment plant in the heat of the day on the other side of the train. I chalked it up as Smooth Move #1 by Denny, and silently wondered why the plant was blatantly ignored... after all... it is part of Lewisburg, right?

Needless to say, the rest of the train ride consisted of Denny noting several points of interest and facts about the area, including the Lewisburg Penitentiary (Did you know Al Capone did time there?), the Bechtel Cow ("Isn't she 'udderly' fantastic?" oozed Denny), the somewhat overrated "Did-you-know-Lewisburg-was-rated-#9-in-the-country-of-best-towns-to-live-in?" plug, and the "Majestic cliffs" of the Buffalo mountains.

When the train reached the turning point in Winfield and stopped, I bolted from my seat to the front of the train where I was to meet my new guides, George, the engineer, and his right-hand man, David L. Reed, the brakeman. I climbed aboard the engine with the ease and grace of a pro train rider and began my front-seat, hands-on experience of trainology.

One of my first, must-be-answered-questions was met with unflinching certainty. "Have you ever run over anyone or anything?" I probed, waiting for some gruesome account involving a small farm animal. "No. Never," they both flatly replied. Somewhat discouraged and hoping for a glimmer of excitement in this six-mile-an-hour quest, I continued questioning.

As we passed through Bucknell, George fired up the horn a few times when we approached the crossings. Cringing from the almost eerie feeling that it was Saturday morning, and I was being rudely awakened by the ear-piercing wail, I asked George if he had to blow the horn at every crossing. "We're required by law to signal at public crossings, but not private crossings, like the ones at Bucknell," George said. He continued by saying that the reason the train usually signals at the Bucknell crossings was a courtesy warning to students and an extra safety measure. I respectfully accepted his grave, thoughtful comments and silently wondered how many students who live near the tracks think the deafening wail is a life-saving, considerate gesture.

Perhaps noting my interest in the horn, George continued with an interesting observation about the tolerance of some Lewisburg residents. "We changed the horn awhile ago because the residents bitched about the noise. We coulda told 'em to shove it up their ass, but we like to keep the peace. We don't want any hard feelings around here," he said.

In the distance, I saw a small red truck approach the tracks and stop dead in the center to let a passenger out.

"Does that make you nervous?" I asked.

"Yeah. You gotta watch 'em close," replied George. "People are boneheads, I'm tellin' ya."

As the train ride came to an end and the train pulled into the station, I realized my hour as a pseudo-engineer was over. The trip was a relaxing, educational, and sometimes humorous look at the town so many Bucknellians dismiss as being 'in the middle of nowhere.' Though the train ride did offer a look at Central PA that most students don't and won't see, I came away from the trip with more of a respect for the men and their train than historical Lewisburg. When that train passes within what seems like inches from your window and blares its mighty horn, give a wave and a holler to Denny, George, and David for me. After all, it's their job, and they love it.

Yancey Smith—The Bucknellian

Have you ever wondered about the clanging bell aggravating your pounding head during your mid-afternoon nap; the mystery has been solved. The secret of the clanging bell is the passenger/tourist train which runs through Lewisburg to Winfield.

Making Special Olympians

KATE FINK
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Preparations are underway for Chi Phi fraternity's annual philanthropy event, the Special Olympics.

This Sunday at 9 a.m., 300 physically and mentally differently-abled athletes from state homes in nearby counties, about 200 student volunteers, and the brothers of Chi Phi will descend upon Christy Mathewson Memorial Stadium for a day of fun, games, and friendship.

Said event chairperson Jimmy Saputo '93, "This is the third year that I'm either co-chairman or chairman for the Special Olympics. I do it every year just because I think it's such a great cause. I love doing it just for the sake of giving something back to the community. It's really been fun."

The event simulates actual track and field Olympic competition. The athletes go through a training process either at local facilities such as the West Branch YMCA in Milton, or in their homes with personal visits by coaches.

They will participate in the 50- and the 100-yard dashes, basketball games, powerlifting, softball, the shotput, long jump, wheelchair races, and 25- and 30-meter wheelchair slaloms. A Bucknell student, a "hugger," is paired up with each athlete to assist, to encourage and to share the glory.

The event operates in conjunction with the Susquehanna Area Special Olympic Committee, which refers the athletes to Bucknell and officiates the events.

The committee is part of the nationwide Special Olympics organization, so Sunday's winners will advance to the state and then perhaps the regional and national championships.

Winners also receive medals and ribbons, and each participant receives a Special Olympics t-shirt and a certificate. More importantly, however, the athletes will walk away with new friendships, new skills, and feelings of pride, courage and accomplishment.

But the event is not just beneficial for the athletes. The brothers of Chi Phi take pride in the fact that their philanthropy does more than just raise money for a cause.

They enjoy taking time to actually organize, implement, and participate. And the student volunteers seem to reflect upon a rewarding experience of heartfelt interactions.

As he emerges victorious from an event, an Olympian celebrates with his buddy. All participants receive medals for their efforts during the day's contests.

Collegium Musicum plays something for everyone

BY KATIE DEBONVILLE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The pageantry and music of the Renaissance and Baroque eras will be available for all to enjoy this weekend when the Bucknell Collegium Musicum presents its spring concert in Bucknell Hall on Sunday at 2:30 p.m.

The Collegium is a group that is devoted to the performance of early music, a genre that generally gets very little air time unless it is the focus of the program. Bucknell's early music ensemble will perform a diverse program of music that spans three centuries and five nations.

According to Susan Jackson, assistant professor of music and director of the Collecium Musicum, Sunday's concert will feature something for everyone. "Renaissance and Baroque music, vocal and instrumental music, sacred and secular music, and solo and ensemble pieces are all on the program," Jackson said.

The Collegium, which includes several students who study in various areas of the music department and a couple of faculty members, is actually composed of two separate groups. The eight-member vocal ensemble covers soprano, alto, tenor, and bass parts and exhibits the talent and versatility necessary to perform the music that is so rarely heard outside of music history classes.

New to the Collegium this year is the recorder ensemble, which features four members who all recently began playing the recorder.

Also included in the Collegium are two guitarists, three harpsichordists, and a performer on the viola da gamba, a stringed instrument that is similar to the modern cello.

In spite of the fact that groups of this sort traditionally perform music of the Medieval Renaissance and Baroque periods, the idea of the Collegium Musicum is a fairly young one in this country. The college-campus Collegium Musicum was brought to the United States by the German composer Paul Hindemith, who began the first American Collegiate early music ensemble at Yale University.

Students who perform in early music ensembles are often required to do research on their music in order to perform it in the correct historical style. Members of Bucknell's Collegium are no exception—several of the musicians involved in Sunday's concert put a great deal of time and energy into studying the composers and historical contexts of their pieces.

Amy Anderson '94, a member of the vocal ensemble, spent last summer on a Knight Fellowship researching much of the music that the Collegium has performed this year. Anderson was also instrumental in planning both last semester's and Sunday's performances.

Karissa Krenz '95, also a performer in the vocal ensemble, will spend this summer on a Knight Fellowship studying the music of the Baroque organist Buxtehude with Jackson.

Members of the vocal ensemble last performed on April 18 during services at Rooke Chapel. Sunday afternoon's program will be the final performance of the semester for the Collegium. It also marks the last concert for seniors David Chrzanowski, bass and harpsichord, Sarah Danser, soprano, Charles Curtiss, alto recorder, and Sabrina Kleinknecht, harpsichord.

Delta Upsilon demie play carols for charities

Fraternity brothers perform A College Carol in Coleman to benefit youth organizations

Nicole Cobban—The Bucknellian

Delta Upsilon brothers Dan Peterson '93 and Chris Jasinski '94 perform tomorrow night in the 78th annual Demie Play. Entitled A College Carol, the play recounts the tale of a Bucknell graduate as he is visited by the Ghosts of College. The performance will take place at 8 p.m. in the University Theatre in Coleman Hall. Tickets are $5 at the door, all proceeds go to the March of Dimes and Villages.

BY NICOLE COBBAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

As the year winds down to a close, and the rank of graduating seniors reflect on their four years at Bucknell, the brothers of Delta Upsilon offer one scenario of post-college life. A College Carol, the 78th Delta Upsilon Demie Play, opened last night and will performed again tomorrow in the University Theatre in Coleman at 8 p.m. Tickets are $5 ($4 in advance) and all proceeds will benefit the March of Dimes and Villages.

A College Carol, based loosely on Charles Dickens' A Christmas Carol, opens with the scene of the traditional Tent Party, with special musical guest Kool and the Gang. Scrooge, double cast as Alec Parsons '93 and Chris Jasinski '94, is graduating from Bucknell, and in the chaos of the party kills Kool, played by Kevin Nicholas '95, with his slingshot.

Scrooge is thus visited by the three Ghosts of College, the first being Kool as the Ghost of College Past. Scrooge learns to see the errors of his life at Bucknell. Sacrificing academics for parties, getting picked up by campus security, and treating his girlfriend with disrespect, Scrooge regrets his actions as an undergraduate.

The Ghost of College Present is played by Lee Guzofski '94, who also co-wrote the script with Brian Rigney '93 and Bryan Smoltz '93.

Scrooge's last visitor is, of course, the Ghost of College Future, played by J. D. Moriarty '94, who shows Scrooge what Guzofski called "his hideous future." Scrooge looks at himself, old, cranky, and married to a hag, played by Delta Upsilon's cook Ruth Haines.

The Demie Play is a long-standing tradition for the fraternity house. This year the brothers hope to raise up to $3,000 for the March of Dimes and Villages, an organization of independent families that take homeless children into their homes. Delta Upsilon, besides organizing the event, covers all production costs for the play. So join the fraternity as it peeks at a day in the life of your average Bucknellian, then, now, and in years to come.

Bucknell students move closer to fine

The indigo girls will play to a packed Christy Mathewson Stadium tonight at 8:30 p.m. with their acoustic, earthy sounds. Amy Ray and Emily Saliels, the duo that composes the group, have climbed the billboard charts and racked up four Grammy Award nominations. Ticket sales have been higher than expected, according to Bill Boswell, director of cultural events. Boswell estimates that 3,000 tickets have been bought by students, close to the school's total enrollment, and more are still available. The price for the show is $10 with a BUID, $12 at the door and without BUID. Construction began Wednesday night for the mega-stage being built in the stadium. The only concern that remains, said Boswell, is the weather. With the last four weeks wavering between snow flurries and sunshine, and weather reports predicting both clear skies and possible downpours for tonight, the possibility of moving the concert into the fieldhouse is a valid fear. Although the seating capacity in the fieldhouse is ample, the acoustics, said Boswell, are poor. Either way, the show must — and will— go on.

TRIVIA QUESTION:
Last Tuesday, Bucknell catcher Chad DeHart '96 tied the school record for stolen bases in a game. How many bags did he swipe?

Women's track poised to upset academies | Indoor champs face stiff challenges outside

BUCKNELLIAN TEAM CORRESPONDENT

When asked about this Saturday's Patriot League championship meet, Bucknell's talented and versatile Norine Nadeau '96 had this to say: "We're going to win. That's all I'm thinking because I can't have any doubts in my mind anymore." Captain Dana Harbst '93 echoed Nadeau's thought. "I really believe that we can win. But the only way that it is going to happen is if everyone is super pumped up and puts in their best performances of the year. Everyone needs to be focused and ready to 'just do it?'"

The women in orange and blue face their toughest challenge ever, as every team in the league seems to be performing "out of their skulls" this season. Add to the picture that it is the first time that all the teams in the league will be competing (Navy is competing for the first time, Army its second), and we've got ourselves one dandy of a track meet at Christy Mathewson Stadium.

Kathy Wurster '94 stares over the shoulder of Gina Abraham '93 during a race last spring.

Some people seem to feel that it will be a race between Army and Navy for the coveted crown; everyone else is racing for third. But don't tell that to coaches Art Gulden, Bill Hodge, and Jo Gianettino. They are hard at work trying to come up with the secret formula for winning the outdoor title for the second time in three years. The coaches are optimistic, as Hodge and Gulden both agree that their athletes are ready to run fast, jump high, and throw far. They are confident that the thundering herd will do some amazing 'feets' on the track.

How do the Bison stack up against the rest of the league? For one, Bucknell has a few returning champions that aren't going to be willing to relinquish their crowns. It all starts with Bucknell's shining sophomore Tameka Hinton who won the 100m dash at Holy Cross last year. Why didn't she win the 200m also, you ask? Because she didn't run it!! (Don't worry, it was won by graduated Bison Tricia Plasko.) Hinton will look to remain undefeated in the league and try to sweep the 100m and 200m. As usual, she will get help from the ever faithful Dana Harbst '93 and Julie Diercks '93. The three will team up with Bridget Dean '95 to try to defend their 4 x 100 relay title.

The distance crew will be led by defending 10,000 m champion Kristen Opdyke '93. She has been sidelined with illness for part of the season, but is back as healthy as ever to trot around the track for 25 laps. Last year she won with relative ease, but the race should prove quite interesting with Holy Cross's Linn Liberatore, and Navy's Michelle Montgomery entering into the picture.

Bucknell will also look for points from middle distance runners Kathy Wurster '94, who has looked absolutely awesome this year,

It's been a long time since a Bucknell men's track team has walked into Christy Mathewson Stadium an underdog. The two service academies enter Lewisburg as the decided favorites to finish one-two at the Patriot League Outdoor Track and Field Championships this weekend (see schedule box). How does head coach Art Gulden look at this meet?

"It's a new situation. I'm anxious to see how we react when we're not the favorites. It's exciting," reacted Gulden.

Anxious, excited; did this mean he's not sure how his team will fare? Quite the contrary. "They've shown me that they're mentally and physically ready to go out and compete," said Gulden. "It will be a great test of our competitiveness and courage."

A quick glance at the league's Top 15 male performances list for each event and you might mistake it for Navy's roster. The Midshipmen, who did not attend last spring's Championships, appear, at least on paper, to be the even-money favorites to win a rare Patriot League title. Last year's champions, Army, will march into the competition focused more on their ancient academy rivalry than a league crown, which is the likely prize for the winner of this dual.

To save time, I'll just eliminate Holy Cross right now. So where does this leave Bucknell and the rest of the Patriot League? The Bison have relied on superior depth, balance, and patience to dominate the Leighs and Lafayettes. But, with the presence of the two academies, that depth will be severely tested. Both Army and Navy have the fire power to place among the top two in almost any event, leaving just four or five spots for six other schools to shoot for—make that five (sorry Crusaders). Colgate has its inhuman distance runner Ray Appenhiemer who's almost a minute better than the rest of the league, including Army and Navy.

Tom Eagleson '93 will be counted on to score in the 800-meter run tomorrow afternoon.

Balance will still serve the Bison well. Brad Bernardini '94, Derek Hamilton '94, and Rick Van Emburgh '95, Bucknell's top sprinters this season, have their work cut out for them, but can score. In the middle-distance races, Tom Eagleson '93, Dave Slupe '93 and Steve Clarke '95 will have to run extremly well to crack the top six. Clarke should score valuable points in the 3,000-meter steeplechase. The 10,000-meter run could see two Bison score. Mike Bronson '93 and Chris Priestaf '95 have posted times worthy of top six finishes.

The hurdles are very deep with runners from five different schools in the top eight. Ted Janowski '96, Ed Loges '96, Adam Scaratelli '94, and Blaine Fawcett '93 join Van Emburgh in the quest for team points in the 110 and 400-meter hurdles. The 4x100 and 4x400-meter relay races should be hottly contested between the seven schools. Depending on who runs for them, the Bison could finish between second and sixth. The 4x800-meter relay results list only

"Maybe that's what heaven will be like for me. We just coach one NCAA tournament after another. I can go against John Wooden in the tournament. That would be something."

—Jim Valvano

The year was 1983. I was twelve years old, and life was great. I didn't have to worry about getting a job or stress over final exams, and my Orioles had just won their first game on their way to a World Series trophy. My biggest problem was that I still had a 10 p.m. bedtime, which did not allow me to watch the NCAA Championship basketball game. Of course, I had the game on my radio, which was tucked under my pillow so my parents couldn't hear.

Anyway, that year upstart North Carolina State was a decided underdog against Phi Slamma Jamma and Houston. I remember being wide awake listening to the back-and-forth contest that epitomized college athletics. Then it came down to the final seconds. Dereck Whittenberg's desperation "pass" fell into the hands of Lorenzo Charles, who dunked it home at the buzzer. I could here my father scream from downstairs. I ripped off my head gear, chucked it into the corner, and sprinted downstairs to see if what I had just heard really happened. The first image I can recall is that of N.C. State head coach Jim Valvano running around like a chicken with its head cut off.

I don't know why, but from then on, I was a big Jimmy V fan. From watching him throughout the tournament, I saw a man who obviously loved the game, loved his team, and loved his family.

Second-seeded Bison enter tourney on roll

BY CHRIS DROWNE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

"Let's play two," was Hall of Fame shortstop Ernie Banks' famous expression. Terrie Grieb's softball team will try to do Banks two or three better this weekend when they travel to Allentown for the annual Patriot League Championship Softball Tournament.

The Bison roll into the tournament winners in ten of their last eleven games, including six in a row. The line-up has been solidified and the pitching in a groove. But, equally, if not more, important has been the improved defense. Before this week, the Bison had given their opponents 37 unearned runs over 22 games. In the eight games since, they've yielded a mere two. That difference has been the main reason for the recent winning streak.

Bucknell, seeded second, has revenge on its mind as it faces #7 Lafayette tonight at 6 p.m. in the opening round of the double-elimination tournament. The Leopards stole a win in Lewisburg with five unearned runs in the top of the seventh. Allison Love '95, the hard-luck loser that afternoon, carries an 11-4 record with her to Allentown. She'll probably have to wait until Saturday morning and pitch in Bucknell's second game against either Army or Holy Cross.

Hiedi Dawson '95 (12-2, 1.69 ERA) has won her last five outings and will likely get the nod in tonight's opener. She cruised to a 7-1 win over Lafayette earlier this year and stands an excellent chance of being named to the All-League team (to be announced tonight).

Offensively, the Bison rank fourth in the nation in runs scored with just under six a game. Centerfielder Lisa Fink '93 and catcher Jen Yuengling '93, both of whom are nationally ranked in batting average and stolen bases, led the attack, but are well supported. Yuengling had her school-record hitting streak snapped at 20 games this past week, but regained her stroke over the last six. Shortstop Kelly Corr '95, rightfielder Jill Spatzer '93, and Fink have all driven in 19 runs apiece. But, first baseman Heather Hoehn '94 leads the club with 21 RBI. The balanced offense, coupled with the recent solid defense, gives the team reason to be optimistic during the bus ride to Allentown.

Jill Spatzer '93 drops down a perfect bunt during Bucknell's sweep of St. Joeseph's.

Lehigh owns the top seed and subsequent first-round bye, but split with the Bison in their doubleheader meeting two weeks ago. They'll play the winner of the Colgate/Fordham battle bright and early Saturday morning. Bucknell was upset early in last spring's tournament and owes several league rivals for close loses this season.

Last weekend was the final four Patriot League regular-season match-ups of the year. Saturday saw the Bison split with Colgate, who had to come to Lewsburg because it was snowing in Hamilton. In the opener, Hoehn went 3-3 with two runs scored, and Spatzer plated three to give Dawson and the Bison a 7-5 win. Love received little run support in the nightcap, losing 2-1. The Bison were limited to just two hits—one each from Spatzer and third baseman Carol Gesler '93.

Following Saturday's doubleheader, the squad treked far north to Holy Cross for a Sunday doubleheader with the Crusaders. That bus trip was infinitely longer than the blowouts. Bucknell took the first 14-0 and the second 15-0. Both games were shortened to five innings due to the ten-run rule. The pitching staff of Love, Dawson, and Niki Gruning '96 yielded just four hits in posting the two shutouts. Corr drove in five in the opener, and Fink matched that total in the second game. Yuengling and Spatzer each out-hit the entire Holy Cross line-up and scored eight total runs in the two games.

Solaida Mamsaang —The Bucknellian

Carol Gesler '93 prepares to defend the "hot corner."

To keep sharp as they awaited the tournament, Bucknell took on Drexel Tuesday and then St. Joseph's Wednesday. Neither Philly school could interrupt the Bison's roll and were swept. Drexel put up the stronger challenge as Bucknell had to come from behind in the second to win 4-3 in nine innings. The opener was a solid 4-2 victory.

St. Joe's was a pitchers' duel and 2-1 win for the Bison. Hoehn and Corr drove in Yuengling and Gesler in the fourth for the two Bucknell runs. Spatzer's throw nailed the potential tying run at the plate to help the Bison hold on for a come-from-behind 4-3 win.

This year's squad (24-6) is not only on the verge of securing the school's best record ever, but also a probable Patriot League title. Having come close their first year in the league and being sent home early last year, the Bison are hungry, getting good pitching and defense, and still hitting well. That combination could bring Bucknell its first women's championship off the track since changing leagues.

Athlete of the Week

Justin Zackey '94

Lacrosse standout Justin Zackey '94 is The Bucknellian's Athlete of the Week for the second time this semester.

The attackman continued his goal scoring rampage by racking up a total of 12 goals and three assists in two games this past week. He will likely find himself atop the NCAA goal scoring list when the statistics get updated this week. Zackey now has 52 goals on the season, more than any other player in Bucknell history.

Jimmy V succumbs to cancer at age 47

Former Bucknell, N.C. State basketball coach, ESPN commentator enlightened many

BY NEIL BARDACH
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Jim Valvano, who held the head men's basketball coaching job at Bucknell from 1972-75, died Wednesday after a year-long battle with bone cancer; he was 47. Valvano reached the pinnacle of his career in 1983, when he led the North Carolina State Wolfpack to an NCAA championship. Valvano finished his career with an overall record of 346-212 over 19 years.

Before he died, Valvano worked as a television analyst for college basketball for ABC and ESPN for three years. During the past year, however, his ability to work was hindered by his illness, which required him to receive treatment regularly at the Duke University Medical Center.

While Valvano was undergoing treatment, he developed a close friendship with Duke's head men's basketball coach, Mike Krzyzewski, who said after his death, "Jim was a dreamer, motivator, and a fighter." He added, "He did all those things to the last day."

Valvano played his college basketball career at Rutgers University, where he stayed on as an assistant coach for a year. At the age of 22, Valvano landed his first head coaching job with Johns Hopkins. He led them to a 10-9 record that year, the school's first winning season in 24 years.

After his short stint at Johns Hopkins, Valvano spent two years as an assistant at Connecticut before he took the head coaching job at Bucknell.

From Bucknell, Valvano moved back near his home in Queens before ending his coaching career at North Carolina State University.

Valvano ended his stint at Bucknell with a 33-42 record. And, while he achieved a winning record only once in three years at Bucknell, Valvano brought a sense of enthusiasm and pride to the program that had been lacking in years past.

Tommy Thompson, assistant basketball coach under Valvano and current head coach Charlie Woollum, remembered Valvano's close ties with his players, and his willingness to do things unexpected of a head coach.

"I remember before one of the last games [he coached at Bucknell]," said Thompson, "he made a promise to the kids before the game that he would do warm-ups with [them]. He was very enthusiastic, and a real good talker. He really brought the guys to life."

Thompson said of Valvano's stint at Bucknell, "You could tell he was looking to head for the big time, and Bucknell was probably just a stepping stone toward that."

The sports world was brought to its knees by the anguish caused by the illness of former basketball coach and broadcaster Jim Valvano, who died Wednesday afternoon after a long bout with bone cancer.

Thompson said of the last days of his life, "He really fought the battle this year, and he never gave up."

Brad Tufts, assistant athletics director, worked at Bucknell outside of the athletic department, but followed all of Bucknell sports closely, and he and his wife "got to know him and [his wife] Pam socially," and that professionally, "you sensed that he was someone who someday would be doing better things. There is no doubt that he put new life into Bucknell basketball."

Tufts also said that, although Valvano may have aspired to coach in the National Basketball Association sometime in his career, "he was great for college basketball."

> "Jim was a dreamer, motivator, and a fighter. He did all those things to the last day."
> Mike Krzyzewski, Duke Coach

Most of all, Tufts remembers that Valvano's enthusiasm was his greatest attribute. "His enthusiasm for the game was tremendous," he said. "It was the kind of enthusiasm that was infectious to his players and coaches, and whoever was around him."

Members of the college athletic community remembered Valvano yesterday. Rich Petriccione, athletic director at Iona and a student manager for three of Valvano's Iona teams, said, "He was the original guy who, for a lot of us, taught us how to dream and think big, then taught us to work hard to try and make it all happen."

John Wooden, former coach at UCLA, said of Valvano, "In all my years of teaching and working with young people, I've only made this statement about two players: They were born to coach. One was Denny Crum, when he played for me. The other was Jimmy Valvano, who was a freshman at Rutgers when I first met him at a basketball camp in the Poconos."

But, perhaps, best describing Valvano's long battle with cancer was Valvano himself. In 1973, he said, "...there can be, without a doubt, victory in defeat."

I always rooted for the Wolfpack (except when they played Maryland, of course), and I always tried my best to believe he was guilty of no wrongdoings in the wake of the investigation of his program. Despite his being forced out of Raleigh, Valvano still made the best of his situation. He kept his good humor and told himself he would become the best broadcaster he could, and after all, he still had his health. For a while, that is.

On June 15, 1992, Valvano was diagnosed with bone cancer. Being the optimistic person that I am, I assumed that if he didn't beat the illness, he would at least be around for several more years. Teaming with Dick Vitale on ESPN, Valvano had become one of the more entertaining and informative television personalities around.

Even as his illness worsened, his humor stayed the same. In his speech on ESPN's Espy Awards, Valvano made the audience laugh, then he made it cry. He told everyone who saw him on the street to "come up and give me a hug." Many did.

Shortly after the Espys, Valvano's airtime declined drastically. It was obvious that he was very sick. Then on Wednesday, I got the news—Jimmy V was dead at the age of 47. I was not really surprised because this day was inevitable, yet somehow the world of basketball—make that just the world—seems a little emptier.

Becky Tobin '95, who finished second in the indoor 800m, Gina Abraham '93 who has been a consistent scorer at leagues for four years, and newcomers Maria Ryan '96 and Aaryn Kay '96. Overall, the crew will have their hands full racing against an extremely talented field lead by All-American Lauren Gubicza of Fordham, but no doubt they will pull in many needed points.

Where else does the blazing blue look strong? Well how about in the jumps, where they are lead by two time defending high jump champion Dawn Ellery '94. Ellery has never lost in Patriot League competition and doesn't intend on starting now. Her friends that take to jumping in the sand instead of on the mat should fair well also. Look for outstanding performances from Kelly Peet '96, who won the indoor triple jump, and consistent sophomores Mary Clare Thompson and Tanya Barnes to shine.

On the subject of jumping, don't forget about the hurdles, where the Bison look to rake in many points. Right now in the 400 hurdles, Bridget Dean '95, Leah Johnson '95, and Beth Muehl '94 rank 2nd, 4th, and 6th, respectively. Dean is also ranks fifth in the 100 hurdles, but don't be deceived. There are only seven tenths of a second separating Dean from first in that race.

Bucknell has a secret weapon this year: it has throwers. Yes, for the first time in several years, the Bison should get a bunch of points in the field. Leading the way is Nadeau in the javelin, Kristen Overturf '96 in the discus, and Hinton in the shot put.

Saturday is Earth Day at Bucknell and the Lady Bison are looking to bury the rest of the Patriot League and leave them in their dust. So hug a tree, buy a T-shirt and then come out to Christy Mathewson Stadium to cheer the streakin' Bison to victory. Who knows, a win could bring President Sojka into the steeple chase water jump pit again.

Tennis finishes sixth at Patriot Leagues

JONATHAN BORDEAU
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Capping a season riddled with mixed results and sporadic displays of promising new talent, the Bison men's tennis team returned to Lewisburg with a mixed bag of results from the Patriot League Championships.

The third annual championship, hosted by the Lehigh Engineers at Bethlehem, PA this past weekend proved difficult for the Bison, as they finished in sixth place, edging out seventh-placed Fordham by half a point. Perennial powerhouse Army commanded the tournament, cruising to its second straight title and finishing 17 points ahead of second-placed host Lehigh. Navy, Colgate, and Lafayette also faired better than the Bison, finishing third, fourth, and fifth, respectively. "We had a very young team this season," commented Chris Rimpel '93. "Many of our players faced their first significant tournament action at the [Patriot] League Championships."

Young talent helped the Bison achieve their sixth-place finish. Playing singles and number one doubles with teammate Cris Stenstrom '94, Mark McGuire '95 was perhaps the best performer for Bucknell. Stenstrom and McGuire paired to advanced to the first doubles final before succumbing to Daman Wood and Marty Whalen of Army, 4-6, 5-7. In the consolation singles final, McGuire defeated David Bracken of Colgate, 9-7.

Other tournament matches saw the number three doubles tandem of Rick Zeoli '95 and Ray Crosta '96 lose to Josh Barr and Jeff Shiff of Lafayette, 8-9 in the consolation finals. In action on Monday, Rimpel was the only Bison singles player to win a first-round match, but he was beaten in the semifinals by Army's Whalen, the number two seed. Sophomore Marco Coen of Army took home tournament MVP honors, winning at second singles and second doubles. Senior Ryan Gelrod of host Lehigh earned the league crown at the number one singles position with a 6-4, 7-6 victory over Navy's Frank Bronson.

The Bison closed out the 1993 campaign with a rescheduled match on Tuesday at Bloomsburg. Unfortunately for Coach Bob Hammerlee, the Bison lost handily to Bloomsburg, 1-8, reducing their final season record to 6-7.

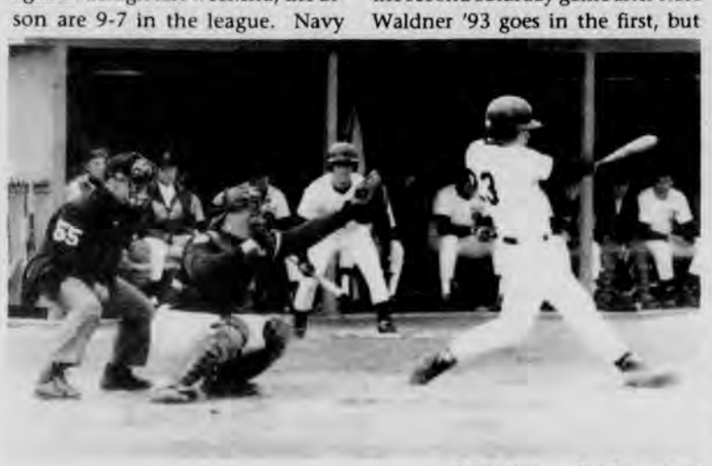
Looking ahead to next year's squad, the team's only senior, Rimpel, sees a brighter future. "Army will again have a shot at the top spot in the league; they should be strong," said Rimpel. "Lehigh graduated their top four singles players, so they might have a rebuilding year. As for our chances, Bucknell has plenty of talent with a year of league competition under everyones' belts. Coach [Hammerlee] has done a good job recruiting; all we need is two or three strong recruits, then we will have a shot at unseating Army."

Bison stay atop Southern Division

BY JON TERRY
Bucknellian Staff Writer

It was yet another up and down week for the Bucknell baseball team, but for the fourth week in a row the team escaped with the lead in the Southern Division of the Patriot League.

After being swept at Lafayette and then reversing their fortunes against Lehigh last weekend, the Bison are 9-7 in the league. Navy came up huge on Sunday by taking a pair from Lafayette, knocking the Leopards into third place at 8-8. Navy is just a half-game behind Bucknell at 10-9, while Lehigh is in fourth at 7-9. The tough Southern Division race will determine which squad will get to face Fordham, which has already clinched the Northern Division crown, for the conference championship.



Brian Sipes — The Bucknellian
Catcher/designated hitter Bryan Koch '95 swings for the fences in a game against Fordham earlier this season out at the mods.

Mike Kearns '93 was the hero of the first game of Sunday's twinbill. With the Bison trailing 2-0, the second baseman doubled down the leftfield line in the sixth inning, plating Larry Trout '93 and Charlie Griak '96 with the tying runs. Kearns would score the go-ahead run on a wild pitch later in the inning.

Jake Kazanjian '93 won his third game of the year by allowing only three hits—all of them singles—while striking out seven in seven innings. Kazanjian usually starts the second Saturday game after Kurt Waldner '93 goes in the first, but manager Gene Depew decided to break up his aces and let Kazanjian go in the first Sunday game. The decision paid off.

The second game was one of the wilder contests of the year. Bucknell jumped out to a 4-0 first-inning lead on RBI hits by Pete Gorski '96, who had three hits on the day in the third spot in the lineup, Steve Gyimesi '93, and Bryan Koch '95. Trout added a sac fly to cap the inning.

After the Bison scored twice more in the fourth to take a 6-2 lead, Lehigh put together a four-run inning of their own to tie the score against starter Dave Scranton '95. The lead was short-lived, however, as Bucknell immediately exploded for five in the bottom of the fifth. Kearns drove in two with a single, and Scott Sutfin '94, Gorski, and Gyimesi knocked in the other three with base knocks of their own.

Leading 12-7 after six innings, the Bison tried to avoid yet another come-from-ahead loss. It would not be easy, however. Brian Walter '94 was touched up for three runs on three hits and a couple of Trout errors, and the Engineers pulled to within 12-10. Kyle Morris '95 came in with one out and saved the day by retiring the last two batters in order. Walter ended up with his first win of the year, while Morris got his first save. For Lehigh, who entered the weekend right in the hunt for the division flag, the two days were a disaster. Prior to being swept by Bucknell, they lost two to Navy, 5-4 and 2-1, to fall out of the race.

The previous day was not as exciting, nor was it as productive. Just three weeks ago Waldner no-hit Lafayette in Lewisburg, but last Saturday in Easton the Leopards roughed him up for eight runs on 11 hits in six innings. Waldner, who was dealt his first Patriot League loss of the year, did not benefit from any defensive support whatsoever. The Bison committed five errors on the day, including four in a five-run fifth, as the bad guys prevailed, 8-2.

Sutfin and Dwight Steward '95 drove in the only runs of the game for Bucknell, which could only muster five hits against Lafayette starter Scott Werkhoven. Matt Sniegocki '93, who has raised his average to .269 after a miserable early-season slump, went three-for-three on the day.

In Saturday's nightcap, Denis Maguire '93 (1-4) allowed four runs in the first inning as Lafayette cruised to a 7-4 win. Andy Petrone's three-run homer was the big blow in the first frame, and Mike Mancia left the yard as well. After falling behind 7-0, the Bison made it interesting by plating four in the seventh, but they came up short. Gorski drove in two with a double in that inning, and Walter, Gyimesi, and Don Den Bleyker '94 also had RBIs.

On Tuesday the Bison played a non-conference affair against Mt. St. Mary's, who came to Lewisburg with a 6-18 record. Bucknell did its best to make sure it went home with loss number 19, and the result was an 8-6 triumph. After jumping out to a 5-0 lead against Morris, the visitors did what a 6-18 team generally does quite often—it blew it. Bucknell retaliated with six runs in the third. One of the heroes was reserve catcher Chad DeHart '96. Making just his third start of the year, DeHart tied a school record with four stolen bases in the game, including three of them in the six-run third. The last player to accomplish the feat was Ted Aceto in 1989. DeHart also had two hits and an RBI, while Sutfin got the Bison on the board with a two-run triple. Rob Glus '95 pitched three scoreless innings in relief to improve his record to 2-1.

Unfortunately for Sutfin and the rest of the team, the shortstop injured his right index finger sliding into second base. Sutfin has been the most consistent hitter on the club this year. His .344 average is tops among the regulars, and his 25 runs scored is also a team-high. His nine steals are second only to Kearns (10), and after a shaky start, his defense has picked up quite a bit. Look for Walter and possibly Anthony Tobia '95 to fill in at short.

This will be yet another important weekend for Bucknell as it takes on a couple of Northern Division opponents. Today the Bison will be at West Point to make up a doubleheader that was washed out earlier this spring. Then tomorrow the team will continue northbound to take on cellar-dwelling Colgate. The team will play its last regular-season home game of the year on Tuesday against West Chester. That will be followed by a double dip the next day at Cornell. Two good days this weekend will prevent the Cornell games from ending the season.

Bucknell has won three of four against Navy this year, so it would advance if the two teams are tied at the end of the year. The Bison would not advance if tied with Lafayette due to the same logic.

Laxmen rout Marist, nipped by 'Gate

BY DARREN MILLMAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

You know the old expression, "Nothing in life is certain except for death and taxes." Well, it has recently been amended so that it now reads, "Nothing in life is certain except for death, taxes, and Justin Zackey '94." Zackey continued on his torrid goal scoring rampage this week, tallying a total of 12 goals and three assists in the Bison laxmen's two contests.

Prior to the past two games, Zackey ranked third in the nation in goals-per-game, and ninth in the country in points-per-game. Although the official statistics will not be updated until Monday, in all likelihood the junior attackman will rank as the top goal producer in college lacrosse, and fourth in total points. To illustrate just how spectacular Zackey has been this season, consider the fact that his current season total of 52 goals is better than any player in Bucknell history, and there are still three games left on the schedule.

On Sunday, the Bison visited the much improved 7-1 Red Raiders of Colgate in what promised to be a classic Patriot League battle. The game certainly lived up to its pregame billing with the lead changing from one team to the other four times during the 60 minutes.

After holding a two-goal advantage midway through the third quarter, Bucknell was unable to deliver the knockout punch to put Colgate away. Before the quarter ended, Colgate's outstanding attackmen Derek Laub found the back of the net with a pair of goals, and the score stood at 9-9 going into the final 15 minutes of play.

With the momentum in their favor, the Red Raiders scored the first two goals of the fourth quarter before Zackey answered with one of his seven goals on the day to bring the score to 11-10 Colgate with four minutes left in the game. Ricky Herrema '93, who excelled all day, won the ensuing face-off and charged towards the Colgate net. Recalling the play, Snyder remarked, "Ricky Herrema was a sick man. He won that face-off and then stuck the game tying goal with a high heater on the goalie's stick side."

Before the Red Raiders could recover, Herrema again controlled the face-off and the Bison set up for what would be their final offensive series of the day. After eluding his man, Zackey found himself face to face with the Colgate goaltender looking for the game-winning goal which would also give him the Bucknell record for goals in a game with eight. In what was probably the only thing which saved the Colgate goalie from needing intense therapy to exorcise the Zackey demons which would have kept haunting his dreams, the goaltender stoned the Bison attackman in his final attempt with just over a minute left in regulation.

At the other end of the field, Colgate's Laub picked up a loose ball behind the cage and drove around to the front of the net before sticking the game winner over Bison the shoulder of Bison goaltender Matt Wojnovich '94. With only 30 seconds left on the clock, the Bison were unable to get off another shot and the game ended 12-11 in favor of Colgate.

Had it not been for the game programs, spectators who attended Tuesday's home game would have certainly been convinced they were witnessing the Bison take on Lewisburg Junior High. Actually, the opposing team was Marist, and for you trivia buffs, they call themselves the Red Foxes.

Bucknell embarrassed the visiting team, scoring 21 goals to the opponents three before the game came to a merciful end. Although I won't waste paper listing all those who tallied points in this one, an astounding 15 players found their way into the Bison stat book.

Just a couple words of note: goalie Dan Whalen '96 saw his first varsity action playing the entire second half. In two quarters of play, Whalen recorded nine saves while allowing only one goal. Streelman had a team season high for assists in a game with seven, while Zackey added five goals and three assists.

Unfortunately for the 5-7 Bison, it is that time of year when the old sports cliché "playing for pride" is fairly applicable. For those of you not familiar with that cliché, it essential means, "We still have games scheduled, so I guess we've got to play them."

Lady Bison drop final three

BUCKNELLIAN TEAM CORRESPONDENT

For your average Bucknellian, the weekend is a time to relax after a tough week of classes. For the women's lacrosse team, last weekend was just the opposite. On Saturday, the Bison met with Drexel in Philadelphia and, without skipping a beat, moved on to Long Island to play Hofstra the following afternoon. This tough and disappointing weekend ended with the Bison returning home twice defeated.

Facing fifteenth-ranked Drexel, Bucknell was confident that they could give them a contest. Both teams started out strong, with Bucknell netting the first point of the contest early in the first half. The first 30 minutes of the game consisted of fairly equal play at both ends of the field. Bucknell defender Laura Hagan '96 played a terrific game, coming up with loose balls and blocking Drexel passes in the midfield.

The Bison attack was on fire as Drexel's ten points were followed closely by Bucknell's six. Jen Kangas '95, Leigh Owens '95, Tricia Way '94, and defender Jenny Corrigan '94 scored for the Bison in the first half. Unfortunately, the second half was not the same. Drexel's defense held the Bison to just one goal, while the Drexel attack scored nine.

The second game of the weekend, against Hofstra, was much like the disappointing results of the first contest. Once again, the game was close at the half, tied at 7-7. However, after halftime the Bison fell apart once again. The Hofstra attack netted six goals to the Bison's two.

"We lost it on turnovers," said Tracy Meerworth '96, who scored three times against Hofstra. Kangas had a spectacular game with six of the nine goals, but her effort was not enough to pull the Bison out of their turnover-induced hole.

After a two-day break from competition, the Bison met UMBC Wednesday in their final contest of the season. Alison Arth '93 and Jen Hayes '93 ran onto the field on Wednesday for the final game of their Bucknell careers. Bucknell was determined to end their season with a win and a record of 4-9. Their ambitions, however, were met with discouraging results.

The Bison started off hot, leaping to a 4-2 advantage. UMBC, however, came back, tying the Bison at the half. Owens and Meerworth netted four points apiece, Way added two, and Lisa Young '95 and Tracy Freeman '95 each contributed one goal.

The second half of the game continued with a virtual goal-for-goal tradeoff, but UMBC ended with one more goal than Bucknell.

At season's end, the Bison are 3-10 with wins over Lafayette, East Stroudsburg, and Georgetown. Young had a spectacular season tallying 26 goals and four assists, ranking her eighth on the career scoring list for Bucknell.

Navy, Fordham, Bucknell, and Lehigh (in that order), but each gap is greater than 15 seconds. So, it's anybody's race.

The field events will test Fawcett and crew as the academies and coal region schools (Lehigh & Lafayette) have recorded some impressive marks this spring. The high jump and javelin responsibilities will fall to Fawcett, who threw nearly 200' at Penn Relays last week. Brian Preputnik '96 and John Plante '94 could sneak in on some high jump points with outstanding performances. The long and triple jumpers are within inches of cracking the top ranks. Loges and Brian Dreschler '95 represent the Orange and Blue hope in the former. Karim Abdul-Matin '96 has been Bucknell's best triple jumper this spring and could place among the top four. The pole vaulters to watch for Bucknell are Brett Karcher '93, Eric Wertz '96, and Steve Warakomski '94.

The weight events are in the hands of Sam Bijelic '94, Pete Gregory '93, Erik Steiler '96, and Jim Heizman '96. Bijelic will compete in the hammer and shot put, while Heizman does the hammer and discus. Steiler will put the shot and Gregory will toss the discus.

On paper, this meet seems like a runaway for the two academies and then a dogfight for the third through seventh slots. But Gulden, anxious and excited, feels optimistic about the entire event. "It will be the best track meet that's ever been held here and maybe will be for a long time," stated Gulden.

"If they cooperate and don't do anything like run sound checks during competition Friday afternoon and early evening, there won't be any problems," said Gulden "But, the physical plant people will work all night to get the stadium ready. It could be a mess if they disturb competition."

The academies have disturbed Bucknell's stranglehold on the Patriot League track world and will likely run off with the top spots. But, the Bison have welcomed previous challengers and met them head on. They'll have to take it to that fabled "higher level" to slip by Army and/or Navy and re-capture the crown they wore two years ago.

THE BUCKNELLIAN

All that jazz... and much more

BY NICOLE COBBAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

As the campus winds down the semester with the prospect of dead week and finals, the Bucknell Dance Company is gearing up for action. The group presents its annual spring concert tonight and tomorrow night at 8 p.m. in the Weis Center for Performing Arts. Tickets are $4 and available through the Weis Center Box Office.

The show culminates nine weeks of rehearsal for the company, and displays a wide spectrum of dancing, ranging from modern jazz to traditional Chinese folk. "We strive for eclecticism in our concerts," said Danna Frangione, associate professor of dance.

The concert features several highlights, including three pieces by guest choreographers. Award-winning Chinese choreographer Kwok Hiu Wah set a piece on the company titled "Waiting." Set in the tradition of Chinese folk dancing, "Waiting" narrates the story of two women whose husbands have left to find work, and their fantasy that they have returned home. The practice of leaving to find employment, said Wah, is common in China where living conditions are poor and husbands often travel thou-

Nobel winner gives speech

BY JOHN GODBOUT
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Nobel Prize-winning economist Lawrence Klein shared his views on President Bill Clinton's first 100 days in office in honor of the retirement of his former student, Balwant Singh, now a professor of management at Bucknell.

Speaking to a packed audience in the Elaine Langone Center Forum on Wednesday night, Klein began with a brief testimony to Professor Singh, but focused primarily on present economic conditions in the U.S., both commending and criticizing the new Administration for actions taken and issues neglected.

Although noting that "there is really nothing magical about [the first hundred days of a new administration]," Klein noted that "it is still an interesting time to study," because we can begin to see the underlying philosophy of the administration.

In comparing Republican economic and social policies of the 80s to what he predicts in the next four years, Klein remarked that the Clinton Administration is "trying to be active and intervening" after a decade in which the leaders allowed the "magic of the market work through deregulation and reduction of social programs."

Klein also discussed a trend in the country in the last 20 years, in which time the income distribution has become increasingly unequal. Although most candidates and politicians shy away from discussions of income and wealth distribution, Klein predicted that "the new Administration wants to... erase this move toward inequality in the United States."

In discussing Clinton's recently defeated economic stimulus proposal, Klein said the proposal was in general to help the economy recover from the recession that began in June of 1990. First proposed in Clinton's Futting People First publication, the proposal has been amended extensively since Clinton took office in January.

Topping to deliver lecture

BY SUSAN SMITH
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Seymour Topping, director of editorial development for The New York Times Company, understands that "Americans have become more intent upon finding solutions to the dysfunctioning of their society." On Monday, May 10 at 8 p.m. in Bucknell Hall he will address the future of newspapers and how he feels they "are being presented with a historic opportunity to enhance their role in American life."

As the former President of the American Society of Newspapers, Topping encouraged his colleagues to examine what their readers sought and to adjust to these changing needs. "Television may be the prime source for breaking spot news, but no medium is better equipped than newspapers for analysis and serious discussion of the rectification of our society," said Topping.

Newspapers need to learn more about who makes up the general population, however, before they can correctly revamp the content of their pages. "I hazard that most editors know their traditional readers extremely well, but unfortunately, many editors are not fully aware of the interests and aspirations of the non-readers in their circulation area," said Topping.

Topping cited blacks, Asians, and Hispanics as three groups that newspapers do not typically address, but should and easily could. Women, who have recently been drifting away from newspapers in large numbers, are another group left untapped, as are the millions of immigrants whom "newspapers by tradition have served to bring into our democratic mainstream."

"One remedial measure is likely to be the hiring of more minorities and women to help in revitalizing content," said Topping. In the past such an opportunity has not been available to these groups, thus exacerbating newspapers' image problems.

Topping applauded newspaper groups which have delved into the future by testing information presenting by fax or computer, but stressed that with all media, "quality will determine what choices are made in the Nineties."

As director of editorial development, Topping oversees the company's 24 dailies and eight weeklies. A former managing editor of The New York Times, Topping has also worked as a foreign correspondent in China, Vietnam, London, and Europe for 13 years before joining The Times as metropolitan reporter and then chief correspondent of Moscow and Southeast Asia.

Most recently, he was appointed professor at Columbia University's Graduate School of Journalism and named administrator of the Pulitzer Prizes.

Topping resides in New York City with his wife, Audrey Ronning Topping, a photojournalist who specializes in Asia.

Ed Dadez to become honorary KDR member

BY MARIA GLOD
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Edward Dadez, Greek advisor for the Interfraternity Council and associate dean of student life, will be initiated as an honorary member of Kappa Delta Rho Fraternity (KDR) on Tuesday.

According to KDR president, Peter Doherty '94, the fraternity offered the bid to Dadez because of the integral role he played in the chapter's 1986 recolonization.

"The chapter recognizes that without Ed's assistance our recolonization would not have been possible," said Doherty. "After all he's done for our chapter we felt that it was more than fitting to extend honorary status to him," he said.

"I don't think [KDR] would feel they would get anything extra."
—Edward Dadez, Greek advisor

Although some members of the campus community question the degree to which Dadez will be able to retain his objectively as Greek advisor, Dadez said his new association with KDR will not effect his ability to serve as Greek advisor. "I think I can continue to remain objective in my position," said Dadez.

Alleged harasser under investigation

Man identified by five students claiming sexual harassment

BY TARA GILLIGAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

An investigation is still pending in the case of a local man who allegedly harassed five Bucknell students in a series of separate incidents between February and mid-April.

According to Barry Hosterman, chief of the East Buffalo Police Department (EBPD), five students positively identified the individual, whose name will not be released until charges have been filed. One other student also participated in the investigation but could not provide a positive identification.

The man in question was allegedly involved in five separate incidents of sexual harassment. "Primarily they were in the area of Smoketown Road and Stein Road," said Hosterman.

Hosterman said he expects EBPD to file charges soon, possibly within the next week. The investigation will not be closed until then, he said.

If the case reaches court, the five women will be asked to testify, said Hosterman.

He described the subject of the investigation as a white, heavy-set male with brown straight hair and glasses. The alleged harrasser drove a blue pick-up truck during the incidents, he said.

Disorderly student taken from concert

BY JOHN GODBOUT
Bucknellian Staff Writer

A Bucknell student caught sneaking into the Indigo Girls concert last Friday was apprehended by a Public Safety officer and cited by the East Buffalo Township Police for disorderly conduct.

Jonathan Weller '93 was spotted by concert security climbing over the wall of the stadium, and refused to leave when directed to do so by Public Safety Officer G. Christopher Plafcan.

According to Plafcan, Weller was drunk and defiant, and required the assistance of concert security personnel to handcuff and escort him from the stadium.

"I'm embarrassed about the incident, and I apologize to everyone who was inconvenienced by my inexcusable behavior," said Weller. "I hope to resolve the incident as quickly, and with as little trouble, as possible."

In addition to the East Buffalo citation, Weller is expected to face internal charges from the Dean of Students office.

Student severely injured in assault in dorm

BY TARA GILLIGAN
Bucknellian News Writer

The victim of an assault which occurred Saturday in Harris hall is undergoing extensive reconstructive surgery in a New York hospital, according to Donald Heiter, chief of the Lewisburg Police Department (LPD).

The individual, identified by Heiter as James Crane '96, was released from Evangelical Community Hospital Sunday and was transferred to Mount Siani hospital where he is being treated for severe injuries "to the face and to the head," said Heiter.

Robert Bird '96 and Michael Phillips '96 face external and internal charges following the incident in which they allegedly broke the window of the room below theirs in Harris hall and then later assaulted the residents of that room. No charges have yet been filed.

The LPD learned of the incident from an employee of the hospital who reported it because of the severity of the injuries.

Heiter said that initially the victims of the assault did not want to call the police into the action. The hospital employee overheard the students talking about retalliation, Heiter said.

According to one incident report, Officer Kersetter of the LPD notified the Office of Public Safety of the report from the hospital. The report stated that "the victim... had been in for treatment of head injuries. These injuries included, but [were] not limited to, fractures of several bones within the facial area."

One other report indicated that a student had been treated at the hospital for a deep bruise in his back. Heiter said he was not aware of any student besides Crane who required hospital care.

Sergeant James Middleton of LPD has been assisting the University in its investigation, said Heiter. The investigation is still in process, but according to initial reports, Bird and Phillips allegedly broke the window of the room inhabited by Crane and J. Erik Schmidt.

Crane and Schmidt are reported to have been in their room listening to music when the panes broke.

The two roommates, along with two friends, confronted the Bird and Phillips, asking them if and why they had broken the windows, to which the response was, according to their testimony: "They said 'because you irritate us' and 'do you have a problem with us?' We said no, we just wanted to know about the broken window."

They went on to claim that Bird and Phillips then "rushed us... All four of us were hit, and about ten guys, at the most ten guys, chased us down the hall."

Heiter said that he could not predict when charges would be filed and said that the officers conducting the investigation had not yet been in touch with Crane. The officer were able to get a hold of Crane's father.

Crane and his father have not yet decided whether they will file charges for simple or aggravated assault, said Heiter.

None of the students involved in the incident could be reached for comment. Vince DeCerchio, director of Public Safety, and John Dunlop, dean of students, were also unavailable for comment.

PUBLIC SAFETY LOG

Wednesday, April 28

At 4:50 p.m., a University student reported being the victim of a theft. It was reported that his wallet was removed from the soccer locker room in the fieldhouse. Victim's locker was unlocked at the time of the theft.

Friday, April 30

At 1:04 a.m., a University student residing in Vedder Hall reported that her window had just been broken by unknown person(s) who had thrown stones at her window. Public Safety officers responded but could not locate the perpetrators.

At 9:03 p.m., a Public Safety officer was requested by a concert security officer to assist with an intoxicated individual who had illegally gained access into the stadium for the Indigo Girls concert. The officer advised the individual, a University student, that he would have to leave, and get in line like everyone else. He refused and was subsequently taken into custody and charged with disorderly conduct by an East Buffalo Township police officer.

A Public Safety officer responded to Swartz Hall on the report of an act of vandalism. Upon arrival, it was discovered that an unidentified male individual had caused damage to a bathroom stall door and left the scene. The reporting party could provide no description of this individual.

Saturday, May 1

At 2:12 a.m., a Public Safety officer responded to the academic quad area on the report of vandalism. It was discovered that unknown person(s) had uprooted a cherry tree. A Work order was filed to replant tree.

At 3:07 a.m., Public Safety officers responded to Swartz Hall on the report of a fire alarm activation. Upon arrival, it was discovered that unknown person(s) had expended a fire extinguisher for no apparent reason.

At 1:45 a.m., Public Safety officers responded to the Sigma Chi fraternity for a reported fight in progress. Upon arrival, the alleged fight had ended and it was reported to the officers that there may have been one injured student who could not be located. After further investigation, it was ascertained that the injured student was taken to the hospital by a friend where he was treated for a head laceration and released. Victim did not wish to press charges and the investigation is suspended.

At 3:30 p.m., a Public Safety officer responded to the practice football field just north of the stadium for a reported injury and damage to a vehicle. Upon arrival, it was discovered that a football player had caused damage to a parked car while being tackled. Owners of car notified and player treated at scene for a possible fractured hand.

At 10:47 a.m., a University student reported being the victim of a theft. A Public Safety officer responded to Carey House and discovered that unknown person(s) had entered a first floor room by way of an unlocked window and did remove various items resulting in the loss of more than $145.

At 11:25 a.m., Public Safety officers responded to Swartz field on the report of an injured student. Upon arrival, it was determined that a University student had injured her foot while playing mud volleyball. The student was transported to the hospital via ambulance for treatment.

At 12:45 p.m., a University employee reported that the license plate from a University vehicle had been removed while parked by the stadium.

At 9:21 p.m., Public Safety officers responded to the rear of the Sigma Chi fraternity on the report of a fall victim. Upon arrival, it was discovered that a University student had fallen off of a set of bleachers and sustained injuries to her knee and temple area. Victim was unconscious at the time of the officers arrival and was transported to the hospital where she was treated for a concussion and held for observation. Victim was discovered to be intoxicated and charges in relation tu underage drinking pending.

At 10 p.m., the Department of Public Safety was notified of an act of vandalism and an assault that had occurred at Harris Hall. A Public Safety officer responded and discovered that the incidents were a result of a dispute between occupants of two rooms that are above and below each other.

At 1:19 a.m., Public Safety officers responded to Harris Hall on the report of a fire alarm activation. Upon arrival, it was discovered that unknown person(s) had expended two fire extinguishers for no reason.

Sunday, May 2

At 2:34 p.m., a University student reported injuring herself while evacuating Kress Hall during a fire alarm. Victim was transported to the hospital via ambulance for the treatment of a knee injury.

At 5:33 p.m., a Public Safety officer responded to Carey house on the report of an injured student. Victim reported to the officer that he had cut his hand while punching a window. Victim was transported to the hospital via ambulance.

While at Carey House investigating the above incident, a Public Safety officer noticed a sign that was stolen from the golf course on or about 10/20/91. This sign was just one of many items removed from the golf course at that time resulting in a loss of $3,330.00.

At 7:26 p.m., a Public Safety officer responded to Trax Hall on the report of an injured student. Upon arrival, it was discovered that a University student had injured his right index finger while lifting weights at Davis Gym. Victim was transported to the hospital via a Student Health Service driver.

A Lewisburg Police officer notified the Department of Public Safety that there was a University student being treated at the hospital after being the victim of an alleged assault. Investigation continuing.

At 1:45 a.m., a Public Safety Officer noticed a suspicious individual standing near Hunt Hall. The individual was put under seen walking through the freshman quad and then north on 6th Street. The Public Safety officer then stopped this individual in order to obtain identification. It was then discovered that this individual had been banned from campus property as a result of his involvement in an incident on 1/15/92.

Monday, May 3

At 1:04 a.m., a Public Safety officer responded to the Gateway area on the report of an act of vandalism. Upon arrival, it was discovered that unknown person(s) had up-dumped a dumpster and fled the scene.

At 4:43 p.m., Public Safety officers responded to Vedder Hall on the report of a student in need of medical attention. An ambulance was summoned and transported victim to the hospital for treatment.

At 5 a.m., a Public Safety student worker reported that a lamp shade located on Swartz field had been damaged. It was discovered that unknown person(s) had shot out the light with a BB gun.

At 3:35 p.m., a Public Safety officer responded to the Bertrand Library on the report of a theft that had just occurred. Upon investigation, it was discovered that a University student had left his bookbag containing his wallet unattended for a short period of time, and upon his return, discovered that his wallet and contents were missing. A search of the area was conducted in attempt to locate two females who were seen leaving the area of the theft upon the victims' return. This search met with negative results.

Wednesday, May 5

A University student residing in the Gateways reported being the victim of harassing telephone calls. Investigation continuing.

At 9:30 a.m., a University employee reported the theft of an answering machine. The answering machine, valued at $180, was removed from a room located in the basement of Vedder Hall. Investigation is continuing.

At 9:40 a.m., a University employee from the Bertrand Library reported that unknown person(s) had intentionally altered computer information in two computers in the library. These acts resulted in the computers being non-functional until restored. Investigation is continuing.

People of the Year

Each year, The Bucknellian selects two or more members of the campus community as special honorees. The individuals profiled below have distinguished themselves in the specific branches of the University they serve. Each of the recipients has improved the University community through unique and substantive change. Bucknell wouldn't be the same without them.

Alem Asres

MARIA GLOD
Bucknellian Staff Writer

"Slowly, slowly an egg can fly. If you nurture it the egg can become a chick and the chick can become a bird," said Alem Asres, director of multicultural affairs. "There is a change taking place in the cultural environment on campus, you just can't see it overnight."

Through his unwavering dedication to facilitate communication and understanding among various groups and to implement a broad spectrum of multicultural programing, Asres has brought a much needed awareness to our campus. "Before he came the effect of the multicultural center on campus was marginalized. He brought awareness of the existence of different cultural groups to the campus at large," said Terence Riley '94, polemarch of Kappa Alpha Psi Fraternity, Inc.

When Asres began his career at Bucknell in 1991, the campus was severely lacking in cultural diversity and awareness. "When I first came to Bucknell, multiculturalism seemed to be equated with them, them being all people of color. It has been an upward struggle to get that multiculturalism for them attitude to say that multiculturalism is for all of us," said Asres.

Solaida Mamsaang—The Bucknellian

Born and raised in Ethiopia, Asres first came to the United States in the early '60s during a period when the civil rights movement was in full force. "Working with African Americans and Americans of good will against discrimination has strengthened my own philosophy of working against racism," he said.

Asres was granted a bachelor of arts degree in political science with an emphasis in international relations at the University of Maryland. He then went on to receive a masters degree in urban sociology at Howard University. Asres then returned to the University of Maryland, where he earned his doctorate. Throughout his academic career, Asres had to overcome obstacles brought on by the lack of cultural acceptance in our society. "While at school my own experiences with discrimination because of my color strengthened my resolve to fight racism," said Asres.

Asres was attracted to Bucknell because of the University's mission statement which asserts that students are the foundation of the future. "The word 'citizen' is loaded with so much meaning to me; to be a citizen means to be comfortable enough in any environment to convey the wishes of ones own people and be a connecting bridge among various cultures," he said.

Beginning his position as director of multicultural affairs, Asres first set out to have all students "see my office as their office." Asres has been instrumental in the creation of groups such as Students for Asian Awareness at Bucknell (SAAB), the Pakastani-Indian Association (PIA) and Greeks for the Advancement of Multicultural Enrichment (GAME). Asres has also implemented such programs as the mentor program and the multicultural advisory board.

Asres has gained the respect of diverse segments of the campus community. "He is always willing to talk to students," said Ketan Majmudar '95, president of PIA. "This is the first time that most students are aware of multicultural issues."

"We must reach out to every sector of the community and find ways to work together," said Alem. The multicultural advisory board seeks to do just this. "The advisory board allows students to come together to share ideas and concepts so they can work together," said Majmudar. Asres has "extended the reach of the multicultural center to more than just addressing the concerns of the African American community," said Riley.

Asres said he believes that the perpetuation of negative stereotypes is the result of a lack of communication among cultural groups. "We will continue to stereotype people if we have no close contact or connection," said Alem. "Stereotyping builds an invisible wall that keeps you in as well as keeping other people out."

"The tension on campus between various groups must be broken not by forcing the concepts of right and wrong but by pointing out mutual benefits," said Asres. Asres said he views multiculturalism as the key to removing racial stereotypes because it aims to increase awareness of the customs and philosophies of all cultures. As human beings we have many things in common, said Asres, and our differences should not cause us to put each other down. "Cultural differences must remain but the prejudices based on these differences must go," he said.

Asres said he believes people cannot fully appreciate their own culture without having an open mind to the workings of other cultures. "Learning about other cultures is the strongest tool to help you understand your own culture," said Asres.

According to Asres, ever-advancing technology has made it increasingly important for students to be open to ideas of other cultures. "Our graduates are going to inherit a world completely different than the one their parents live in, and we have to provide them with the tools and skills they need to negotiate and work in a world that is so diverse," said Asres. Because the United States is ethnically diverse, multiculturalism is a movement toward national unity that validates the principles of our democratic system, he said. "We must appreciate the diversity this country brings us," said Asres. He designed the mentor program to aid students in making the transition from life at Bucknell to life in the "real" world. This program pairs students with professionals who have realized the career goals set by these students. Karen Taylor '94, a biology major, was paired with Dr. Jackie Cooke '77. "I think it is a very good program that can benefit many students on campus," said Taylor.

Despite the on-going success of many muticultural programs, Asres said he has on occasion met with frustration. "Sometimes people do not know what I am doing or why I am doing it and they become very critical," he said. Although much progress that has already been made, Asres said he would like to see awareness and diversity on campus continue to increase. These changes, he said, should involve both an increasing enrollment of minority and international students and changes in the curriculum to include the accomplishments of all peoples. "If we succeed in including all American citizens into our curriculum our campus environment will, by definition, attract everyone," said Asres.

Asres said that he hopes Bucknell can create a campus environment "where every ethnic group and every race can be comfortable and proud and tell the world how beautiful this place has been." "Individuals are like pieces of a puzzle," said Asres, "when you put them together they form a mosaic of beautiful color."

Amanda Swarr and Joel Wainwright

DEB MANASSE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Chosen as this year's student People of the Year, Amanda Swarr and Joel Wainwright have made considerable strides toward challenging the apathy so often associated with the typical Bucknellian. And, while their peers may or may not agree with the specifics of their ideology, it is difficult to take issue with either their dedication or their tireless efforts to work toward the creation of a Bucknell community which embraces, as Swarr put it "the inclusivity of all people."

"What we are doing is not new," said Swarr. "We are just continuing to challenge what happens at Bucknell."

For Swarr and Wainwright, such challenging means constantly struggling against the tide of the status quo at Bucknell, to bring issues such as homophobia, environmentalism, feminism, racism, and animal rights to the forefront of the minds of Bucknell's traditionally conservative population.

"Someone needs to have an impact here, and we are filling that void," said Swarr. "Of course," she added, "we are certainly not filling it alone."

According to Swarr, the majority of her efforts are focused on the issues of feminism and of Lesbian, Gay and Bisexual rights.

"As I awakened to feminism I realized how much sexism and heterosexism had affected me as well as other people who went against the status quo," said Swarr. "I wanted to fight against these oppressions in any way I could."

Wainwright said that he sees his primary issue as the environment. "I share the same vision as Amanda — inclusivity," said Wainwright. "But my role is a little different than Amanda's, foremost because I'm a white man, and that means I'm not a part of any oppressed group."

Wainwright said that for this reason he feels that he can not speak out adequately about the issues of racism or sexism. According to Wainwright, the issue of environmentalism is not fraught with the same kinds of limitations. "I'm as much of an earthling as everyone else," he said.

Nonetheless, although both Swarr and Wainwright have dedicated themselves to specific causes, both maintain that such a targeted focus is actually just a means of getting at the larger issues they feel must be addressed.

"The oppression of women, animals, et cetera are all interconnected, and we are just looking at different ways to come at it," said Wainwright.

Heather Jobson—The Bucknellian

According to Wainwright, his position of being a white upperclass male means more than simply being less qualified to speak directly on issues like racism and sexism. For him, it also means having the rare opportunity to become involved in the kinds of activism he pursues.

"The fact that I am able to do the things I do is a privilege," said Wainwright. "If I were an African-American woman for example, and I had to deal with the hangups involved with racism and sexism, I wouldn't have the energy at the end of the day to do these things."

Such a scenario is difficult to imagine, however, for anyone who has witnessed either student's unbounding energy and determination.

Among their projects this year has been a protest against John Sununu's visit to campus. In response to his campus lecture, the two formed a group called "Bucknellians Against Apathy." Although the group consisted only of the two of them, its effect was felt by many. People attending Sununu's lecture were handed flyers containing excerpts from New York Times articles detailing Sununu's use of government funds for private business ventures.

Swarr and Wainwright have also been very involved with the Organization for United Ecology (OUE), and were the two students arrested during a demonstration held in Harrisburg protesting the proposed plan by Susquehanna River U.S. Pollution Control, Inc. (USPCI) to construct a hazardous waste incinerator in Union County.

"We wanted to symbolically shut down the DER, and we did," said Swarr. "The sentiment of the group is to do whatever it takes to stop construction of the incinerator.

Heather Jobson—The Bucknellian

"We will go to whatever non-violent lengths which are necessary to stop the burner," said Wainwright at the time of the demonstration.

Just two weeks ago, Swarr and Wainwright organized a protest at the Lewisburg McDonald's as part of a national "Beyond Beef" campaign, the goal of which is to persuade McDonald's to offer a "veggie-burger" consisting of potatoes and other organic foods as an alternative to eating meat. Swarr said that the purpose of the demonstration was to "change people's attitudes about consuming flesh."

"We got kicked off the property less than a half hour after we got outside," said Wainwright. "Now we are getting press about it, and people are calling me about it."

Also, Swarr and Wainwright recently recruited Bucknell students for the Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual Rights March held in Washington, D.C. "It's all about overcoming stereotypes, especially in terms of homophobia and sexism," said Swarr.

Swarr has been very involved in getting a Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual Resource List printed and sent to all students on campus and with organizing a Lesbian, Bisexual Questioning Group which meets weekly to discuss questions of sexual orientation. Swarr was also involved with organizing a "coming out of the closet" panel during Earth Week.

"The panel involved both students and members of the community," said Swarr. "The idea was to make a presence of people sharing their coming-out stories."

However, despite all the success stories, Wainwright stresses that there have been failures as well.

"We joined the Committee on Complementary Activities with the intention of taking ideas to the level of the administration and came away disenfranchised with the idea of changing things within the system," said Wainwright. "It was a great opportunity to see the difference between working outside the system and working within the administration."

Wainwright also points to his failed attempts to convince the biology department to allow non-majors who are morally opposed to animal dissection to make alternate arrangements for the dissection portion of their labs, as one of the year's major disappointments.

"They have refused to call a meeting to meet with me," said Wainwright. "Many of the professors do research regularly with animals. I am challenging the way they conceive of biology."

Challenging conventional ideas has become a way of life for Swarr and Wainwright. "We approach our education here in a different way from most students," said Swarr. "It is our education to change Bucknell."

"Even the failures have been successes," said Swarr. What we are doing is so different from what the majority of Bucknellians are doing."

Swarr described a perfect example of a "positive failure" as the desecrating of signs hung by Feminist Outreach which described hypothetical situations of male and female roles being reversed.

"People are threatened," said Swarr. "Some people see that as a complete failure, but I think of it as a success too; it made somebody think."

"Hopefully by the time we leave we will have had an impact on individual attitudes," said Swarr. "On a realistic level that is all we are trying to do."

"You kind of have to stir things up," said Wainwright. "I think we've succeeded in doing that."

Cavell holds two lectures in forum

Jean Auro—The Bucknellian

Stanley Cavell, Walter M. Cabot Professor of Aesthetics and General Theory of Value at Harvard University, delivered the first of his two public lectures this past Tuesday evening to a packed house in the Elaine Langone Center Forum. The final visiting scholar in the six-year series of Mellon Lectures in Literary Theory, Cavell's intensive three-day visit at Bucknell included, in addition to the two public lectures, attending three classes in the philosophy and English departments, an open question-and-answer session with students, and a seminar on his first lecture and other issues concerning his work. Michael Payne, professor of English and a former student of Cavell's, noted that "of all the scholars who have come to Bucknell in the Mellon series, Stanley Cavell has been the most giving" of his time, intellect, and attention to both faculty and students. Cavell's visit will culminate in the last published volume in the Bucknell Lectures in Literary Theory, a series edited by Payne and Associate Professor of English Harold Schwietzer.

Klein addressed the debate surrounding increased spending on the infrastructure of the country, which Clinton believes will have a "multiplier effect" on the economy, making both the public and private sectors more efficient. According to his calculations, the effect of Clinton's stimulus package on the multiplier effect is "quite significant - it increases it anywhere from 20 to 40 percent," said Klein.

Defending accusations that Clinton policies follow the tax-and-spend policies of most of Clinton's Democratic predecessors since Franklin Roosevelt (with the exception of President Kennedy,) Klein argued that "in the 80s we didn't tax and spend, but we borrowed and spent."

In criticizing the new President, Klein said "Frankly, I think that some of the programs of the Clinton Administration are too complicated."

He feels that Clinton's proposed BTU tax would have better success in Congress if it were proposed as an excise tax, where consumers would pay increased taxes at the gas pump. Clinton "can't fine-tune programs through Congress, so they should be made as simple as possible."

Brian Sipes—The Bucknellian

Nobel laureate Professor Laurance Klein, at left, spoke on Wednesday night to a capacity audience in the Elaine Langone Center on the occasion of the retirement of his colleague, Professor Balwant Singh, at right.

Klein also criticized the Administration for blaming broken campaign promises on figures which they claim were not available to them previous to assuming office. Klein said that they "should have known" based on calculations he and other prominent economists figure every Monday morning, and then mail to the President and Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board.

"It is quite evident that the economic surge seen after the election has dissipated, and what we see for April is not much better, only very faint improvement," said Klein.

Now the Benjamin Franklin Professor of Economics Emeritus at the University of Pennsylvania, Klein was influential as a member of the economic task force which brought President Jimmy Carter success in 1976.

Despite his emeritus status at UPenn, Klein still makes weekly predictions of the future of the United States economy, and also does similar consulting work with other countries.

Library to extend hours for finals

In response to BSG requests, the Bertrand Library will be extending library hours during finals weeks, May 14-21.

The library will be open from 8:00 a.m. to 11:45 p.m. May 14 and 15, and from 8:00 a.m. to 2:00 a.m. May 16-21.

In addition, the library will be open from 8:00 a.m. to 5:30 p.m. on May 22.

BSG redesigns Veritas form

Due to low response to Veritas evaluation forms last semester the forms will not be distributed this semester.

The BSG Veritas subcommittee has spent this semester reviewing the evaluation process, with input from both students and faculty.

The new forms will be decided upon and printed over the summer, and the new Veritas will be distributed next semester.

Singers, Ringers dedicate concert

The Rooke Chapel Ringers and Rooke Chapel Choir will give a concert on May 9 at 7:30 p.m. in Rooke Chapel.

The concert will be dedicated to the memory of William McRae Jr., who founded the choir in 1948.

McRae, who retired from Bucknell in 1979 as a professor of music after 42 years with the University, died in 1992

Int'l Education to honor grads

The Office of International Education will hold a program for eight graduating engineering students from India and Pakistan on Tuesday, May 11, at 7:00 p.m. in Walls Lounge.

The purpose of the program is to provide the students with a forum to reflect on their experiences before leaving Lewisburg this summer.

The graduating students are : Ankush Agarwal, Sridhar Desikan, Milind Lele, A.A. Lokanathan, Rajan Patel, Arvind Pejavara, Vipul Sagare, and Abdi Zakir.

Smithson award winners chosen

After reviewing 92 poetry and 24 prose entries, the English Department announced the 1993 recipients of the Julia Fonville Smithson Memorial Prizes this week.

The prize-winning works were the poem "Basilica, University of Notre Dame" written by Erica M. Smith '94, and a story entitled "...Despising Robert Silverman," by Marc Haimes '93.

Honorable mentions for the awards went to Wendy J. Schweiger '95 for her poem "Dinner" and to Angelique Hawkes '94 for her story "Annie and Me and the Golden Dream."

In addition to seeing their works printed by the English Department, Haimes and Smith will each receive $50 in prize money.

MIT Dean resigns amongst charges

An MIT administrator responsible for handling complaints of sexual harassment has resigned amid charges that he harassed a female university employee.

Associate Dean of Student Affairs James Tewhey stepped down as University officials investigated charges of misconduct and mismanagement against him.

After Kathy Nolan, an associate director of financial aid, accused Tewhey, he has been under a court-ordered restraining order .

Nolan had also been under a temporary restraining order, but the court denied Tewhey's request to have it continued

Hostages held in UPJ gameroom

An Indiana University of Pennsylvania student held four students hostage in the gameroom at the University of Pitt-Johnston.

An unidentified female caller reported to Public Safety that Gordon Schnarrs was on his way to shoot a UPJ student, and gave a description of Schnarrs and his car.

Schnarrs had traced his target to the gameroom, where he was later apprehended by Public Safety officers.

Schnarrs now faces charges including aggravated assault, recklessly endangering another person, unlawful restraint, false imprisonment, simple assault, criminal coercion, underage drinking, and making terroristic threats.

Schnarrs posted the 10% of the $45,000 bond, the amount required to be released.

Study says women get higher grades

Statistics released by the Registrars office at Skidmore College indicate that female students have been consistently awarded higher grades than their male counterparts over the last three academic years.

Registrar Anne Henderson explained the discrepancy by saying that women tend to be "more serious" about academics at liberal arts colleges. She also mentioned that since Skidmore is still viewed as a largely women's school, they tend to receive fewer applications from qualified men.

Sour test deal implicates two

After a student she hired to take a test for her failed, a Penn State University student reported the breach of contract to the police.

Both students now face up to a year in prison and $2500 fines, in accordance with a state law which prohibits the selling of academic work. PSU officials said that both students could also be expelled.

The woman sought police aide in having her $1200 stereo returned, which she offered in payment for the test.

Public safety officers to use batons on duty

Editor's Note: The following is a letter by Vincent DeCerchio, director of Public Safety.

Officer Jon Weaver of the Public Safety Department recently attended a 40 hour course in the use of the P.R. 24 baton at the Public Safety Institute, Harrisburg Area Community College. The program is a course designed to teach law enforcement and security personnel how to utilize a defensive tool to protect themselves from a physical assault and at the same time subdue a physically aggressive criminal suspect or suspects without subjecting any of the actors to injury. The officers of the department of public safety will be attending a similar training course in the use of the P.R. 24 baton at Penn State University in the summer of 1993. The P.R. 24 baton is a defensive baton with origins in the martial arts and is not to be confused with nightsticks or other batons which are employed as striking weapons.

The idea to evaluate the training and use of the P.R. 24 by our officers first came to Vince DeCerchio when he observed a demonstration at HACC. "Our primary mission is the protection of life and property on campus. I am always concerned about physical or sexual assaults on campus. Although the police response time here is excellent, our public safety officers are usually the first responders to a crime in progress. Being able to disarm a criminal aggressor or to diffuse a violent episode immediately can make a considerable difference in reducing serious injuries. When a victim is under attack, a few minutes can make a difference." Lehigh University, Lafayette College, Moravian College, Elizabethtown College, Dickinson College and Penn State University security or police personnel presently carry the P.R. 24s while on duty. Student security at York College also carry P.R. 24s as part of their equipment.

I will be placing P.R. 24s in our patrol vehicles to be used only in the event that we need to respond to crimes occurring involving a serious physical attack or violent episode. Officers may also carry them when approaching an unknown situation where a potential danger exists. At present, the Public Safety officers do not carry any type of defensive tool., I am also studying the P.R. 24s use at other institutions and agencies and evaluating their reception and effectiveness.

The Bucknellian elects new staff members

BY JEFF BOULTER
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Tara Gilligan '94, has been elected Editor-in-Chief of The Bucknellian for the fall semester of 1993.

Gilligan brings with her two semesters of experience as news editor, one as assistant editor. She said that she was optimistic about the upcoming semester despite the departures of a large senior staff.

"We've never had a particularly strong recruitment plan, but I think that by using all of the people who sign up in August to work for the paper, we'll be able to return our staff to full strength within a fairly short time frame," said Gilligan.

Aiding Gilligan as Managing Editors will be Dave Barry '94, who has been abroad for the semester, and Nicole Cobban '95, who is coming off three semesters as Arts and Entertainment Editor.

Jeff Boulter '96 and John Godbout '95 will kick off the semester as co-News Editors. Opinions will be headed by Kelley Sheahan '96 and Dave Walsh '95. The sports section will be edited by Neil Bardach '96 and Jonathan Bordeau '96 with Corey Hutchings' '95 continuing as Statistician. Krissy Schurr '95 will return as Features Editor with the help of Danalyn Adams '94.

The first-year duo of Susan Naughton and Jean Auro will return as sophomores to be Photo Editors. Sharon Reynolds '95 will return as Production Manager. Sheila Pretti '94 will act as Business Manager. Heather Clark '95 will oversee the advertisements.

The new staff would like to congratulate the spring '93 staff on their fine work and bid a fond farewell to the graduating senior staff.

According to Doherty, some fraternity members were concerned that Dadez would judge the chapter more harshly as a result of his membership in the brotherhood. "Some people felt Ed would make an example of us or be too hard on us," said Doherty.

"I don't think they would feel they would get anything extra," said Dadez. "Maybe they would feel they would be looked on more closely and that I would expect more from them," he added.

Doherty said the fraternity concluded that Dadez's judgement would remain unbiased. "Anybody who knows Ed would agree that he is a fair person," said Doherty.

INVESTIGATION From page A1

The investigation began after the several women filed complaints with the Office of Public Safety in March. The women filing the complaints decided to take action when they received a campus-wide safety alert describing an incident of sexual assault which occurred on Mar. 2; their description exactly matched that given in the safety alert.

In the initial incident, a female student reported that a man in a blue pick-up truck drove past her several times as she jogged on Smoketown Road. Twice the man left his truck and jogged past her, once in each direction, and uttered a remark she could not discern.

Several other students later filed complaints about similar incidents.

Long-time faculty announce retirements

Harold Heine, professor of chemistry, retires after 45 years

BY LARNIE J. BOOKER
Bucknellian Staff Writer

It is often said that legends are people that you dream about but rarely ever come in contact with. At the end of the 1992-1993 academic year, Bucknell will bid adieu to a teaching and research legend, Dr. Harold W. Heine, a professor of chemistry for 45 years.

Heine received his bachelor's degree from Rutgers University in 1944. As an undergraduate, he was the recipient of the New Jersey State Scholarship and the Meredith Graduate Fellowship. These awards were just a tidbit of the success that would fall upon this chemist.

Professor of Chemistry Harold Heine will retire this year after 45 years of service to the Bucknell community.

Upon receiving his BS he decided to attend his alma mater in order to pursue his Ph.D., which he received in 1948.

Upon his graduation from Rutgers he was offered a position as an assistant professor of chemistry at Bucknell. From 1951-1954 he served an associate professor of chemistry and in 1954 he became a professor of chemistry and has remained here ever since.

He was not willing to speak on his behalf to The Bucknellian, yet his colleagues cannot say enough about him. "He is a legend at Bucknell," said Dr. Hans Veening, the chairman of the chemistry department. "He has been an inspiration to all of us [his colleagues]," said Dr. Charles Root, a professor of chemistry. "You can go anywhere in the country and mention the fact that you're from Bucknell and people will immediately ask how's Harold," said Venning. "Everybody knows him."

"You can go anywhere in the country and mention the fact that you're from Bucknell and people will immediately ask how's Harold. Everybody knows him."
—Dr. Hans Veening, Chair of the Chemistry Department

Heine's nationwide notoriety came from his discovery of a group of compounds known as aziridines. "He developed the chemistry of these compounds with great elegance and insight", said Manning E. Smith, professor of chemistry emeritus. "This discovery established him as a different kind of chemist working in an undergraduate environment. You can hardly pick up an advanced text in organic chemistry that has a section devoted to aziridines without finding Heine's working extensively quoted."

This devotion to research made Heine a better professor because he then worked to create the same opportunities for his students.

As a professor, Heine began to explore different resources that would help to develop Bucknell's chemistry department. He began by initiating the university's BS/MS Program that provides students the opportunity to receive their master's degree in science after only four years.

"He was a cheerleader for the chemistry department," said Root. As such, Heine went to chemical companies such as Dow, the Dreyfus Foundation, dul'ont, Merck and many others looking to receive funding for undergraduate research support.

His devotion to research continued as Heine created an undergraduate research exchange program with the Netherlands that has continued for over 25 years. He is also one of the original founders of the Council on Undergraduate Research. He has published over 40 papers in chemistry journals, over half of which have been coauthored by undergraduates.

His unique teaching style has endeared him to his over four decades of students who have gone on to successful careers in the science world. He was so loved by his students that in 1966, the yearbook, L'Agenda, was dedicated to this stellar educator.

"I believe at this moment that Bucknell has one of the best undergraduate chemistry departments in the country," said Smith. "The person most responsible for the change of Bucknell chemistry department from ordinary to great is Harold Heine."

With all of Dr. Heine's excellent work in his field he has been the recipient of many awards and distinguished honors. He was the 1970 Harbison Award winner for Gifted Teaching and Research from the Danforth Foundation.

In 1979, his colleagues nominated him for the Chemical Manufacturers Association Catalyst Award for Superior Teachers of Chemistry, but he was not named the winner. Disappointed, Smith and Veening resubmitted Heine as a nominee the following year, and this time he was distinguished with that honor.

In 1987, Smith and Veening, along with some of Heine's former and present students, sent letters of recommendation to the American Chemical Society (ACS) noting the professor's accomplishments. These efforts made him the 1987 winner of ACS Award for Research at Undergraduate Institutions.

A member of six national honorary societies which include Phi Beta Kappa and Omicron Delta Kappa, Heine has spoken at many universities including Ohio State, Villanova, Virginia and Buffalo along with several other symposiums.

He spent a year at the University of Koln, Germany as the awardee of the National Science Senior Faculty Fellowship.

He was awarded the Class of 1956 Lectureship for Outstanding Teaching Award along with the Lindbach Award for Distinguished Teaching Award.

In addition to all of this, Heine served as the consultant for the Surgeon General of the United States from 1966-1969.

For four and a half decades, Harold Heine has roamed the campus of Bucknell, bringing to it prestige, honor and respectability. Veening said, "he is sort of a permanent fixture."

His presence will be sorely missed, yet his impact will never be forgotten.

Mills Edgarton prepares to say farewell to languages department

BY BETSY LEICHTFUSS
Bucknellian Staff Writer

After 33 years in the Modern Languages, literatures, and Linguistics Department, Professor Mills F. Edgerton is retiring from teaching.

In September 1960, Edgerton began his career at Bucknell in the Department of Spanish, which has since been absorbed into the Department of Modern Languages. In addition to teaching Spanish, he has taught Italian and Linguistics, as well as literature courses including a course this semester on topics in Spanish with a focus on Argentina.

"[Professor Edgarton is] somebody, I feel, who sets a standard for the rest of us in terms of intellect and his concern for the education of Bucknell University students. [Students] become aware very quickly of the depth and breadth of this man's knowledge and how much they can learn from him."
—Elaine Garrett, Associate Professor of Modern Languages

"As time went on, I found literature more and more important," said Edgerton, whose interest in literature has evolved over the past three decades. He first decided to teach literature courses because he gained a "clearer idea of what [he] thought should be happening inside students' heads."

Edgerton said that he has become deeply convinced that "we should be doing everything we can to encourage students to lead rich inner lives." Reading and talking quietly to others about literature, he explained, enriches the "inner life" of the reader.

His primary outlook is that "[if] a student leaves the University loving reading and all that goes with it, that person will read [in the future] and get all wonderful things from reading."

Edgerton says he has worried for many years what education is doing for students and what is happening to students after they leave Bucknell. He has a deep "concern for young people going out in to the world as it is today."

It is this vision of the future that Edgerton's colleagues say they most admire about him. Elaine Garrett, Director of the French Program and Associate Professor of Modern Languages, said that Edgerton is "somebody, I feel, who sets a standard for the rest of us in terms of intellect and his concern for the education of Bucknell University students." According to Garrett, "[students] become aware very quickly of the depth and breadth of this man's knowledge and how much they can learn from him."

Although he is retiring from his position in the Modern Languages Department, Edgerton will be continuing in his position as Director of the Bucknell University Press.

The University Press, begun in 1969, is one of more than 100 university presses across the country. Edgerton became involved with the Press when it began, and it has been a major part of his life since 1976, when he became director.

He is largely responsible for the Press printing over 25 titles a year, with a total of at least 400 titles in print, the bulk of which are in the humanities.

John S. Wheatcroft, professor of English, said that Edgerton "is an unusually effective editor of the Bucknell University Press. He has developed it into an important and prestigious publication for this institution."

In addition to continuing to run The University Press, following retirement Edgerton plans to address a list of things he has wanted to do over the past years but had no time to do, including reading, writing and in time, studying ancient Egyptian.

Of the many experiences he has encountered over the years, Edgerton says he will best remember "helping to shape a good language department and carrying the University Press forward."

Dadez rushed into conflict of interests

With all of the rumors and accusations which are bound to fly around a college campus concerning the relationship between the Greek community and the University, the Greek advisor should be the one stable force which draws all parties back into alignment. The Greek advisor, while an active member of the administration, must also support Greek causes; that is, he must be able to fairly and impartially mediate problems between the University and Greek organizations, collectively or individually.

Ed Dadez, Greek advisor for the Interfraternity Council and associate dean of student life, stepped beyond the reasonable bounds of his position this week when he agreed to accept honorary membership in the Kappa Delta Rho (KDR) Fraternity. His acceptance raises a number of issues and, most importantly, represents a clear conflict of interests.

KDR's reasons for honoring Dadez are flawless. Since its 1986 recolonization, Dadez has been instrumental in helping the members of KDR return their fraternity to its respectable place in the Greek community; he has in recent years served as KDR's advisor. Unquestionably, members of KDR have much to thank Dadez for. Their desire to honor Dadez in such a way is entirely acceptable, even touching; and had Dadez not already committed himself as advisor to the entire Greek community, he should have accepted the honor with pride. But for exactly the reasons KDR chose to honor Dadez—because of his aggressive interest in Greek matters—he should have refused the award; as Greek advisor, Dadez is bound to uphold certain standards not just for KDR, but for every other fraternity and sorority as well.

An attachment to any one fraternity may present a conflict in the way he views all others; but perhaps more importantly, it will affect the way other Greek organizations view him. Can members of other fraternities and sororities fully respect an advisor who they know to have ties to one fraternity house? Will others think they have to take similar strides to win the favor of Dadez? How many other houses will wish they had first thought to enroll him as an honorary member in their organizations?

In addition to serving on numerous other committees, as Greek advisor Dadez plays a key role in the Council on Greek Life (COGL), a small group of administrators and students which each year reviews fraternities and sororities and rates them in a number of subjective categories. The system, as it stands, is already extremely secretive and exists without check; no one but COGL and individual fraternity presidents has access to any of the decisions of this committee. Such a set-up encourages favoritism, or at the very least provides ample opportunity for it, especially when one of the important figures is bound by a close, personal relationship to one of the houses.

Of course, the opposite is every bit as likely to occur. In an effort to appear unbiased, Dadez could (unconsciously) turn into a harsh critic of KDR. Again, with few checks in place in the current system, Dadez as Greek advisor must maintain a position in which he can recognize and challenge inequities. But if he himself represents one of the inequities, the system is flawed at its most fundamental level and can no longer work.

Granted, Dadez's acceptance of the honorary membership will likely have no noticeable effect on the Greek community; Dadez will probably continue as normal, without granting KDR any special status. But whether he meant it as such or not, Dadez has set a potentially dangerous precedent. Under no circumstance should a person in his position accept affiliation with a particular fraternity. There is an extreme difference between joining a fraternity while in college and accepting membership while in a position of authority, and Dadez's current position dictates that he should not have accepted the honorary membership in KDR.

Student presents other side of greenhouse debate

TO THE EDITOR:

I am the author of the "anonymous" mailroom bulletin discussed by Ms. DeRubertis in last week's Bucknellian. Had she looked closely at the bottom right-hand corner of the piece she would have noticed my initials; she could have gotten my name out of a directory. I guess it's asking too much of an environmentalist to dig up the facts. For those who wonder what this is all about, here is the content of my bulletin concerning the greenhouse effect:

FACT 1: Atmospheric pressure is about 15 psi.

FACT 2: Earth's radius is about 4,000 mi.

FACT 3: CO_2 constituted about 0.04 wt% of the atmosphere in 1950.

FACT 4: CO_2 now comprises about 0.06 wt% of the atmosphere.

FACT 5: From facts 1-4 we may calculate that the amount of CO_2 in our atmosphere has increased by 1,200 billion tons since 1950.

FACT 6: Human activity currently releases 6 billion tons of CO_2 per year.

FACT 7: Non-human activity releases 200 billion tons of CO_2 per year.

FACT 8: From fact 6 we see that at our present rate of production it would take humans over 200 years to create the increase of CO_2 observed in our atmosphere since 1950.

FACT 9: By comparing facts 6 and 7 we see that human CO_2 emissions are squat compared to those from natural sources.

That's it. I can't make it any simpler without telling people how to multiply and divide. You claim that "atmospheric carbon dioxide levels have increased more than 25% since the industrial revolution." So what! My calculations take a 50% increase in carbon dioxide levels and prove that we aren't responsible for it! Please note that my piece did not debate the existence of a greenhouse effect or increased temperature levels; it proved that human activity can not be responsible for observed increases in carbon dioxide. That makes all of your evidence (warmest years to date coinciding with disappearing rainforests, increased carbon dioxide levels, etc.) irrelevant. I see little need to worry about something we can't control.

In response to your statement that "1,575 respected scientists from 69 countries...agree that a 'wait and see' policy could be disastrous,"—big deal! There are thousands of scientists who believe there is no conclusive evidence that a greenhouse effect exists, much less that humans are responsible for it. Of course, we never hear about them. How many scientists saw that "Warning to Humanity" thing and didn't sign it? At least 1,575 respected scientists from 69 countries.

I can and will always regard SEAC and most other environmental groups as a bunch of zealots who pride themselves on being a pain in my butt.

Ms. DeRubertis, I can and will always regard SEAC and most other environmental groups as a bunch of zealots who pride themselves on being a pain in my butt. What else could be their objective in banning CFCs when there is a perfectly provable argument that the human impact on ozone levels is small compared to that of natural forces? (Please see my article on this which appeared in last semester's Sentinel). Thanks to people like Al Gore and SEAC, what I myself used to do to my car air conditioner for $10, I now have to pay someone else $100 to do. In addition, due to the future elimination of current refrigerants, my home and car air conditioners will be rendered useless in five years, all because a bunch of loudmouths have abandoned reason for hysteria. Your skepticism of the truth serves only to cause many people undue hardship.

'Rise up' against injustice: Drink!

TO THE EDITOR:

Why is this school so anal about on-campus alcohol? I read an article about the increasing crackdown on alcohol every other week in The Bucknellian, and it seems foolish—these hypocritical administrators attempt to inculcate the evils of alcohol upon the students, fellow adults, while they continue to drink themselves. The administration does not attempt to root out vandalism, irresponsible drinking, nor driving while intoxicated, but simply the act of drinking itself. Fraternities are just trying to provide a social arena for interaction amongst peers—fraternities (like TKE, which seems to be getting spanked by this choking moral oppression) use their houses much like the Sojkas do for the annual Christmas Party—serving alcohol and enjoying themselves. I wish The Bucknellian would save me the morality lessons of those "evil ones" who drink as our "righteous" campus security uses strong-arm tactics to turn the under-21 segment of this campus dry. This is supposed to be a liberal arts university, not a police state.

The national law which prohibits the use of alcohol by those under the age of 21 is absolutely absurd. This law is based on the assumption that all people under the age of 21 are not wise enough to drink responsibly. People from 18 on, however, are considered responsible enough to die for the cause of national interests and mature enough to be tried and executed by capital punishment. There seems to be a fairly obvious double-standard here which threatens the integrity of the government to make just laws.

"What can I do to help alleviate the injustice in our Bucknellian community?" you may ask. The answer is simple. I implore all Bucknellians to rise against the oppression of campus safety led by the local enforcer of morality, Vincent DeCerchio, and raise their beer bottles in defiance. Students of Bucknell, unite! This modern-day Rasputin would like to tell you what to do with your body, strip you of the sacred democratic right of choice. But you must rebel—drink openly with a free conscience in this crucial act of civil disobedience. In the few weekends left this year drink hardily and with pride—it is your duty. Even if you do not usually drink, you must do so in the coming weeks to insure the democratic ideal for future generations. Each individual must throw away personal distastes in the coming weeks and simply act to retain the foundation of American values, the sanctity of the individual choice. Each beer downed, each shot of Southern Comfort is a conscious act of rebellion and a signal to the old men in Marts Hall that they cannot strip us of our right to the pursuit of happiness. Rise up against this tremendous injustice and drink hardily. In fact, also make liberal use of marijuana so the message of inebriative freedom comes across loud and clear.

I hope fear of punishment doesn't stop individuals from taking an active role in this revolution—there is no room for cowards. As Thoreau said, "There is no place for a just man under an injust law but in jail." Let campus safety try to scare you but do not relent. I invite Mr. DeCerchio to bust me for underage drinking—I would gladly bear my cross for this cause; a cause which seeks to protect the integrity of the human individual.

With a clear conscience,

OPINIONS

Marc Haimes' Crossing Lines

FOUR YEARS. NO TEARS. (THE FINAL INDULGENCE)

My God, it's over. These are the last Crossing Lines to ever light my computer lab monitor. The concluding campus points. The end of the sharp scholastic images. The final bison tale. From phallic references to esoteric inaccessibility, from conservatism to liberalism, from anti-ism to anti-anti-ism, from denial to narcissism, this is it.

From narcissism to depression, from depression to happiness, from happiness to nostalgia, from nostalgia to maturity, from maturity to happiness, from happiness to phallic references, I'm not going to pretend that I currently realize what I've learned scribing this great column, attending this great university, loving this great university, leaving this tiny university. I've thought about this moment before. I'd be sitting here. Legs up on the provided desk. In front of the provided Macintosh. Writing disjointed sentences. Thinking about John, the bagman. Knowing each stream of keystrokes that my seething brain provides me brings my monitor closer to the real world. Closer to truth. Well, actually closer to graduate school—but an infant has gotta crawl before he can walk. Right?

From cynical to sentimental. From sentimental to forgetful.

I don't remember ever crying here. And, out of all the classes, all the people, all the experiences, all the columns, I think I find this simple, dry notion the most unbelievable. Because as I attempted to straddle that line between self-therapy and satire, emotion and calculation, sincerity and bullshit, truth and lie, love and hate (while blasting those guilty of all the preceding offenses), I always thought I leaned more toward the left. I think I thought we all did. Deep down.

But is it any better to hide insecurity behind pseudo non-veiled obscurity rather than blunt conformity?

So I leave this place wanting to write more. I leave this place wanting to write more here, where there's an accessible medium, an approachable (if not receptive) audience, and authors who have just started learning the questions. Authors who have just started learning how to rub, twist, speckle, and fling the questions onto that provided monitor. Just started.

And now we will go, knowing we can now write elsewhere. And Bucknell will stay—politely providing the insecurity, the frustration, the conflict, the nurturing, and the validation for the next group of comics and sufferers. Comics and sufferers. There're so many of us, I think. We fancy ourselves healthy enough to feel pain. The jokes become more difficult as the spectrum becomes wider, but it can be done. It can be done. Perhaps even by offensive writers who presumptuously repeat meaningful-sounding phrases and create run-on sentences to satisfy their taste for brazen, publicized indulgence and ruin any sense of contrived sentiment. It can be done.

And the institution remains. It remains the ultimate good sport. Because only a few of the self-proclaimed mavericks will ever think they realize the irony of it all. The universal irony. The cosmic irony. The scholastic irony.

Bucknell University. My God, I'm going to miss this place. Really miss this place. And as I conform to this simple, sentimental, wonderful thought, the tears begin. And they continue, wisely stopping my search for a profound exit.

I know eventually these tears will end and dry, leaving only their streaks, their memory, their knowledge—but right now, I can barely see the screen. I can barely see the screen. Good luck.

First hundred days 'wasn't supposed to be this way'

BY ROSS FEINGOLD
Bucknellian Columnist

After one hundred days in office, one of the few things that people on all sides of the political spectrum can agree on about President Bill Clinton is that he is the owner of many, many campaign pledges yet to be implemented. Perhaps more disappointing is the fact that of the few times concrete action has been taken by the Administration, often the policy has been in contradiction to what the public was led to believe would be Clinton policy. The amateur and professional analyst will write this off as "politics as usual."

But it wasn't supposed to be this way. Emanating from the Democrats throughout the campaign was a tale about a new generation of politician, product of the baby boom generation. Clinton, politicized in the course of his attempts to dodge service in Vietnam, came of age in a different era, and was supposed to bring a different perspective and methodology to Washington. "Change" was the buzzword the Democrat spin doctors employed to influence the electorate. With a Democrat in the White House and the Democratic majority in Congress, gridlock as we know it would disappear and a panacea economic recovery package would be implemented. Most importantly, Clinton was supposed to be a new type of Democrat, not cut from the tax-and-spend mold of the "old" Democrat.

The list of unfulfilled campaign pledges is long, the list of deceptions quickly increasing.

And the slogan was "It's the economy, stupid," with the media eagerly playing along by painting a picture of imminent doom, in disregard for many of the facts. The concentration on the economy came at the expense of disregard for two places called Bosnia and Russia, issues that would wind up consuming many hours of the first hundred days as policy had to be formulated from scratch.

Clinton changed his mind on who would be hit with tax hikes, going from a privileged few to a now-unfortunate many. The new taxes weren't going to go to deficit reduction, but instead to more spending that fortunately the Republicans nixed. So much for not being a tax-and-spend Democrat. An energy tax that will hit all classes of Americans is in the works, something not mentioned during the campaign. And very discreetly, a larger and expanded tax package is being put together to pay for an exorbitant health care package, by a task force removed from Congress and certainly the public. Is this really putting people first, or putting the same failed Democrat-inspired social policies first?

The list of unfulfilled campaign pledges is long, the list of deceptions quickly increasing. Without a doubt it is much too early to judge the president guilty of not fulfilling campaign pledges, as much time remains in his term. However, outright deception from a man whom we were supposed to believe would not do such a thing because previous presidents had done it (and after all, he would not be like any of the previous officeholders in any way, shape, or form) is something about which America should worry.

Time to make progress on NAFTA

BY JOHN SHIRE
Bucknellian Columnist

In his first hundred days of office, President Bill Clinton has focused primarily on social issues and has allowed pressing economic affairs to pale in comparison of objective importance. Although social and economic issues are not mutually exclusive (as demonstrated by the fiscal package that Clinton is pushing through Congress), it seems that the complexity and importance of this nation's economic policy have not been given adequate attention by the Clinton administration. To clearly illustrate this point, one could examine the slow progression of NAFTA, the North American Free Trade Agreement, which would create a regional and relatively free trade agreement between Canada, the United States, and Mexico.

Those who would support Clinton's slow bureaucratic approach to dealing with NAFTA would argue that it would be foolish to act aggressively on the agreement in its present form because it would eliminate the option of two additional trading partners, Poland and Taiwan. As explained in the March 13, 1993 issue of The Economist, "if a trade block is closed—or limited to a narrowly defined geographic region—it cannot be a step toward globally freer trade." If Clinton wishes to meet his objectives of liberal trade, he could do so easily by allowing Poland and Taiwan to begin negotiations about joining NAFTA and, simultaneously, set an example to the European Community that extending liberal trading terms can be achieved. Furthermore, those who would support Clinton's cautious steps into the agreement would argue that patience may pay off because Mexico will be increasing its environmental standards in the future and thus provide for cleaner industry.

By contrast, those who would admonish Clinton for delaying action on NAFTA would argue that a strict regional agreement would encourage members to produce and trade goods and services that are most profitable, rather than all members producing and trading the same goods and services. This would create far more trade for all members. Furthermore, by delaying, those U.S. based corporations located in Mexico will be forced to meet new environmental standards and consequently increase the production costs for all the corporations without a compensatory increase in product demand. In this respect, U.S. corporations located in Mexico will suffer from a dwindling profit margin.

Initially, Clinton promised that he would back NAFTA as long as Congress would draft "supplemen-

Activist message lost in furor

BY SCOTT RUSSO

Having come "full circle" as an empowered white male in this society, I am left struggling with the apparent ineffectiveness of activist groups here at Bucknell. That is, now that I deeply understand how and why I have benefited from my position in society (a position I never earned nor deserve), and now that I see the importance and the purpose of many activist groups fighting for a truly equal society, I am left to figure out why it took me so long to come to grips with the way things are. Was I too slow to accept the truth about equality and empowerment, or was I put on the defensive by the actions of activists as my first significant experience with such issues? As I look back, I clearly see that both of these factors contributed to my struggle, and I am left with some crucial thoughts for activists, and for young white males.

To activist groups, I think I can offer a valuable perspective from someone who now sees the necessity of the ends you seek, but has only come to such beliefs through a long and uncertain process. To the young white male who has not been exposed to the problems of the society that he benefits from, I can try to explain what lies ahead, and help make you aware of the responsibilities you have which you never asked for. In the process, I hope you will work to understand why people are so angry and bitter, why their focus is you, and why they are justified in their position.

One of the problems that our generation is facing is that, after developing strong emotions about past and present injustices, we are transferring these bitter feelings onto "those people" today. Criticism of the people who maintain and support the status quo of our past society may be the first step toward achieving equality and change. However, identifying impressionable, relatively neutral young people with those who are currently empowered and who are doing the exploiting certainly will not in any way work to encourage them to support a particular cause. This seems to do nothing except to put that group on the defensive for something they didn't do.

Granted, certain people are in a position to occupy positions of power, but this doesn't make them responsible for the injustices of the past. What it does is make them responsible for the future. And putting them on the defensive now will not encourage them to make much of an effort for positive change.

Society won't really change unless people's attitudes change, and people won't really change unless they decide on their own that a certain way is right or wrong. Therefore, if we want them to change, we need to inform them of a new view, and work with them by engaging in some kind of discussion as to why it is right. This kind of inclusive deliberation will necessarily include entertaining their views and their reasons for having such beliefs.

Such a strategy is especially important in a university setting. At this level, there shouldn't be a fight for women's

McDonald's protestor explains "Beyond Beef"

TO THE EDITOR:

Since the Bucknellian news story on the demonstration at McDonald's was printed, I have received numerous questions about our intentions, as well as some harassment. I appreciate this opportunity to clear up the issue.

The "Beyond Beef" campaign is an ongoing, nationwide effort by a coalition of various organizations to lower US beef consumption by 50%. The rationale for this cause stems from several different issues, the most important being environmental degradation and human health.

The over-utilization of land caused by production of animal products has resulted in a continuous loss of topsoil; an article in the L.A. Times noted that 35 pounds of topsoil are irretrievably lost to produce one steak! Any geologist could tell you that topsoil takes too long to develop to be wasted. The estimated annual cost to the U.S. of this soil erosion is $44 billion.

Another environmental problem associated with beef consumption is the destruction of the rainforests. In Central America, cattle ranching is the primary reason for rainforest clearing, which causes desertification and irreplaceable loss of species. (We are now losing 1,000 species a year!) Although McDonald's claims not to purchase any rainforest beef, the environmental damage caused by raising beef are no less severe to this, our country!

There are other environmental problems associated with meat production: water pollution, carbon dioxide and methane production, use of toxic pesticides to grow feed, and animal cruelty. Considering all of these factors, one can fully understand why John Robbins, author of Diet for a New America, has stated: "The most important step any person can take to become more environmental is to become a vegetarian."

> "The most important step any person can take to become more environmental is to become a vegetarian."

Many people asked how hunger is related to beef consumption. If every American decreased their meat consumption by only 10%, enough land, energy, and water would be freed up to feed 100,000,000 people. What could be done if we shared this food equally? Francis Moore Lappe, in her book Diet for a Small Planet, explains this argument in great detail.

Additionally, health is a major issue. At a time when our nation is attempting to find ways to pay for our tremendous health expenditures, we must understand that, according to the Surgeon General, 68% of health problems are diet-related. One cannot ignore the warnings any longer: meat consumption is directly linked to heart disease (the most common cause of death in the U.S., also the world's worst meat consumer) and various forms of cancer.

These compelling arguments have not been widely publicized. The silence (which profit-driven organizations like McDonald's obviously desire) must be broken. Direct action—such as our protest—remains the best way for us to spread our message.

In herbivorous bliss,

Trustee diversification should happen naturally

TO THE EDITOR:

The April 30 issue of The Bucknellian contained an editorial calling for greater race and gender diversity on the Board of Trustees. In itself, having greater diversity on the board is not objectionable, but it should happen naturally. Regardless of race, members of the board should be chosen because they are the best of the available candidates in helping the University excel in its mission of educating.

The editorial states that the trustees should have a rich variety of experience in the world, but then confuses the issue by claiming that the way of achieving this variety is through race and gender diversification. The editorial justifies its call for diversification by indicating that 35 of the 43 active trustees are white males, the implication being that it is not possible for people of the same race and gender to have different perspectives. It's as though the editor believes that every white male came from the same family, had the same upbringing, went to the same school, has the same job, lives in the same neighborhood, etc.

The editors feel content in labeling every group with its own "perspective," as though there is no difference between the individuals in each group. Diversity comes from the differences between individuals, not from the differences between groups. Admittedly, it is easier to make assumptions about the members of different groups, but doing what is right usually isn't the same as doing what it easy. The Bucknellian is content with doing what is easy: judging people based on race and gender.

Decades ago, Martin Luther King dreamed of a day when a man would be judged not by the color of his skin but by the content of his character. Today, under the false guise of continuing Dr. King's movement, there are those—such as the editors of The Bucknellian—who believe that University hiring practices should put sex and skin color above all else. While the editors of The Bucknellian have every right to believe that race should be the determining factor when making trustee appointments, they should at least have the courage to admit that they are betraying those who gave their lives in search of a truly color-blind society.

Pregnancy Center's techniques questioned

TO THE EDITOR:

There will be no compromise on the abortion debate. It will continue until all women are assured accurate information necessary to make educated choices concerning their bodies. One way reproductive freedom has been denied to women is through the control and manipulation of information. I wish to call attention to the fact that The Bucknellian has been supporting this type of deception by the Susquehanna Valley Crisis Pregnancy Center.

Readers of The Bucknellian may remember frequent advertisements from this business in past issues. The Crisis Pregnancy Center claims to offer "non-judgmental counseling" to women in advertisements in The Bucknellian. Moreover, they claim to offer "Comprehensive information about ALL of your options." At first glance, the Crisis Pregnancy Center appears to be a legitimate resource for women who need advice.

However, upon further research, it becomes apparent that the Crisis Pregnancy Center is merely a forum for slanted misguidance. I picked up "information" from this business to understand what exactly "ALL of your options" included. I found propaganda ranging from distortion of Judeo-Christian beliefs to grossly enlarged depictions of fetuses at various stages of development. Additionally, the Crisis Pregnancy Center refuses to tell women where they can go to receive a safe and legal abortion (so much for "ALL the options"), making them guilty by omission. The misinformation presented attempts to sway pregnant women into choosing to continue their pregnancies without offering information concerning all options, including abortion.

I believe that the Susquehanna Valley Crisis Pregnancy Center may offer valuable services to anti-choice women who are in need of pregnancy tests and/or counseling. However, it is a disgrace that the Crisis Pregnancy Center tries to manipulate vulnerable women through the promotion of obvious untruths.

I am writing to expose this reality as well as to request that The Bucknellian discontinue the perpetuation of such false advertising in the future (or at least challenge advertisers to make their ads accurate). I also encourage others to venture to the Crisis Pregnancy Center to witness the facts as they are contradictory to the advertisement I have cited (or simply ask members of Bucknellians for Human Life, since the proceeds from their recent tee-shirt sales benefited the Crisis Pregnancy Center).

Women need real full-options counseling, including objective information on continuation of pregnancies, adoption, and abortion, so that we can make decisions for ourselves, rather than having them made for us! This information can be obtained at various places, such as the Family Planning Clinic of SUN located south of Lewisburg on Route 15.

tal" legislation that would "address various environmental and labor concerns, as well as the fear that possible 'import surges' from Mexico could wipe out some American business," (The Economist, April 10, 1993). Many economists believe that the "supplemental" legislation is a hindrance to the agreement because it has forced some American businesses, specifically the sugar and citrus industries, to question whether they can seek special exemptions from the ramifications of free trade.

It seems to me that many who support Clinton for his sloth-like manner in executing NAFTA have missed the forest for the trees. The point of NAFTA should be to create a regional agreement between three countries that will create a favorable balance of trade for all members. American businesses should not have to suffer from new environmental standards in Mexico because Clinton placed economic policy on the back-burner. Nor should Clinton be concerned about setting examples for the European Community by including Poland and Taiwan in the agreement, when West Germany, Japan, Hong Kong, and Taiwan have become booming manufacturing centers. This is independent of the fact that the inclusion of Poland and Taiwan will prolong the final draft of NAFTA far beyond the set time of next January.

Along the same line of argument, the biggest problem with Clinton's "supplemental" legislation is that it removes the element of liberal free trade in a pure form. The more regulations and restrictions that are tacked on to NAFTA, the less likely the conservative approach to a free-market economy will have a chance for success (and in all fairness, it was George Bush's deal to begin with). By the time Clinton's administration has completed drafting NAFTA, the term "free trade" will have lost much of its meaning. One can only hope that with the completion of the Family Leave Act, fiscal policy, and the events of Waco, Texas out of the way, Clinton will make strides toward completing NAFTA, which actually pales in comparison to a greater feat—the completion of GATT, the General Agreement on Trade and Tariffs. Clinton's work is certainly cut out for him. It would be nice to see a whole lot more progress in this area of national interest.

rights, nor a fight for equal rights based on race or color. The struggle should be an education process and a learning experience for those of us who are struggling with the real life importance of such efforts. We've been brought up in a certain way all our lives. Unfortunately we are under a narrow societal perspective, and it limits our ability to change. That doesn't mean we can't change, or that we don't want to change. If we are immediately blamed for the injustices of the past as our first exposure to such issues, and further blamed for believing what we have been taught and brought up believing, how can we help but react negatively and defend what we hold to be natural? It seems to be a human reaction.

The reason activist groups may be so small here at Bucknell (other than the fact that many students don't yet have a real grasp of real life problems and their effects) is that students don't relate to groups who recognize them as part of the problem, and who force beliefs down their throats. Some activists may think of this as a technique, or as the only way to get those who would otherwise ignore it to listen. I'm suggesting that this can do more harm than good. In order for neutral people to support an effort of any kind, they have to come to certain conclusions and realizations within themselves with simple guidance and education from those who know from experience.

The point of all this isn't to end up agreeing on everything. There are obvious fundamental differences between the various groups and cultures of our society that can't be resolved by an "education process" or debate. But there are some—perhaps many—which can be worked out for the benefit of society if we understand each other better. What we have to do is grant our differences, embrace them, and work together in spite of them through deliberation to sustain our diversity. We have to live together constructively, with a forum for debate that respects certain differences. We have to try to understand each other's experiences, beliefs, and motivations, and find out what has to be done in order to sustain society for everyone. There is a desperate need for a forum where we can discuss our positions openly, with the proper understanding and respect for differences, for the purpose of discovering our common goals and concerns. Communication and understanding are crucial.

There are obviously going to be many issues that come to an impasse for a long time. We aren't all going to agree on some set of rules or morals of equality. This is not only unreasonable, it is impossible. Morality and ethics aren't based on some truths we are all seeking. They are based on the very debates we have over what the right things to do are in our present society. What we have to do is recognize this, accept it, and actively take part in a process that will work to run society better today. We are not getting very far now as we fight among ourselves, and we are heading toward a gridlock. What we have to do is openly debate among ourselves, find out where any hidden agreements and commonalities may lie, make the changes we can, and continue this process indefinitely. An open forum for debate and discussion of such issues is crucial for us now, and for it to work successfully, we all need to keep open minds about others, and also about ourselves.

Bucknellians savor the life in Lewisburg

How many Bucknellians can make it through a single week without venturing down Market Street? Very few. Yes, believe it or not, that small town in the middle of Pennsylvania plays a large part in all of our lives. Whether taking a walk with their significant others or grabbing a quick bite to eat, Bucknellians can be seen in varying facets of life in Lewisburg. During the semester students are ever present on the streets, turning a quiet little community into a lively college town. In fact, as students pack their bags for home, Lewisburg establishments prepare for a lull in business. While seniors head out to new worlds, they should keep in mind that within the relatively little time spent in Lewisburg each one has left a special mark and helped to make this historic little town Lewisburg.

Clockwise from top left: Yancey Smith '96 and Joanna Conard '96 take an afternoon stroll along the railroad tracks; Downtown Lewisburg offers a variety of business and shopping opportunities; Few Bucknellians can make it through the year without a couple trips to Wal-Mart; Tom Kelly '96 picks up a late-night snack at Short Stop; (l to r) Davin Toth '93, Andy LeStage '93, and Craig Knauer '93 can be found at the Bull Run Inn wallowing in the prospect of finding a job and entering the "real" world; Megan McWeeney '95 visits Wash Tubs on Seventh Street for a necessary ritual which most students tend to put off as much as possible.

The Nissan College Graduate Purchase Plan.

One look at the deals on this page and you'll forget about that weekend you spent tangled in microfilm instead of doing the tango at the tailgate party before last year's homecoming game.

Because, if you've worked hard, graduated in the past 12 months and are employed, or you're about to graduate and have a job lined up, you're eligible for Nissan's College Graduate Purchase Plan.*

You can drive the Nissan® Sentra® XE Limited Edition, which includes air conditioning, an AM/FM stereo cassette, cruise control and an optional driver-side airbag at no additional cost for just $175 a month. Or how about the fun-to-drive NX® 1600, with a driver-side airbag, for only $180 a month? Or if you really want to dominate the road, you can get into a sleek, sporty Nissan 240SX® Coupe, equipped with a Dolby® AM/FM stereo cassette and advanced multi-link rear suspension, for an incredible $225 a month. And all these deals are yours with no down payment. That's right. Great cars, low monthly payments and no down payment—just for going to school and getting a job! It's all finally starting to make sense, isn't it?

ARTS AND ENTERTAINMENT

New perspective on "cave painting"

BY JOSH DEWALD
Bucknellian Staff Writer

On most occasions the resident artistic talents of Bucknell and the majority of their works remain hidden. However, this week the artists and their selected pieces will come out of hiding, displaying their labors in the annual spring student art demonstration. The exhibit will begin with a reception today from 4 to 6 pm, and then will continue through the 14th in the Elaine Langone Center Cave from 11 a.m. to 4 p.m. every day.

This show is the only chance Bucknell art students have to display their year's work to the rest of the student body and an opportunity to witness a little publicized facet of campus life.

Eric Troffkan, a graduate sculpting assistant who helped to install the exhibit with Center Gallery director Cindy Peltier, spoke of the wide range of art classes represented in the exhibit. He explained that works from Print Making, Mixed Media, Sculpture, Painting, and Theories of Color courses, among others, will demonstrate such artistic media as paintings, prints, sculpture, design, and drawing. The works are chosen by faculty, and can be selected from artists ranging from freshman to graduate level, regardless of major or concentration.

Troffkan, who himself will have one sculpture on display, stressed that "the people who have the most work in the show are those who pursue their work most seriously."

In keeping with the diverse nature of the student artists, the media used and the works in the exposition, the artistic periods represented will also be of a wide variety. As art major Kim Domanski '94 explained, works with abstract, realistic, impressionistic, post-modern, and modern influences will be shown.

The post-modern motif will be especially expanded upon, as much of the art is accompanied by relatively large amounts of text, a technique that became popular in the 1980s. Domanski will have a total of six works in the exhibit, including five paintings conceived in her Advanced Studio Work in Painting class which will feature the theme of the visual representation of natural terrain. The remaining work is a box project created in a Mixed Media class.

Tom Lehman '93, an art major concentrating in independent printmaking this semester, will also demonstrate his talent in the form of two wood cuts, one of which is more representational and the other of which is more abstract, focusing more closely on the colors and shapes than the figure definition. Speaking of the exhibit, Lehman said it was "hard to classify the show as anything but diverse."

The upcoming exhibit is a rare opportunity for the students of Bucknell to see the works of our artists, as well as an excellent forum for the artists to display their talents in an official showing. The variety of the exhibit offers a taste of multiple art forms, acquainting the campus with all that the art department has to offer.

Dance Company leaps into action sands of miles to find work, sometimes never returning home.

Allyson Green, an independent New York choreographer, conducted a Jan Plan with several members of the company to set a modern Guatemalian piece for the concert.

Also making its second appearance by the Bucknell Dance Company will be "Groovin'," choreographed by Todd Rosenlieb '89. The modern jazz piece had the audience hooting and cheering in the company's fall performance, and since then Rosenlieb has added two sections to the dance to develop the 1960s motiff.

"As a suite, the piece needed to introduce the period—the period of the late 60s and early 70s—that was the birth of Alvin Ailey and the 60s dance movement as a whole," said Rosenlieb.

Performing in his own piece, Rosenlieb will also showcase his talents in an alumni improv. Six Bucknell alumni and Frangione will create a dance on stage set to music by the B52s and King Crimson. Returning performers include Rosenlieb, Sharon Nichols '91, Tina Henninger '91, Hannah Fuentes '91, Courtney Bear '90, and Faith Hunter '92.

Having always prided itself on being heavily student-oriented, Frangione claims that the alumni improv is the first of a newly founded tradition. Frangione also points to the four student choreographed pieces to be premiered in Weis as the result of the students' initiative and dedication.

Janelle Oltorik '93, president of the Bucknell Dance Company, choreographed two pieces, a ballet piece to be performed with the Rooke Chapel Ringers, and a solo jazz piece which Oltorik will dance herself.

Working with live musicians is an opportunity the company always tries to take advantage of. Last year, the group performed in "Sui Sibi Mortem" with Some Singers, a male a cappella group on campus. The Ringers provide an ethereal background to the ballet, complimenting the dancers in movement and mood.

Katrina Herb '93 designed a modern ballet that uses a shopping cart as the centerpiece for the dance which, said Herb, started out as an object she thought would be "fun to work with," but has gradually gained meaning in the piece. Pointing to the unbalanced number of women who shop for families versus men, Herb used the cart as a symbol for "gender roles," although Herb added that the cart is used abstractly, and may not be recognized as a symbol by the audience.

Rounding out the student choreographers, Tiffany Fortier '94 experimented with modern jazz, producing a hard-hitting, fast-paced "street jazz" piece.

Associate professor of dance Danna Frangione and guest artist Todd Rosenlieb '89 rehearse guest choreographer Kwok Hsi Wah's "Waiting" for the Bucknell Dance Company's spring concert in the Weis Center. The company will perform tonight and tomorrow night in Weis at 8 p.m.

Frangione and Shellie Cash Muller, assistant professor of dance, are pleased with the efforts of the students.

Ordinarily, said Frangione, she and Cash-Muller choreograph at least two or three pieces for the dance concert, but said of the upcoming concert, "There was so much student choreography there was no room for faculty choreography—which is wonderful. That's what the company is for."

Stadler poets bid farewell with reading from "Disorder" by Amber Thomas

"So this is what
condom sticking to plastic garbage liner sock curled in a ball bvd underwear suspended on bed railing as if you have always been here adding to my piles and disorder

that becomes apparent when i see you pick the final hair from your mouth
wipe it on your leg reaching for your pants so satisfied to have had me
given all in you..."

Amber Thomas (left), a junior from Humboldt State in California, and Kristen Twitchell, a junior from Winona State in Minnesota, are this semester's Stadler Younger Poets. The two will give a joint reading of their works this Sunday at 8 p.m. in Bucknell Hall.

from "Dancing with the River" by Kristen Twitchell

"Boats circle the water like an old folk dance, the fiber-glass bottom's stomp to the rhythm of the splitting wake as Larson and Crestliner swing their skiers then dip them down. Splashes of laughter of the bank where I sit on matted grass and watch the rocks spit up those partners who have lost the beat like the ripped-open belly of a fish and the foamy waves that miss the mushy ground as they cut in on side-lined debris..."

Bucknellian Staff Writer

Have you ever heard of the Stadler Semester of Poetry? Did you know that through this program Bucknell hosts two of the most promising young poets in the country? If not, don't feel bad—you're not alone. According to Stadler Younger Poet Kristen Twitchell, "I'm really surprised at the number of people who haven't heard of the program."

Twitchell, a junior from Winona State University in Minnesota, and Amber Thomas, a junior from Humboldt State in California, have travelled across the country to study poetry here with poet-in-residence Molly Peacock, as well as with English professors Karl Patten and Jack Wheatcroft. The Bucknell community will have a chance to become better acquainted with these poets when they hold their Stadler Younger Poet's reading this Sunday in Bucknell Hall. The reading will take place at 8 p.m. and is free and open to the public.

The two had come in hopes of studying all kinds of poetry, from the most traditional to contemporary. Unfortunately, said Thomas, "my biggest complaint about the whole Stadler Program is the type of writing [that we are studying]. So far, in my experience, I have found that it is very traditional in terms of what is expected from us, and in terms of style, structure, and writing."

Finding this out has been disappointing for the two poets, since they arrived on campus expecting to work on more modern writing, and to develop their own unique styles.

"At my university," said Thomas, "we have a lot of young poets whose focus isn't on traditional styles. The focus is on 'Can you write? Can you make you point clear? Does it sound good? Can you use things available to you?' And so far I haven't found my work has been dealt with as clearly as I had hoped."

Their complaints, generally, include insufficient opportunity to write as much as they could, not getting to work one-on-one with instructors and poets, and only holding one reading.

On the positive side of things, however, they do profess that studying in Pennsylvania has provided them with the chance to learn about their own regional styles, and to try to expand the scope of their poetry. They have been able to study more formal styles of poetry, such as that of Peacock, and have been able to compare lifestyles here with home experiences, all of which have been extremely helpful.

In all, Twitchell and Thomas have learned a great deal here, and intend to return to their home institutions better prepared to enter the world of publishing poets. Thomas has been nominated for two scholarships, and intends to continue giving poetry readings while working on a book of poems.

In the meantime, Twitchell and Thomas look forward to their reading this summer. The event offers them the opportunity to bid a final farewell, as well as share their semester's progress with the campus. On hand for the reading will be Jack Stadler, the program's founder and namesake.

So I was on the phone with my mother, complaining that I had nothing to do, and The Bucknellian flipped open to a section looking for writers. I was so excited I didn't even say good-bye...

Voice of a new generation

Cellular phones: yuppie fad or necessity?

BY JOYCE DOLLINGER
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Although sneered at as a rich man's toy, cellular telephones are becoming one of the major consumer products of the1990s. The growth and future of the market for cellular telephones looks even brighter.

The use of cellular phones is growing rapidly, doubling each year. Cellular phones are no longer just for the rich and powerful, nor are they the trendwatcher's trend. They can be important tools for parents, salespeople, and home office workers as well.

There are over ten million cellular phones in operation. Additionally, cellular telephone sales have skyrocketed 43% from 1991-92. The cellular market is adding 196,000 users per month, and many more people are racing to buy cellular phones, because in today's communication-oriented world, no one can afford to miss a deadline, lose a contract, or fall behind the competitors just because a phone isn't handy.

HOW THEY WORK

Cellular telephones operate through systems based on cellular radio technology. In these systems neighborhoods are divided into districts called cells. Each cell has a low-powered or high-powered radio transmitter and receiver. For example, when a car with a telephone travels from cell to cell, a computer transfers a call from one transmitter and receiver to another without interrupting the conversation. Also, cellular telephones can transmit calls from car dashboards or briefcases via radio waves in the neighborhood of 800megahertz. Moreover, "they send their signals using very small bursts of high-frequency electro-magnetic waves, or microwaves, favored for most over-the-air telecommunications."

THE POSITIVES

Go-anywhere office machines, such as cellular phones, have transformed from exotic status symbols to work-day business tools. They make travelling easier for everyone, and enhance the productivity of those spending more and more time out of the office. Also, cellular telephones can be installed in cars to help keep executives ahead of the clock. For many small businesses, cellular telephones are improving the company's efficiency and overall performance. News directors are using cellular telephones to communicate with reporters and satellite newsgathering trucks. Finally, they offer users less time waste, higher productivity, and faster connections with emergency service, which are changing communications as we know it.

THE NEGATIVES

Although there many positives, cellular phones do have some problems. First, they are vulnerable to the forces of nature. During huge snow or rain storms, cellular power can fail. Car phones are also an increasing cause of accidents on the road because the phones can be a distraction to the driver. There is also an increasing problem with eavesdropping on cellular phones because it is easy to pick up these radio signals with a suitable receiver. Under current legislation, eavesdropping carries a penalty of up to two years in jail, but the laws are seldom enforced. Because cellular phones communicate over airwaves and not telephone lines, cellular phone conversations are not subject to federal or state laws prohibiting wiretapping. Additionally, normal 911 service can pinpoint the location of the caller, but cellular phones' mobility raises problems in locating the source of calls. As personal communication services grow, new standards for the handling of emergency calls must be developed. Finally, in today's hypersensitive world, electronic scares are running wild. There has been scant evidence that cellular phones cause brain cancer, though the same worry has been expressed about hair dyers, eletric razors, and computers.

COSTS

The spectacular success of cellular telephones has convinced entrepreneurs and government officials that there is a potentially rich market for new kinds of inexpensive wireless phones. Phone revenues were up 28% in 1991, and users have doubled since 1989.

While cellular phones may be convenient, customers don't always realize how expensive owning one can be. Information on choosing a service, picking the right phone, insurance, and taxes should be considered before buying.

Prices for cellular phones are expected to decline by at least 20% because of exploding growth in the market. Retailers expect the biggest bonanza for the consumer-electronics market since the VCR. Car phones can now be purchased for less than $500, and service fees can be less than $20 a month.

The sexual revolution at Bucknell

Women at Bucknell during the 60's and 70's groove their way into the changing times

BY ALEXANDRA STEFANOVIC

Sherry Grant, the first female to enter the ranks of Bucknell's R.O.T.C. program, stands at attention among her fellow comrades. Women at Bucknell during the 60's and 70's explored other types of "foreign territory" during this time of gender policy transition.

It's safe to say that the '60s and '70s proved to be the decades that gained the most prominence in almost every woman's heart. Never before had women on campus been able to stay out past 10:30 a.m. on the weekends, let alone be seen wearing a military uniform. In 1969, the curfew for all but freshmen students was repealed. For those love birds, even the phrase "four on the floor" was abolished. There was a definite change from the cutesy stylistic attitude portrayed by women in the fifties.

There was no question that a revolution was occurring. Demonstrations for equality were seen on all levels, whether dealing with various academic degrees or athletic excellence.

The Vietnam War completely annihilated the cheesecake and Pajama Queen vogue. This change did not come about too easily in the '50s, especially since slim, attractive, girlie-girl females were encouraged to be the "Engineers Choice." This was a type of "Woman of the Month Award" given by the Engineer Department. The lucky recipient of this award appeared in the Bucknell Engineer magazine in a two-page spread with a small blurb about the woman's activities, academic pursuits, and appearance. Most of these women weren't even engineers... they just possessed that dazzling '50s smile.

The award was all in fun, but definitely not the avenue women in the '60s and '70s followed. Combat opportunity to achieve some level of military excellence, how about their push to excel in the academic realm?

There was a fight to alter the existing programs of study, though not to everyone's liking. Fortunately, the passing of Title IX and the welcome more women, but many of them disagreed with the manner in which this change was demanded. For example, both Stevenson and Bryan did not like the loss of communication between themselves and students. Professors were tabooed and thought to be "out of boots, olive colored uniforms, 5 a.m. runs, picket signs and a chance to prove themselves were their new calling. The desire to be a part of the fighting and protective forces of the United States was demonstrated with the first woman in ROTC at Bucknell.

Established in 1969, the Association of Black Students (A.B.S.) played a vital role in insuring that African American students on campus had an active voice in student government and other areas of campus life.

In 1974, Sherry Grant, along with her husband Terry, entered Bucknell's ROTC as the first married couple. Long braids and all, Grant paved the way for future ROTC women. Surprisingly, there are only seven women at Bucknell enrolled in ROTC today. With Aspin and Clinton's move to allow women to fight in air-combat, though, maybe there will be greater inspiration for women to participate.

After women were given the Higher Education Act of 1972 celebrated the woman's desire to achieve equality. Mary Jane Stevenson, Dean of Women at Bucknell from 1947-1971, and Peg Bryan, the Chair of the Women's Department and Director of Women's athletics, said that all the women on campus saluted the passing of this law. It created more opportunities for them, therefore ending the student Anti-Establishment movement popular in the late '60s. The law outlawed single-sex organizations, and also mandated that women on campus had to have facilities and opportunities equal to those that men enjoyed.

Sure, the administration was warming up to this law and was in favor of revising the curriculum to touch with the realities and needs of the students." Nevertheless, a new Woman's Studies Major, emphasizing history, was offered in the early 1970s. Since then, the major has come a long way from its origins.

Another field of study that has come a great way in favor of women is engineering. No longer is this subject still considered a "man's science." Women in engineering? The overall sentiment seems to be "Why not? I have no problem with it." Now, there are scholarships awarded to women who have achieved a high level of excellence in the hopes that they will use the discipline in personal research in and out of college.

Moving from the focus of academic revision is Bucknell's great leap over the hurdle to provide women athletes with the funds needed, so that they may rise to competitive levels. The first funding for all intercollegiate sports came in 1973 in the sum of $10,000. This figure increased to $35,000 in 1978 thanks to Title IX. This title, along with other affirmative action initiatives instilled an even greater change and added a hint of multiculturalism.

All-American women were not the only ones breaking new ground on campus. Underrepresented women such as African Americans and Latin Americans were pioneering new programs as well. For example, in 1969, the ABP (Association of Blacks for Progress) was introduced. The group was a very active student government, and had an impressive membership, considering the newness of the organization.

Other women's organizations that emerged during this period were the Women's Recreational Association in 1970, The Association of Bucknell Black Engineers in 1978, the Society of Women Engineers in 1980, and perhaps the two most popular, the Women's Resource Center in 1985 and NOW (National Organization of Women) in 1992.

The Women's Resource Center highlights the economic, political, and cultural contributions of women in society and seeks to raise awareness about the historical and social factors which shape our life experiences. It acts as a support network for women that never existed before, led by trained, professional women. No longer are issues such as rape, abortion, drugs, eating disorders and suicide kept behind close doors. Women want these topics out and discussed without reservation.

The journey has been long and hard for women at Bucknell. Hopefully, the movement will not stop and simply accept the changes already made, but will continue on the path for greater transformations. We should admire those women, such as Ms. Catherine B. Larison, Ellen Bertrand, and Shelly Grant for setting precedents at Bucknell, and those who continue to support the movement geared toward achieving greater equalities.

Women finish a close third at Patriot League Championships

BUCKNELLIAN TEAM CORRESPONDENT

People may be a bit surprised to see that neither the men nor the women's track teams finished first in the Patriot League Championships, but it certainly wasn't because of a lack of effort, determination, or hard work. Actually, Coach Art Gulden called this year's women's team "his best ever." So the question still is, why did they not take away the golden crown?

"Army just had too many bodies, especially in the throws. [Army scored 61 pts in the throwing events, as compared to 16 for the Bison.] With a few more bodies and another year to mature, we should come much closer, if not beat them next year," said coach Gulden.

But Bucknell still had a great day, coming within six points of sinking the Midshipmen of Navy, and outclassing the rest of the field, as the fourth-place team, Fordham, finished well behind the running Bison.

The stars of the day were sprinters Bridget Dean '95 and Tameka Hinton '95. Dean had the day of her collegiate career, as she collected two gold, one silver, and one bronze medal. The 5'3" Dean soared to victory in the 100 meter hurdles in one of the most exciting races of the day. She was in second place until the leader, an almost shoe-in winner from Army hit the last hurdle and fell, giving Dean the precious victory. Dean then came back and placed second in the 400 meter hurdles in 1:03.57, which is second on the Bucknell all-time list. Earlier, Dean teamed up with Sharon Shilling '95, Tameka Hinton '95, and Dana Harbst '93 to blow away the field for a 4 x 100 meter relay victory. This is the third consecutive win for the Orange and Blue in this event. Finally, Dean joined Hinton, Norine Nadeau '96, and Shilling in the 4 x 400 meter relay which placed third in 3:58.41. Assistant coach Bill Hodge is extremely pleased that the talented Dean is only a sophomore.

Hinton also shined in the meet. Along with her relay first (4 x 100m) and third (4 x 400m). Hinton proved herself the fastest woman in the league as she streaked to victory in the 100 meters in 12.27 seconds. Hinton then placed second in the 200 meters in a photo finish with Army's Tanisha Hodge. How close was the race? The two speedsters were separated by only .03 seconds. Hinton then had a "bad day" (or so she claimed) as she placed third in the shot put. There are probably many athletes that wish their best days could be half as good as Hinton's bad days.

Other tracksters also had a banner day. Kelly Peet '96 finished second in the triple jump with a jump of 11.52 meters, a season best, and fifth in the long jump with 17'11/4". Norine Nadeau '96 placed third in long jump, 17'33/4", fourth in javelin with 36.5 meters, and was a member of the bronze medal 4 x 400 meter relay team.

Bucknell's senior women also finished their careers with a bang. Dana Harbst finished fourth in the 100 meters and was on the winning 4 x 100 meter relay team. Kristen Opdyke finished second in the 10,000 meters. Gina Abraham used a devastating kick to place third in the 1500 meter in a season best of 4:44.67, and was on the silver-medalling 4 x 800 meter relay team with Becky Tobin '95, Maria Ryan '96, and Kathy Wurster '94. Unfortunately, senior sprinter Julie Diercks was unable to compete because of a pulled hamstring. The talented Diercks would have most likely placed in the 100 meters and been on the winning 4 x 100 meter relay team.

Overall it was an exciting meet, filled with great performances by all the competitors. The addition of Army and Navy to the league raised the level of competition immensely. It is in hope that they both start participating in all Patriot League Championships in cross country, indoor, and outdoor track so that every meet is as intense as this one was.

Now it is on to the ECAC's for Tameka Hinton in the 100 and 200 meters, and Norine Nadeau in the javelin. For the rest, what lies ahead is finals, and a summer of easy running. Easy running? Hey, cross country Patriot League Championships are only six months away.

Yes, Army and Navy finished first or second in all but three events and finished one-two in the meet. They were givens. The unknown was third place—would it be Bucknell or the rivals from Bethlehem.

Host Bucknell led Lehigh by a single point going into the final event of the Patriot League Track and Field Championships, the mile-relay squads was to determine the non-service academy winner. Dan Akwei '96 led off and passed the baton to Michael Keogh '96, who in turn dished to Jean Simon '94. Rick Van Emburgh '95 ran the anchor leg and brought Bucknell home more than a second ahead of the Engineer quartet, who finished second. The win enabled Bucknell to avoid the four-point swing and finish with 92 points to Lehigh's 89.

This year's meet was drastically different than any previous championship. It was the first time both academies attended and a concert was held in the stadium the night before the running events. The former fac,tor forced a different strategic outlook for the coaching staffs. Bucknell would not be able to place three people in each event as they had in pre-academy days. Army and Navy would take most of the top spots, allowing only exceptional individual performances to score, and not teams. Head coach Art Gulden was quick to point this out and also to praise his team and staff for reacting very well.

Coaches Bill Hodge, Jo Giannettino, and Bob Schanbacher not only had their individuals ready to compete under these new circumstances, but had the significant chore of organizing the meet. Getting officials and making sure that everything went off on time was a tremendous undertaking. Those members of the team who weren't competing in the meet helped out as officials and assistants to ensure the strict timetable would be held to.

Also, the concert, much to the disbelief of all other Patriot League coaches, had no effect on the meet. The crew delayed sound checks as the high jump was slightly past schedule. A great deal of credit also needs to be given to the physical plant personnel who worked through the night to disassemble the stage and prepare the stadium for competition the next morning.

Michael Klemen — The Bucknellian

Pete Gregory '93 won the Patriot League discus championship this past weekend at the stadium.

Getting back to the athletes and events, perhaps the key difference between the Bison and Engineer teams was not only the mile relay, but three other events. Bucknell was only shut out of five events, while Lehigh was kept from scoring in eight.

Two Bison scored in the pole vault, as Brett Karcher '93 took third and Steve Warakomski '94 fifth place. No Bucknellians placed in the top six in the hammer throw, high jump, or triple jump. But, two Orange and Blue winners did emerge from the field events. Pete Gregory '93 won the discuss with a toss of 47.12 meters, sixth best in Bucknell history.

Blaine Fawcett '93 won the javelin in dramatic fashion. After missing his first opportunity to throw because he was competing in the hurdles, Fawcett didn't have time to catch his breath before his second throw and made a poor toss. Down to his final attempt, he barely avoided fouling and uncorked a winning throw.

Shotputter Eric Stieler '96 captured important points by placing sixth in his event, and Brian Drechsler '95 claimed fifth place in the long jump to round out Bucknell's scoring in the field events.

Chris Priestaf '95 got the distance Bison on the scoreboard by finishing third in the 10,000-meter run. Steve Clarke '95 took fourth in the 3,000-meter steeplechase, and Judd Jarden '93 finished second by less than half a second in the 5,000-meter run. Tom Eagleson '93 placed sixth in the 1,500-meters and Dave Slupe '93 fourth in the 800.

Van Emburgh qualified for IC4As with his second-place finish in the 400-meter intermediate hurdles. No Bison placed in the 110-meter hurdles.

In the sprints, Brad Bernardini '94 took second in the 100-meter dash in 10.97 after running 10.92

Commentary

Has it been four years already? It seems like just yesterday that I was hanging my Air Jordan posters in my Larison Hall—excuse me, Cottage—room, and my roommate was getting cut from the soccer team, then minutes later asked to return to the squad.

That was probably my earliest memory of athletics at Bucknell, but boy would there be some dandy ones to come. Believe it or not, one of my favorite memories is of a football game. There haven't been too many of these games to get excited over in the last four years, but there was one in particular in 1989. Remember when Lafayette quarterback Frank Baur was on the cover of Sports Illustrated, being touted as the best quarterback nobody ever heard of? Well, Baur came into Lewisburg that year and His Overratedness did not even finish the game—his team got blitzed, 54-33. After being stampeded, the Lafayette players departed for the showers in a sea of confetti consisting of shreds of a certain magazine. By the end of the game, one fan had even superimposed the likeness of Bison quarterback Scott Auchenbach, who threw for 299 yards and three touchdowns that day, on the cover.

Of course, the men's basketball team has provided its share of memories through the years—most good, some heartbreaking. In the old days when Lafayette had a good hoops team, for example, they came to Davis Gym one night and got themselves engaged in a barnburner. In the end, Bucknell pulled ahead late in the game, and Mike

Softball ends finest season as runners–up

BY CHRIS DROWNE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The two teams could play a hundred more times and settle nothing. But, unfortunately for the winningest softball team in Bucknell history, the Lady Bison and Lehigh were bound to the double-elimination format of the Patriot League Championship tournament.

After emerging from the winners' bracket unscathed with an extra-inning 4-3 win over the Engineers, Bucknell waited for Lehigh to knock off Army in the losers' bracket final, 4-3 in extra innings. The re match of the top two seeds, who split their regular season doubleheader, would have to determine a champion.

But, the Lady Bison's road to Sunday's final games was long and driven by revenge. Lafayette had come from behind to hand Bucknell its toughest league loss during the regular season. Now, the Leopards had to pay a heavy price for stealing that win. Ellen Gabriel '93, Lisa Fink '93, and Jill Spatzer '93 pounded out three hits apiece and drove in eight. Heather Hoehn '94 plated four herself as the Lady Bison rompted 14-2 in five innings (courtesy of the ten-run rule). Alison Love '95 avenged her personal defeat by holding Lafayette to two runs and five hits.

Game eight of the tourney allowed Bucknell to pay back another rival, but not nearly as easily. Army, who ten-run ruled Bucknell during the regular season, extended the Lady Bison further than any previous opponent.

"It was the best game I've ever seen," said head coach Terri Grieb. Who could argue? Seventeen innings settled nothing, including the nerves of either squad. Down heading into their final at-bats in the seventh and 12th, the Lady Bison battled back to tie the score. Finally, with one out in the 18th, Bucknell broke through and sent the Cadets to the losers' bracket with a 4-3 win.

"We executed, made the big plays, and got the key hits," said Grieb. "Everybody stepped up to help get us the win."

Fink's five hits paced the Bucknell offense that included six multiple hit batsmen. Heidi Dawson '95 went the entire 18 innings on the mound to earn the hard-fought victory and first of three straight games against Lehigh.

As mentioned earlier, Bucknell downed Lehigh 4-3 (notice a pattern?) in eight innings to earn Sunday morning off.

Game 14 could either clinch the title for the Lady Bison or force a deciding final game. Lehigh opted for the latter. Down 3-0 after three innings, the Engineers battled back against Dawson to tie the score an inning later. Lehigh pitcher Nina Rems shut Bucknell down the final four innings, giving her team a chance to win in the bottom of the seventh. The top-seeded Engineers took full advantage of the situation by pushing across the winning run with two outs for the 4-3 win that forced a deciding game 15.

Love and Meri Wall squared off in the title game. After leading 1-0, the Lady Bison suddenly found themselves trailing 3-1 heading into the home half of the fourth. That deficit didn't last long. Bucknell put up two runs to answer the challenge and set the stage for another 4-3 decision. Le-

BRIGHT

I did," Bright said, "because throughout the year, we were always kidding each other in practice about looking in the stat sheet to see who's ahead, and at the beginning of the year, Russell was always ahead of me."

Toward the end of the season, the Bison experienced a rough stretch, when they were still winning, but not as handily as they had earlier in the season against similar opponents. Oftentimes, Bright took it upon himself to carry the team through this tough time.

"I think I was voted captain because I didn't feel the pressure at the time," said Bright. "If you feel there's pressure, then you're not going to play as well as you can."

According to Bright, it was important in his position to make the right decision during crucial points in important games. He also thought that his job was easier because of the team surrounding him. "I was fortunate to have seven or eight really good players on the court with me," he said. He added, "I just tried to go out there and do what was needed of me."

Bright is certain of his abilities, and he knows he wants to play professional basketball. However, he realizes that "I'm not one of those players that can say, okay, I'm definitely going to the NBA, but I'm also not saying, well, I have nothing but Europe. I'm one of the players who is in between right now."

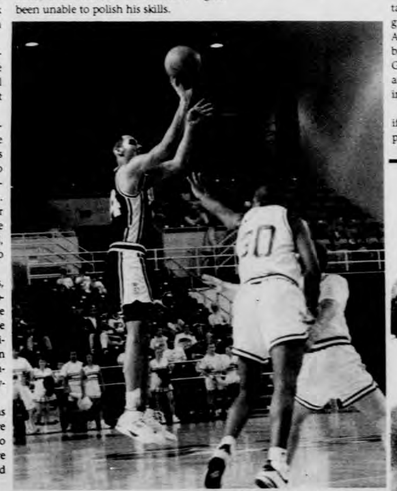
Bright's goal now is to gain as much exposure as possible before decisions have to be made, and to "play against those guys who are definitely playing in the NBA, and see what I have to work on."

One of Bright's biggest obstacles has been the lack of national exposure that Bucknell receives. He said, "I was recruited by bigger schools, but if you've got the talent, it doesn't matter where you go, they will find you."

Bright is also confident that he would not have achieved as much at any of the bigger schools that recruited him, including Georgetown and Kansas, because he would not have received as much playing time, and therefore would have been unable to polish his skills.

Also, Bright sees beyond basketball, saying that "the reason why I ended up here is for academic reasons. I know that basketball can only take you so far."

On that note, Bright knows that his greatest accomplishment has not yet been achieved here at Bucknell. He said, "the best accomplishment won't happen until May 30 when I graduate and get my degree."



Solaida Mamsaang — The Bucknellian
Bright's jumper, as well as the rest of his game, will be sorely missed.

GRUNOW

100-meter butterfly with a time of 1:03.32 at the U.S. Senior National Championships in Nashville, TN.

In four years of swimming, Grunow won 88 individual races and never lost a regular season 50- or 100-yard freestyle event. Over the last two years, she compiled a record of 49-0, including an Eastern title.

After all of the training and hard work, Grunow cites her 1992 invitation to the Olympic Trials as her greatest swimming achievement. After failing to qualify many times before and in numerous events, Grunow was finally able to secure an invitation with her performance in the 50-meter freestyle.

"I was very excited when I qualified," said Grunow of her fondest pool memory.

She is also very proud of the development of her other events. In the events that she is not as strong in, she has managed to improve greatly upon her times in high school.

"Since coming to Bucknell, I am very proud of the versatility that I have developed," said Grunow. It is this versatility that proved crucial to Bucknell's second place finish at this season's championships.

Outside of the Freas-Rooke Pool, Grunow graduates this spring with a bachelor of arts degree in history. As for future plans, she will take a year off in order to enroll in courses required for graduate school in physical therapy.

"I am very interested in physical therapy," said Grunow. "Next year, I will take some introductory courses and finish applications to some three-year program graduate schools."

As perhaps the greatest swimmer to jump off the blocks at Bucknell, Grunow leaves a lasting legacy of swimming accomplishments and records.

"Her records speak for themselves," said Kachmarik, "but what is more impressive is what she does for the team out of the water."

"Not only is she an exceptional swimmer," commented Rose Maguire '96, "but she cares about how everyone else performs. She helped us with our mental focus and preparation. I think she was a better captain because of that."

"She was, in essence, our backbone," said Kachmarik. "In twenty years of coaching at this level, I have more respect for Margaret than anyone I have ever come across."

1992–93 Athletes and Coaches of the Year

Bright soars to Male Athlete of the Year Crown

BY NEIL BARDACH
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Mike Bright '93 is The Bucknellian's Male Athlete of the Year. Bright, one of three captains on the men's basketball team this year, finished in the top ten in the nation in steals, along with his teammate and long-time friend, Russell Peyton '93. The two were the only teammates in the country to both finish in the top ten in that category.

Looking back on his final year as a Bison, Bright says he will always remember the two final games against Holy Cross. He said, "The first one [was special to me], not only because we won the championship by ourselves, but I had a whole bunch of family there, and it was my senior night. Everything wrapped up in that will make me always remember that."

Bright's Resume
- Team Tri-Captain
- 1993 Patriot League Player of the Year
- 4th in the nation in steals per game
- 3rd leading scorer in Bucknell history

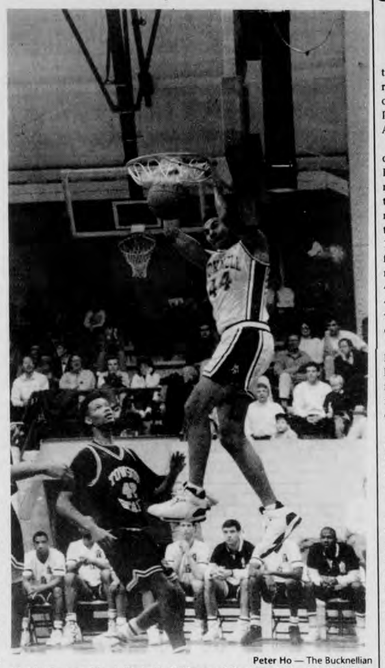
Bright also said that he will always remember the final game of the Patriot League tournament because "it was my last college game. We lost, although I felt we gave it the effort and Holy Cross was better that night; but, you know that's basketball— one night you're better, and one night you're not."

Bright's records this season were numerous, but perhaps most memorable was his record-setting performance against Loyola, MD, when he buried nine straight three-point shots, a Patriot League record.

"It's hard to say you don't know what you're doing," said Bright, "because obviously, and I don't care what sport you're in, and you can be as modest all you want, but you still know when you're hot."



Peter Ho — The Bucknellian
Patriot League Men's Basketball Player of the Year Mike Bright '93 brought Bucknell sports to a new level of excitement during his outstanding career and becomes the first basketball player honored.

"After a while," he said, "I could hear my teammates saying 'man, you're hot, that's five already. I wasn't thinking about breaking school records and Bucknell records and Patriot League records."

As it happened, Bright managed the record while playing only 20 minutes in that game.

Defensively, Bright has been the star of the team for a long time, but this year, he received stiff competition from his friend Peyton.

"I credit Russell Peyton this year for making me get as many steals as

Grunow remains Female Athlete of the Year

BY JONATHAN BORDEAU
Bucknellian Staff Writer

As she closes in on graduation this spring, Margaret Grunow '93 is riding a tidal wave of success and accomplishments out of Freas-Rooke Pool as The Bucknellian Women's Athlete of the Year.

Winning the award a second consecutive time, Grunow leaves Lewisburg as the best Bucknell female swimmer of all time. She holds three individual Patriot League records in the 50-meter freestyle, the 100-meter freestyle, and the 100-meter fly. She was a member of four Patriot League record-setting relay teams, including the 200- and 400-medley relays and the 200-and 400-free relays. She owns 19 individual and team championships, compiled in four years at Bucknell.

A two year co-captain for coach Lynn Kachmarik, Grunow earns high praise from one of her biggest fans. "Margaret was a major factor in elevating our program to the level it is at now," said Kachmarik.

"We are one of the strongest programs in the East and that can be attributed, in large part to Margaret's preparation, motivation, and training."

Grunow came to Bucknell with relatively little swimming experience. She came to Lewisburg from Greenwich (CT) High School with ambitions to swim for coach Kachmarik. She liked Bucknell swimming because she "did not want to be staring at the bottom of a pool for four years."

Once at Bucknell, Grunow's times became faster and faster. She broke her habits and started to practice in the off-season with former Bucknellian Jim Harvey. She spent her summers training in Fort Lauderdale and New Jersey, shaving precious seconds off of her times.

In addition to being honored as a Patriot League All-Academic with a 3.2 G.P.A. in season, Grunow has garnered many honors and awards from around the league and the country. She was named Patriot League Outstanding Swimmer of the Championships for her efforts during the 1991-1992 and 1992-1993 seasons. Grunow is also a two-time Patriot League Swimmer of the Year. Recently, she was named the recipient of the prestigious Robert A. Latour Award, presented annually to a member of the women's swim team in "recognition of leadership, sportsmanship, outstanding achievement, and dedication."

Peter Ho — The Bucknellian
Margaret Grunow '93, owner of nearly every Bucknell swimming record, earned her second straight Athlete of the Year award with another standout winter that included Patriot League MVP honors.

- Two year Co-Captain
- Patriot League All-Academic Team
- Two-time Patriot League Swimmer of the Year

- 6 Bucknell records, 3 league records

Nationally, Grunow became the first Bucknell female swimmer to compete at the Olympic Trials. At the 1992 Summer Olympic Trials, Grunow finished 32nd out of 66 competitors in the 50-meter freestyle. In the same event, Grunow finished 20th among the nation's elite at the Outdoor U.S. Senior National Championships in 1992. This past year, she placed ninth in the

Ewan earns Women's Coach of the Year

BY JONATHAN BORDEAU
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Guiding the women's tennis team to its second-straight year of dominance and earning Patriot League Coach of the Year honors is good enough to earn Rose Ewan The Bucknellian's Women's Coach of the Year Award.

In addition to coaching tennis, Ewan is Associate Athletic Director at Bucknell. She had served as Assistant Athletic Director for Bucknell's women's sports since 1986 before being promoted in 1990.

Prior to her appointment at Bucknell, Ewan was the assistant athletic director, field hockey and tennis coach at Mt. Pleasant Senior High School in Wilmington, DE. Under her leadership, the field hockey team qualified for the state tournament four of her five years, while the tennis team won five state titles and was runner-up seven times.

Ewan is a 1964 graduate of Penn State University. As an undergraduate, she was named the outstanding woman athlete of her senior class. A native of Chambersburg, PA, Ewan also holds a masters degree from Penn State.

Now in her 15th year at Bucknell, Ewan has enjoyed 14 seasons at the helm of Bison women's tennis. Her affiliation with Bucknell began when she dated a Bucknellian while enrolled at Penn State. A friend told her of the availability of the women's field hockey and lacrosse coach position at Bucknell and after a successful interview, Ewan was "one of the lucky people that got accepted for the job."

A year after her appointment, Ewan switched to the head coaching position of Bison women's tennis. During her 14-year tenure Ewan has amassed a career record of 135-103-1. Her career coaching record has been strengthened by two successive years of dominating play as the Bison have gone 28-2 in the past two seasons. This record of achievement has included a second-place finish at the Patriot League Championships in 1991. Avenging last year's second place finish, the Bison returned to league play and dominated their opponents this past season, taking home their first-ever Patriot League crown in the team's 21-year history.

En route to the title, the team strung together ten consecutive wins before falling 6-3 at the hands of Seton Hall, but later closed out the regular season boasting a 12-1 record. In addition to the ten straight wins from this season, the Bison carried over 15 straight wins from 1991. The combined 25 victories marked the third-longest winning streak in Bucknell athletic history.

Woollum scores as Men's Coach of the Year

BY NEIL BARDACH

Men's basketball coach Charlie Woollum is The Bucknellian's men's Coach of the Year. Woollum led his team to a 23-6 overall record, including a 13-1 record in the Patriot League.

Entering the year, Woollum and his staff were faced with several question marks concerning the upcoming season, especially getting the ball into the hoop.

"We lost 40 points [a game] with Matt King ['92] and Bill Courtney ['92]," said Woollum, "so we made the decision early on in the season to try to adjust our defense, to try and generate some points from that end of the floor."

The past season left the Bucknell community with a sense of enthusiasm that has not been felt for a long time, a sense of enthusiasm that Woollum tries to bring to every game he coaches. "We try to make basketball fun for the player and the fans," he said.

The game that sticks in the coach's mind from the season was the game on Jan. 30 at Holy Cross.

"I think our comeback against Holy Cross, when we had been down by so much, really let our kids know they could play," said Woollum. The team definitely responded from that point on in the season, as they finished the season 11-1 (including the Patriot League tournament) from then on. In fact, Woollum believes that the streak "was probably as good a streak as we've had in my 18 years here."

Mike Bright '93, one of the team's tri-captains, said of his coach for the last four years, "Coach [Woollum] was more than just a

Dollenberg competes at Eastern Intercollegiates

Bucknell junior golfer Doug Dollenberg competed at the Eastern Intercollegiate Golf Championships held at Hog's Neck Golf Club in Easton, Maryland this past weekend.

Dollenberg, one of five individuals selected to compete along with 17 full teams that were invited, shot 83 the first day and came back to card 81 in the second round to finish at 164. That ranked fourth among the five individual entries in the tournament. Penn State won the tournament with a team score of 604, edging Army by one shot.

With this weekend's play, Dollenberg concludes the spring season with an average of 80.8 in 11 rounds of competitive play. His season-best score was a 76 at the Patriot League championships, where he placed sixth overall.

Lacrosse goalie earns citation for her poetry

Sophomore Wendy Schwieger, the Bison's starting goalie in women's lacrosse, was a finalist for the Julia Fonville Smithson Memorial Prize in creative writing, selected by the Department of English. Schwieger received honorable mention for her poem, "Dinner."

A walk-on with the lacrosse team this year, Schwieger started every game for the Bison and recorded 131 saves for a .443 save percentage. The team recently concluded the 1993 season with a 3-10 record overall and 1-3 mark in the Patriot League.

Nawarskas named honor society secretary

Junior women's basketball player Monica Nawarskas has been elected secretary of the Bucknell chapter of the Delta Mu Delta honor society in business administration for the 1993-94 academic year.

Nawaskas, a captain-elect of next year's women's basketball team, holds a 3.5 cumulative grade-point average in business administration.

Nawarskas started 16 of Bucknell's 28 games this year and finished third on the team in scoring with 8.5 points per game. The Bison finished the 1992-93 season with an 11-17 mark and advanced to the Patriot League semifinals before bowing to eventual champion Holy Cross.

Zackey leads nation in lacrosse scoring

Junior lacrosse player Justin Zackey currently leads the nation in scoring with just two games to play. Zackey, who scored 11 goals in two games this past week, now has scored 58 goals in 13 games for a 4.462 goals-per-game average.

According to the latest rankings compiled by the U.S. Intercollegiate Lacrosse Association, Derek Laub of Colgate ranked second with 4.111 goals per game, but that number slipped as Laub scored just four goals in two games this past week.

Men's lax loses thriller, gets routed

BY DARREN MILLMAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Last Saturday's men's lacrosse game between the Bison and Lafayette was reflective of the season as a whole—plenty of excitement, but in the end, disappointment.

Those who attended the game witnessed one of the most thrilling contests this campus has ever seen. Trailing 14-12 with under five minutes remaining in the game, Bison midfielder Graham Officer '95 found high-scoring Justin Zackey '94 cutting towards the goal and Zackey stuck his team-leading sixth goal of the game in the back of the net.

Down by one goal, the stage was set for what would be the most memorable single play of this season, and certainly one of the most astonishing plays in team history. With ten seconds left in regulation, defenseman Jeff Kangas '94 inbounded the ball from the Bison endline. Kangas passed to goalie Colin Barker '94 in front of the Bison net.

Time had dwindled to only about five seconds as Barker found defenseman Sean Krieg '94 about ten yards inside the midfield line. As the final seconds ticked off the clock, Krieg showed the fans his best Christian Laettner impersonation, rolling to his right and launching a desperation shot in the direction of the Leopard net.

With a mob of players from both teams grouped in front of the net, the Lafayette goalie had no choice but to look up into the bright sun. Amazingly, Krieg's bomb eluded every player, including the blinded Leopard goalie, and settled into the top right corner of the cage. Bedlam followed as Krieg's teammates stormed the field and piled on top of him. After taking several minutes to sort out the implications of that astounding play, the officials correctly indicated that the game would continue with a four minute sudden-death overtime period.

Despite several opportunities for each side, the first overtime period ended without a goal. As the second overtime period began, it appeared the Bison were showing signs of fatigue, particularly at the midfield position. After making several strong saves in the Bucknell net, Barker was finally beat as Lafayette midfielder David Comfort dashed passed his man on a sweep and scored the game winner. The loss ensured the Bison of a disappointing fifth-place finish in the six-team Patriot League field. Prior to the season, the team had aspirations of finishing no lower than second behind Army.

Amazingly, Krieg's bomb eluded every player, including the blinded Leopard goalie, and settled into the top right corner of the cage.

After the heart-breaking loss to Lafayette, the Bison had the unenviable task of traveling to Princeton to take on the nation's second-ranked team. There were few surprises in this one. Princeton won and won big. The Bison were never really in this game falling behind 10-1 before halftime en route to suffering a 19-2 pounding.

If anything should come as a surprise, it is the fact that Zackey who had scored at least four goals in ten straight games, failed to score at all in this one. On the opponents side, Dan Quayle's son Jay, a sophomore midfielder for the Tigers, added insult to injury assisting on his team's eighteenth goal, and scoring the nineteenth. Apparently, he felt the $22,000 speaking fee his father received was insufficient.

The season will come to a merciful end as the Bison visit the University of Scranton on Saturday to destroy what promises to be a grossly inferior team. With a win over Scranton, the final season record would stand at a mediocre 6-9.

There is some good news for Bison lax fans. The team will return virtually the entire starting unit and bench. Starting attackman Todd Streelman '93 was the team's second leading point scorer with 19 goals and 30 assists. In his career, Streelman has amassed 49 goals and 74 assists. He will graduate third on the school's all-time assist list.

Also lost to graduation are midfielders Ricky Herrema '93 and Dan Snyder '93. Herrema has been the team's primary face-off man for each of the last three seasons. He leaves some very large shoes to fill. Also graduating is defenseman Gabe Portuondo '93 who played only two games this year before suffering a season ending injury.

Women's H_20 polo places third

Victoria Gorman '93 leads Lady Bison to wins over three Ivy foes

BUCKNELLIAN TEAM CORRESPONDENT

From April 23 to 25, the Bucknell women's water polo team competed in the Eastern tournament at Princeton University. The team, led by Seniors Victoria Gorman and Diane Schulte, consisted of only five returning players so this young team had its work cut out for them.

Friday night, the women played at College Park. They had played and lost against the Terps just the week before at a home tournament, but the team knew that Maryland was not beyond its reach. This ended up being the game of the tournament as both teams played up to their potential.

The first quarter was a battle. Maryland scored first, but Bucknell answered with two more in the next two minutes from Gorman and Bell. Maryland, however, came back with two more and Bucknell added a third from Gillespie. At the end of the first quarter, the teams were tied at three goals apiece.

The second quarter was a different story. The shooting arms of Maryland came out strong with four goals while Bucknell only answered with one from Gorman.

During halftime, Bucknell refocused and then proceeded to hold Maryland to only two goals as Gorman added two more in the third quarter. When the fourth quarter rolled around, Bucknell knew it had its work cut out for them. The women added four more goals, two from Gorman and one apiece from Nielsen and Klaus, but Maryland answered with three more. The final score showed the story: Maryland 12, Bucknell 10.

Unfortunately, that loss forced the women to play for third on Sunday morning. Before that game, however, at 10 p.m. Bucknell was faced with the stiffest competition in the East—Slippery Rock University, who has a reputation for excellence in water polo. For many years they have placed well in the national tournament against the powerhouses of California. Their talent showed as Bucknell lost soundly to the Rock, 18-3. Gorman, Nielsen, and Gillespie provided the only goals.

After a night of sleep to recuperate, the Bison women took on Brown University for third place Sunday morning at 11. They came out strong with three goals in the first quarter made by Schulte, Bell and Gorman. In the second quarter, two more were scored by Bell and Nielsen. With the strong support of fellow starters, Presecan, Klaus, Gillespie, and Staiano, Brown was shut out for the first two quarters.

Finally, in the third quarter, Brown got a goal, but Gorman had already scored for her second of the game. During the fourth quarter, the younger players kept Brown to only two goals while Klaus added two more to the scoreboard. In the end, Bucknell took third place with a win of 8-3.

The entire tournament was packed with outstanding performances. First year goalie Nicole Lloyd proved to be an asset in the goal as she continuously blocked shots. Her performance was also noticed by other coaches and referees as she was named to the All-Tournament Second Team.

Also on that team was junior Anne-Marie Nielsen. She was able to put seven points on the scoreboard during the tournament and assisted in the hole for other goals. Returning starter and senior Diane Schulte, additionally, proved to be an experienced player. Schulte was also honored with a place on the All-Tournament Second Team.

The most valuable player of the team proved, once again, to be Victoria Gorman. Gorman, a member of the Women's National 'B' Team, managed to score 22 goals in the five games of the Eastern tournament. More importantly, however, she has led this team to great achievement through her encouragement in and out of the pool. The Bison women are losing her to graduation, but Gorman's dedication to the team has brought it to a level of excellence that will continue even when she is gone.

coach to us— he was like a father figure. He always treated us like adults." At the same time, said Bright, everyone understood that the coach's work was final. "It's like Coach always said, 'this isn't a democracy, it's a dictatorship.'"

Toward the end of the season, when the Patriot League tournament began, the team hit a stretch when there play was not as dominating as it had been earlier in the season.

Woollum said of that stretch, "I think, sooner or later, when you're playing well, you're bound to hit a tough time."

He said of the tournament, "We did not play very well against Lehigh, and they came in and held the ball; it was a good move, and we had a tough time defending it."

The tournament was a success, though. Said Woollum, "You had to go in there and beat [those teams] three times in a single season, which we did."

One of Woollum's big question marks for the upcoming season will be dealing with the loss of all of this year's seniors, especially Bright, the Patriot League Player of the Year. He and teammate Russell Peyton '93 were the only same-team duo to finish the season among the top ten in the nation in steals.

Now that the season is over, Coach Woollum has begun the recruiting process, and is now preparing for the period in which he can look at high school juniors.

The recruiting process is not easy for Coach Woollum, especially given the high academic standards of Bucknell. As he said, "We are looking for kids who are academically qualified, which automatically rules out about 85% of basketball players."

ry. Youth proved fruitful, however, as the trio of first-year players Lauren Weihl, Sara Allen, and Erika Anhood, playing at fourth through sixth singles, garnered Patriot League championship victories. Julia Diaz '95 and Kristina Lutter '95 added to the ranks of successful youth for coach Ewan. Playing at number one and two singles, respectively, the tandem combined for a 22-3 record on the season. The team's only junior, captain Kymm Carlson, posted a 9-4 record on the season playing in the number three slot. Ewan's team displayed dominance throughout the league this season, outscoring opponents 92-19 and shutting them out five times.

"The thing I appreciated most about this year's team," said coach Ewan, "was the independence and maturity of such a young group of players. Kymm [Carlson] set a positive example through peer leadership and involvement with other players."

Her players flaunt nothing but praise about their coach. "She always stresses positive attitude," said Diaz. "She encourages everyone to never give up. If you lose the first set, then treat the second set as a whole new match. She is a big proponent of positive attitude."

As far as motivation and coaching technique are concerned, Diaz sees coach Ewan as more of a quiet motivator. "She likes her players to be independent," said Diaz. "I guess she figures that if you have been playing long enough to make it to competition at the college level, then you pretty much know how to identify your problems. Before matches, [Ewan] gives us little pep-talk lectures and then lets us go out on the court and play our own matches. She'll offer encouragement if someone is down in a match, otherwise she enjoys everyone's success."

Baseball's hopes, season fall short

BY JON TERRY
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Susan Naughton — The Bucknellian
Brian Koch '95 connects on his second homer of the year in Tuesday's loss to West Chester at the mods.

For the fourth consecutive year the Bucknell baseball team has entered the season's final weekend with a chance to make an impact in the post-season, and for the fourth consecutive year the team has seen its season end in an abrupt and disappointing fashion.

This time last week the Bison knew they needed to win three of four games against Army and Colgate to win the Patriot League's Southern Division. After Lehigh's improbable doubleheader sweep of Lafayette, it actually turned out that they needed only two wins out of four—a feat that should not have been entirely out of the question given the fact that starting pitchers Jake Kazanjian '93 and Kurt Waldner '93 have proven that they are among the best in the conference. But once again hope turned sour, and the right to play Fordham in the league championship series slipped away, as the Bison dropped three of four to their Northern Division foes to finish the year with a 15-25 overall record, 10-10 in the Patriot League.

For the team's veterans, memories of 1993 will be especially dark. In each of the past two years Bucknell had to win three-game series over Lafayette to keep their season alive. That was considered a tough task given the strength of the Leopards' pitching in those years. Mark Antolick, for example, was named the conference's top hurler last year and is now collecting a paycheck for his talents.

This year, however, was a different story. Despite getting off to a slow start in March, the team sat atop the Southern Division for all but a few days during league play. The season featured a no-hitter by Waldner—only the second in Bucknell history—and a dominating road sweep over Navy. All in all, the team looked as if it would be just good enough to take the crown.

One major factor on the team's descent was the season-ending finger injury to shortstop Scott Sutfin '94. Sutfin was by far the steadiest force on the squad this year. He hit .344, led the team in runs (25) and hits (33), and was second in stolen bases (9). Defensively Sutfin struggled early in the season, especially in the eight-game Florida road trip, but he settled down after that, committing only five errors in his last 21 games. If you don't think that losing Sutfin hurt the team, consider that his replacements at shortstop were an abysmal 2-for-17 with five errors in the team's last five games played without him.

In the first of two against Army last Friday, Waldner sought his ever-so-elusive 18th career victory, which would place him atop the school's all-time list. Unfortunately it was not to be for the senior righthander who got knocked around for the second straight outing, as the Bison fell, 5-1. Army outhit Bucknell 10-4 and also took advantage of three errors as they broke open a 1-1 game with two runs in the fourth and sixth innings. Dwight Steward '95 drove in the only run of the game for Bucknell in the fourth inning.

In the Bison's 3-1 loss in the nightcap, they got the baserunners, but could not get them across the dish. It was pretty much the same old story for Kazanjian. All year he has received little support form both his offense and defense, and he is usually done in by one bad inning. This time an RBI double by John Martine '94 scored Larry Trout '93 to give the Bison a 1-0 lead in the second inning. That was all they could muster, though, despite out-hitting the Cadets 9-4. Pete Gorski '96 made three errors at short, and Kazanjian allowed a two-run single to Bill Mullee in the fourth inning, and that was the ballgame.

Even though they did not know it at the time, a Saturday sweep at

Men's crew wins league, ladies sixth

BUCKNELLIAN TEAM CORRESPONDENT

Bucknell Crew hosted the Patriot League Championship Regatta on Walker Lake in Snyder County two weeks ago. As parents and friends crowded the shores of the normally serene fishing reservoir, the men's team became the new Patriot League champions, and the women's team placed sixth. Collectively, the men's and women's teams tied Colgate for second place overall with 125 points, barely losing the title to Fordham with 128 points. Although Head Coach Jim King seemed pleased with Bucknell's performance, many of the rowers felt frustrated. The heavy rains and subsequent flooding of the Susquehanna River have kept Bucknell Crew indoors for much of the season. "We know that if we had the water practice, we would have destroyed everyone else," commented Andy Bush '93.

Bush's confidence in the potential of his teammates was fulfilled this past weekend at the Mid-Atlantic Regional Championships in Occoquan, VA. There, Bucknell Crew competed against many of the more competitive crews from the Washington, DC area.

The novice men once again stole the show by walking away with the gold in both the four and the eight. They impressed the whole team as they easily defeated such larger, better-funded programs like Georgetown and George Washington.

In other novice competition, the women's eight did not win their initial heat, but soundly beat everyone in the petite finals to place seventh overall.

The varsity lightweight men's eight lost the gold to Georgetown by less than two seconds, and missed second place to Johns Hopkins by a mere one-hundredth of a second. "We just couldn't get the rating up for the sprint," said team captain Edward Williams '93. The crew is confident that it will avenge its performance this weekend at the prestigious Dad Vail Championship Regatta in Philadelphia. This is the premiere event of small-school spring competition, with crews from as far away as Ontario competing.

The varsity heavyweight men's four exceeded all expectations by placing second to Georgetown in their initial heat. Their performance placed them in the grand final, where they just missed fourth to a tough Loyola crew and were not far from third-place finishers from UVA. Coxswain Jacquelyn Shriver '93 remarked afterward that "although I believe we could have medaled, I am pleased with the way we pulled it all together for this race. Our season has been one frustration after another, but we know we did better today than anyone expected of us."

Similarly, the varsity heavyweight women's four exceeded all expectations as well. After a brief illness, Tina Pinto '94 was back in the bow, pulling the women to second place in their heat and fourth in the final. Everyone was impressed by their defeat of Navy, one of the most competitive women's crews in the country.

The varsity lightweight women's four took home the bronze with their excellent performance in their race. The crews that both women's boats defeated are the same crews that will be competitive in Philadelphia.

Unfortunately, Mid-Atlantics was the last race of the season for many Bucknell rowers. Head Coach Jim King feels that the lack of water time will prevent many of his crews from being a significant competitive force at the Dad Vail Regatta. Yet based on their performances at Mid-Atlantics, these rowers are happy with how the season ended. They will be anxious to see how the boats they have defeated will perform this weekend.

Only the novice men and women, the junior varsity men's eight, and the varsity lightweight men's eight have performed consistently well enough all season to participate in the championships in Philadelphia this weekend. These crews all have the potential to make it to the final rounds, making this the most successful season in the history of Bucknell Crew.

high scored that all-important fourth run in the top of the seventh, putting the pressure on the Lady Bison to answer once again. Wall, tournament co-MVP, shut out the Lady Bison in the bottom of the seventh to end the tournament and the winningest season in Bucknell history.

"Saturday was physically draining, but we were rested mentally and physically for Sunday," said Hoehn. "We were in the driver's seat and had it in our hands."

Grieb could only shake her head as she continued to recall the tournament. "It will probably take a month to sink in, but we finished our seed [#2] and exceeded my expectations for this season."

When asked where this team stood relative to her previous squads, the coach wasn't sure but said, "Maybe we've had more talent, but this team had something different, a hunger, an inner strength that could've come from being knocked out of last year's tournament early. I'm very proud of them. They put their names in the record books."

This senior class certainly earned its place along side any other in those record books. Fink closed out one the best careers in Bucknell history with a .440 batting average and Player of the Year honors in the Patriot League. Jen Yuengling '93 hovered around the .400 mark all season and was the league's top lead-off hitter and first team All-League catcher. Despite not playing in ten games, Spatzer finished second on the team in RBI and hit .389. Third baseman Carol Gesler '93 anchored the left side of Bucknell's infield throughout her career and will be tough to replace. Gabriel, who DH'ed and played outfield, contributed greatly to the offense going 9 for 20 in the tournament.

Solaida Mamsaang — The Bucknellian

First baseman Heather Hoehn '94 earned First-Team All-Patriot League honors and led the team in runs batted in this season.

The cupboard won't be left completely bare when the Lady Bison take the field again next spring. First and foremost, all three pitchers, including Patriot League Pitcher of the Year Dawson, return. Behind them, All-League shortstop Kelly Corr '95 and All-League first baseman Hoehn provide a strong offensive base for next year's line-up.

While the slim chance of an at-large ECAC bid remains, Bucknell's 27-8 mark will probably be the final record entered into the books. When they say, "We had it," the coach and players mean the league title. But, what they had was one of the best seasons of any Bucknell athletic team this year.

in trials. Akwei placed fifth in the 400-meter dash, but Bucknell failed to score in the 200-meter dash.

The Orange and Blue 4x100-meter relay squad took third while the two-mile relay quartet finished fourth.

So after all that, what were the final scores? Army 214, Navy 106, Bucknell 92, Lehigh 89, Lafayette 60, Fordham 53, Colgate 35, and Holy Cross brought up the rear with two points.

Gulden had several impressions of the weekend's events. "The whole meet was fun. We were aware that Navy and Army were strong, and we knew Lehigh would be close," said the coach. "I thought we'd get between 60 and 70 points and not the 92 we ended up with. The competition pushed us, and we reacted very, very well."

Gulden went on to comment on his senior class. "They did very well. It's a credit to them and the four years of work that they've put in. They competed well even when they were hurt or sick."

Not wanting to close the book on this senior class on a negative note, Gulden concluded, "You don't have to win to get super performances and be pleased with your team. Army and Navy are super teams. The team shouldn't feel any remorse."

COMMENTARY

Bright's dunk at the buzzer triggered bleacher-clearing pandemonium.

Of course, there would be other similar moments. Raymond Brown's buzzer-beater over Rider and Bright's steal and slam in the semifinals against Colgate this year were the loudest moments I can recall in Davis Gym. Other priceless moments include Mike Joseph's "taunting" technical in the 1990 tourney at the Towson Center, in which he hit his defender in the face with a ball fake; head manager Chris Drowne drawing a tech in the 1991 semifinal against Fordham; and Bill Courtney's off-the-backboard alley-oop pass to Bright that same year.

Perhaps the best single-game performance I can recall in my four years here was the one turned in by Matt "Amigo" Clark in front of his friends and family against Northern Iowa in the 1990 San Juan Shootout. Clark made the most of his 40 seconds of court time by committing three fouls and drawing a technical. At least Clark didn't try to show off by scoring any points.

One of the more unfortunate stories in the last four years actually turned out for the better. After losing in the first round of the 1991 women's basketball tournament, ex-coach Lori Howard left four of her players stranded in Worcester, MA after they allegedly broke team rules. After not allowing the players to come home on the team bus, coupled with the fact that she only won two games that year, Howard was dismissed. The ugly situation became brighter, however, when former Arizona St. coach Juliene Simpson was brought to Lewisburg. In her first two campaigns here, Simpson has rescued the troubled program, as evidenced by the team's fifth-place finish and conference semi-final appearance this year.

What can I say about Art Gulden's track and cross-country programs? Very few people know about it, but Gulden has been one of the most successful coaches in the country—in any sport. Dean Smith hasn't even come close to winning 18 straight conference championships, but Bucknell's men's cross-country team sure has. Both the men and women won indoor track titles again this year, and throw out the service academies, whose job it is to train every darn student there to be a good runner, and both outdoor teams would have also had two more banners to put in the fieldhouse.

The Runnin' Bison are a big part of why Bucknell is an annual President's Cup winner as the Patriot League's most successful school on the fields and courts. I guess I will leave here with the rememberance of Bucknell as not only a fine academic institution, but one in which athletics play a major role—and not just on the varsity level. If you don't believe me, just walk outside and count the number of people jogging, roller blading, or playing softball. In the winter time, you can't find an open basketball court, and try walking into a dorm room without spotting a pair of skis in the corner.

Anyway, I hope all of you who will be here for at least another year realize the quality of Bucknell athletics. We're no North Carolina, but at least we're no Prarie View A&M.

A final Collegiate Perspective

So the two sports section editors leave it to yours truly to fill out the paper's back page, which is about as appealing a forum in which to display one's talents as the Mod fields. Okay, though, I'll just consider this as a favor to old friends.

And now, for the final time, some expectedly random thoughts—this time from around the world of sports:

•You heard it here first (or third): Bucknell is a lock to win the Patriot League's President's Cup for the third-straight year. This is getting embarrassing. Maybe we should fire up the competition next fall by renaming it the "President Sojka Cup."

•Who ever said that crime doesn't pay must have had his thinking cap on. Case in point: Consider the recently misguided efforts of one Guenter Parche. The 38-year-old German lathe operator and full-time Beech Nut stabbed No. 1-ranked Monica Seles at a tennis tournament this past week in Germany so that his idol Steffi "Jodie Foster" Graf would move up to the top of the women's tennis rankings, and his plot just might have worked as far as taking Seles out of commission. However, Graf was so shaken up by the assault on her close friend that she went on to fall in that same tourney's final, 6-3, 6-4. Talk about reaping what you sow—or, lapping up what you lathe, depending on what side of the Berlin Wall you're from.

•If Francis Ford Coppola has any sense in his head, he'll snatch up the opportunity to direct a motion picture extravaganza about last weekend's men's lacrosse thriller between Bucknell and Lafayette. The Orange and Blue were down, 14-13, with ten seconds left when a Bison stickman heaved in a miraculous tying goal from three-fifths of the way down the field. It was a beautiful, sunny Saturday afternoon, Earth Day was in full swing, and the capacity crowd went crazy.

Well, but then we went on to suffer a crushing defeat in sudden-death double overtime. And, I guess that horrendous sunburn that I have did result from sitting out there. Come to think of it, that was also the time when that Malinich-Booker thing got really ugly in the paper's Opinions section, and I would have to say that a hell of a lot of studytime was flat-out wasted while all of us watched the game. To say nothing, of course, of the fact that Lafayette entered the game at an abysmal 2-8.

Peter A. Lalos

On second thought, to hell with the film.

•I've always assumed that the people I see flinging the frisbee around on the University's quads are actually good at throwing them. However, after four years of watching these people toss discs into the ground about ten feet short of their playmates, I've come to the conclusion that most of them just plain stink on ice.

•Aren't these little black dots just the bee's knees? Got 'em six fo a dollar in town.

•Really, though, Washington D.C.'s murder rate is not as bad as the country makes it out to be. See, it's only the outlying areas of town that really have a crime problem. Wait—Make that the outlying areas and nearby Capital Centre in Landover, Md. That is where Washington center Dale Hunter plays most of his games, isn't it?

•If no one else is going to be bold enough to ask, then I will: When will "Tetris" become an officially-sanctioned varsity sport at Bucknell?

•Why do college women play softball, while college men play baseball? And don't give me the reason that female hands aren't big enough to fit around the other sport's game ball...

•If Michigan's Chris Webber is in fact going to turn pro, I wish him all the luck in the world. Now, I only hope he's better at calling an agent than a time out (Insert rim shot).

•When someone tells you that you "throw like a girl," does that mean that you also only earn 64 cents to the dollar?

•All the avid cyclists at Bucknell have to be asking this query: If a motorcycle can occupy a parking space on campus, why can't a bicycle? And what, pray tell, would the administration's policy be on unicycles? I guess that there would be nowhere to put a University sticker on the darned things.

•I think that the crew team should hold a competition celebrating the past achievements of the storied rock group Iron Butterfly. You know, because then Bucknell could have an In-A-Gadda-Da-Vida-Regatta.

But enough of this tom-foolery. I bid you farewell and green and orange and blue pastures. And so, I flail!!!

BASEBALL

Colgate would still have been good enough to win the division. Denis Maguire '93 went the distance on the hill for the Bison giving up just six hits, but the lefty could not figure out a way to retire Colgate's Seth Kaplan or Mike Mabardy, and it resulted in a 6-2 loss. Kaplan, the Red Raiders' left fielder and leadoff hitter, went 3-for-3 with a double and three runs scored, and third baseman Mabardy had two hits and three RBI. Only one other man in their lineup had a hit.

Bucknell had leads of 1-0 and 2-1 thanks to a double by Steve Gyimesi '93 and a Colgate error. Later on, more shoddy defense and anemic offense killed the Bison, however. The team made three more errors, which led to three unearned runs crossing the plate. Offensively, Bucknell could only come up with two hits against Craig Parkin, who came into the game with an 0-6 record on the season. The win was only the eighth of the year for Colgate, whose baseball program is close to being dropped.

In the second game, manager Gene Depew played mostly reserves since the chances of a division title had been erased in the previous hour and a half. Starter David Scranton '95 was finally the beneficiary of some offensive support. The Bison plated six runs in the fourth inning on their way to a too-little-too-late 9-5 triumph. Gyimesi was the star at the plate, going 4-for-4 while driving in five runs. The right fielder needed only a triple to hit for the cycle, and his three-run homer which highlighted the fourth frame was his second of the year, tying him with Bryan Koch '95 and Matt Sniegocki '93 for the team lead. Charlie Griak '96 threw in two hits and two RBI as well.

Susan Naughton — The Bucknellian

Kurt Waldner '93 got a no-decision in his final collegiate start. He was attempting to break Don Richards '56 career win record of 17.

On Tuesday, with the season basically over, the Bison were scheduled to play West Chester. Apparently the umpires assumed the game meant nothing and failed to show up, leaving trainer Steve Zinder and Daily Journal sports editor Chris Couragen as the men in charge. We're not quite sure if they were selected because they were the only two around when the teams were looking for umps, or if it was simply because they were the only ones wearing blue shirts, but nevertheless, the game went on.

About the only suspense on the afternoon was whether Waldner, pitching on just three days rest, could get his record-setting victory. Unfortunately, the answer was no, as Waldner left the game after six innings with the score tied at three. Maguire and Kazanjian each gave up a run in relief in the last game of their careers, and the Bison fell, 5-3. Koch's second round tripper of the year gave Bucknell a 2-1 lead after one, but they could not hold it.

In all, it was a disappointing year for the Bison. What's worse, the team loses a lot for next year. Three-fourths of the starting rotation will graduate—Waldner, Kazanjian, and Maguire. Those three had the three best earned run averages on a staff whose ERA was a lofty 6.61 on the season.

On the bright side, Sutfin will have one more year to try to erase this year's disappointing finish, and several other young players showed some promise in 1993. Griak played in 18 games and hit .351 with five doubles and five RBI. Steward, despite having a sore throwing arm all year, hit the ball hard at times and finished at .245 with seven RBI in 25 games.
